Any attempt on the part of the U.S. censorship office to treat the Nazis deferentially ended abruptly in December of 1941 with the entry of the Americans into World War II, as sparked by the bombing of Pearl Harbor. Nazis could, and have been, identified as bad guys in the huge majority of American films ever since.]

In the film, Reagan goes undercover to infiltrate a gang of spies. He poses as a counterfeiter to gain entrance to the illegal cabal. The villains are operating an airborne smuggling ring conceived as a means of bringing hostile aliens into the United States.

Reagan, the Fighting Irish, as Secret Service Agent Brass Bancroft, balls his fists to confront the enemy

Despite his emotional involvement with the notorious starlet, Ila Rhodes, Warners publicity set out to promote a squeaky clean image of Reagan as a new hero in the movies. A statement claimed, “Ronald Reagan, both in appearance and personality, is the representative of all that is admirable in young American manhood. There is nothing pretty boy about him. Virility is his outstanding characteristic.”

The mention of “pretty boy” was a veiled dig at Robert Taylor, the resident pretty boy at MGM. Ironically, Taylor was one of Reagan’s closest friends, a relationship so close that his girlfriend, Barbara Stanwyck, once accused her bisexual beau of having a crush on Reagan.

“I don’t want to be a candidate for glamour roles,” Reagan told the press. “I don’t care to have my hair curled.” To promote his macho image, he was photographed working out with Mushy Callahan, the former junior welterweight boxing champion.

Warners assigned a Californian, Noel M. Smith, to direct the picture. He had helmed Tooties and Tamales, his first film, back in 1919, and would go on to direct 125 movies between then and 1952.

On being introduced to Smith, Reagan asked, “When do I fight? And whom?”

Smith later recalled, “Within an hour, my star had five skinned knuckles, a bruised knee, and a lump half the size of an egg on his head.”

On the second week of the shoot, an actor in a minor role fired a blank .38 caliber cartridge too close to Reagan’s ear, puncturing his ear drum. The damage couldn’t be repaired, and he suffered a loss of hearing in that ear for the rest of his life.

Deep into the shoot, Reagan had another accident when, clad in his flying outfit, he stepped in front of a studio wind tunnel. As his parachute became unraveled, he was dragged by the hurricane-force winds across the railroad tracks of the props department and hurled against a wire fence. After the wind machines were shut down, he was rescued by two studio grips. An ambulance arrived and he was rushed to a hospital where he was examined. Doctors found no injuries, but he spent the night there and was released to recover at home that weekend before reporting back to work the following Monday morning.

Producer Bryan Foy had lined up an impressive supporting cast, including John Litel, James Stephenson, Rosella Towne, and Foy, Jr. “I’ve cast Ila Rhodes as your leading lady, although she’s inexperienced,” Bryan said. “She’s the only one in the cast I’m taking a chance on. If she doesn’t go over in this film, she’s going to be reduced to uncredited role in programmers.”

The role of Saxby, Reagan’s boss at the Secret Service, was interpreted by veteran actor John Litel. The Wisconsin-born actor had enlisted in the French Army during World War II and had been decorated for his bravery. Reagan thought he was ideal for the role.

Robert Taylor (depicted above) was Reagan's best friend, but his occasional effeminacies were something that Reagan, in the promotion of his own career, wanted desperately to avoid.

A Warner's contract player, Litel would appear in 200 films, most often as a hard-nosed cop or as a district attorney. He not only would make another Brass Bancroft films with Reagan, but would also appear in his classic, Knute Rockne—All American.

Dapper James Stephenson played the villain, Jim Cameron. Born in Yorkshire, England, the son of a chemist, Stephenson had been a stage actor in his native country until coming to the United States in 1937 at the age of 48. Jack Warner thought he'd be ideal cast as either an urbane villain or a disgraced gentleman.

Eddie Foy, Jr. played Bancroft's genial side-kick, Gabby. He and Reagan bonded and became close friends for years.

Eddie was introduced to show business in vaudeville as part of a family act, "The Seven Little Foys." He later branched out on his own, making his debut on Broadway in 1929 in Show Girl. In the 1940s, he would appear with Judy Canova in four films. She always played a hillbilly yokel, or a country bumpkin. One film had them battling Nazis.

John Litel (right) played the role of Saxby, Reagan's tough-as-nails boss at the Secret Service.

Reagan interpreted Eddie as a genuine trouper, and he served as Reagan's "lookout" during filming, so he wouldn't be caught with Rhodes if Jane or Hayward arrived unexpectedly on the set.

Bancroft's dialogue, which Reagan was forced to deliver, sounded at times like something that tough-guy Edward G. Robinson might have said on screen. "He's a number one stool pigeon. Framing me so I'll get sent to Alcatraz. He called me a squealer. I'm not taking that from anybody."

In the film's most gruesome scene, the pilot, in his cockpit, pushes a stick on his control panel. The floor of the aircraft's passenger compartment suddenly opens for a view of earth thousands of feet below. The aliens are thus hurled to a squashy death.

This scene and others brought protests from the censors at the Joseph Breen office. It was suggested that the script be altered so that the captured criminals would be punished but not executed. Breen also wanted all references to opium smuggling eliminated. Additionally, a scene revolving around a café brawl was defined as "too violent a rough and tumble," and clipped from the final cut.

At the end of the movie, Reagan battles the villain in the cockpit of the airplane, as it plunges to the ground. This, although extremely violent, was deemed acceptable by the censorship board.

In response to protests from Jack Warner, Breen exclaimed, "I am the Code! I stand like a man on the seashore, trying to hold back the tides of the ocean with a pitchfork." He also said that he detested what he called "the whorehouse crap of Hollywood. A tide of immorality is engulfing the world." Privately, he blamed Hollywood's sexual indulgences on the Jews who operated most of the Hollywood studios.

Producer Bryan Foy cast his brother, Eddie Jr., (depicted above) as Gabby, Bancroft's genial sidekick. "I liked Eddie a lot," Reagan said. "But he was one of those touchy-feely kind of friends. Couldn't keep his hands off me."

The Breen office had even objected to the plot of Reagan's relatively harmless comedy, Boy Meets Girl. The censors cited veiled undercurrents of illegitimacy, bigamy, and abortion.

"The movies of one Ronald Reagan often contain nudity and promote promiscuity," Breen charged. "I also object to the treatment of marriage in Reagan films, along with rampant sexual innuendo."

Privately, he maintained a dim opinion of Reagan. "From what I hear, he's a horndog screwing every legs-apart starlet at Warners."

The pompous, dreaded, very judgmental, and much-despised Joseph Breen, the ferocious overseer of censorship issues associated with the movies.

Warners publicity played up the claim that Reagan as a reserve officer "made many training jumps from planes." A picture of Reagan outfitted as an ace pilot was placed in theater lobbies across the country, along with blowups of Charles Lindbergh, Amelia Earhart, the Wright Brothers, and Eddie Rickenbacker. In truth, Reagan had an absolute terror of flying.

The Secret Service of the Air was part of a political campaign to present the U.S. government in a good light long before the December, 1941, attack on Pearl Harbor. Jack Warner enjoyed a fine working relationship with the War Department, and sent many copies of Reagan's film to officials in Washington.

In a letter to the War Department, Warner maintained that "with this film, we are trying to alert the American people about the dangers of subversive activities from foreign agents. We are also trying to rekindle some old-fashioned American patriotism."

At Warners, Reagan had become used to wearing military duds—a Navy uniform in Submarine D-1, even though his scene was cut from the final version; that of a U.S. Cavalry officer in Sergeant Murphy; and a military cadet's uniform in Brother Rat.

Throughout his varied interpretations of Brass Bancroft, Reagan continued his interest in politics. A left winger, Eddie Albert told him that Hollywood's Communist Party wanted to come the aid of the unemployed, the dispossessed, and the homeless, many of whom had lost their homesteads in the Middle West during the Depression and the Dust Bowl, and had drifted to California.

To the then-liberal Reagan, these goals sounded admirable, and he asked Albert if he could join the Communist Party. The chairman of the party, however, rejected Reagan's admission form, defining him as a flake and asserting that his political opinions changed every twenty minutes.

At long last, Reagan was cast in an A-list film, a soap opera tearjerker, Dark Victory (1939), a vehicle for Bette Davis. He hated his role of Alec Hamm, a repressed homosexual. He was fifth in billing, earning $1,258 for his work on the film, as opposed to the $35,000 paid to the film's female star.

There is evidence from Hal B. Wallis, the film's producer, that Reagan asked him to play the lead role of the brain surgeon, Dr. Frederick Steele. That role, however, went to George Brent, marking his eighth film with Davis.

Spencer Tracy was the first choice for the role if MGM would temporarily release him from his contract with them for a short-term stint with Warners. But after reading the script, Tracy turned it down. "This is Bette's picture," he wrote, as part of his rejection.

Basil Rathbone was then tested for the role of the doctor. After watching his own test, Rathbone wrote Jack Warner, "Would you either let me have the test or destroy it yourself?"

[Once again, Reagan would compete with George Brent for a role in yet another Bette Davis film, In This Our Life (1942), co-starring Olivia de Havilland. Reagan lost the role of Craig Fleming to Brent. Perhaps Reagan enjoyed some revenge by continuing to seduce Brent's wife at the time, Ann Sheridan.]

As associate producer of Dark Victory, Wallis selected David Lewis, the lover of director James Whale, of Frankenstein fame.

Born in Colorado in 1903 to Russian Jewish immigrants, Lewis later trained under the "Boy Wonder," of MGM, Irving Thalberg. Originally, Lewis had wanted to be an actor himself, studying in New York under the grande dame, Maria Ouspenskaya.

He became known for taking any film script and making it better. Unlike others of Hollywood's closeted homosexuals, Lewis was rather frank about who he was, and did not attempt to camouflage his same-sex cohabitation with Whale. Because of that, Reagan was leary of Lewis' reputation when they met. Lewis shook his hand, but Reagan later complained to Brent that, "David held it far too long."

Although he had never been nominated for an Oscar, the bisexual director, Edmund Goulding, was one of the best directors of so-called women's pictures, competing with gay director George Cukor. Among many other films, Goulding had directed Greta Garbo and John Barrymore in Grand Hotel (1932). As regards Goulding's previous exchanges with Bette Davis, he had directed her in a 1937 film, That Certain Woman, and in the same year as Dark Victory, 1939, he'd helm another critical success for her, The Old Maid.

Born in London during the twilight of the Victorian era, Goulding was the son of a butcher. From a lowly beginning, he rose to become not only a great director, but a virtual Renaissance man too—playwright, novelist, screenwriter, singer, and composer.

Goulding was very friendly with Reagan during the first week of filming, almost paying him too much attention. It was obvious to Lewis that Goulding was maneuvering to seduce Reagan. Lewis called that fact to Goulding's attention. "You just want him for yourself, bitch," Goulding said.

"How true!" Lewis admitted.

Dark Victory's Associate Producer David Lewis (depicted above), lover of James (Frankenstein) Whale, was willing to advance Reagan's career, providing he lay on his casting couch.

Jack Warner had allotted only thirty shooting days and a budget of $500,000 for Dark Victory. Principal photography began on October 8, 1938.

Dark Victory had flopped on Broadway as a star vehicle for the formidable Tallulah Bankhead. As such, Jack Warner was able to purchase it for Kay Francis for $27,500. In a surprise move, Francis not only turned it down, but sued Warners, like Davis had done previously, to break her contract.

After that, even Bankhead herself was considered for the role. Then, for a brief time, the part belonged to newcomer Gale Page.

During the time David Selznick controlled the rights to the property, Barbara Stanwyck lobbied him to give her the lead. Selznick turned her down, offering the part to Merle Oberon instead.

At one point, Selznick even sent the script to Greta Garbo, but she returned it without reading it. Immersed in plans for Gone With the Wind, which was consuming all of his time, Selznick eventually allowed the rights go to Warners.

Films of the 1930s, for the most part, were supposed to have happy endings. Not Dark Victory. The doomed heroine, Judith Traherne, has an incurable brain tumor and dies in the final scene as the world grows black. Davis was cast as a spoiled rich socialite on Long Island, interested in fast cars, beaux, race horses, drinking, and parties. In her early scenes, Davis almost hysterically overacts, but settles more comfortably into the portrayal later on.

Geraldine Fitzgerald, a little known Irish actress, was cast in the sympathetic role of Judith's best friend, Ann. Warners, through Wallis, had signed her to a seven-year contract.

Fitzgerald had been warned to expect "actress warfare" with Davis on the set. But they established a friendship and had mutual respect for each other's very different talents. That same year, Fitzgerald received an Oscar nomination for Best Supporting Actress in her role opposite Laurence Olivier in Wuthering Heights.

On the set, Reagan's girlfriend, Ila Rhodes, was heartbroken. Her brief position as his leading lady had come and gone after the release of Secret Service of the Air. In Dark Victory, she had an uncredited bit part playing a secretary.

Reagan offered her what comfort he could, and that involved making love to her in his dressing room. He was also balancing his ongoing affairs with Susan Hayward and Jane Wyman.

On the set, Reagan sometimes bonded with Humphrey Bogart, who for some strange reason played a horse trainer caring for Davis' stables. Like Reagan, he, too, was supposed to be in love with Judith Treherne. In those days, Reagan and Bogie often discussed their troubles with women.

"Both Susan and Jane seem to have marriage on their minds," Reagan said. "So does Ila Rhodes, that cutie I introduced you to the other day. Only problem is, marriage is about the last thing on my mind."

"Well, if you decide to get married, I'm prepared to divorce Mayo Methot and let you take her off my hands."

"Thanks, but no thanks," Reagan said.

Later, Bogie became less than friendly with Reagan when he heard that he had lobbied for his role as the horse trainer, urging Goulding to give his part of the repressed homosexual to Bogie. "The guy already has the lisp," Reagan had said to the director.

In this scene from Dark Victory, Bette Davis as Judith Traherne was slowly going blind. Her close friend, Alex Hamm (an effete society gadabout portrayed not very convincingly by Reagan) provided sympathy, but not much else.

The script was subtle but clear—to Reagan's horror—that the character he was portraying was that of a frustrated, deeply closeted homosexual.

One hot afternoon, he waited until he saw Reagan heading for the men's room. Reagan was already there, urinating, when Bogie entered. There were eight urinals, but Bogie opted to stand at the one on Reagan's immediate left.

"To get even with the fucker and to frighten the hell out of him, I stared down at his dick," Bogie later said to Goulding. "I leaned over close to him and whispered in his ear. 'I can take care of that thing for you.' Reagan didn't even finish pissing before he was zip-ping up and out of the toilet."

Geraldine Fitzgerald (left), the formidable Bette Davis, and Ronald Reagan as he appeared in his first A-list role, "although I didn't want to play it homo."

Throughout the remainder of his life, and despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, Reagan always insisted in private that Bogie was a bona fide homosexual.]

Goulding extended an invitation to Reagan and Rhodes for a party at his spacious home. At the time, Reagan was unaware of the exact nature of Goulding's notorious parties, which most often degenerated into orgies. At Goulding's home, a butler showed them into the foyer where Gouldng came out to greet them.

To Reagan's surprise, the director was dressed as a stern British nanny holding a wooden paddle. "I'm available tonight to deliver corporal punishment to those who have been naughty."

Almost speechless, Reagan later regained his voice. "I didn't know this was a costume party."

"Don't worry about it, darling," Goulding said. "Clothing is strictly optional. On the screen, I specialize in tasteful, cultured dramas. Off screen, my specialties include promiscuity and voyeurism."

Ushered into a large room, Reagan and Rhodes saw about fifty other guests, male and female, most of them in various stages of dress, mostly undress. Many of the women and men, too, were in their underwear. "You can strip down if you want to," Goulding told Reagan. "I've seen your publicity stills. Everything is casual here."

"No thank you," Reagan said. "We're fine."

He learned from fellow guest David Lewis that he and Rhodes had arrived in time for the orgy. Both Lewis and Goulding had rounded up “handsome hunks” from the various studios, along with beautiful young starlets.

Goulding left the room to check on the evening’s “entertainment.” Reagan whispered to Rhodes, “Let’s have a polite drink and then get the hell out of here.”

Reagan told her he was leaving, but she said, “I’m staying.”

He never really forgave Rhodes for staying behind. It certainly marked the end of their engagement and perhaps their relationship, too. She later reported to him what happened. “Goulding was the master of ceremonies, presiding over a very debauched scene—all combinations, with lots of role playing. At the orgy, Goulding obviously preferred the hunks.”

Two days later, Goulding walked into Reagan’s dressing room without knocking. The actor was changing for a scene, wearing nothing but a pair of white boxer shorts. He looked uncomfortable in Goulding’s presence.

“Sorry you left the party,” Goulding told him. “But you can make it up to me.” He reached inside Reagan’s shorts and fondled his genitals. Reagan immediately yanked his hand away and reached for his pants.

Goulding later told Lewis, “The kid rejected my advances. He’s got a pretty good hang, though, but seems to be saving it just for the ladies.”

Moody and tormented, director Edmund Goulding solicited sex from Reagan, but didn’t get it.

He also invited him to one of his infamous Hollywood orgies.

After that, Reagan and Goulding began to argue about how he should play the role of Hamm.

In the movie, Reagan had been cast as an alcoholic who, although in love with Judith, might have fitted more comfortably into the bed of Brent. Some latter-day reviewers suggested the role might better have been cast with Lew Ayres; others that either Van Heflin or Robert Walker might have developed the role into an Oscar-winning nomination for Best Supporting Actor of the year.

As Hamm, Reagan was supposed to play an inebriated idle dilettante, a character “full of chatter, as much so as a parrot or a woman.”

When Reagan refused to play the role as a gossipy and—by inference—gay male, Goulding—rather than firing him outright—pared down his part to just a few scenes. In those scenes, Reagan appears as a rather dull and unimaginative man of few words, delivering a performance that’s wooden, at best.

The character of Hamm had originally been conceived as “a drunkard, sexually ambiguous waste of a man.” Goulding interpreted that to mean “a repressed homosexual.”

“Goulding saw my part as a copy of his own earlier life,” Reagan later wrote, an obvious reference to Golding’s own homosexuality.

“I was playing, he told me, the kind of young man who could dearly love Bette but at the same time, the kind of fellow who could sit in the girls’ dressing room dishing the dirt while they continued dressing in front of me.”

“I had no trouble seeing him in that role, but for myself, I want to think that if I strolled where the girls are short of clothes, there will be a great scurrying about and taking to cover,” he wrote.

“Goulding didn’t get what he wanted, whatever the hell that was, and I ended up delivering my lines the way my instinct told me they should be delivered. It was bad.”

Most reviewers agreed with Reagan’s own assessment of his performance: It was bad.

Goulding later expressed his disappointment in Reagan’s acting to Hal Wallis. “He refused to understand the nature of Hamm. He drank because he felt impotent, and he loved Judith because she was unattainable. The character was not necessarily a practicing homosexual, but a man battling his own sexual instinct and tragically losing, escaping to the bottle. Reagan saw only black and white in a character, never gray. He wanted to play good guys, supermachos like Brass Bancroft, the Secret Service agent. I went on and shot the film with him, but I should have fired him."

"Because Reagan refused to cooperate, I cut several possibly good scenes with him," Goulding later said. "It could have been a juicy part."

On the set of Dark Victory, Reagan had never been the object of so many sexual advances, some of which came from Bette Davis herself. She was at a turning point in her life, coming to an end of her affairs with Director William Wyler and aviator-film mogul Howard Hughes. She was also divorcing her first husband, Harmon Nelson, Jr.

One afternoon, she invited Reagan to her dressing room and was outrageously flirtatious with him. Finally, when he stubbornly refused to pick up on any of her come-hither signals, she openly invited him to go to bed with her. He politely refused and excused himself. From that point on, she contemptuously referred to him as "little Ronnie Reagan."

If Davis struck out with Reagan, she at least got Brent to seduce her. She had been pursuing him for years. He had just divorced his actress wife, Ruth Chatterton, and was on the market again. Davis' most famous line in Dark Victory was "Darling, poor fool, don't you know I'm in love with you?" She delivered that same line in private to him. Their affair would continue even after Dark Victory was wrapped. But by the time he married Ann Sheridan, it was all over between them.

Orry-Kelly was selected to design Davis' costumes. For years, the flamboyant gay designer was her foremost costumer, beginning with The Rich Are Always With Us (1932), and ending with A Stolen Life (1946).

During the shoot, Davis had several feuds with Orry-Kelly over wardrobe. She wanted to show skin, even asking him to design what she called, "my naked dress."

When Reagan saw her in the revealing couture, he whispered to the designer. "Bette could be nude and she wouldn't turn me on."

Orry-Kelly misinterpreted the remark, assuming that Reagan was actually a homosexual. Later, when the designer propositioned him, he learned differently.

After his rejection of Orry-Kelly [the former lover of Cary Grant], Reagan asked Brent, "Are we the only heterosexuals making this movie?"

"I'm a heterosexual," Brent assured him. "I don't know about you. After all, you've been cast as the homo—not me!"

That snappy remark made Reagan dislike Brent even more than he had before. Ever since joining Warner Brothers, he'd felt that those gentlemanly roles assigned to Brent could have been better performed by him.

When Dark Victory was released in 1939, it had to compete with some of the greatest films Hollywood ever made. Even so, it drew mobs of fans at the box office. The reviews, however, were mixed. Time Out London, years after its release, defined it as "a Rolls Royce of the weepie world."

Reviews of Reagan were sometimes harsh. A critic wrote, "He doesn't do much of anything except guzzle vast quantities of alcohol and generally embarrass himself."

Bogart also didn't fare well as Traherne's horse trainer. A reviewer claimed that he played his role "with a creepy kind of sexuality."

At Oscar time, Davis received a nomination for Best Actress, losing to Vivien Leigh for her role in Gone With the Wind, a role Davis had coveted.

After shooting wrapped, Reagan entered a confused period of his life. The women he was involved with seemed to be wanting more of a commitment from him than he was willing to deliver.

After a sleepless night, he rose early one morning to greet the dawn.

He later wrote about his impressions: "I saw my first real California sunrise. It comes up over the rise of the mountains that hedge Hollywood on the East, with the misty clouds radiating all the colors of the rainbow."

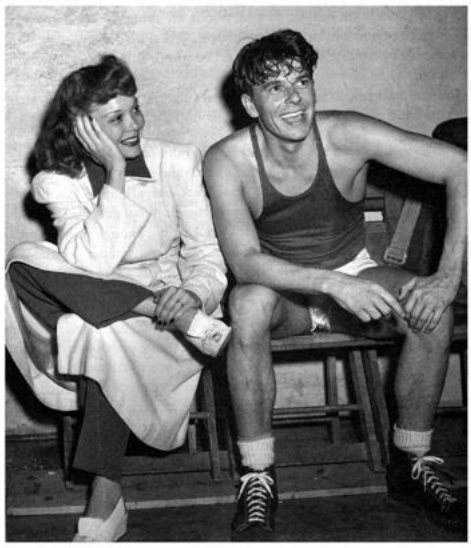
Chapter Five

Fiery Susan Hayward

Battles Jane Wyman for Ronald Reagan During His War with the Dead End Kids

Reagan Complains:

"Too Many Starlets Are Demanding My Services."



Until she met Reagan, Jane was not sports oriented, a nightclub with a drink being her favorite outing. At first, she liked to watch him at play, just to "check out his sexy body."

She later referred to this candid snapshot as "the happiest picture ever taken of Ronnie."

A picnic for two for the budding Warners starlets. They were being defined by the press as “a serious romantic item.” Within a few months of this Sunday afternoon outing, they would be hailed as “America’s Most Perfect Couple.”

Actually, they weren’t, but they were in love.

Movie historians cite 1939 as the greatest year in the history of motion pictures. That year, based on the release of Gone With the Wind, Scarlett O’Hara stood in the barren gardens of Tara, proclaiming, “As God is my witness, I will never go hungry again.”

Starved for participation in A-list pictures, and yearning for good scripts, both Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman were suffering from a different type of hunger as they rushed from one B-movie to another.

Reagan continued his role as a B-list matinee hero within a programmer series playing Brass Bancroft, Secret Agent. That's when he wasn't hitting the streets with the Dead End Kids or making love onscreen to his leading lady, a lesbian in private life.

Jane had graduated from the chorus line to at least eighth billing, but occasionally, she was awarded a starring role in a very minor film. For her, the highlight of 1939 involved meeting and starring "with the love of my life." The co-participant in that grand passion, however, wasn't Ronald Reagan.

Jack Warner was not pleased with Reagan's lack-luster performance with Bette Davis in Dark Victory. "If you've got a weak script that none of our big male stars want, give it to Reagan," Warner told producer Bryan Foy. "Also, have him make some more of those Bass Bancroft adventure stories."

"I was proud of some of the B-pictures we made, but a lot of them were pretty poor," Reagan said. "They were movies the studio didn't want good, they wanted 'em Thursday."

Director Noel Smith was tapped once again to direct Reagan as Bass Bancroft in Code of the Secret Service (1938). Eddie Foy, Jr., repeating his earlier role, was signed on as his sidekick, Gabby. The female lead, such as it was, went to Rosella Towne.

Running for only 58 minutes, the plot sends Reagan to a remote section of Mexico on the trail of a coven of counterfeiters using plates stolen from the U.S. Mint. At their headquarters, with the understanding that the paper used in the printing of U.S. currency is unique, the villains are bleaching real dollar bills and printing larger denominations on the same paper. The chief of the bad guys is a colorful, peg-legged character disguising himself as a Catholic priest.

Reagan didn't like any of his dialogue, especially the line, "Oh, you wanna get tough, huh?"

An expert horseman, Reagan is filmed jumping onto the back of a stallion and riding at a fast clip into the setting sun. At one point, he hides out in the river, escaping a Mexican posse. He breathes through the tube of a broken reed.

Bobbysoxers in Philadelphia Strip "Sexy Ronnie" Naked.

John Litel was not available to repeat his role of Saxby, Bancroft's boss, the part going instead to Joseph King. Reagan found him a bit wooden. A figure in silent films, King acted in 211 movies from 1912 to 1946.

One can only imagine the consequences if the circumstances in this picture had occurred in real life, with Reagan, during his presidency, as a terrorist's hostage. Reagan is tied up on the left, Rosella Towne on the right.

When Reagan saw a screening of Code of the Secret Service, he was horrified. The producer, Bryan Foy, agreed with him. Both of them went to Jack Warner and pleaded with him not to release it. After viewing the film, the studio chief agreed.

But later, he retracted his word, releasing it across the country as a minor programmer. To appease Foy, he agreed not to show it in the Los Angeles area, so as not to embarrass the producer and the actors in their home town.

On a trip back to Dixon, however, Reagan saw that his former favorite movie house was, indeed, showing the film. The ticket taker immediately recognized the hometown boy. "Mr. Reagan," he said. "Welcome home, but you should be ashamed of yourself for making this turkey."

In New York, a reviewer said, "I used to go see Pearl White in The Perils of Pauline at the Saturday matinee. Now the screen has a new Pauline facing even greater danger. Pauline is now Ronald Reagan."

After Warner betrayed Foy and Reagan and released the movie, Reagan said, “It was the worst film I ever made. Never has an egg of such dimensions been laid.”

[One of Reagan’s future security chiefs, Jerry Parr, when he was a child, had a different opinion. He went to see the movie eight times. Afterward, he told his parents, “When I grow up, I’m going to become a member of the Secret Service like Brass Bancroft.”

Ironically, he eventually became not only a member of the Secret Service, but was designated as Reagan’s Chief of Security. He accompanied Reagan on all his personal appearances, including a 1981 visit to the Hilton Hotel in Washington, where the President gave a speech to the Construction Trades Council.

After he left the hotel, the sound of gunfire cracked the air. As Reagan later wrote, “Jerry Paar grabbed me by the waist and literally hurled me into the back of the limousine. When I landed, I felt a pain in my upper back that was unbelievable. ‘Jerry, get off,’ I said. ‘I think I’ve broken one of my ribs.’”

Agent Jerry Parr, right, a childhood devotee of the Brass Bancroft series, pushes Ronald Reagan into his limousine during a 1981 assassination attempt in which the president was wounded.

Later, in the hospital, the President learned what really happened, as he suffered excruciating pain. He had taken a bullet from the demented John Hinckley, Jr. After ricocheting through his body, the bullet came to a stop about an inch from his heart.

“I began to realize that when Parrhad thrown his body on me, he was gallantly putting his own life on the line to save mine. I felt guilty that I’d chewed him out right after it happened.”

Only the week before, Reagan had gone to Ford’s Theater and looked up at the flag-draped box where Abraham Lincoln was assassinated.

Hinckley had gone to see Taxi Driver starring Jodie Foster, and had become mesmerized by her. In his memoirs, Reagan wrote, “Although I have never seen the movie, I’m told there was a scene in it in which there was a shooting; For some reason, Hinckley decided to get a gun and kill someone to demonstrate his love of the actress.”]

When director Roy Del Ruth called Jane Wyman to tell her that he’d cast her in his upcoming aviation picture, Tailspin, she was mildly surprised to be playing an aviatrix. But when he revealed the formidable lineup of stars, she was not only awed, but a bit intimidated. Never had she faced such an array of stars, headlined by Alice Faye, Constance Bennett, Nancy Kelly, and Joan Davis, along with the former silent screen heart-throb Charles Farrell in the male lead.

Getting sixth billing in the 84-minute film, Jane learned that she would play a woman pilot named “Alabama.” The movie was an oddity in that most films of the 1930s featured celluloid versions of only male pilots such as Clark Gable or Spencer Tracy.

According to the plot, Trixie (as played by Faye) takes off from her job as a Hollywood hatcheck girl and joins with another female aviator, Babe Dugan (Joan Davis), to enter a women’s air race from Los Angeles to Cleveland. An oil leak causes their plane to crash, but the two women survive to continue with additional airborne adventures.

Trixie’s rival, both in the air and for the romantic affections of the male lead, is socialite Gerry Lester (Constance Bennett), the daughter of a steel mogul. After lots of romantic scheming and scraping together the agreements and finances she needs to fly her plane, the optimistic and very perky Trixie eventually wins, although she was aided by the kindly rich girl, Gerry, who at first fakes engine trouble as a means of letting Trixie win, but who then gets into serious danger when her plane crashes and she is injured.

Jane Wyman, showcasing the haute mode of 1941.

Warners had lent Jane to 20th Century Fox since it had no immediate role for her. That didn't mean that Jack Warner was pushing her aside. He had taken out an ad in The Hollywood Reporter, naming her among his top ten contract players. On that list, only Jane and a New York actor, John Garfield, would ultimately achieve stardom.

While filming, Jane's final divorce papers came through from Myron Futterman. She had only kind words to say about him to the press, ignoring the harsh reality of their actual marriage. "I thought I was doing the right thing at the time," she said. "Myron was a lovely, charming man, but it just didn't work out. I guess I married too young." She defined her marriage to him as her first, ignoring completely her marriage to Eugene Wyman.

For reasons of her own, she misled Warners' publicity department, asserting that her father, "Ernest Wyman," had died. There had never been such a person. [Her screen name, Wyman, had derived from her first husband, Eugene Wyman.]

During the shoot, the producer, Darryl F. Zanuck, with his cliché cigar, showed up on the set. He had come to see both Del Ruth and Faye. He met Jane briefly and said, "Welcome to Fox. Hope it won't be your last visit."

After a brief chat, he wandered over to Del Ruth before spending an hour with Faye. After all, Faye was his most bankable star. Jane had wanted to make a good impression on him, but she was sure he would have forgotten her by tomorrow.

Faye's husband, singer Tony Martin, came onto the set one afternoon. Faye was emoting before the camera. Unlike Zanuck, Martin paid a lot of attention to Jane.

As she'd later tell Joan Davis, "I find him very handsome and oh, so masculine. But I didn't want to interfere in Alice's marriage, although Tony flirted with me outrageously. I don't give that marriage a long life."

Jane was right, as Faye and Martin would divorce in 1940. She'd follow that with a 1941 marriage to Phil Silvers.

On the set, Jane turned down Martin's invitation to slip away for a drink. "He was some sharpie," she told Davis. "Too much hair oil, and I find his singing style a bit bland. He's no Bing Crosby. But I can see why Alice fell for the lug. He's very, very sexy. When he talks to a gal, he stands so close to her he rubs his ample package up against her."

"I found myself lost in this lineup of hot-to-trot dames," Jane said.

The next day, Faye talked to Jane. "It seems that both of us started out as wise-cracking showgirls in films, but I, at least, have been told by Zanuck to soften my image. One reviewer said I was 'a singing version of Jean Harlow.' As you can see, my hair-dresser has given my peroxide blonde hair a more natural look."

"Miss Faye, you look beautiful, and I loved you in In Old Chicago." Jane said.

"Would you believe it, Zanuck initially turned me down for that role? He offered the part to MGM's Harlow, but she died, of course."

"I'm anxious to see you in Alexander's Ragtime Band," Jane said. "With that divine Tyrone Power. I think he is the world's handsomest man."

"I do, too, but he's never given me a tumble. Most days, after work on that picture, Power rushed off with Errol Flynn, who always showed up at five o'clock. The world's second handsomest man made off with the world's first handsomest man. For we ladies, there is no justice."

Three days later, Faye encountered Jane on the set. "Did you hear the latest news? My newest claim to fame. I'm the favorite movie star of Adolf Hitler!"

That same day, Jane chatted with Charles Farrell, the matinee idol of the 1920s. Appearing in more than a dozen films with Janet Gaynor, they were once hailed as "the movies' favorite couple." With nostalgia, he discussed Hollywood in the 20s.

"Did you catch my latest?" he asked her. "I play Shirley Temple's dad in Just Around the Corner (1938). Alice has also played Temple's mother. Maybe Alice and I should get married and make the little lollipop brat legitimate."

Jane interpreted Del Ruth as a smooth, competent, director who managed to keep all those screen stars in line, along with a complicated plot that involved aerial competition and frequent wisecracks from both Davis and Jane. Del Ruth was a genuine professional, who, since 1932, had been the second highest-paid director in Hollywood.

Jane was awed by the blonde beauty of Constance Bennett, a New Yorker who was the daughter of famed actor Richard Bennett and the older sister and fellow actress, Joan Bennett. Constance seemed very independent, cultured, and rather candid.

For years, Jane had read about the star in fan magazines, learning that she liked to collect both money and men. One reporter asked her father, "Doesn't Constance know she can't take her money with her?"

Richard had responded, "If she can't take it with her, she won't go."

Everyone in the film industry had an opinion about Constance. Columnist Adela Rogers St. John said, "She has a reputation for attracting other girls' men." Bette Davis cattily remarked, "Her face is her talent. When that drops, there will go her career."

"I'm not quite the female Casanova that rumors have it," Constance told Jane. "In fact, I'm married at the moment. My husband will be arriving soon to take me to lunch, and I'll introduce you."

An hour later, Jane met James Henri Le Bailly de La Falaise, Marquis de La Coudraye, who had [from 1925 to 1931] been the third husband of Gloria Swanson. He had won Constance from the arms of her then-lover, Joseph P. Kennedy. Both Constance and Swanson had competed for the love of both Kennedy and the French nobleman.

In her capacity as Tail Spin's third lead, Nancy Kelly was just "walking through the picture." That same year, she was also making Jesse James (1939), interpreting the role of Tyrone Power's love interest. Emerging from New England, she had been a child actress and model, becoming "the most photographed girl in America" at the age of nine.

Rising from the plains of Minnesota, Joan Davis was a comedic actress who had gotten her start in vaudeville. Jane had lunch with her one afternoon in the commissary. By now, she was used to actresses talking about themselves. Davis revealed that she'd appeared in a picture, Way Up Thar (1935) with the then-unknown Roy Rogers. "He told me he would have made a pass at me, but didn't, because I was just too ugly," Davis said.

In her private life, Jane continued to date Reagan, but, as she told Joan Blondell, "He is hardly overcome with passion at the sight of me. He's also dating other starlets, casually playing the field. So am I. When 'God's gift to women' comes along, I'll know who he is at once. Perhaps he's waiting just around the corner."

She told Del Ruth, "When Ronnie goes for a while without calling me, I ring him up and ask him out. He's too polite to refuse such a request from a lady. I do wish he'd show more aggression in pursuing me."

Actually, as Jane would later concede to Louella Parsons, "I am much more concerned with my career than I am chasing after some man,."

For five days, she sat around idly until a call came in from Lewis Seiler. He told her that she would be returning to her home studio at Warners, as he'd cast her in The Kid from Kokomo (1939). She learned that her co-star would be Wayne Morris.

"Talk about a man who aggressively pursues women," she said. "He is the master of the forward pass."

"This is my swan song to Warner Brothers," Dick Powell said, shaking Reagan's hand and welcoming him to the sound stage of their latest movie, Naughty But Nice. "I should be twenty years younger, playing my role."

Director Ray Enright had assembled a cast that, for a B-picture, was considered stellar. It included Reagan's sometimes lover, Ann Sheridan; Maxie ("Slapsie") Rosenbloom; newcomer Gale Page; plus such veteran performers as Helen Broderick, ZaSu Pitts, the ever-reliable Allen Jenkins, and band leader Peter Lind Hayes.

Although his role In Naughty but Nice was one of the smallest and least inspired in the film, Reagan managed to look "Presidential."

Naughty But Nice was filmed in October of 1938, but Jack Warner was so disappointed with it, he delayed its release until June of 1939.

The plot whirls around Donald Hardwick (as interpreted by Powell), a young and somewhat prim music teacher who comes to New York to try to get his symphony published and to visit his colorful Aunt Martha, a role interpreted by Helen Broderick. His other two aunts are played by ZaSu Pitts and Vera Lewis.

When these idiosyncratic aunts appear on camera, they steal the show. Donald is introduced to Linda McKay (Gale Page), a lyric writer, who sees jazz and Big Band potential in Powell's symphonic music and also falls in love with him.

Torch Singer Zelda Manion (Sheridan) vamps the young composer, luring him away, at least temporarily from "nice girl" Linda. Playing the role of Ed Clark, Reagan was cast as an honest music publisher. Linda converts Donald's composition to swing, and the music ends up on The Hit Parade.

On the set, Page and Sheridan became friends. Sheridan told Reagan, "Gale and I are just two Cherokee squaws. I was told that Indian blood flows through our veins. Both of us are looking for a brave warrior—and you're it, Big Boy. Gale and I decided you're more Comanche than Cherokee."

Warners' Publicity Department gave Sheridan a major press buildup. No expert herself, [she was in the process of divorcing Edward Norris at the time], she was encouraged to provide women with marriage tips, suggesting that in her pursuit of a happy marriage, a woman should be a good companion—and not just a wife. Posters advertised what was pre-defined as Sheridan's style of attracting men: "Not too much fire, not too much ice, it's best to be just a bit Naughty But Nice."

Sheridan met Reagan in her dressing room for what she called "a very personal reunion." As she later told Page, "I wanted to make sure that all his equipment was still in working order and that Susan Hayward, perhaps in a fit of rage, hadn't snipped it off."

As he left her dressing room, Sheridan told him, "Don't tell Powell, but Jack Warner is giving me top billing. Warner's thinking is that it's better to promote one of his rising contract players than yesterday's news. Powell is on his way out the door."

After Reagan read the script for Naughty But Nice, co-written by Jerry Wald and Richard Macaulay, he told Powell, "You're getting a rather tepid send-off from Warner's with this turkey."

"Don't I know it," Powell said. "But let's struggle upward and onward."

Originally entitled The Professor Steps Out, Naughty But Nice was a minor musical with songs by Johnny Mercer and Harry Warren.

Reagan was pleased to be working with Powell. He later recalled, "I was one of the thousands who were drawn to this very kind man, and who would think of him as a best friend. Sometimes, our paths took us in different directions, and months would pass without your seeing each other. When we did meet again, it would be as if no interruption had occurred. I cannot recall Dick ever saying an unkind word about anyone."

Years later, in a memoir, Reagan credited one of his fellow cast members, veteran stage actress Helen Broderick, the mother of Oscar-winning actor, Broderick Crawford, of changing his mind about unions. "At first, I was not a union man, until one afternoon when Helen cornered me in the Warners Commissary. She lectured me for an entire hour about the facts of life. After that, I became the most devoted member of the Screen Actors Guild."

Gale Page and Ann Sheridan asked Reagan if he would escort them to hear the act of Peter Lind Hayes, the vaudeville entertainer, songwriter, and occasional actor. He had a small part in their movie.

Up to then, Reagan had not paid much attention to Page, whom he found demure and rather attractive. After the show, Page invited Sheridan and Reagan to her home, where she'd already baked a tray of lasagna.

He was only vaguely familiar with Page's short career. Both of them shared memories of their small contribution to The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse (1938), the picture on which they'd worked with Edward G. Robinson and Humphrey Bogart.

Page's big break had come when she became a member of the "four daughters," three of which were played by the Lane sisters—Priscilla, Rosemary, and Lola—in the highly successful film, Four Daughters (1938). The picture had induced Jack Warner to sign Page to three more sequels with the Lane siblings.

Rumors of what happened that night at Page's apartment, where Reagan and Sheridan were guests of the young actress, eventually leaked out. The following Monday morning, Reagan confided in Powell the events of that Saturday night. "After eating, we engaged in a game of strip poker. The gals must have been con artists. They beat hell out of me, and I ended up stripped down to my underwear. After another game, even that came off, my last vestige of modesty."

"This was my first three-way," Reagan confessed, "and it'll be my last!"

The story was too tantalizing for Powell to keep to himself. That night, he told what had happened to his wife, Joan Blondell. She couldn't resist sharing it with her co-stars on the set of The Kid from Kokomo. Reagan's friend, Pat O'Brien, found it amusing, but Jane Wyman said she thought it was "disgusting."

On the last day of shooting for Naughty But Nice, Page visited Reagan in his dressing room to kiss him goodbye. "You have such a great figure," she told him. "You really should share it with others."

"I do enough of that already," he told her.

Months later, he would find out exactly what she meant by that strange suggestion.

Reviews of Naughty But Nice were tepid at best, or scathing at their worst. Variety called Sheridan "a slight menace, a mike siren who would break up the songwriting team just to be cut in on Powell's future songs." Harrison's Reports criticized "the silly plot and trite dialogue."

Bosley Crowther of The New York Times dismissed the film, claiming that it was "staffed by a competent cast of pranksters. This item might be steady fun if it were anything more than a bath of old gags strung together."

Even if Reagan's films were poor, it didn't seem to affect his ever-growing fan mail. Hundreds of women seemed to write letters that were almost love letters in tone. One woman found his voice "…irresistible. I like the way you breathe around words. What a pillow talker you must be."

Every week at least a dozen marriage proposals arrived. Most of them enclosed photographs of their senders in various states of dress, or undress, as the case might be.

Although Reagan's body was widely admired, he also had an eye for the female figure—that is, when he could see it.

Edmund Morris, in his officially sanctioned biography, Dutch, related a typical moment when Reagan went to the beach with Jane Wyman and a "friend."

"He must have been under orders not to wear his glasses in public," the friend claimed. "He squinted painfully as he watched her retreating figure go into the water. Then he jabbed at the sides of his eyes, pulling the flesh tight, and stared long and hard through sloed slits. The effect was of almost oriental lechery."

"All this adulation from fans is going to my head," Reagan told Powell. "I find myself walking around with my head in the clouds. But a call from the producer, Mark Hellinger, brought me down to earth with a thud."

The last day at the studio, Reagan went to Hellinger's office to pick up a script of his next movie, Hell's Kitchen, a feature he was ordered to make with the Dead End Kids.

"How could Jack Warner throw me into a hellhole with those juvenile delinquents?" Reagan asked. "Unlike Bogie and Cagney, I've been a good boy. I don't cause trouble like Bette Davis. Why was I being singled out for punishment?"

Pat O'Brien, the male lead, also greeted Jane. Reagan's close friend was like a father figure to her. In the starring role, O'Brien played Billy Murphy, a fast-talking boxing manager. Blondell was cast as his wily sweetheart, Doris Harvey.

Joan Blondell, the female star of The Kid from Kokomo, had been working a week on the movie before Jane Wyman reported to work as one of the supporting players. Blondell was there to greet her on the sound stage and invite her to share her dressing room, sparing her from the cramped communal salon reserved for the supporting female players.

Lewis Seiler, who had directed Jane in He Couldn't Say No, was also there to welcome her. She had read that he would next be directing Reagan and the Dead End Kids in Hell's Kitchen.

Pat O'Brien and Joan Blondell, the stars of The Kid from Kokomo. He was a fast-talking boxing manager sharpie, and she was his wily secretary.

Jane's sometimes lover, Wayne Morris, arrived late on the set that day, since he had not been needed in early scenes. He passionately kissed Jane and invited her to have lunch with him in the Warners' commissary.

At first, he discussed his career woes, complaining about the script by Jerry Wald and Richard Macaulay. "I play this hayseed boxer who won't fight in the ring until he finds his mother who abandoned him on a doorstep as a baby. Incidentally, I think mama posed for that painting of Whistler's Mother's. I'm made to look like some sissy mama's boy. I'll be ridiculed like I was when I was a male cheerleader at Los Angeles High School."

"You were a cheerleader?" Jane asked in astonishment. "With your build, I thought you'd have gone out for football."

Usually Morris had a rather carefree personality. But on this day, he appeared worried and a little bit afraid. "I just learned that Warners is not going to renew my contract. Working with Bogie on The Return of Doctor X has done me in, along with this present turkey we're making. Bogie himself claimed that our Doctor X is a piece of shit. He's cast as the living dead in search of fresh blood."

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

"I hear Republic, which has combined with Monogram, is searching for a replacement for John Wayne," he said.

"You'd be perfect for John Wayne roles," she said.

I'm going over there to try to convince the brass that I can be their guy as soon as I finish making this cheesy farce."

At the end of the lunch, he saved other important news for last, revealing that he'd just married Leonora Hornblow.

She looked mildly shocked. "I hope the two of you will be very happy," she said, without trying to show any jealousy.

"It's not working out," he said. "We're only two months into the marriage and we're already talking divorce. That brings up the subject of you and me."

She reached for his hand. "Let's put you and me on hold for a while, at least until your divorce comes through. Are you okay with that?"

“Hell no!” he said, flashing anger. “But it’s lady’s choice. I’ll predict something. You and me are going to get back together. You’ll miss my kind of loving.”

“That may be true,” she said. “Do you realize this is our fifth picture together?”

“I’ll predict something else,” he said. “I bet we’ll do five more. Fan magazines claim we make a cute couple, and that you should have gone for me in Brother Rat instead of Reagan.”

“I must go,” she said, rising from the table. “I’m sorry you’ve run into trouble so early in your marriage.”

“You’ve had at least one or two husbands, so you know how things often don’t work out.”

“What seems to be the trouble?” she asked. “I know that whatever your problem may be, it’s not in the bedroom. You’re an artist in the boudoir.”

“Of course it’s not that,” he said. “The bitch objects to my sleeping with other women.”

Like Morris, Jane also wasn’t pleased with her role in The Kid from Kokomo. At one point, she talked to Wald, the screenwriter. “I just wrote a film for your boyfriend, Reagan,” he said. “Naughty But Nice. If he invites you out on a movie date to see it, turn him down.”

She expressed her dissatisfaction with her role in The Kid from Kokomo as a girl reporter, the love interest of Morris.

“Eventually, when I’m a big-time producer, I’ll bring stories by D.H. Lawrence and Ernest Hemingway to the screen,” Wald said. “But for the moment, at least, I’m putting bread on the table.”

Blondell’s biographer, Matthew Kennedy, wrote: “If Jack Warner wanted to make Blondell happy again, he had a peculiar way of showing it. The Kid from Kokomo was so bad, in fact, that Warner more likely wished to bully Joan off the lot by giving her a Skid Row assignment. Predictably, Kokomo stunk up theaters for a few days, barely made its cost, then crept away to rightful obscurity.”

Kokomo, Indiana, was never as glam as the implications of this photo by haute photographer George Hurrell, snapped as a publicity photo of Jane Wyman for her role in The Kid from Kokomo.

Blondell, at age thirty-two, saw attention shifting to such younger actresses as Jane and Ann Sheridan. Jane stood with Blondell as she looked out over the empty sound stage at the end of the filming of The Kid from Kokomo. “The same fate awaits me one day,” she said to Blondell.

A messenger boy interrupted her and handed her an envelope. In front of Jane, she opened it. “It’s dated January 7, 1939, my last paycheck from Warners. It totals $2,916.67—and that includes bonuses.”

Then she turned to Jane. “Let’s get the fuck out of here!”

The producers of Hell’s Kitchen, Bryan Foy (still “King of the Bs”) and Mark Hellinger, sent Reagan its script, in which he discovered that once again, he had a disappointing role. It was obvious from the beginning that the picture would be stolen by the Dead End Kids.

“They’ll make mince meat out of me,” he complained to co-director Lewis Seiler, who had just completed helming The Kid from Kokomo.

"I don't think I'll be able to handle the rowdy scenes by myself," Seiler said. "I've called in E. A. Dupont as my co-director. "He's a German who's directed crime stories on film since 1918. He'll keep these unruly boys in line."

The underlying concept for the Dead End Kids had originated on Broadway in 1935 as a play, Dead End, which ran for 684 performances based on Sidney Kingsley's grim look at slum life on the Lower East Side of New York City. Producer Samuel Goldwyn had seen the play and decided to film it, paying $165,000 for the rights. In his film version, in starring roles, he cast six of the original Kids from the Broadway play.

During the filming of Dead End, the young actors ran wild around the studio, vandalizing and destroying property. At one point, they crashed a delivery truck into a sound stage while a film was actually being shot.

"I'm too old to put up with shit like this," Goldwyn had informed director William Wyler. "I'm selling these jerks' contract to Jack Warner. Let him deal with these aging brats."

The original film, Dead End (1937), had starred Sylvia Sidney, Joel McCrea, and Humphrey Bogart.

Before reporting to the set, Reagan placed a call to Bogie to learn about his experiences working with this motley crew. That actor told Reagan, "I did something that rubbed those jerks the wrong way. All of a sudden, all of them descended on me and stripped off all of my clothes, including my underwear. There I stood, jaybird naked, before cast and crew. With one hand covering my privates, I rushed to my dressing room listening to the catcalls and the jeers."

The Dead End Kids: Hollywood's romanticization of America's urbanized juvenile delinquents. Although movie audiences found them compelling, none of the actors who worked with them did—especially Reagan.

Bogie, in 1938, had also been cast in Crime School, with the Dead End Kids playing young hoodlums sentenced to reform school.

"I was miscast in Crime School as a do-gooder," Bogie said. "Not a role with my name written on it. Actually, Crime School was a rehash of Cagney's 1933 The Mayor of Hell. And now, Jack Warner is reworking virtually the same script with you in it. That bastard is sure getting his money's worth out of this old turkey."

Reagan also contacted Cagney, who had only recently filmed Angels with Dirty Faces(1938), with the Dead End Kids. It had also starred Bogie and his friends, Pat O'Brien and Ann Sheridan.

"You've got to watch the gang's leader, Leo Gorcey," Cagney warned Reagan. "He tries to throw you off by his constant ad-libbing. One day I snapped. I gave him a stiff arm above his nose and snapped his head back like I was going to break his neck. 'Now listen, punk,' I told him. 'There won't be any more of this god damn nonsense. You're going to do it like Michael Curtiz told you to. Or else…' The next day, the fucking ad-libbing stopped."

Reagan told Seiler, "If Cagney and Bogie each survived working with the Dead End Kids, I guess I can, too."

In Hell's Kitchen, Reagan was cast as a do-gooder, playing the role of lawyer Jim Donohue. He gets his uncle, Buck Caesar (Stanley Fields), a paroled convict with money, to make a contribution to the reform school which houses the Dead End Kids.

Regrettably, the school's superintendent, Krispan (Grant Mitchell), is a crook, keeping a double set of financial records. Eventually, as could be expected, the Kids expose Krispan's nefarious deeds, the most horrendous of which involves locking one of the Kids in a deep freeze, where he dies.

In the United Kingdom, because of its violence, the film was given an "H" rating (the equivalent of an "X" rating today).

For the female lead, Margaret Lindsay had been cast as a social worker. Reagan had already escorted her on two studio-sanctioned dates, each involving their attendance at Warners' premieres.

When he heard that Lindsay would play a role in the film, he told Seiler, "I think I'm losing my sex appeal with her. I didn't even rate a good night kiss on her doorstep."

"You're the wrong gender," Seiler told him.

"You mean, she's a lesbian?" Up until that point, Reagan seemed to feel that all lesbians were macho-strutting and butch. His mind had not yet wrapped around the concept of a lipstick lesbian, an archetype exemplified by Lindsay.

During the second week of shooting, it came as a complete shock to Reagan to learn that Seiler had cast Ila Rhodes in a small role in Hell's Kitchen. He had broken off his engagement to the actress four months before, and she was bitter toward him.

Hell's Kitchen: Reagan with Margaret Lindsay. "She batted for the other team," he said.

On the day of his scene with her, both of them were to appear with actors Grant Mitchell and Stanley Fields. For the first time in his life, he faced an actress who denounced him personally. Rhodes came up to him. "You turned out to be a second-rate asshole!"

He said nothing, but waited impatiently for direction from Seiler as a means of getting through the scene. He later told the director, "You didn't do me any favors. Here I am in this picture, facing an irate former girlfriend, pretending to make love to a lesbian on camera, and putting up with the Dead End Kids to boot."

Of all the gang members, Reagan held Huntz Hall, another New Yorker, in the deepest contempt. The son of an Irish immigrant, an air-conditioner repairman, Huntz got his nickname because of his "Teutonic-looking nose." At the age of five, he'd become a performer on radio. In previous films, Hall and Bogie had practically declared war on each other. Bogie had warned Reagan, "Watch out for him."

Huntz Hall: Bogie defined him as a "god damn psycho."

Huntz maintained a total disdain for Reagan, referring to him as a square. Along with some of the gang members, Hunt plotted to give Reagan a "hot hat." On three separate occasions, he rolled newsprint around a hat, setting it on fire, and then slipping forward and shoving the burning headgear down onto Reagan's head. He would always yell in panic, but remove the burning hat before his hair caught on fire. "The Square was never seriously burned until one day," Hunt recalled years later.

Eventually growing bored with this prank, Hunt devised a devilish deviation on his arsonist theme: One day, as Reagan sat dozing in a director's chair, Hunt slipped up behind him and placed a powerful firecracker under the flimsy canvas of the chair's seat.

The firecracker blasted off, setting Reagan's trousers on fire. He screamed in panic as the flames engulfed his clothing.

"That fucking firecracker acted like a stick of dynamite," Huntz said. "Reagan must have jumped ten feet in the air."

As Hall stood laughing, looking like the dopey-looking kid he played on camera, another Dead End Kid, Bernard Punsley, rushed to Reagan's aid.

He smothered out the fire on his trousers and got two grips to carry him to Reagan's dressing room. An ambulance was summoned.

With a pocket knife, Punsley cut away at Reagan's burnt clothing. With a first aid kit, he applied a soothing salve to Reagan's burnt buttocks. When the ambulance and its crew arrived, Punsley told them he was a doctor in training, and rode beside his patient.

Even at the hospital, Punsley insisted on staying in Reagan's room. The actor agreed, because he'd come to his rescue. He visited Reagan every day and seemed to administer to him as if he were Reagan's doctor. He learned that Punsley, who was always reading medical books on the set of Hell's Kitchen, planned to become a physician.

Later, when he went into the Army, he received medical training. After the war, he entered the Medical College of the University of Georgia and obtained a degree. In time, he became the Chief of Staff at South Bay Hospital in Redondo Beach, California. When Reagan was Governor of California, he sent a note of thanks for his rescue, years before, along with his congratulations at his successful transition from acting to the medical fields.

A future doctor, Bernard Punsley later claimed, and rightly so, "I saved Reagan's ass...and I mean that literally."

In his letter, Reagan jokingly wrote, "You know better than anyone I've met how to deal with a hot-assed actor. Like you, I've changed professions, me going into politics, and you into medicine. You'll probably do better in helping people than I will in my new job."

Years later, Reagan recalled his horrid time working on set with the Dead End Kids. "It was an experience similar to going over Niagara Falls the hard way—upstream. Counting noses and getting them all in one scene was a major chore, but sometimes it was a relief when they did take off and disappear for a few hours. You never knew when a canvas chair would go up in smoke or be blown apart by giant firecrackers they were never without. Having heard lurid tales from other actors, like Bogie and Cagney, I approached my first picture with them as something of a sweat. I barely survived that to find that Jack Warner had cast me in another picture with these hoodlums. They had graduated beyond juvenile delinquents at that point."

For her third film role of 1939, Jane Wyman was not thrilled to be cast as Torchy Blane, the girl reporter turned amateur detective. Beginning in 1937, Glenda Farrell, Jane's rival at Warners, had made the role her own in a series of seven movies, including Smart Blonde (1936), in which Jane had had a small part.

The first Torchy Blane movie was a box office hit, and Jack Warner ordered that it be developed into a series. It eventually included such installments as Torchy Gets Her Man and Torchy Runs for Mayor.

After Farrell bowed out of the series, the next Torchy role was awarded to Lola Lane, one of the famous Lane sisters. Lola's picture bombed at the box office, but Warner decided to give the series a final chance by casting Jane as the star of Torchy Plays With Dynamite.

The second female lead, that of bad girl Jackie Maguire, went to Shelia Bromley, who had made a film with Reagan. From time to time, Jane chatted briefly with her between takes, appearing pleasantly polite, although she didn't like her co-star. At one point, Bromley told Jane, "I think I'm the only one of Reagan's leading ladies that he didn't seduce. Not that he didn't try."

"How nice that you so bravely held out," Jane snapped, sarcastically.

Bromley's claim about being "a Reagan Virgin" was later disputed by her co-workers.

In the film, Bromley played the girlfriend of the notorious hoodlum, "Denver Eddie," who escapes a police raid, but Bromley is arrested and sent to jail. Torchy gets herself thrown into jail, too, by turning in eleven false alarms. In prison for eleven months, she befriends Maguire. Torchy's plan involves trailing Maguire after both of them are released from prison. The amateur detective rightly thinks Maguire will lead her to Denver Eddie—and so she does.

In this, the final sequel of the Torchy Blane series, Jane (right) replaced Glenda Farrell (left). Farrell had defined the role of a tough, fast-talking blonde, through four previous sequels.

Already out of steam by the time Jane arrived, the series was terminated after her first and final try.

"By the time I took over the role of Torchy, the series had run out of steam," Jane later recalled. "Noel Smith, the director, wasn't much help to me."

"I watched all of Farrell's previous Torchy films in the Warners' screening room," Jane said. "She played her as a fast-talking, wise-cracking, tough-acting broad, but I wanted a different interpretation that was more who I was. Farrell's characterization of Torchy was rather annoying. I wanted to play her with more sympathy."

In the Torchy Blane movies that had featured Farrell, her none-too-bright boyfriend had been a detective played by Barton MacLane. Jane ended up with character actor Allen Jenkins, with whom she'd worked before. "I liked Allen," she said, "but I don't think any movie-goer will take us seriously as a romantic couple."

Smith not only helmed Jane in her debut as Torchy, but had also been assigned to her upcoming film, wherein she would also play a detective. At the end of the shoot, he had only praise for Jane. "She always showed up on time, perfectly made up, and with all her lines remembered. She was most cooperative."

"My, she was one good-looking dame, and my crew used to stare at her. Behind her back, they talked to each other about how they wanted to plug her. She'd joke and banter with them, but never give them any action. Frankly, the word back then was that Jane slept only with big-name stars like Henry Fonda or Clark Gable, perhaps an occasional director. But no cameramen, grips, lighting technicians, or messenger boys. Anytime Reagan called, she came running, even though he wasn't a big star."

One hot afternoon, Farrell showed up on the set to see how Jane's interpretation of Torchy was coming along. She and Jane chatted between takes.

"I'm leaving Warners," Farrell said. "Or, more accurately, it's leaving me. I hope I'll find work at Columbia and extend my career. But if I don't, I'll be like Blondell, one of those Depression-era film blondes of the 30s who tried to make Americans forget their troubles."

Jane wished her luck in her future career.

Years later, Jane tried to put a spin on her own B-pictures of the 1930s. "The writing, direction, and overall production values [of those films] may not have been much, but they did move fast and got all the action packed into less than an hour. I found that the shortcuts sharpened my timing and gave a razor-edge to my acting style. It was like being trained in an acting school. [Thanks to them] I learned how to be a stronger presence on the screen."

Jenkins more or less echoed Jane's sentiments. "The result was a hell of a lot of good pacing, compressed action with not a second wasted, and an overall root-a-root-toot effect that, I'm afraid, action films tended to lose when they got too long and careful."

"Of the three women who played Torchy, including Farrell and Lola Lane, Jane was the most attractive in purely physical terms," Jenkins said.

When the Torchy Plays With Dynamite came out, movie reviewers compared the three actresses who, over time, had interpreted the character of Torchy Blane. They defined Farrell as "the toughest broad of them all. For pure brass, she wins the prize," or so claimed the New York Journal-American. "Lane was more feminine and genial, less sure of herself. Wyman was less brassy, but more in control as Torchy, more her own woman."

For the most part, Jane's reviews were better than those for Lane. Most critics defined Lane as "a ghastly substitute for Glenda Farrell."

One reviewer asked, "Has any movie-goer ever seen Allen Jenkins get the girl until now?"

One of the worst reviews asserted, "If you've seen one Torchy film, you've seen them all. Jane Wyman does all the cutesy tricks she's learned from working in all those Warners' potboilers."

She liked Variety's appraisal of her performance best of all. She clipped it out to read it to Reagan on their next date.

"Jane Wyman is new to the title role of the newspaper scribbler and her casting as Torchy Blane is a happy choice. She clicks nicely with Allen Jenkins as her detective sweetheart, and goes through another exciting experience with mobsters. Wyman circumvents any temptation to overact and makes her romance with the detective lieutenant realistic."

"I'm grateful to Variety for saying that," Jane told Reagan. "But I didn't think my so-called romance with Allen looked realistic at all. Far from it!"

Torchy Plays With Dynamite had opened across the country as a B-list programmer on a bill that featured an A-list 1939 movie, Dodge City, starring the dashing Errol Flynn. Jane was disappointed when her picture flopped. Subsequently, the Torchy Blane series did not survive the 1930s.

Jane did not appear in Dodge City, but Warners publicity wanted to send her on a junket with Flynn to Dodge City, Kansas, for its premiere. She was told that the publicity she'd generate would help her career. Other Warners stars included Ann Sheridan and newcomer John Garfield.

Jane, of course, remembered, unfavorably, her one-night stand with the Australian star, Flynn, a major Hollywood seducer. She wondered if she'd be competing with Sheridan for his legendary romantic attentions.

One night, Reagan had dinner with his friend and Father Confessor, Pat O'Brien. He told the older actor that although he felt a strong need to become married with children, he did not want to abandon forever his life as a free-wheeling bachelor. He wondered if it were in him to dabble in the best of both worlds, although that would involve betrayal.

Susan Hayward, Jane Wyman, and Ann Sheridan were virtual fixtures in his life. He'd dropped Ila Rhodes, and now, he wanted to find time for two beautiful blondes, Carole Landis and Betty Grable, who had each been phoning him.

As he told Dick Powell over lunch at the Brown Derby, "I may be spreading myself a bit thin, but I think there's enough of me to go around."

When he discussed his dilemma with O'Brien, telling him, "If I accommodated all the starlets calling me, I wouldn't have time to make any movies," Reagan found him less than sympathetic.

"Poor Baby," O'Brien responded. "If only I had that problem. Even my wife turns me down more often than not."

On April 1, 1939, at Union Station in Los Angeles, Jane, with three big suitcases stuffed with wardrobe items from Warners, boarded a specially chartered train headed to Dodge City, Kansas, for the premiere of a Technicolor western starring Errol Flynn.

Jane was not in the cast of Dodge City. Warner's had commissioned Olivia de Havilland as the female lead. Jane was sent out as a Warners starlet, along with others, to publicize the film, but also to garner publicity for her own burgeoning career.

At the station, she joined some of the other passengers, including Humphrey Bogart, Ann Sheridan, Wayne

Morris, John Garfield, De Havilland, Bruce Cabot, and another starlet, Jean Parker.

Sheridan and Jane were shown to their individual compartments by a porter. Jane whispered to her friend, “I wonder what the sleeping arrangements are going to be on this train ride.”

Although Jane wasn’t in Dodge City, she was invited along on its promo tour.

“Errol already slept with me during the making of Dodge City,” Sheridan confessed. “And Garfield and I have just made a thing called They Made Me a Criminal (1939). We’ve been spending some very hot nights together, but there’s been absolutely no talk of marriage, which I’m glad about, ‘cause I’m just recovering from a divorce. John feels he’s got to share his dick with half the females of Hollywood, but he said it took a whole week before he got laid after arriving in Hollywood.”

“How tragic for him,” Jane said.

“I’m sure Morris will be knocking on the door of your compartment soon,” Sheridan said. “And perhaps Errol will throw you one, too.”

“Been there, done that,” Jane said. “But I could easily handle a second helping from that Tasmanian Devil.”

Sheridan was riding the crest of her Oomph Girl! publicity buildup. Even though her role as a dance hall hostess was minor, she was nonetheless assigned third billing in Dodge City, one of Warners’ “big budget” releases for 1939.

“I’m surprised Bogie is along for this trip,” Sheridan said. “Maybe he’s escaping from that harridan of his, Mayo Methot.”

“I saw him slipping some little wren onto the train back at the station,” Jane said. “She looked sixteen if she’s a day. So I think we won’t be seeing much of him.”

The train stopped first in Pasadena, where De Havilland got off to report to the MGM sound stages to begin her role as Melanie in Gone With the Wind. Jane envied her, having coveted that part for herself.

After that, the train made sixteen stops en route to Dodge City. At each of them, all the actors, including the stars—with the visible exception of Bogie, who didn’t seem to care—got off to pose for photos and to sign autographs.

William Lundigan...Erotically involved with Errol Flynn

Since Kansas was dry and because many of the stars were heavy drinkers, the prop department at Warners had converted one of the railroad cars into a replica of the hard-drinking bar ["The Gay Lady Saloon"] that had been featured within the movie.

During the first night of their transit from L.A. to Kansas, Jane awoke after midnight and discovered that the light in her compartment didn't work. She exited from her compartment in search of a night porter. During her search, she spotted a young actor, William Lundigan, emerging from Flynn's compartment. She had already met him, finding him clean cut and good looking.

Sheridan had told her that Flynn had gotten him a small role in Dodge City. That would lead to future roles in Flynn's films, including Santa Fe Trail, in which Reagan would co-star.

The following evening, in the Gay Lady Saloon, Jane was surprised at how open Flynn was in flaunting his bisexuality.

Rising from his table at around midnight, he looked at Lundigan. In front of everyone, he said, "Fancy a poke, sport?"

The young actor dutifully rose from his chair and followed Flynn to his compartment.

Jane had expected Wayne Morris to come knocking on her door, but he hadn't. She soon found out why. He was spending his nights with Jean Parker, the Montana beauty, who had been working as a Warners starlet since 1932. Like Jane, she had unsuccessfully auditioned for the role of Melanie in Gone With the Wind. Parker had previously appeared with the Barrymores (John, Ethel, and Lionel) and with such performers as George Raft, Katharine Hepburn, and Robert Donat.

She was married to George E. McDonald, the prominent New York socialite and newspaperman, but her marriage was coming to an end, as indicated by her ongoing affair with Morris. Parker would divorce her husband in 1940. Jane viewed Parker as her rival, and managed to avoid her throughout the course of the train ride.

Jane found Garfield, a New York trained actor and "bad boy," immensely attractive and sexually appealing, but dangerous. She was reluctant to get involved with him because of her friendship with Sheridan. But any time Sheridan was not around, Garfield sent Jane "signals."

He told her that Warners had recently completed a survey of movie fans. "Jack said I have a powerful image on the screen, a certain persona that's very sexy. He claims I'm unique among actors because I appeal to both genders —I mean, regular guys, and not just the fags, seem to like me."

She assessed his cocky attitude and feared that it would soon catalyze some ongoing feuds with the Warners' brass.

"You know, I'm the obvious replacement for Bogie, and as you probably noticed, he's been avoiding me. I can also play those Edward G. Robinson roles. I find both Bogie and Robinson a bit creepy. You may not know this, but Robinson's a fag. And Bogie has no sex appeal at all. When are you going to let me provide you with one of my samples?"

"Give me a raincheck," Jane said.

Late one night, before the Warners train rolled into Kansas, Flynn knocked on the door of Jane's compartment. "How about it, sport?" he asked.

Young John Garfield (from: They Made Me a Criminal).

"I thought you'd never ask," she said, ushering him inside.

She offered him a drink, during which time he complained that he had been woefully miscast in Dodge City. "No one appreciates my acting. Everybody seems more interested in my thighs."

"That's because you encase them so well in those green tights," she said.

"I'm just a god damn sex symbol to the whole fucking world," he said.

"You should be flattered," she said. "I'm honored that you could include me in your busy schedule."

"Of course, sport," he said. "I adore you. Sheridan and Lundigan are just passing fancies. I really like quality gals like you."

Then he stood up. "Don't you think I should get out of my clothes and show you I'm still The Perfect Specimen? I'm sure you saw that movie I made with your buddy, Joan Blondell."

"I did indeed," she said. "But I prefer to see the real thing, not the screen image."

Flynn spent the rest of the night seducing Jane, promising to continue the adventure after they got to Dodge City.

During their final drunken night within the Gay Lady Saloon, "The Boys" gathered on the far side of the car. Jane still hadn't spoken to Big Boy Williams, having never forgiven him for his attack on her. His was the loudest voice, audible during conversations he conducted, respectively, with Alan Hale, Patric Knowles, Lundigan, Flynn, and Bruce Cabot.

Jane and Sheridan sat together at the far end of the railway saloon, in a position that allowed them to clearly overhear every word the men were loudly saying. Their topic was Venus's flytraps, which Jane quickly figured out was a reference to a vagina.

"When I married Lili Damita, her honeypot was so big it could stretch a country mile without tearing an inch," Flynn said.

"Since Bogie isn't here, I confess that I've had his wife, Mayo Methot," Cabot said. "So has Flynn here. So has Knowles. It was the biggest hole I've ever seen. A guy could fall in."

"My dear friend, John Barrymore, described the Venus's Flytrap better than anyone," Flynn said. "He once told me what it was like to fuck Tallulah Bankhead. You shove it in, a journey through the depth of a West Virginia coalmine, until you come to the main saloon and gallery. There, a cabin boy descends with a ladder, ringing a bell, inviting you to go on to the lower depths, if only human skin could stretch that far."

Jane later told Sheridan, "I was afraid to get up and leave. I didn't know what Big Boy would say about me."

When the train finally arrived at Dodge City, the passengers were met with a brass band and a parade. As they were driven through town in open cars, Jane waved to the adoring crowds.

Dodge City was previewed that night in three different movie houses. The film was shown around the clock until dawn, so that the town's entire population could see it if they wanted to.

The first night in Dodge City, Flynn kept his promise and visited Jane's suite. He left at two o'clock that morning, returning to his own suite which he shared with Lundigan.

As Jane told Sheridan over breakfast the next morning, "How could you and I go through the 30s as starlets at Warners without bedding Errol Flynn? If either of us hadn't, we'd be disgraced."

One night, when the sands from the desert winds were blowing into Los Angeles, an elated Susan Hayward arrived on Reagan's doorstep. "I'm a star!" she shouted, as she kissed and embraced him. "Perhaps not the biggest star in Hollywood, but I'm on my way."

Her first big break had come when she was cast in Paramount's 1939 remake of*Beau Geste*, the original story based on a silent film, released in 1926, that had starred Ronald Colman. In the newer version, three brothers—Gary Cooper, Ray Mil-land, and Robert Preston—were the stars, with Hayward cast as their love interest and the female lead.

The dream of every Hollywood starlet, Susan Hayward was the belle of the ball in Beau Geste, attracting the leering interest of Robert Preston, kneeling at her feet; Gary Cooper, standing guard over her; and Ray Mil-land, moving in on the right.

"Coop" won the prize in all departments, but later dumped her.

Even though she was broadcasting the news of her big break, Hayward was also aware of its limitations. "I'm the gal who says goodbye to the boys as they set off to war at the beginning of the picture, and I'm the one who's there to welcome them back."

"Congratulations and come on in," he said, taking her wrap. "I've got two steaks on the fire."

"At last my Flatbush accent is gone," she said gleefully. "The director, William Wellman, told me I now sound like a combination of Ronald Colman and Barbara Stanwyck."

Reagan tactfully avoided asking Hayward about her romantic life when she wasn't with him. Rumors were spreading that she and Cooper were engaged in an affair.

As a means of publicizing Beau Geste, Paramount had sent her on a splashy publicity tour to her native New York, where she received a lot of personal publicity, including her appearance on the front cover of The Saturday Evening Post.

The next day, Reagan lunched with his new friend, Eddie Foy, Jr. During its course, they discussed their upcoming film, Smashing the Money Ring, another "Brass Bancroft, Secret Agent" thriller.

"He confided in me," Foy later said. "He told me that he'd never known Susan to be this wild and passionate. But he also expressed an unease about her, as if she were too vital and way too intense. His exact words to me were, 'Susan's a fiery tigress. I have this awful feeling that when she's in bed with me, she's going to sting me like a Black Widow spider after our dirty deed is finished.'"

Three nights later, Reagan entertained a very different, more angry, and more sullen Hayward. Her earlier sense of giddy elation had evaporated. At the end of the filming of Beau Geste, Gary Cooper, who seemed to have been afflicted with the same state of Leadinglady-itis that usually enveloped Reagan during filmings, had dropped Hayward and moved on to his next conquest.

Not only had Hayward lost Cooper, but those big roles she'd dreamed about had not been forthcoming from Paramount. Once again, she had been cast in two B-pictures. One was the lackluster Our Leading Citizen (1939), with Bob Burns, a former radio comic. The other, also from 1939, was $1,000 a Touchdown, co-starring Joe E. Brown and Martha Raye, two loud-mouthed troupers facing faltering screen careers.

Hayward did have some news that concerned him. That afternoon, she had had lunch with columnist Louella Parsons, who had asked her to join her in a vaudeville-inspired publicity tour scheduled for November. “She’ll have a bevy of beautiful starlets, and she plans to ask you to be the sole male performer going with her on the jaunt.”

“Who are the other gals?” he asked.

“She hasn’t made up her mind yet, but I know she’s going to ask Jane Wyman, that ugly little twat who performed so badly with you in Brother Rat. That role should have gone to me. I could have pulled it off.

With trepidation, Reagan reported to the Warners studio for his latest film, The Battle of City Hall [Before its release in 1939, the title was changed to Angels Wash Their Faces, the sixth of seven films featuring the Dead End Kids.] Its director was Ray En-right, who had previously helmed Reagan in the disastrous picture he made with Bogart, Swing Your Lady, and also in Naughty But Nice, where Reagan played a distant second fiddle to his friend, Dick Powell.

When Reagan shook Enright’s hand, he was frank, admitting he wasn’t looking forward to appearing once again with the Dead End Kids. He told Enright about the serious burns he had suffered on his buttocks after Huntz Hall had exploded a firecracker under his chair.

Reagan did not condemn all of the Dead End Kids, relaying to Enright the bravery of Bernard Punsley. “This doctor in the making put out the fire and ministered to my burns until the ambulance arrived. I’ll always be grateful to him for that.”

Jack Warner had ordered the film’s title change as a means of cashing in on some of the success of a movie that Warners had released the previous year, Angels with Dirty Faces, a picture that had co-starred James Cagney, Ann Sheridan, Bogart, and the Dead End Kids. Angels Wash Their Faces was not really a sequel, but Warner hoped to trade off the wide visibility of the original title.

Reagan with Ann Sheridan in Angels Wash their Faces.

As the son of the District Attorney, (Henry O’Neill), Reagan was not pleased with his role, even though he shared top billing with Sheridan.

Enright told Reagan that he had conferred with his colleague, Michael Curtiz, the jaded survivor of many previous encounters with The Dead End Kids. [Curtiz had directed Angels With Dirty Faces the year before.] In this heavy Hungarian accent, Curtiz witnessed how the Dead End Kids had thrown a lit firecracker into Bogie’s dressing room, and had painted obscene murals on the office walls of various high-placed Warner executives. They had also set off the fire sprinklers in the wardrobe department, ruining thousands of dollars worth of costumes.

Finally, as a means of policing the unruly delinquents, Curtiz called in a big ex-football player, Russ Saunders, to enforce security.

As Leo Gorcey later recalled about one of Saunder's disciplinary actions, "Anyone who has ever been hit, point blank—with water from a full-size, high-pressure fire hose can understand why we caused no more trouble."

As reported by Enright, "The first day Reagan encountered Hall on the set, he did something out of character for him. He punched Hall in the nose, giving him a bloody one. After what he did to Reagan on Hell's Kitchen, Hall certainly deserved that punch. He picked himself up off the floor and looked like he was going to fight Reagan. But he thought better of it and insulted him instead.

"Forgive me," Hall said to Reagan. "I know you have to keep those lily-white melons smooth and ready to receive the pricks of Errol Flynn and all the other studs at Warners who want to poke you."

Enright claimed that when he heard that, a genuinely furious Reagan looked like he wanted to continue beating up Hall, but turned and walked away instead. From then on, Hall and Reagan made it a point to stay out of each other's way.

Hall procured marijuana for the Dead End Kids. "They're going up in smoke with this Mexican weed," Reagan told Enright.

"It's good to work with Ann Sheridan," Reagan told Enright. "She's a great gal." In Angels Wash Their Faces, he falls in love with her.

According to Enright, Sheridan seemed to have a soothing influence on Reagan. "When they weren't needed on the set, they spent a lot of time together in his dressing room. Ann was very frank with me about their relationship."

"We're not in love," she told Enright. "But we have great sexual chemistry. If you can find a guy in Hollywood who knows how to fuck, you hold onto him."

For his part, Reagan never discussed his affair with Sheridan. "In spite of his busting Hall in the face, Reagan was a real gentleman," Enright said. "I knew he was dating Wyman at night. I had directed her pictures as well."

Once again, Reagan found himself working not only with Hall and Gorcey, but with Gabriel Dell and Bobby Jordan. He had lunch several times with Punsley. In the film, the character he played ended up badly. Trapped in a tenement fire, he is burned to death.

Margaret Hamilton: Have you ever tasted an unripe persimmon?

Punsley introduced Reagan to Frankie Thomas, who played Sheridan's brother. Reagan found him likable and talented, having worked on Broadway since he was eleven. He'd recently appeared in a hit film, Boys' Town (1938), starring Spencer Tracy and Mickey Rooney.

Sheridan was cast as the loyal sister of Gabe Ryan (Thomas), who is framed on a charge of arson and sent to prison. His gangland members work to clear his name, and the real arsonist is revealed at the end, as could be predicted.

"Other than being cast with Ann as my leading lady, what made the highlight of the picture for me involved meeting two delightful old broads, Margaret Hamilton and Marjorie Main," Reagan said.

The same year Reagan met Hamilton, she was also starring as "The Wicked Witch of the West" in The Wizard of Oz with Judy Garland. "Thank God the movies had roles for an actress with a sour-apple expression and a beak-like nose. She was a natural to play the greatest female villain in celluloid history. To my surprise, I learned that before she became the terror of all little kids, she'd been a kindergarten teacher and had, for a while, run a nursery school. In the movies, she virtually cornered the market on playing schoolmarms, backfence gossips, spinsters, and acerbic old buzzards. In private, she was one of the nicest ladies I have ever met."

He had seen Hamilton in her role in These Three, based on Lillian Hellman's The Children's Hour, which had originated as a hit play on Broadway. In the film, Miriam Hopkins and Merle Oberon run a girl's school. A malicious little brat, played by Bonita Granville, spreads lies about them and endangers their livelihood.

"I loved it in the movie when you hauled off and smacked hell out of the little bitch," Reagan told her.

"Speaking of Bonita, here she comes," Hamilton said. "I'll introduce her. She's got a crush on you."

Bonita Granville...a crush on Reagan

At that point, Reagan had not been informed that Granville was also in their movie. Hamilton later said, "Bonita met Reagan, but he seemed immune to the charms of this sharp-nosed, brazen young woman. Later, Bonita got Mickey Rooney to seduce her in those Andy Hardy films, but Reagan was a holdout. Of course, he had Ann Sheridan. What did he need with Bonita?"

Main, who later became famous for her Ma Kettle roles, had appeared in the original Broadway production of Dead End. She was asked to repeat her role. In this movie version, she was cast as the mother of gangster Humphrey Bogart. She delivered a classic line, "Ya yellow dog!" before slapping hell out of Bogie.

She had heard about the trouble the Dead End Kids had caused Reagan. "If any of these hooligans cause you any more grief, send for me and I'll turn them into sopranos!"

Mom, roasted piglets, and Marjorie Main. She threatened to castrate the Dead End Kids.

During the final week of the shoot, John Garfield came onto the set to retrieve Sheridan. He was introduced to Reagan, who had been told that he'd accompanied Sheridan and Jane Wyman to Dodge City for that film's premiere.

He informed Reagan that he, along with Sheridan, had been cast as the stars of a new movie, Castle on the Hudson, with Reagan's good friend, Pat O'Brien.

When Garfield excused himself to go to the toilet, Reagan said to Sheridan, "My dear lady, I hear you and Garfield are becoming quite an item."

"That's because with Jane and Susan Hayward lusting after you, you're not always available. With you, the line forms on the right."

Dick Foran called Jane Wyman a "go-to-gal."

"You flatter me," Reagan responded.

When she asked about his next picture, he said, "I'm back to playing Secret Agent Brass Bancroft chasing after counterfeiters. I'll end the 30s struggling through another B, heading for oblivion unless something breaks for me soon."

"Maybe Hollywood will get wise and cast us two heartbreakers together in an A-list picture," she said. "I feel it in my bones."

She had spoken like a prophet.

After sitting, bored, and watching Jane Wyman emote as Torchy Blane, Jack Warner pulled the plug on the series. To replace it, he immediately ordered the script department to launch a new series about a private woman sleuth that would be fresher and more tantalizing than the stale Glenda Farrell series.

The result involved Jane receiving star billing in Private Detective, where she was cast as Myrna ("Jinx") Winslow.

The 57-minute film would be screened as the bottom half of double bills throughout the country, opening at the end of 1939 and playing for a few weeks into 1940 when Europe had gone to war.

Screen writers Raymond Schrock and Earle Snell were hired to concoct a crime drama pitting Jane against her boyfriend detective, a role interpreted by Dick Foran in the part previously played by either Barton MacLane or Allen Jenkins.

Jane had never considered Foran a charismatic leading man. She told Noel Smith, the director of Private Detective, "Dick is hardly the type to set a gal's heart fluttering." Later, she re-evaluated him when he arrived on the set looking tall and handsome, a clean-cut all-American type like Ronald Reagan, standing six feet two with thick red hair.

She had always associated Foran with singing cowboy roles, where he had been directed by Smith. Occasionally, he had appeared in such A-list pictures as The Petrified Forest (1936), with Bette Davis and Humphrey Bogart, or The Sisters (1938), again with Davis. Jane had seen him in Cowboy from Brooklyn (1938), in which he had appeared with Reagan.

Although he was married at the time to Ruth Piper Hollingsworth, Foran signaled to Jane that he'd be interested in dating her. He explained, "My marriage is on the rocks, and I'll soon be filing for divorce."

"Welcome to the club," she said.

"If you're lucky, I'll sing my hit recording, 'My Little Buckaroo,' to you, something they featured in my film, Cherokee Strip (1937)."

"Thanks, but I'll skip it for the time being," she said.

Foran had nothing but praise for Jane, calling her "a real trouper, a good sport, no temperament, always a pleasure to play with."

In the same year, he'd directed Jane, Smith also helmed Reagan in Secret Service of the Air. "I always felt that Smith was the kind of director who wanted to rush through a movie, bringing it in on time and under budget," Jane said. "He didn't believe in giving an actor much guidance. His motto was, 'Show up on time, know your lines, and don't bump into the furniture.'"

Gloria Dickson: NOT the luckiest girl in the world.

The plot of Private Detective revolved around Jane, a detective who's involved in an investigation of a divorcée accused of murdering her ex-husband. A child is involved, as is a sleazy lawyer (Morgan Conway).

Jane and her boyfriend, a police officer, cross and criss-cross paths so often they decide to work together as a means of making more progress on the case. Her most dangerous moment occurs when she barely manages to escape carbon monoxide poisoning.

Jane was already a friend of her co-star, Gloria Dickson, who had made her film debut with Lana Turner in the 1937 They Won't Forget. She was the wife of Perc Westmore, the leading makeup artist at Warners. The Westmores often double dated with Jane and Reagan.

["There had been such hope for Gloria when she started out at Warners," Jane later recalled. "In 1937, she landed on the covers of several magazines, and featured in such articles as 'The Luckiest Girl in the World.' She wasn't lucky at all. I didn't see much of her after she and Perc divorced in 1941. There were two more husbands before she was burned to death in a fire in her Los Angeles home in 1945."]

As Jane feared, Private Detective met with lackluster or bad reviews. Variety summed it up like this: "Warners has put the Torchy Blane series into the garage for an overhauling and a repaint job. Private Detective has a new finish, but underneath, it's plainly the Torchy formula, with wider cruising range than was the case in the girl reporter series with Glenda Farrell."

When Jack Warner viewed Private Detective, he canceled the proposed follow-up installment that would have featured Jane. "Once again, I was back, along with the other starlets, in the Warners cow corral."

In the third of the Brass Bancroft Secret Service series, Smashing the Money Ring (1939), Reagan once again chased after counterfeiters, except that this time the crooks were already in prison.

The character he was playing had been defined as "an ace treasury operative," on a mission to bust up the ring, which was printing counterfeit money on the prison printing press and shipping it out into circulation by concealing it within bundles of their newspaper, The Big House Bugle.

Backed up with footage shot at San Quentin, Bancroft poses as a prison inmate so that he can live among the prisoners and learn how their operation works.

After Reagan read the script, mainly by Raymond Schrock, he knew at once that it was filled with all those prison movie clichés from the 1930s. The main villain, "Dice" Matthews, (played by the ratlike actor, Joe Downing), spouts dialogue such as "Don't forget what happens if you sing to the coppers!"

"A line like that might have worked coming from the mouth of George Raft," Reagan said.

"Dice" is feuding with the owner of a gambling ship, the SS Kismet, who he claims "double crossed me." When the investor is sent to prison, Dice goes after him with a shiv. But Reagan intervenes and saves his life, although (amazingly) that doesn't alienate him from Dice.

The lovely Margot Stevenson.

As the plot thickens, Reagan falls for the film's only female character, Peggy, the daughter of the owner of the SS Kismet.

Margot Stevenson was cast in the role. This sultry, blonde-haired, and glamorous New Yorker was also a stage and radio actress who was known mainly for her role of Margot Lane opposite Orson Welles in the radio adaptation of The Shadow.

Reagan in jail!! with Eddie Foy, Jr. in Smashing the Money Ring.

Stevenson is incidental to the story, and appears mainly because Jack Warner wanted some romance in an otherwise all-male prison movie. On screen there was no chemistry between Reagan and the star. Apparently, there was no off-screen combustion, either. While making the movie, Reagan did not come down with his usual "disease" of "Leadinglady-itis."

Once again, Reagan's friend and confidant, Eddie Foy, Jr., was cast as his goofy sidekick, Gabby.

Foy gave a good reason about why "Ronnie didn't pursue Margot, who was a very sexy broad. When she wasn't working, Jane Wyman was known to pop unexpectedly onto the set."

Some of Foy's scenes were bizarre and perhaps suggestive. In one segment, he says, "I'll never forget the night I played Little Red Riding Hood aboard the USS Arizona. Did they salute me with 26 guns?"

No explanation is given as to why he was referencing this folkloric tale before the rugged seamen sailing the battleship.

Trigger-happy, and very Film Noir: Good Guy Reagan aims a pistol at actor Dick Rich in Smashing the Money Ring.

Joe King played Reagan's boss, Saxby, although Reagan had wanted the more seasoned John Litel in the part instead.

The director, Terry O. Morse, a Missouri-born film editor since 1927, was new to Reagan. That same year, he was also helming The Adventures of Jane Arden. He complained to Reagan that he did not like to direct, "particularly the shitty material I'm assigned." In 1956, he did have a moment of glory when he directed the Raymond Burr scenes in Godzilla, King of the Monsters!.

Smashing the Money Ring was the second worst of the Brass Bancroft films, and Reagan felt his character would go the way of the already-canceled Torchy Blane detective serials. He also spent many restless nights fearing that Jack Warner would not pick up his option.

Jane visits Reagan, who's in prison garb, on the set of his Brass Bancroft movie, Smashing the Money Ring.

He later recalled, "A lot of script changes went on every day. You never knew what the action was or what your lines were until you arrived on the set. Morse was working with a very small budget and a time clock that was ticking. The movie was released, warts and all."

Since the title, Smashing the Money Ring, revealed the ending, movie-goers felt no suspense during the 57 minutes the film was unwinding on the screen. "Everything was predictable," Reagan said. "The dialogue was boring, the action lame."

"I made many films in Hollywood I was not proud of," he said. "Smashing the Money Ring was one of them."

In a bizarre attempt to promote the movie, Jack Warner ordered that theater lobbies showing the serial be filled with fingerprint booths, WANTED posters, and “crime clue boxes.” Patrons were encouraged to drop the names of suspicious neighbors into the boxes. Reagan objected to the promotion, defining it as “a Big Brother Is Watching You” kind of spying.

Reagan also objected to the way that he was being promoted both on and off the screen. Bancroft was defined in promotional materials as “a man with smashing fists when guns aren’t handy.”

Reagan pointedly informed the publicity people, “I’m not a violent person.”

In response, one member of the staff said, “Get real! You should thank us for publicizing your testosterone quotient. It worked for Errol Flynn, didn’t it?”

Jane closed out her lackluster film career of the 1930s with yet another programmer, Kid Nightingale, co-starring John Payne. Thinking it would be “just another picture to grind out,” she ultimately interpreted the experience of making that movie as “life-changing.”

When she arrived on the set, her plans to marry Ronald Reagan had moved from the back of her brain to its frontal lobes. But, as she told her friend Paulette Goddard, “Life has this funny way of throwing you a curve ball. While dreaming of walking down the aisle with Ronald, along comes John Payne. God has this talent for creating exceptional men.”

The devastatingly handsome John Payne and the pert, beautiful blonde, Jane Wyman, fell in love in both real and reel life.

Since Goddard had never met Payne, Jane expressed her opinion: “He’s a Southern gentleman from Virginia raised in an antebellum mansion. He is devastatingly handsome, with a devilish smile and an eye-catching cleft in his chin. He stands six feet four, and he can also sing a love song. Not only that, he exudes sex appeal with his super-wide shoulders and rocklike muscles, enough to make a weak-kneed girl swoon.”

“There’s just one major drawback,” Jane said. “This Greek god is married to that little nobody actress, Anne Shirley. The lucky cow gets to paw those manly inches every night. Imagine waking up in the morning with a nude John Payne in bed with you? God, I detest that creature for snaring John when I want him. He could have his pick of Hollywood goddesses, and he chose Stella Dallas’ bitch of an ungrateful daughter.”

The notorious “crotch shot” of John Payne from Kid Nightingale became an underground favorite of American homosexuals.

As Roddy McDowall recalled, “It did for John what that Betty Grable pinup pose did for her in World War II.

She was referring to the 1937 movie Stella Dallas, the tearjerker soap opera that Shirley made with the long-suffering character who played her mother, Barbara Stanwyck.

The thin, silly plot of Kid Nightingale focuses on a singing waiter who gets into a fight with some obnoxious diners and knocks them out, for which he is fired. A shady boxing promoter, played by Walter Catlett, witnesses

Payne's pugilistic skills and signs him up to become a boxer. "The quick buck artist" bills the character played by Payne (Steve Nelson) as "Kid Nightingale."

As the woman who falls for Payne, Jane, cast as Judy Craig, is a rehearsal pianist and singer. She and Payne get to perform a musical duet. He also sings operatic arias and Tin Pan Alley songs. Because of his studly physique, he attracts hordes of screaming females to his boxing matches, which are rather brief. His manager even hires an orchestra to accompany him, musically, after each of his knockouts.

"I got the role only because your friend, Dick Powell, turned it down as he was making his exit from Warners," Payne told Jane.

The director, George Amy, had a front-row position as he watched Jane fall hard for the seductive charms of Payne. "It was obvious to the whole cast that by the second day, Jane was madly in love," Amy said. "When they weren't due on the set, Jane spent all her time in Payne's dressing room. I didn't think Payne was going to divorce Shirley and marry Jane, although stranger things have happened. Jane was a sweet girl, but I feared she was heading for heartbreak. Like so many of Hollywood's leading men, Payne would probably drop her at the completion of the picture and return home to Shirley and their baby girl."

"Reagan showed up on two occasions," Amy said. "That guy liked to talk. I was known as a film editor more than as a director, and he asked me tons of technical questions, showing me he had a keen mind."

Johnnie Davis (center figure) is cheerfully positioned between Reagan (left) and John Payne (right). But it was actually Jane coming between the two men.

When Reagan heard about Jane's interest in Payne, he came over to work out with him in the studio gym. "Perhaps he wanted to check out the competition," Davis said.

When Payne was shown this candid shot, he said, "My chest is better developed than Ronnie's, and my legs are more muscular."

Amy was one of the best film editors in Hollywood, a favorite of other directors such as Howard Hawks and Michael Curtiz. His editing was one of the reasons Warners became known for turning out a steady stream of pictures with fluid style and at a breakneck pace.

Years later, Payne told the press, "When I made Kid Nightingale with Jane Wyman, she was so much in love with Reagan that she couldn't wait for our love scenes to end so she could rush to his arms."

Actually, however, in his capacity as a married man who was cheating on his wife, Payne was putting a good spin on his relationship with Jane, hoping to distract reporters from suspicions about his not-very-secret affair with his co-star.

Jane wanted to know every scrap of information about Payne she could learn from him. "I was flattered," he told Amy. “No woman had ever shown that much interest in me.”

She learned that he had attended a prestigious military school, the Mercersburg Academy, in Pennsylvania. Later, in 1930, he’d studied journalism at Columbia University, earning a living writing pulp fiction—“The bodice ripper type.”

He had also studied drama and took voice lessons at Julliard in New York City. “I drifted from odd job to odd job,” he said. “At one point, I was a wrestler billed as Alexei Petroff, ‘the Savage of the Steppes.’ I operated an elevator in a hotel, worked at the switchboard, and served beer to pool hall sharpies when not mopping up their vomit in the men’s toilet. I was a male nurse and also a nanny to two unruly brats.”

He later sang on the vaudeville stage. There, a talent scout for Samuel Goldwyn spotted him at Broadway’s Shubert Theater in 1934. “Once I made it to Hollywood, I was bounced from studio to studio,” he said. “I’ll soon be leaving Warners and signing with Fox. I don’t like the image, but they plan to turn me into a pretty boy to compete on screen with MGM’s Robert Taylor.”

It was pure speculation, but Amy suspected that one of the reasons Payne so easily strayed with Jane was because he’d heard that his wife was having a torrid affair with John Garfield on the set of the movie they were making, Saturday’s Child, released in 1940.

His affair with Jane marked the beginning of Payne’s roving-eyed conquests of many other screen goddesses, including Alice Faye, Betty Grable, Sonja Henie, Linda Darnell, Gene Tierney, and Susan Hayward.

As their affair quickly deepened, Jane confessed to Goddard, “John and I are in love, but he’s not going to leave that dreadful little Shirley thing. He’s made that painfully clear to me. But he had a counter-proposal: I couldn’t turn that down. I’m crazy for him, and he’s agreed to be my back alley lover, even if I marry Ronnie. That way, I can hold onto him. I mean, the sexual chemistry between us is explosive. I decided not to be greedy. If I can’t devour the whole pie, I’ll settle for a slice of it.”

“Kid Nightingale opened to rather bad reviews. The New York Times “yawned” through the picture, but praised Catlett as a “flibbertigibbet pug scout,” Harry Burns as a fake singing teacher, and “Porky” Ed Brophy as “a dyspeptic manager.”

Kid Nightingale also got a snicker from Variety. “The producer must have had his tongue-in-cheek. It’s a combination of one film of every kind of pap, hokum, and comedy business that Hollywood has used since Mack Sennett and the Keystone Cops. It’s so absolutely silly, it’s almost good.”

In the beginning, Susan Hayward did not view “pretty, pert” Jane Wyman as a romantic threat to her relationship with Reagan. She knew that he’d dated her during the filming of Brother Rat, a pattern he had followed with many of his other leading ladies. When his films were completed, so were his affairs, respectively, with these other starlets. At least that’s what she had been led to believe.

She had also heard that Jane had divorced some dress manufacturer from New Orleans.

On several occasions, Reagan had told Susan that he always rejected invitations to date married women. “I don’t care whether they are in the midst of a divorce or not. Until they get their papers, it’s no dice with me.”

She had taken him at his word, as he had seemed sincere in his dishonesty. It’s true that he rarely dated married women. Jane had been an exception to his usual rule, but there had been others.

If anything, Hayward felt that her greatest competition for Reagan’s affections derived from Priscilla Lane, who had been cast as the female lead in Brother Rat. Hayward, more or less, had been promised that role, fueling her resentment of Priscilla.

Years later, in her apartment in Fort Lauderdale, Hayward spoke with bitterness about that time in her life. “They called that whore, Priscilla, ‘Warners’ blonde sweetheart.’ She pretended to be a Goodie Two-Shoes, but everyone knew what a slut she really was. She was not only fucking Reagan, but also Bogie, Wayne Morris, Bruce Cabot, Flynn, and for all I know, Edward G. Robinson, except I heard that he was a closeted gay who really preferred boys. Can you imagine that? Little Caesar himself chasing after pretty young boys? That was Hollywood back in those days.”

“I remember Reagan as if it were only yesterday,” Hayward ranted. “It was Friday night. I had spent the better part of the day working on my makeup and finding the sexiest dress I could wear. He had called me for a date, and I was very excited. I put clean sheets on my bed and stocked my medicine cabinet with his favorite gargle. He told me he had some important news to tell me. I knew what it was: He was going to propose!”

“When the doorbell rang that night, I took one look in my full-length mirror for reassurance. Then I went to the door. There he stood, in a white jacket, his hair slicked back. He smelled like he’d just stepped out of the shower.

That was one clean man. I wanted to grab him, pull him inside, and rape him on the spot. But like Bette Davis said in some awful movie, 'I'd love to kiss you, but I just washed my hair.'"

Hayward recalled that he'd kissed her, but gently. She had thought that was because he didn't want to mess up her makeup. "I was in full warpaint, and we were heading for Cocoanut Grove."

"On the drive down, we made only small talk. I knew he was avoiding the subject of marriage. That would come later in the evening. I was almost certain he was carrying an engagement ring in his white jacket."

She remembered that "everything had gone swimmingly that night. He ordered champagne, but I asked for a Scotch to begin the evening. I found myself shaking. I thought a hard drink would steady my nerves."

She claimed that before dinner was over, she was wondering if she should keep her name of Susan Hayward, or else change it in future billings, to Susan Reagan.

"Since very few fans had even heard of Susan Hayward back then, it would have been no big deal. A lot of actors in the 1930s changed their names after appearing in only a couple of pictures."

Over an after dinner drink, Reagan told her that he had "an important secret to share with her."

"I won't get Louella on the phone right away," she said with a smirk. "I mean, she's got to know, sooner than later, but I promise to keep it a secret at least for forty-eight hours."

As she remembered, "He looked quizzically at me."

"You mean, you don't know?" he said. "God, I thought you'd heard the gossip by now. Word travels fast in this town."

"It suddenly occurred to me that Reagan and I were on two different pages. 'You're going to ask me to marry you tonight, and my answer is yes! There! That's out in the open even before you ask me. Us Brooklyn gals like to make it easy for our beaux.'"

Reagan looked startled before blurting out, "You don't understand. I've fallen in love with Jane Wyman. I'm going to ask her to marry me."

Blind with rage, Hayward rose from the table. She took a glass of champagne and tossed it in his face before storming out of the club, causing a scene.

"My tears were falling like a faucet," she said. "I called to the doorman to summon a taxi. When Reagan caught up with me, I hauled off and gave him the slap of his life. Growing up in Flatbush, I knew how to slap a man. He must have felt like he'd been stung by a nest of mad hornets."

Hayward claimed she spent the next ten nights alone, barricaded within her apartment. "Thank God I didn't have to report to the studio. I cried my eyes out. They got all puffy, and I looked like shit. The phone rang several times. I didn't know if it was Reagan or not. Finally, on the eleventh day, I picked up the receiver, expecting it to be either the studio or Reagan. It was neither."

Louella Parsons was on the other end of the line. "Susan, darling, I've been desperate trying to get in touch with you. I want to book you on a nationwide publicity tour. Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan have already signed up for it."

Louella Parsons had rounded up a troupe of starlets, plus Reagan, to accompany her on a coast-to-coast personal appearance tour, a kind of vaudeville act billed as "Parson's Flying Stars." The tour was to last eleven weeks, for which Parsons would be paid $7,500 a week. The columnist allotted $4,200 of that to be divided among her six young subcontractees.

Before leaving Hollywood, she told Hayward that "the stars of the show will be those two lovebirds, Ronnie and Janie." That caused Hayward's face to turn as red as her hair. She confessed to Parsons that she was still carrying a torch for Reagan. "I can't believe any sane man would dump me for that little mouse, Wyman."

Ronald Reagan with Louella Parsons, getting ready to make headlines on their return visit to Dixon, Illinois.

He knew how to handle “The Most Feared Woman in Tinseltown” better than any other actor.

Ever the two-faced one, Parsons confidentially claimed that she agreed with Hayward. In contrast, she told Jane how happy she was for her to have snared Reagan.

“There’s no way Jane’s gonna become a star,” the self-styled “Gay Illiterate” told Hayward. “She’s not beautiful. She’s not talented. Her career will be confined to bit parts, and I think her days before the camera will be very short. She’ll probably become a housewife for Ronnie, raising his children.”

“That won’t be true forme,” Hayward predicted for herself. “I’m gonna have to build extra shelf space to store my Oscars.”

Parsons assured her that she liked an actress with confidence.

When Hayward learned the names of the other starlets in the traveling troupe— Joy Hodges, Arleen Whelan, and June Preisser—she exclaimed, “I am not overwhelmed.”

Hodges had scored a success on Broadway in a Rodgers and Hart musical, and had completed a co-starring role in Little Accident (1939) for Universal.

Reagan had always been grateful to her for helping him get launched in pictures in the aftermath of his early migration to Hollywood. Their dating had been “harmless,” in his words. “No big deal, but we did have a love for each other.”

Before she contracted for the tour, Parsons had visited the studios, including MGM, Warners, and 20th Century Fox, asking for suggestions about how to choreograph and promote her vaudeville preview of “The Stars of Tomorrow.” As she admitted, “I’ve always had this soft spot in my heart for Ronnie. He and I share something in common. We both came from Dixon, Illinois.”

Reagan was very nervous about having to be in such close intimacy with Hayward so soon after he’d dumped her. But he was delighted that his friend, singer Joy Hodges, was going along.

David Niven had described Parsons as “Short, dumpy, and dowdy, with large brown eyes and a carefully cultivated vagueness.” But Reagan liked her, mainly because she was constantly plugging him and his career in her column.

He had, on occasion, been entertained at her home for intimate dinners with her third husband, Dr. Harry Martin, whom Parsons called “Docky.” He specialized in treating movie stars who had contracted venereal dis eases.

Nymphomaniacal Norwegian Darling of the Nazi hierarchy, and former fuck-buddy of JFK—Sonja Henie

The first time Reagan had dined with the drunken doctor, he had loudly whispered to him, “I’ve just treated Clark Gable for the clap.”

Because Parsons worked for the Hearst newspapers, she had booked her tour of just those cities where her boss, press baron William Randolph Hearst, owned a newspaper. That way, she would be assured of getting favorable reviews for her show. The hard-working starlets, along with Reagan, would be called upon to perform four or five shows a day, usually scheduled as part of the screening, in theaters, of a double feature.

For the big send-off from Los Angeles, and to cash in on free publicity, Parsons lined up major stars to see the troupe off at Union Station. The stars included Deanna Durbin, Sonja Henie, Eleanor Powell, and Hayward’s nemesis, Priscilla Lane. Hayward remembered that Jane was furious when Priscilla gave Reagan a passionate kiss on the lips. “Wyman was even more enraged when that nymphomaniacal Norwegian skating star, Sonja Henie, practically lip-locked Reagan,” Hayward said.

Jane later complained to Parsons, “I thought the ice queen was going to suck out Ronnie’s tongue.”

June Preisser with Mickey Rooney. “Andy Hardy” appears to be resisting her advances on screen. That wasn’t the case in private.

Meanwhile, also as part of their very public departure, Hayward was kissed passionately by a trio of bisexual stars, Errol Flynn, Tyrone Power, and, somewhat less passionately, Fred Astaire. Slipping off afterward to conceal herself from photographers, she wiped her lips, later telling Parsons, “I don’t know where those three cocksucking mouths had been the previous night.”

Although he wasn’t her type, she also accepted a big smack from the reigning box office champ, Mickey Rooney. She heard Parsons chide him for being two years older than his official MGM biography.

“I’ll be Andy Hardy forever,” Rooney said, “especially if Metro keeps finding these knockout sweethearts like Lana Turner for me.”

Pert, blonde-haired June Preisser showed up at the railroad station to greet Rooney. She had made Babes in Arms with him, and he gave her a warm embrace and a “very French kiss,” as he called it.

Preisser, with her song-and-dance routines, had more vaudeville talent than any of the other starlets. Most of her acts opened with her “rolling” herself, like a tire, across the stage, using her hands and feet to imitate the rolling motion of a wheel.

Capitalizing on her skills as an acrobat, this Southern Belle from New Orleans would soon appear with Rooney and Judy Garland in Strike Up the Band (1940).

Another member of Louella’s touring brigade was Arleen Whelan, born in Salt Lake City. During her twenty-year career, which began in 1937, she would make two dozen films, starting with Robert Louis Stevenson’s Kidnapped. She broke into movies after one of 20th Century Fox’s directors, H. Bruce Humberstone, received a manicure from her.

When Hayward met Whelan, she later confided to Parsons, “I thought redheads like me are supposed to flame. I’m on fire. Whelan can’t light a candle to me. That red hair of hers is probably dyed.”

To pacify her, Parsons privately agreed, although publicly, she tried to portray herself as a neutral and benificent monarch throughout all the backstage knife-stabbing to come.

After a tryout in Santa Barbara, the troupe opened at RKO’s Golden Gate Theater in San Francisco after the audience had snoozed through a Jean Hersholt movie, Meet Dr. Christian. The date of that premiere was November 15, 1939.

Parson’s 70-minute stage performance featured dance, music, comedy, and references to recent Hollywood gossip. On stage, her role involved sitting behind a desk, watching the hopefuls perform in front of her, while imperiously trying to figure out which of the “youngsters,” as she called them, deserved a mention in her column. As corny as this was, audiences in the late 1930s “ate it up,” Parsons gleefully reported.

Whelan recalled that Hayward usually stalked out onto the stage “like a red-haired panther. She planted her feet firmly, as if she owned the god damn theater and then she’d shout, ‘Anyone here from Brooklyn?’ Wherever we played, there was always a rowdy bunch from Brooklyn, or so it seemed.”

The highlight of the show was a comedy sketch between Reagan and Hayward.

Hodges recalled seeing them perform. “Hayward put fantastic zeal into her performance. She was the least-known member of the troupe, but stood out the most. She came out on stage looking stunning in a blue velvet dress with all that flame-red hair.”

“For her sketch with Reagan, she at one point ‘stage stabs’ him, but his head keeps bobbing up. Then she slugs him repeatedly. I don’t mean a stage slug, but a down-and-out, fist-smashing attack. I don’t know how Ronnie stood it.”

From the beginning, Jane stood in the wings watching as Hayward pummeled her groom-to-be. She later complained to Parsons. “She is slapping him so hard just to make me mad. If she keeps this up, she’s going to injure him. She’s getting even with him for dropping her in favor of me.”

Parsons later said, “Ronnie rolled with the punches and at no point did he complain of Susan’s attacks. After the tour, he must have walked down the aisle with Jane black and blue.”

Hayward, annoyed at Jane standing in the wings glaring at her, bitterly complained to Parsons, urging her to have her removed. “She’s destroying my act. Instead of concentrating on what I’m doing, I’m staring at her.”

When Parsons suggested that Jane remove herself from the sight lines of actors performing on stage, she refused. “To hell with this would-be Scarlett O’Hara. If I don’t stand there watching over Ronnie, she’d kill him before our wedding day. She’s just slapping him around like that to spite me.”

“Or maybe to spite Ronnie,” Parsons chimed in. Perversely, she seemed to enjoy the rivalry between the two actresses, each of whom would go on to become a super-star of Hollywood’s Golden Age.

Louella had traveled with her own personal hairdresser and came out every night clad in mink and pearls. As she settled behind a desk, onstage, she read phony items [“William Powell and Ginger Rogers have been seen holding hands”] from a fake teletype machine. Then, after delivering her “update from Hollywood,” she’d surrender the stage to Whelan, who sang a Bossa Nova tune. A San Francisco paper wrote, “She moves with mild undulations of her torso.”

Variety found Reagan “very personable, deft, and obviously at home on the stage,” suggesting that he might consider Broadway as an option one day.

The Hearst-owned San Francisco Chronicle defined the show as “sparkling—great dramatic flair from Louella.”

Non-Hearst papers were critical, however, one of them suggesting that Parsons spoke her lines in a “muffing, spluttering, stumbling voice.”

After San Francisco, Parsons and her “Flying Stars” were off to tour America, landing in such cities as Pittsburgh, where they played to “standing room only” audiences.

In Philadelphia, Reagan came to realize for the first time that he’d become a sex symbol to hundreds of young American women, along with a few grandmothers who had joined his fan club.

That was demonstrated one night when he left his hotel room, passed through the lobby, and walked out onto the street. He was immediately confronted with dozens of bobbysoxers, most of them with autograph books.

He later recalled, “Somehow, the crowd got out of control. I’d never seen women this aggressive before. They tore at my clothing, wanting a piece of me. I felt several hands grabbing my crotch. Before the hotel security guards rushed out to save me, I was practically stripped naked. Thank God I wore a clean pair of underwear. I thought things like that happened only to Frank Sinatra. Now I was experiencing it. That’s what I get for being so god damn handsome and having such a masculine physique.”

“On the tour, Louella was a bit mischievous,” Hodges said. “She reported to Arleen that Susan had been making unflattering remarks about her.”

Whelan set out to get her revenge, and went to Jane. “I hate to tell you this, but last night at around two o’clock in the morning, I saw Reagan leaving Susan’s bedroom. I was coming home late from a date.”

Jane believed Whelan’s lies, later denouncing her future bridegroom, calling him “a whoremonger.”

At one point during the tour, Jane got so angry, she wouldn’t speak to Ronnie except on stage,” Hodges claimed. “Finally, they had to appeal to their fairy godmother, Louella herself, to impose an uneasy truce upon these ill-matched lovers.”

During the tour, while Jane was alienated from Reagan, Whelan decided to move in on him, hoping to take advantage. In Chicago, where Parsons was fêted, there was a swimming pool in the basement of their hotel.

“Arleen pursued Ronnie there,” Hodges said. “When he put on his trunks, and went for a swim—he was quite the athlete—Arleen put on her most seductive bathing suit and followed him downstairs.”

“Arleen told me, ‘Ronnie’s package looks promising, and I intend to sample it before this damn tour is over,’” Hodges claimed. “She was also mad at Louella for inviting only one male star along on the tour.”

The players moved on to Washington, D.C. There, Parsons invited Eleanor Roosevelt to attend one of the performances, but the First Lady politely declined the invitation. Parsons fumed, “That bitch. I’m more famous than she is, and she snubs me.”

Hodges later recalled, “There was something so alone about Hayward. She was the most unpopular of all the gals on the tour. I was a brand new bride. And Dutch (Reagan) and Jane had each other. Arleen was very gay, with plenty of beaux. She was to marry Alexander D’Arcy in 1940. June already had a career on the stage with her sister, Cherry. But Susan—she seemed to have nothing except her natural talent.”

A promotional tour makes whoopee about the Ronnie-Jane wedding nuptials to come.

"Hayward had absolutely no sense of humor," Hodges continued. "She was grumpy all the time. We later learned that Jane had stolen Ronnie from her. I avoided Hayward whenever I could. She could be so blunt. You never knew when she was going to say something biting, hateful, or just plain sarcastic. Hayward sucked up to Louella, but gave everybody else a rough time, especially Ronnie and Jane."

At one point during the tour, a drunken Parsons took Jane outside and lectured her, "You're wearing far too much costume jewelry. It detracts from your natural beauty and makes you look cheap. You don't want to look like a Saturday night hooker when you go out."

For Jane, the highlight of the cross-country tour came when Reagan presented her with a fifty-two carat amethyst engagement ring. She proudly showed it to the girls.

When Hayward found out about it, she jealously snapped, "The man I'm going to marry will give me a fifty-two carat diamond."

En route back to Hollywood, their TWA plane stopped in Albuquerque, where the Pueblo Indians made Parsons an honorary member of their tribe. They gave her the name of "Ba Ku La," which translates as "Princess Starmaker."

Later, in her hotel room, the newly christened "Indian Princess" telephoned her editors, demanding that her previous submission be rewritten, as follows:

"Ronnie Reagan and Janie Wyman are to be married as soon as our personal appearance tours end in Hollywood. These two lovebirds are made for each other. It will be the third marriage for Jane, the first for Ronald."

When he read the column, Reagan said to Jane, "Louella says that your marriage to me will be number three. Where did she get that wrong information?"

"Not from me, darling," Jane said. "I was only married once. I've told you that."

During her years-long marriage to Reagan, she never revealed to him her first marriage to Eugene Wyman.

Years later, when Reagan was the emcee for The General Electric Theater, a reporter asked him about his involvement with Susan Hayward. All he said was, "Fire and Ice," before walking away.

During the months she spent in Fort Lauderdale early 70s, Hayward said, "It was men like Oleg Cassini, Jeff Chandler, John F. Kennedy, Porfirio Rubirosa, and oh, yes, Ronald Reagan, that led me to say, 'Men! I'd like to fry 'em all in deep fat!'"

Begin Married Life.

But Will They Be Faithful?

Reagan's Movie Line "Win One for the Gipper" Morphs Into a Vote-Getting Slogan for His Future Campaigns.

Jane Wyman began her "married life" with Ronald Reagan months before the actual wedding, although he didn't come home every night.

"He's a great dancer," she told Joan Blondell, "and you know how much I like to dance. I prefer to go nightclubbing six nights a week, but he can settle happily for two. It's a possible conflict."

"He talks of having more children," Jane said to Blondell. "I told him to have the orphanage send over as many kids as he wanted, but he'd have to hire some god damn nannies to take care of them. I've worked too hard to become a movie star to let it all slip away from me now. It's a possible conflict."

Before he entered into marriage with Jane Wyman, Ronald Reagan called on Pat O'Brien, his fellow actor and "father confessor."

Reagan later told Dick Powell, "Just before I stepped up to marry Jane, I had been in the toilet throwing up. No, not because the idea of marriage either terrifed me or disgusted me. I had history's worst case of the flu, and felt dizzy-headed and faint."

"On our honeymoon night, Jane didn't get a rise out of me."

"I've slept with a lot of Hollywood starlets," he admitted, "and I've come to the conclusion that none of them is ideal marriage material. I'm looking for a gal I could proudly take home to dear old Dad...and Mom, too. Nelle believes I won't find such a gal in show business."

"What about Jane?" O'Brien asked.

"She's the best candidate so far," Reagan admitted, "but she didn't make a very good wife to this guy, Myron Futterman. My fear is that once again, Jane will not honor her marriage vows and that she'll go out with other men when I'm away, perhaps on location. She cheated on Futterman with a lot of other men, including yours truly. Since Futterman was out of town a lot, she had plenty of chances."

"Let me ask you this," O'Brien said. "Would you be faithful to her? You're a real ladies' man, bouncing from the bed of one starlet after another. From what I've seen, you don't have to ask them. They throw themselves at you. Could you resist such temptation and go home to a wife and maybe kids night after night? As we Irishmen know, the flesh is weak."

"I've got to be truthful with you, as I always am—no bullshitting with you," Reagan said. "In all honesty, I think I'd become a husband with a cheating heart."

"I believe that, too, my boy," O'Brien said.

"My answer might be different twenty or so years from now," Reagan said. "Maybe then I'll be ready to settle down: But right now, I'm living my salad years. Only a fool or a homosexual would turn down some of the offers I'm getting. For instance, Betty Grable and Carole Landis are still calling me. On the other hand, I'd like to start a family…You know, have three or four kids."

"I have some advice for you that goes against the clichéd rule," O'Brien said. "Why not have your cake and eat it, too?"

Reagan looked startled at first, then seemed to mull it over. "I think that might be some of the best advice a young married man can ever receive."

Stepping out, Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan made a dashing, handsome, and romantic couple.

As this picture indicates, they had liberated themselves from their early Middle West dress codes and had "gone Hollywood."

After talking to O'Brien, Reagan proposed marriage to Jane, but how he went about that remains a source of widely different speculation. Some of Reagan's closest friends, including Dick Powell, Eddie Foy, Jr., and Eddie Albert claimed that Jane forced him into marriage with a suicide threat.

In a surprise move, First Lady Nancy Reagan confirmed those assertions in an interview in 1989 with Reagan's biographer, Edmund Morris. She claimed that Jane swallowed a lot of pills, but summoned an ambulance herself to rush her to the hospital to have her stomach pumped.

According to Nancy, when a messenger delivered the suicide note to Reagan, he rushed to the hospital. When he was allowed to see her after her stomach was pumped, he was alleged to have said, "Of course, I'll marry you.":

"You know how softhearted Ronnie is," Nancy said to Morris. "Jane Wyman knew which buttons to push."

The story of Jane's suicide attempt was widely publicized at the time. Nancy's source obviously must have been Reagan himself.

Over the years, Jane consistently denied the story to her friends, labeling it "a gross exaggeration. It was Nancy who tricked Ronnie into marriage by getting pregnant—not me. She should not be spreading lies about me concerning an event that happened so very long ago."

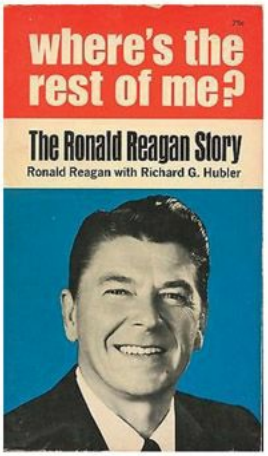
As would be expected, Jane had a very different version. "Ronnie's proposal was about as unromantic as anything that happened. We were about to be called for a take on the set of Brother Rat and a Baby. Ronnie simply turned to me as if the idea were brand new and had just hit him and said, 'Jane, why don't we get married?' I couldn't think of any reason we shouldn't. I'd been wondering for a whole year—ever since I first saw him—why he hadn't asked me. I was just about to give him a definite yes when we were called before the cameras. In trying to step down off my personal cloud, I managed to muff a few lines and toss in a whispered 'yes,' after the director yelled, 'Cut!'"

Louella Parsons supplied her own version, claiming that "One lovebird proposed to the other lovebird during our cross-country tour."

When Reagan became president—the first divorced man to ever do so—there was a renewed interest within the press about his first marriage. Many reporters sought copies of his first memoir, Where's the Rest of Me?, for a rundown of his version of his first marriage. The book had been published in 1965 at the culmination of his film career.

In an almost shocking omission, which his editors at Duell, Sloan, and Pearce let him get away with, Reagan didn't even mention that he married Jane.

[In March, 1961, Duell, Sloan and Pearce became an affiliate of Meredith Publishing Company, which later sold parts of it to the Academic Learning Company, LLC and to Prentice-Hall.]



Although Reagan was dating other women, even doing more than dating, he and his blonde starlet, Jane Wyman, more or less let the world know that they were "an item."

All dolled up, they descended the steps of the Biltmore Hotel on February 23, 1939, after the Oscar ceremony. Jane's coat was a gift from Myron Futterman, her second husband.

Parsons had plenty to say about the upcoming marriage. "Jane was always so nervous and tense before she found Ronnie. She was a girl on the make—for life, for love. I think she wanted, well, everything. Steady, solid, decent young Ronnie has slowed down her pace, and it is all for the best. It is an opposites-attract thing, but I'm predicting here and now that these opposites will celebrate their 25th and 50th wedding anniversaries—together."

Joy Hodges, who had accompanied Parsons on her cross-country vaudeville tour, saw potential trouble in the upcoming marriage. "Even back in 1940, Ronnie was almost fanatically interested in politics, always talking about the war, Hitler, FDR, Lend-Lease, whatever. Jane was clearly bored with such talk. She made that rather obvious. She told every body, 'Don't ask Ronnie what time it is, or he'll tell you how a watch is made.' She liked talking about movies and gossiping about the latest indiscretions within the Hollywood colony."

"I knew both of them pretty well, especially Jane, if you get my drift," said Wayne Morris. "I thought their attraction was almost entirely sexual. For that reason, when the novelty wore off, I predicted the marriage was due for a crash landing. I don't believe that a zebra can change its stripes. Jane was a playgirl who loved night clubs and handsome men, especially guys like me. Reagan was a magnet for the babes, attracting most of the little hotties running around the Warners' lot. He was also smarter, better educated. She didn't know what he was talking about half the time. Their temperaments were entirely different. Except for sex, the marriage had little going for it."

Eddie Albert, who once again had co-starred with them in Brother Rat and a Baby, talked to Reagan two days before the marriage. "Ronnie described Jane as 'lots of fun to be with' and 'a good sport.' That didn't sound like a man too deeply in love. I think she pressured him into marriage with that suicide attempt. I was convinced that my good buddy couldn't give up his pastime of screwing beautiful babes."

By the time Reagan entered into marriage, he was making $1,650 a week, whereas Jane was drawing only $500 a week as a contract player at Warners.

Although a so-called movie star, Jane had not yet been able to cash in on her growing fame. He knew he was not marrying a woman of means, but he soon learned his bride-to-be was not only flat broke, but heavily in debt, too.

Warners' Publicity wanted to use their budding romance to promote their careers. So they posed for a series of pictures demonstrating what a happy couple they were.

For the November, 1941 issue of Screenland, Jane had given an interview to writer Virginia Wood. "When I married Ronnie, I was drowning in debt. I was marrying a man who could not let a bill lie on his desk for more than ten days. I tried to pay all my debts before I walked down the aisle, but I was not making enough money to pay them off. On one account, I was paying it off at two dollars a week."

"Ronnie told me that when we were married, he would see to it that both of us saved half of everything we made," she said.

Before their marriage, Joan Blondell and her husband, Dick Powell, took the Reagans to the Cocoanut Grove where Powell was invited to sing a song for the guests.

Louella Parsons (left), the gossipy columnist and "Tinseltown Tarantula," came down hard on many relationships, including Clark Gable, a married man, living with Carole Lombard.

Although she was known for exposing indiscretions, she always gave Reagan and Jane a pass when she heard of one of their adulterous scandals.

"Later, Jane and I went to the powder room," Blondell said. "She made a confession to me."

“I can’t help wondering if Ronnie’s easy nature is some sort of an act,” Jane said. “He’s just too god damn good natured. It doesn’t seem possible that a man could have so even a disposition consistently. I’ll let you know in two weeks if I’m marrying a Dr. Jekyll who turns out to be Mr. Hyde.”

Jane didn’t wait long between marriages. Her divorce from Futterman was finalized right before Christmas of 1939. She married Reagan on January 26, 1940. The rite of marriage was celebrated at the Scottish-themed Wee Kirk o’ the Heather Chapel in the Forest Lawn Memorial Park in Glendale, California.

Jane later joked to Blondell, “It was Nelle Reagan’s idea to have the marriage performed in a cemetery. I practically had to stumble over the graves of Lon Chaney (Senior) and Marie Dressler to get to the chapel on time.” The chapel had been the setting for the 1937 funeral of Jean Harlow.

The Rev. Cleveland Kleihaur performed the ceremony, which was traditional in every sense except for the bridal kiss. Jane didn’t even get a peck on the cheek. That showed sensitivity on Reagan’s part, not the reverse. “To get to the chapel, I had to rise from my deathbed, where I was suffering from the flu. I felt so weak during the ceremony, I thought I was going to pass out.”

In a gown with accessories borrowed from the wardrobe department of Warners, Jane made a dazzling bride in her floor-length, high-necked, long-sleeved blue satin gown with a mink fur hat and a matching muff.

Two generations of Reagans at the “Ronnie and Janie” wedding. Nelle, in the frumpy finery of her era, and Reagan’s father, Jack, flank the groom and bride.

For his best man, Reagan selected Bill Cook, a friend from his Des Moines days as a radio announcer. Cook had been a member of Reagan’s barbershop quartet.

Jane introduced her maid of honor, Elsie Watt, as her sister. Technically, Elsie was not her sister, but the daughter of Emma Fulks, who had reared Jane as a young girl when her real parents had abandoned her. To give the bride away, Louella Parsons had arranged for her husband, Dr. “Docky” Martin, to walk Jane down the aisle.

Blondell was rather cynical about the wedding. “I met Moon Reagan, Ronnie’s brother. He held down jobs in media, but I found him rather dumb and boorish. But he was a doll compared to Ronnie’s mother, Nelle. She looked like some severe religious fanatic, a real Midwest Puritan. His father, Jack, was already drunk before the ceremony began. I heard Jack approach Jane and beg her ‘not to take Dutch away from us.’”

“Louella hovered over the newlyweds like some devouring mother hen,” said Dick Powell. “She even hosted the reception at her home on North Maple Drive in Beverly Hills. Louella was so excited, she wet her pants. I mean that literally. But she did that at most of the parties she attended. Weak kidneys, I suppose.”

The couple left for their honeymoon in Palm Springs, a resort that would more or less become her home in time to come.

Unusual for the desert resort, it rained almost every day, ruining Reagan’s plans about playing golf, a game that Jane also enjoyed. He was going to teach her to swim, but that plan also fell through.

Fifty years after that honeymoon, and at the same resort, correspondent Bob Colacello asked Jane to recall her rainy honeymoon.

“Is there anything about it that stands out in your mind?” he asked.

“No, not particularly,” she said.

He later claimed, “She flashed me such a cold and angry look that I thought she might murder me right there in her pink-and-lavender retirement condominium.”

When Reagan and Jane drove back to Los Angeles, he moved his meager belongings into her modest three-bedroom apartment at 1326 Londonderry View, off the Sunset Strip.

That Monday, Blondell called and invited Jane to lunch at her favorite spot, the Brown Derby. “Ducky, how’s married life?”

“We’ve had our first argument,” she answered. “He wants to start a family right away, and I want to stay lean and mean and continue my movie roles, waiting for the big one.”

“And now for the most important question,” Blondell said, even though she knew the answer. “How is Ronnie in bed?”

“If Hollywood was Mount Olympus Lew Wasserman (depicted above) was Zeus,” said the late Jack Valenti, former president of the Motion Picture Association of America.

Back in Hollywood, Reagan became suspicious that the mobs of crazed bobbysoxers in Philadelphia, who had previously disrobed him, had actually been paid to do so. The prime suspect was his aggressive new agent, Lew Wasserman, representing the Music Corporation of America (MCA).

Born in Cleveland to Jewish-Russian immigrants, Wasserman had begun a meteoric rise, beginning in 1933 as a theater usher at a movie house in Cleveland and eventually evolving, under the MCA baton, into the most powerful actors’ and entertainment industry agent in the world.

His clients included not only Reagan and Jane Wyman, but Warners’ über-diva, Bette Davis. In fact, most of the big stars at Warners were represented by him.

If Wasserman were indeed the culprit who had staged the mob scene in Philadelphia, he had a reason. It was his attempt to convince Jack Warner that his new client was a sex symbol, with the intention of getting him a breakthrough role in an A-list picture.

Warner believed that Errol Flynn and George Raft were sex symbols, but not “a clean-cut boy like Ronnie, whom I like personally, inviting him to my dinner parties.”

“My male stars—Bogie, Ronnie, and Edward G. Robinson—are not sex symbols. Bogie and Edward G. are too ugly, almost repulsive, and Ronnie is every gal’s big brother, but not one she wants to commit incest with.”

Wasserman had met with Warner to try to get him to cast Reagan in an A-picture, the role of George Gipp in Knute Rockne—All American, which was to star Pat O’Brien as the coach.

For a while, William Holden and John Wayne had been leading contenders for the role of Gipp, although Robert Young and Robert Cummings provided heavyweight competition.

At one point, a handsome Canadian actor from Manitoba five years older than Reagan, Donald Woods, was in the lead. He had appeared in several B pictures, making his film debut in 1928, at the dawn of the Talkies. Occasionally he got to appear in an A-list picture, too, including A Tale of Two Cities (1935) and Anthony Adverse (1936). Warner finally concluded that Woods “is even more clean cut than Reagan. I hear he’s faithful to his wife. My god, from what I heard, those two lovebirds fell in love with each other in the first grade.”

[Woods had married Josephine Van der Horck in 1933, and he was still married to her when he died in Palm Springs in 1998.]

“Okay, I’ll consider Ronnie and get back to you,” Warner promised.

It was believed that after this meeting, Wasserman then hired young women in Philadelphia to forcibly disrobe Reagan when he emerged onto the street through his hotel's front door.

But, then again, maybe not. No smoking gun was ever discovered, and Wasserman, of course, denied the charge.

"Ronnie's come a long way since he got rid of those god damn horn-rimmed glasses," Warner had told Wasserman.

[After 1940, Reagan was never again seen in any film with glasses. He had been among the first Hollywood star to wear contact lenses, something new on the market then in America. But there were problems. "Each lens has a little bubble over the cornea that you have to keep filed with a saline solution," Reagan told his friends. "Every couple of hours, the solution turns gray and you go blind. You've got to take them out, remove the liquid, and put in a clear solution. They're difficult to wear, but vanity prevails."]

Knowing that Wasserman also represented Jane Wyman, Warners issued an order concerning her appearance, too. "I don't want her to wear glasses like she did in those Brother Rats. It makes her look too scholarly. Also, I want her to be blonder. Tell her hair stylist to make her hair lighter. I'll invent a name for the kind of hair color I want. Call it 'Vroom Blonde.'"

Wasserman succeeded in negotiating more money for each of these soon-to-be-married clients of his. He arranged a seven-year contract for Reagan at $3,500 a week, referring to him as "my first million-dollar client."

He also convinced Warner to raise Jane's salary from $500 a week. He secured a three-year contract for her, beginning at $1,500 a week, with the stipulation that it would eventually climb to $2,500 a week.

Since she was still heavily in debt, she was delighted with the money. But as each new role came in for her, and she read yet another lackluster script associated with a B-picture, she continued to harass Wasserman to get her better parts. "I've got money in the bank, but I'm still a B-picture baby."

That long-anticipated A-picture role, her breakout movie, would not come until war's end in 1945.

In contrast to Jane, who was always complaining, Reagan became "the darling of MCA."

"Reagan was unlike all of our other clients, who bombarded us with complaints day and night," said Taft Schreiber, an MCA executive. "Bette Davis constantly storms our citadel with one complaint after another. The diva even came to us one time to complain that Jack Warner had never felt her up."

Newlyweds for hire: An artfully staged, skilfully choreographed (by the studio) marriage. Three views of "America's most ideal couple."

"I understand that Mr. Warner likes to put his filthy paws up a girl's dress," Davis said. "But he's never done that to me. Does that mean he thinks I'm not a sex symbol like Kay Francis?"

"If a star gets trapped in a rotten flick, we're to blame," Schreiber said. "But Ronnie never blames us. He suffers through the B with good spirits, knowing that his big break will come, feeling secure that we're working to build him up."

Wasserman predicted that Reagan would become one of the biggest wartime stars in Hollywood. "Let's face it," Wasserman said to Reagan. "Sooner or later the United States will be attacked. All the glamour boys, unless some of them are too old, will be in the service. You're blind. They won't draft you. You can take over those matinee idol roles. Just be patient a little longer."

Whereas Brother Rat (1938) had been a hit, its sequel, Brother Rat and a Baby (1940), was lackluster. However, Warners hoped that the publicity generated by the marriage of Reagan with Jane would beef up the box office receipts.

In the sequel, the original cast was reunited—Wayne Morris, Priscilla Lane, Jane Bryan, and Eddie Albert, plus Reagan and Jane. Instead of William Keighley, a new director, Ray Enright, a familiar face to both Jane and Reagan, was brought in to helm the script, written by Jerry Wald and Richard Macaulay. A strong supporting cast included such stalwarts as Arthur Treacher, Paul Harvey, Berton Churchill, and Humphrey Bogart's quarrelsome wife, Mayo Methot.

The baby in the movie, the one supposedly belonging to Eddie Albert and Priscilla Lane, was the usually congenial toddler, Peter Good. At one point during the filming, Elsa Maxwell, the famous hostess, threw a party for him at the Hollywood Roosevelt Hotel. The kid was brought screaming into the party, and he continued screaming for another fifteen minutes until he was finally removed.

The film's most memorable and prophetic line was delivered when Jane says to Reagan: "You might as well back down, because I'm gonna get you."

Reagan noted that Enright was frequently impatient and seemed to deliberately rush through the script. At one point, he told Reagan, "Speed it up. I want out of this shit pile."

On the set, Reagan met a struggling, young, and rather handsome actor, Alan Ladd, who was appearing in a small role.

"My great dream is to become a big star like you," Ladd said to Reagan.

"You flatter me," Reagan answered. "I'm hardly a big star."

Ironically, the stardom during World War II that might have gone to Reagan, had he not been drafted, went to Ladd, after he appeared as the laconic gunman in the 1942 This Gun for Hire.

"Hollywood's two midgets, Ladd and his frequent co-star, Veronica Lake, became the screen team that Jane and I dreamed of becoming," Reagan said. "Jane and I never made it, but they sure did. No hard feelings, kids."

Critic George Browne wrote, "What was mildly amusing when Morris, Albert, and Reagan were enrolled at the Virginia Military Institute as cadets seems silly and rather childish now that they have graduated to being so-called 'adults.' Their antics don't seem to work anymore, and we've heard that Jack Warner has ruled, 'No more glasses for Wyman.'"

Another critic noted, "Reagan looks distinctly uncomfortable kissing Wyman on the screen. Maybe they should practice more at home. Dare I point out that all the principal stars were far too old to play the roles assigned?"

Jane Bryan in 1939, off-camera, and her husband, drugstore czar Justin Dart, Sr. They evolved into major financial backers of political Reagan.

Another reviewer suggested that "If Reagan is trying to succeed in screwball comedy, as this film suggests, somebody should tell him Cary Grant he ain't."

Enright told Reagan that their film, Brother Rat, had angered some graduates of V.M.I., and that consequently, all references to that military institution were eliminated from the sequel.

By the time Reagan worked again with Jane Bryan on the sequel, his original crush on her had gone the way of the summer wind. She was engaged to wealthy Justin Dart. Dart was unaware of Reagan's former passion for his wife-to-be, and he and Reagan bonded in spite of their differences. A staunch Republican, Dart was large, gruff, with a brilliant grasp of economics. Mostly, they debated FDR, Reagan in his capacity as a liberal Democrat, wanting FDR to seek re-election, and Dart fearing that he would.

Dart was in the process of divorcing heiress Ruth Walgreen, the daughter of the drugstore magnate, Charles Walgreen. Even with the divorce, Dart still controlled a large share of the fortune. He would turn his share into millions of dollars. He later recalled, "I played music whose siren sounds eventually lured Reagan into the Republican orchestra."

Bryan retired from the screen after Brother Rat and a Baby, and Dart became president of the Rexall Drugstore chain.

They remained Reagan's personal friends, surviving the collapse of his marriage to Jane and encouraging a relationship with his new wife, Nancy Davis. "We didn't have to convert Nancy to the Republican side," Dart later said.

The Darts first urged Reagan to run for governor of California and later for President of the United States. In the decades to come, the drugstore czar would become the bluntest and most outspoken of Reagan's so-called "Kitchen Cabinet" of longtime friends invited to the White House.

Her career on the skids, Mayo Methot was the third wife (all of them actresses) of Humphrey Bogart, Helen Menken and Mary Philips having preceded her. Methot had been cast in a small role—that of a larcenous passenger on a bus—in Brother Rat and a Baby. Once designated as "The Portland Rosebud," during her youth in her native Oregon, she had lost her looks, thanks to her very heavy drinking over the years.

By the time she married Bogie in 1938, her alcoholism had taken its toll. In the 1920s, she had been a popular actress on Broadway. Signing with Warners in the '30s, she had specialized in the portrayal of tough-talking dames in such pictures as Marked Woman (1937), co-starring Bogie and Bette Davis.

On the set, Methot chatted with Reagan and Jane, who were each well aware of her reputation as the more combative of "The Battling Bogarts." Both were heavy drinkers known for their violent excesses under the influence. She was such a warrior that Bogie had nicknamed her "Sluggy." During one fight in their kitchen, she'd taken a butcher knife and stabbed his left shoulder. After that, the press dubbed their home "Sluggy Hollow."

Bogie arrived one day on the set, congratulating Jane and Reagan on their marriage and inviting them to lunch with Methot and him in the commissary. "I hope your marriage will be as successful as mine," he said, presenting a straight face to Jane and Reagan.

Against Reagan's better judgment, he accepted an invitation to dress in formal wear and attend a gala at the Cocoanut Grove with them.

As they were dressing for the event, Reagan warned Jane, "We'd better confine our drinking to one glass, because we'll have to carry Bogie and Methot home in our car."

At the Ambassador Hotel, Reagan and Jane nursed their respective drinks, while the Bogarts belted down quite a few. Jane couldn't help but notice Methot's "conspicuous cleavage." When she dropped her purse and bent over, her left breast popped out of her gown.

"Stuff in your tit, bitch!" Bogie snarled at her. Angered, she straightened up, lifted her glass of vodka, and tossed it into his face. Although Reagan expected an immediately violent response from him, Bogie, for the moment at least, gave the appearance of remaining calm. Meanwhile, Jane looked pointedly in another direction.

But as he sat there, with liquor dripping from his face, it was obvious that Bogie was fuming. Slowly, he picked up a napkin and wiped away the vodka.

At the end of the evening, Bogie and Methot headed for the lounges to freshen up. Jane and Reagan remained behind to pay the bill. "We survived the night, but barely," he said. "Now, let's get these two home and call it a night."

"Never again," she vowed.

With Reagan behind the wheel, driving them home, Methot suddenly demanded to be taken to the Cock n' Bull Restaurant & Bar on Sunset Boulevard for a nightcap. Reagan demurred, saying that he and Jane had to get up early, but Bogie joined his wife in insisting.

"Take us to the fucking Cock n' Bull!" Bogie ordered Reagan.

Finally, to keep the peace, Reagan drove them there in spite of Jane's signals that she wanted to go home.

The restaurant and bar was one of the favorite watering holes of the stars. In 1931, Methot had married its co-owner, Percy T. Morgan, and she still liked to patronize the bar because the staff never presented her with a bill.

Seated at table, both Bogie and Methot each ordered vodka and tonic, the Reagans preferring coffee. When Methot's drink was served, she spit it out. "This is gin and tonic, you fucker," she called out, loudly, to the waiter. "I SAID VODKA, AND I MEAN VODKA."

The waiter moved forward to replace her drink. With condescension, showing his utter disdain for his wife, Bogie thanked her for not having tossed the drink into the waiter's face. "That's what she usually does," he said to Reagan, "like she did with me tonight at The Grove."

Reagan glanced at Jane, noticing that she was growing decidedly uncomfortable as the night progressed.

When the waiter returned with a different drink, Methot slugged down a fourth of it before turning to Bogart with a certain ferocity.

He shot a glance at Reagan, saying to him in an undertone, "Take a good god damn look at that face on her. She's getting ready for the kill. I can always see it coming." Then he turned his full attention in her direction.

"What is it now, my fair lady? What is going on in that vodka-soaked brain of yours?"

She ignored him, focusing instead first on Reagan and then on Jane.

"I found out today that my husband has been fucking Ann Sheridan."

Reagan squirmed in his seat, knowing that he was guilty of the same pleasure.

Almost as if for the first time, Jane spoke up. "Mayo, that's not true, Ann is a dear friend of mine, and she confides in me. She never once has mentioned Bogie, except as a vague reference as a friend."

"Listen, sweet cheeks, I know better," Methot said. "Nothing gets by me."

"C'mon, bitch," Bogie snarled. "We're heading out of this joint."

Bogie stood up, along with Jane and Reagan, Methot rose on her unsteady feet, looking angry and distraught and also as if she were about to topple over.

When Bogie reached to support her, she slugged him in the face, bloodying his nose. He struck her back, knocking her down onto the floor. When Reagan offered to help her up, she pushed his arm away. "I can rise on my own fucking feet," she said, using the table to brace herself as she rose.

Then, facing Bogart in all her fury, she reached into her purse and pulled out a revolver. "Okay, Mr. Gangster, Mr. Tough Guy, it's twilight time." Then she pointed the gun at Bogie.

"I dare you," he said, defying her.

At first not knowing what to do, Reagan lunged toward her, impulsively wrestling the gun from her hand.

"You bastard," she shouted at Reagan. "I should shoot you, too."

Jane nervously intervened, taking the gun from Reagan's hand and passing it to the restaurant manager, who had rushed to their table as the noise had escalated.

“Come on,” Jane said to Reagan. “We’re going home. I’m sure that these two will get to their own home on their own steam if they don’t kill each other first. If not, it’s hardly our problem.”

Reagan dutifully followed his new wife. As he exited from the restaurant, the entire place could hear the Bogarts screaming at each other.

[As far as it is known, that incident at the Cock n’ Bull was the third time during her marriage to Bogart that Methot had threatened her husband with a gun.]

Louise Brooks in her memoir, Lulu in Hollywood, summed it up: “Bogie found Methot at a time of lethargy and loneliness, when he might have gone on playing secondary gangster parts at Warner Brothers for years and then been out. But he met Mayo and she set fire to him. Those passions—envy, hatred, and violence, which were essential to the Bogie character—which had been simmering beneath his failure for so many years—she brought to a boil, blowing the lid off all his inhibitions forever.”

The marriage of Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan attracted such nationwide attention that the couple became known as “America’s Sweethearts.” Jack Warner ordered that another script be found for them, insisting that in this latest picture that they be jointly configured as man and wife.

Top billing for their next project, An Angel from Texas (released in 1940), actually went to Eddie Albert and Wayne Morris, their Brother Rat cohorts.

A face familiar to both Reagan and Jane, Ray Enright, was called in to helm the pair once again in this 69-minute B-picture released by Warner Brothers.

The female lead went to Rosemary Lane, sister of the famous trio which also included Lola and Priscilla, Reagan’s former girlfriend.

Enright assembled a strong supporting cast that included Ruth Terry, John Litel, Hobart Cavanaugh, Ann Shoemaker, Tom Kennedy, Milburn Stone, and Elliott Sullivan.

An Angel from Texas represented an oft-repeated, unimpressive film concept with an overused, somewhat experimental history, a re-configuration of a tired old workhorse that should have been sent out to pasture years before. Its script, written by George S. Kaufman (not one of his better works), had originated in 1925 as a play on Broadway entitled The Butter and Egg Man. Its plot involved a folksy out-of-towner who is persuaded to invest in an iffy but eventually successful Broadway play, finding love in the intrigue associated with the production.

Warners was hoping that by teaming Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman as a husband-and-wife in An Angel From Texas, the studio could cash in on the massive publicity generated by their recent marriage.

The “Angel” in the film’s title represented a show-biz term for a financial backer. In the 1940 film, a good-looking, rather innocent Texan (Albert) sends his girlfriend (Lane) to Broadway, hoping she can break in as a working actress. Instead, she becomes a secretary to a fast-talking sharpie, a Broadway producer as portrayed by Morris, and his more restrained partner.

Albert arrives with $20,000 of his mother’s life savings to invest in a hotel. But he’s lured into investing the money into a Broadway show, instead.

Jane was cast in the film as Reagan’s wife. She easily outwits both her husband and his con artist partner and helps back their Broadway show with money from a winning sweepstakes ticket registered in her own name.

During the first year of her marriage to Reagan and her subsequent pregnancy, Jane did not see John Payne, refusing to return his persistent phone calls.

Reagan also temporarily abandoned his sometimes girlfriend, Ann Sheridan, at least until they started making more movies together.

Sheridan, however, was a frequent visitor at the Reagan household, praising Jane's cooking. Toward the end of the year, she began showing up at the Reagan apartment with George Brent, whom she would eventually marry.

Joan Blondell later delivered a rather revealing insight into Jane's relationship with her new husband. Blondell was aware of Jane's romantic interest in Payne.

"If you were making a movie with Payne and Ronnie, how would you cast it?" Blondell asked.

"I'd cast John as the romantic lover," Jane responded, "and I'd ask Ronnie to play the role of an older brother, who is a sort of a father figure to the heroine."

During their days off from the studio, both Reagan and Jane liked to play golf, so they applied for membership in the Lakeside Country Club. Their boss, Jack Warner, applied at the same time. Whereas his application was rejected, Jane and Reagan were granted membership.

Later, Reagan asked the club's president why Warner had been turned away. "We don't want Jews in our club," he told Reagan, who resigned from the club the following day, along with Jane.

Subsequently, both Jane and Reagan joined the Hillcrest Country Club in Beverly Hills, where they were befriended by other golf-loving couples, including George Burns and Gracie Allen and Jack Benny and Mary Livingston.

When An Angel from Texas opened across America, audiences were not particularly mesmerized. Variety referred to Albert's "befogged cranial machinery," and to Lane as "his school Bernhardt girlfriend."

The paper went on to say, "[Angel from Texas] wasn't made with the hope of knocking critics for a loop or lining up standees at the box office, but it serves its purpose of a good little audience picture with a fair share of laughs, once the patrons are in."

The New York Times characterized the film as "a bright little farce about a couple of yokels from Texas who outwit a pair of Broadway theatrical sharpies. Ray Enright has directed it in a breezy, farcical manner."

Another critic said the script should never have been reactivated after its 1928 release as a silent.

An Angel from Texas did absolutely nothing to advance the film careers of either Jane or Reagan. They were still hampered with reputations as actors limited to roles in B-pictures, hoping their big break would come soon. The sun would shine on Reagan far sooner than it would cast its powerful rays on Jane. Whereas he'd have to wait for only a few months, she would spend years languishing in the shadows.

Lewis Seiler had already directed Jane Wyman in He Couldn't Say No and in The Kid from Kokomo. For the third time around, he gave her fifth billing in his latest picture, Flight Angels, scheduled for release in 1940. The other stars included Virginia Bruce, Wayne Morris, Dennis Morgan, and Ralph Bellamy. She had worked with Bellamy before in Fools for Scandal, starring Carole Lombard and Fernand Gravet [aka Fernand Gravey], whom Jane had dated.

The excitement within the cast was generated by Dennis Morgan, Warners' handsome new leading man. Jane had heard the gossip: Now that Reagan had married her, he was no longer the favorite handsome hunk of Warners starlets. Almost overnight, Morgan became the most sought-after heartthrob, even though he had married his childhood sweetheart way back in 1933.

Jane was most anxious to meet him, but in the meantime, she had to deal with her sometimes errant beau, Morris. In her dressing room, he told her that his divorce from Leonora Hornblow would be finalized as soon as he received some court documents.

"Even though you're now an old married woman, I still have the hots for you," he ungracefully informed her.

Flight Angels: Wayne Morris, Jane Wyman, Virginia Bruce, and Dennis Morgan.

She thanked him for his continuing interest, but claimed, “I’m not ready yet to start cheating on my husband.”

“I bet you won’t say that when you meet Dennis Morgan,” he said. “All my girlfriends are dumping me and going for him. Are you going to join the stampede?”

“I haven’t met God’s gift to women yet, and I’m still very much in love with Ronnie,” she said.

“You will be until he starts to bore you,” Morris responded. “When that day comes, think of old Wayne here. I can always rise to the occasion.”

A 74-minute programmer, Flight Angels was an inside look at the pilots and stewardesses who work for a fictional airline. Morgan played an ace supervised by Bellamy, who grounds him when he learns his eyesight is failing. Bruce and Jane were cast as stewardesses, Bruce is in love with Morgan, who—in the film—eventually marries her. Morris was cast as an engineer working on a secret research aircraft called “the Stratosphere Ship.” If all goes well, the aircraft will fly higher and faster than any other plane.

During the compilation of the film, Morris became so fascinated with flying that he told Jane that planned to study to become a naval aviator. “War is coming to America,” he said, “and I want to be ready to shoot the bastards down when it comes.”

Seiler introduced Jane to Margot Stevenson, who had been cast in a minor role of a woman named “Rita.” Jane was rather cold and distant to this actress, because she suspected that the New York beauty had had an affair with Reagan when she had co-starred with him in the picture, Smashing the Money Ring.

On the set of Flight Angels, Stevenson was spotted leaving Morris’ dressing room on two separate occasions. As Jane told Seiler, “Since Wayne isn’t getting anything from me, he’s wasting no time finding it elsewhere.”

In Flight Angels, Dennis Morgan seemed to have been typecast. On screen, he played a pilot with a roving eye for the ladies, much to the distress of his on-screen wife, Virginia Bruce.

Off screen, Morgan’s roving eye focused on Jane.

At one point, John Garfield arrived late one afternoon for a date with Stevenson. Their affair would continue when she was cast in his next two films, Castle on the Hudson (1940) and Saturday's Children (also 1940).

At long last, the eagerly anticipated Dennis Morgan walked into Jane's life. His romantic image had not been overly sold, as he was extremely handsome, radiating charm with his curly hair, broad shoulders, tall physique, and "Oscar-winning smile."

Jane agreed with the recent assessment of Ginger Rogers, who defined him as "the personification of the Arrow Collar Man." Variety had announced that Morgan was set to co-star with Rogers in Kitty Foyle (1940), each in meaty and highly dramatic roles.

Morgan had a natural spontaneity and winning charm. As he kissed Jane's hand, he said, "What a bonny lass. I know that sounds corny, but Jack Warner has ordered me to act more Irish."

"Actually, I was born in Wisconsin to a Swedish father and a Scottish mother. But Warner plans to cast me Irish."

"Your secret is safe with me," she said.

"For keeping it secret, I'll sing 'When Irish Eyes Are Smiling' one night to you."

"I can hardly wait for that moment," she said, flirtatiously.

"I'm supposed to be the new boy on the block at Warners," Morgan told Jane. "I'm hot, at least according to the publicity, but you may not agree with my build-up."

"But I do," she said. "You look like a dream walking. I hope I'm not being too forward. I just blurted that out without thinking."

"I love hearing that from you, Button Nose," he said. "I might even belt out a song for you right now."

"I know what a great voice you have," she said. "Ronnie took me to see The Great Ziegfeld (1936). You were dazzling when you emerged dressed to the nines and looking gorgeous, surrounded by a birthday cake of the most beautiful women in the world. I practically swooned when you sang 'A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody.'"

"I hate to disappoint you," Morgan said, "but those idiots over at MGM dubbed my own singing voice and substituted that of Allan Jones instead. I can sing so much better than he can."

"I'm sure that's true," she said. "That won't happen at Warners."

"Already, the attacks on me have begun," he said. "Today I read that I'm being referred to as a 'muscle-bound canary.'"

"We have to expect that in this business."

"I'd like to get to know you better," he said.

"For you, I'll be an open book," she said. "But for now, you've got to go. If you stick around for another minute, I'll fall madly in love with you. After all, I'm only flesh and blood."

He kissed her on the cheek, but hadn't gone far until he glanced back at her, promising, "I'll be back!"

Flight Angels opened to predictably bad reviews, Variety claiming, "It's as obvious as the nose on your face and a typical Grade B second feature."

Another critic, Clive Hirschhorn, wrote, "The corn is high as an elephant's eye (8,000 feet, to be precise) in this soap opera of the air, which zeroes in on the private lives and public duties of air stewardesses and the men who pilot planes in which they serve. Romance, drama, and excitement cohabit shamelessly in Maurice Leo's familiar screenplay."

Years later, Morris recalled fondly his working on that picture and on other films with Jane, Reagan, Eddie Albert, Priscilla Lane, and Jane Bryan. "We were the 'One-for-All and All-for-One' Society of Busy Bees. 'B,' of course, for B pictures. But those days were fun."

After Lewis Seiler directed Jane Wyman in Flight Angels, he helmed her husband, Reagan, that same year in Murder in the Air (1940). This would be the fourth (and last) film in which Reagan would star as secret agent Brass Bancroft.

He was reunited with his friend and confidant, Eddie Foy, Jr., who had starred with him in Smashing the Money Ring. John Litel, who had interpreted the role of his boss in the first Bancroft film, returned to the series in the same role of Saxby. The British actor, James Stephenson, was a familiar face, having co-starred with Reagan in Cowboy from Brooklyn, Boy Meets Girl, and Secret Service of the Air, each of the three released in 1938.

"Hello Sailor." Brass (Reagan) Bancroft with Foy, embarking on his secret mission.

In their latest endeavor, Stevenson would interpret the role of the spy, Joe Garvey, who speaks with an intentionally indeterminate foreign accent. He directs an allegedly patriotic society with hints of Fascist bad-guy overtones, "Loyal Naturalized Americans."

With a length of 55 minutes, Murder in the Air was the shortest of the Bancroft films, but also the best for fight scenes and aerial combat on the screen. Reagan's increasing number of female fans, as well as his gay ones, thought he looked "really cute" in his sailor uniform and swooned when he appeared shirtless.

As the war deepened in Europe, the United States was still not officially involved, although the FBI and other agencies were arresting alleged saboteurs and ferreting out spies on the home front. Even though he fully recognized the commercial value of releasing a film about the spy industry into espionage-crazed America in 1940, Jack Warner accused the producer, Bryan Foy, of "stretching a five-paragraph story on page eighteen into five or six reels."

To beef up the plot, Bryan Foy had obtained footage of a dirigible crashing into the ocean. Scriptwriter Raymond Schrock was ordered to configure that footage into the film's dramatic climax.

After a well-known spy is killed in a train wreck, Reagan, as Brass Bancroft, is ordered to assume his identity and penetrate the inner circle of the spy ring. That part in the film turned out to be a bit of a stretch for his acting ability. One reviewer found his impersonation of an America-hating tough guy unconvincing. "Reagan is just too clean-cut and patriotic to be a Nazi spy."

Brass Bancroft's goal in the film involved preventing the spies from obtaining a new super weapon, a death ray projector that could destroy any airplane within a distance of four miles. [It was widely speculated in some quarters that Hitler already possessed such a weapon.] In the film, the death ray was called "The Inertia Projector," the ownership of which will determine the outcome of the war.

Of course, as anticipated, our hero, Reagan, will save the day and bring down the plane in which the chief bad guy—assisted by his use of the death ray—is making his escape.

Future historians have noted that in the 1980s, President Reagan's "Strategic Defense Initiative"— more commonly known as his Star Wars plan—was inspired by memories of the death ray, whose concept he had been so closely involved with during his crafting of Murder in the Air.

Reagan, as Brass Bancroft, on the verge of both a scary discovery, and an attack from James Stephenson.

Prior to Reagan's involvement, the film's title had been renamed twice. Previous names had included both The Enemy Within and Uncle Sam Awakens before they were declared as not commercial enough. The title that eventually stuck was Murder in the Air. According to Jack Warner, "'Murder,' the audience understands, and 'In the Air' makes it all the more intriguing."

Long before it became notorious to liberals, HUAC (the House Un-American Activities Committee) was presented favorably in the film, a life-supporting voice that warned about the dangers of saboteurs and spies who operated destructively within the fabric of the American infrastructure.

The film's attack on "Reds" and "Wobblies" (a pejorative name for labor unions) provided a preview of Reagan's future as a conservative politician.

Among the many studios in Hollywood, Warners had become anti-Nazi before MGM, Fox, or Paramount. In 1939, Warners' had released Confessions of a Nazi Spy, starring Edward G. Robinson. Because America was supposedly neutral at the time, that film had set off a wave of protests.

"Jack had a lot of balls to make this anti-Fascist film," Reagan said after seeing the movie.

Some congressmen had accused the Warners, especially Jack and Harry, of "warmongering." Immediately after its release, Murder in the Air was banned in Germany, Japan, and in some Latin American countries, including Argentina.

Months before its script went before the cameras, Jack's brother, Harry Warner, had delivered a blistering speech before the American Legion. He called upon Legionnaires to "fight unwelcome un-American forces. Drive them from their secret hiding places, destroy their insidious propaganda machines, and drive out the 'Bunds' and their leagues, their clans and Black Legions, the Silver Shirts, the Black Shirts, and the Dirty Shirts!"

After the release of Confessions of a Nazi Spy, the censors at the Breen Office wanted to avoid another controversy about America's neutrality. In an early draft of Murder in the Air, a coven of saboteurs, obviously German, were ripping apart railroad tracks as a means of derailing an oncoming train. Censors demanded that the scene be reshot and the saboteurs reconfigured as members of "mixed nationalities."

The months before America went to war represented a troubled time, with opinions sharply and rancorously divided. German Americans were raising loud objections against an unfavorable depiction of their homeland. Irish Americans opposed Lend Lease, America's initiative that sent supplies and equipment to a battered Britain, Ireland's long-standing oppressor. Many U.S. senators remained firmly isolationist, urging Americans to stay out of "Europe's War." Reagan learned that the Breen office was often, at its core, anti-Semitic, blaming Jews, not Hitler, for the troubles in Europe.

Even at that early stage, Reagan was aware of the dangers of Fascism. He was firmly committed to the belief that America was in imminent danger of an attack. He endorsed the first draft of Murder in the Air, with the full realization that it was obvious pro-American propaganda. Within a relatively short time, he would be making propaganda films for the War Department.

Originally Murder in the Air had opened with stock footage of goose-stepping Nazis on (malevolent) parade. The chief of the Secret Service proclaimed in a voice-over, "Once again, the world is rushing headlong into a maelstrom of death and destruction which would wipe civilization from the face of the earth."

After depicting the horrors of Europe, the screen turns peaceful, showing America going about its daily pursuits, feeling secure in its policy of isolation. But warnings are sounded that espionage agents are seeking to paralyze American industry, bomb its defense plants, and destroy its natural resources.

The Breen office demanded that these anti-German scenes be removed. However, some of the footage of the original version remained, wherein against a backdrop of fires and explosions, a headline reveals the gravity of the situation—PRESIDENT PLANS NATIONWIDE DRIVE ON SPIES AND SABOTEURS.

Reagan was already familiar with Lya Lys, the actress cast as Murder in the Air's leading lady. He had already seen her performance in Confessions of a Nazi Spy. In this newest film, she'd been cast as the scheming and crafty Hilda Ryker, who exposes Brass Bancroft's cover when he is on the trail of the spies.

Although he played a villain in Murder in the Air, Stephenson, in Confessions of a Nazi Spy, had been cast as a British Military Intelligence Agent. In Confessions, Lys had been cast as Erika Wolff, the mistress of Dr. Karl Klassel (Paul Lukas) who arrives in America to rally support for the Nazi cause among German Americans.

When Reagan met Lys, she had just married John Gunnerson, a Chicago vending machine manufacturer who had once been married to the famous silent screen star Anna Q. Nilsson. During the shooting of Murder, Lys used Reagan as a kind of Big Brother confidant, pouring out her woes. "After being married to John for only three days, I realized it was a mistake."

He found Lys an intriguing woman, originally thinking she was German, having been born in Berlin. But she told him she was actually French and Russian.

Three years older than Reagan, she was among a group of French actors who had arrived in Hollywood in the late 1920s to make French language versions of American films. Their members included the future matinee idol Charles Boyer.

Lya Lys, a European actress, fled the Nazis, refusing to make propaganda films for Josef Goebbels.

Lys told Reagan that in the 1930s, she had returned to Paris to star in the surrealistic film by Salvador Dalí and Luís Buñuel, L'Age d'Or, delivering her finest performance.

She returned to Paris during the late 1930s, and was appearing there in a play entitled The King's Dough when war broke out. "I was among thousands of refugees fleeing Europe," she told Reagan. "But I couldn't get passage on a ship sailing from France. I was told to use a Scandinavian port. On the way to Denmark, I was detained for three days by the Nazis, even though I had become an American citizen. It seems that Josef Goebbels wanted me to stay in Berlin and make propaganda films for the Nazis at UFA Studios. Like Marlene Dietrich, I refused. They finally let me go, warning me never to return to Germany, telling me that if I did, I would be imprisoned."

Rightly thinking that Murder in the Air was a timely film, Warners geared up a massive publicity campaign, unusual for a programmer. In real life, Reagan had a morbid terror of flying, but in Warners' publicity releases, he was depicted as an ace pilot with a reputation for daring parachute jumps.

His friend, Foy Jr., asked him if he were embarrassed, in spite of his aversion to flying, at being promoted as a modern day Charles Lindbergh.

"It's all fantasy, my dear friend," Reagan said. "You forget we slave every day in a dream factory. Since when did Hollywood ever concern itself with telling the truth?"

Warners' Publicity Department devised a marketing plan wherein young boys across the country, for a fee, could join the Junior Secret Service. Membership included an 8" x 10" autographed photo of Brass Bancroft, signed by Reagan himself.

Ads across America asked countrymen to join Reagan in battling what was defined as "A Fifth Column of up to 20,000 secret and concealed enemies" seeking to sabotage America's infrastructure and to steal America's secrets. Schools were urged to set up essay contests, addressing the question of, "What steps do you think government must take to combat espionage and spying?"

Variety wrote that Murder in the Air "is strong on novelty in the Buck Rogers vein," and The New York Tribune pronounced Reagan "a dashing hero and a two-fisted man." But despite their patriotic preachings, Brass Bancroft movies did not routinely receive good reviews. One critic interpreted Reagan as "a heroic youngster playing Bancroft with vigorous conviction as he faces danger."

As Reagan moved into the 1940s, his increasing popularity was reflected in an avalanche of fan mail. Warners' mail department claimed that he was receiving almost as much fan mail as Errol Flynn.

[Writing in 2010, the Memphis-based film critic John Beifuss said, "The Warner archive collection of Brass Bancroft films raises a question. Why aren't these movies better remembered today? Is it because Reagan was a bit too immature and (even then) square to appeal to kid audiences, while also a bit boyish (and the films too juvenile) to interest adults? Whatever the reason, they're worth rediscovering for old movie buffs in general and for Reagan fans in particular."]

Carole Landis no longer called, especially after Reagan got serious about his relationship with Jane Wyman. He figured that the sexy blonde starlet had moved on with her life, although he'd always been attracted to her.

Variety had reported that she'd landed the female lead in an A-list picture, One Million B.C. (1940), opposite a muscle-bound newcomer, Victor Mature. It appeared that he was being groomed for stardom. Reagan had seen pictures in the newspapers of this actor, with his muscular frame, thick lips that opened to a toothy smile, and slick waves of dark hair. Variety also noted that in One Million B.C., Mature as a skin-wearing caveman would battle giant lizards while projecting grunts at Landis.

One night, when Jane was involved in an evening shoot, Reagan called Landis, who agreed to meet him at an out-of-the-way club. He signaled that now that he was married, it would not be a romantic date, but a "chance for old friends to catch up."

She agreed to meet with him with the understanding that she'd have to leave before nine o'clock, for an important engagement.

Over drinks at the Blue Parrot, she told him how thrilled she was to be starring as the lead in a new movie. "I think it's going to make me a star. Of course, I have to wear skimpy animal skins and show off my body, but what the hell. Today, Victor Mature and I had to shoot a scene in this tree where a fifteen-foot python slithers down to join us. I nicknamed it Pete. The film is being directed by Hal Roach, Senior and Junior. They had to film a dozen takes because Vic is deathly afraid of snakes. I'm sort of a tomboy and wasn't scared. However, I wasn't quite prepared for my closeup with Pete when the god damn reptile darted his tongue out to give me a kiss."

Rather abruptly, he asked, "How's your love life?"

"Now that you no longer come around, I've found a beau or two. Of course, as anticipated, Vic comes on strong with me. He's the son of an Italian-speaking immigrant knife sharpener from Kentucky. Roach has signed him to a contract at $250 a week. When one of his talent agents discovered him, Vic was living in a tent on the bank of a small river in San Fernando Valley, where he bathed every morning. Getting fucked by him is like having a log shoved up you."

"That doesn't sound like much fun," Reagan said. "Are you and Zanuck finished?"

"Not at all," she said. "He keeps promising to make me a star. I still come running whenever he calls me and summons me to his office for love in the afternoon. All business at Fox slows down between noon and 2pm, when he takes his conquest of the day."

"I gathered you've moved," Reagan said.

"I rented this little bungalow at 1130 South Clark in Los Angeles. It's a neighborhood filled with underpaid studio employees and young actors hoping for the big break."

At the end of their meeting, Landis wrote down her new address and phone number. "One night when there's a full moon, why don't you drop in?"

"I love seeing you, but it doesn't seem that you have any night free."

"You've got a point there, gorgeous," she said. "What the hell! For old time's sake, you can at least give me a lip-lock before we depart."

After making eight B pictures in 1939, Reagan had grown impatient with producers or directors who never cast him in quality movies. He knew his days as the King of the Bs were numbered. Since no one would offer him a good script, he decided to write one himself, although he was not a writer. Jane volunteered to help him, but since she was far less well educated, her writing skills were even worse than his.

He obviously needed a subject, and he thought he'd like to write the script for a football picture. He decided to focus on the careers of George Gipp and Knute Rockne. Ever since he'd been a young boy, Reagan had admired the football exploits of George Gipp.

Michigan-born Gipp (1895-1920) had been a football player for Notre Dame, designated as that university's first All-American. During his senior season, he died at the age of 25 of a streptococcal throat infection days after leading Notre Dame to a win against Northwestern.

Of course, as Reagan soon learned, the story of Gipp could not be accurately transmitted without examining the life of his coach, Knute Rockne.

Born in Norway in 1888, and educated as a chemist, Knute Rockne is regarded as one of the greatest coaches in the history of college football. He popularized the forward pass. During his thirteen years as head coach at Notre Dame, his "Fighting Irish" won 105 victories, including three national championships.

Rockne's death in Kansas on March 31, 1931, shocked the nation. His TWA flight 599 crashed while he was en route to participate in the production of the film The Spirit of Notre Dame. President Herbert Hoover referred to Rockne's death as "a national loss."

To his surprise, Reagan one morning read that Warners', his home studio, was coincidentally moving ahead to film the life story of Knute Rockne, which would, of course, include an episode that featured the short, brilliant, and tragic life of Gipp.

He had never done this before, but Reagan set out to lobby for a role, scheduling an appointment with Hal B. Wallis, the producer of the upcoming film, which would eventually be entitled Knute Rockne—All American, after trying out two other titles, including The Life Of Knute Rockne and Touchdown.

Before attending the meeting, Reagan talked to the film's first director, William Howard, who was hoping for a comeback. This talented, once-promising director had fallen on bad days.

During the first weeks of the shoot, Howard was drinking heavily, and Wallis fired him, replacing him with Lloyd Bacon. That director had helmed both Reagan and Pat O'Brien in the two films they had made together, Cowboy from Brooklyn and Boy Meets Girl.

To Reagan's astonishment, he had learned from Howard that William Holden and John Wayne had each been tested for his role of Gipp, and that each had been rejected by Wallis.

"Wayne looks better on a horse," Howard had said, "and Holden is better as a violin player than a boxer, much less a football player." He was referring to Holden's role in the recent release of Golden Boy (1939), in which he'd starred with Barbara Stanwyck.

After a screen test, Robert Young was also rejected. "Put him in a dinner jacket in some parlor," Wallis said in a memo. "Certainly not on the football field."

Robert Cummings was another actor considered. "This Missouri kid might play a dapper playboy, but he can't play football," said Wallis in yet another rejection memo.

Howard had suggested Dennis Morgan, who was making a picture with Jane Wyman, but Wallis wouldn't even sanction a screen test. "Morgan looks like he just stepped out of a beauty parlor to get his hair waved. He doesn't belong on a football field. Sports fans would mock him."

The Canadian actor, Donald Woods, was given the most serious consideration. Before Reagan claimed the title, Woods was another actor known on the Warners lot as "the King of the Bs." Woods had a better physique than Reagan, and was taller, standing 6'4".

Although Wallis thought Woods would be most convincing as a football player, he had another assignment for him. He and Lupe Velez had stirred up some box office in The Girl from Mexico. Wallis ordered a sort of sequel, Mexican Spitfire, in which he wanted the stars to appear together once again. "By the time Velez gets through fucking Woods, he won't have the energy to run across a football field," Wallis claimed.

In his office, the producer was not impressed with Reagan's physical presence. "You're not big enough to play a football player. Those guys are fucking bruisers."

Reagan protested. "Gipp weighed five pounds less than I do. He walked with a sort of slouch and a limp. He looked like a football player only when he was on the field."

To convince Wallis that he knew his way around a football field, Reagan went home and returned with pictures of himself in a uniform from the years when he played for Eureka College. That seemed to do it for Wallis, but he still wanted Reagan to be tested on camera.

By the time he got home that day, before Jane returned from the studio, the phone was ringing. It was Wallis' secretary. “The boss man wants you to show up for an eight o’clock shooting in the morning. You’re to be tested for the role of George Gipp.”

Reagan was elated. His big chance had come at last.

For his screen test, Reagan thought he would appear opposite some contract player, as was the custom. To his surprise, when he showed up, Pat O’Brien, in his coach’s uniform and in full makeup, was there to shake his hand. He’d agreed to participate as Knute Rockne, conferring on camera with Reagan playing George Gipp.

The test went smoothly, and was completed before noon, when O’Brien invited Reagan to the commissary for a hamburger. Over coffee, he told Reagan that Jack Warner had wanted James Cagney to play Knute Rockne, because he was number four in terms of star power at the box office.

“In terms of star power, I’m not even in the top fifty,” O’Brien said. “But both Bonnie Rockne, Knute’s widow, and the Catholic Church objected to Cagney because he’d appeared in all those gangster films. After that, Warner went after Spencer Tracy, but MGM wouldn’t release him. I was the last resort. I got the role only because Bonnie approved.”

Two days later, Wallis called Reagan, granting him the role. “You’re going to be on the screen for only ten minutes, but your role is vital to the script.”

Screenwriter Robert Buckner, an amateur historian who had known Rockne slightly, got advice from Bonnie, as well as from the brass at Notre Dame. He told Reagan, “Bonnie claims there are too many football scenes and not enough scenes relating to her husband’s academic achievements.”

He also revealed that he was writing a new screenplay, a Western called Santa Fe Trail. There’s a great role in it—that of George Armstrong Custer. You should lobby for it.’

Despite that advice, Reagan was not intrigued enough to follow it.

On the set, he had an embarrassing encounter with Gale Page, with whom he had had a notorious three-way with Ann Sheridan. She had been cast as Bonnie Skiles, the sweetheart that Rockne eventually marries. Reagan told O’Brien, “Thank God I have no love scenes with her. One night, things got out of hand between us.”

O’Brien responded, “All of us adventurous Irishmen take a detour here and there, and no man should be held responsible for mistakes along the way.”

On the set of Knute Rockne, Reagan was reunited with veteran actor Donald Crisp, with whom he had co-starred in Sergeant Murphy. Crisp had been cast as Father Callahan, who ran the university. Later, some reviewers cattily commented, “Crisp forgot he was playing Father Callahan. He thought he was playing God himself.”

Reagan also had a reunion on the set with William Hopper, Hedda’s son. In Knute Rockne, Hopper had been cast in an uncredited role as a New York reporter.

William had continued to call Reagan frequently, but he had always put him off. He wanted to maintain his friendship with William, mainly because he was the son of such a powerful columnist, but knowing about William’s sexual interest in him, he didn’t want to get too close. Reagan complained to O’Brien, “William’s always after me.”

Over lunch, William told Reagan that married life to Jane Gilbert “is something to endure. I prefer another kind of action. How is married life with you?”

“Jane and I are very happy, but unless we’re making a picture together, we don’t see a lot of each other. Two movie stars who get married rarely lead a life of domestic bliss— that is, if both of them are employed.”

William said that he wished Reagan well, hoping that his portrayal of George Gipp “will put you over the top. As for me, I’m working steadily, but I’m just part of the scenery—a bank cashier who gets murdered, a cowboy in the background, often a reporter, once a Yale tennis player and a society gent in a top hat.”

Hedda joined them for lunch and sympathized with her son’s career frustration. She had experienced the same problems when she had tried to be a movie star. “When bad days come, all your hard work seems to be waiting to fall on you like a ton of bricks. I remember when I lost my seven-year contract at MGM. I was never a star, always a featured player, letting the spotlight shine on the stars. I was the mean woman who slapped children, made myself a gossipy and annoying guest, or else a matron on the make for someone else’s husband. On the screen, I looked ridiculous. I once asked Mayer why I was always cast as a bitch. He told me, ‘It takes one to play one.’”

Most of the film’s football scenes were shot at Loyola University. The most difficult scene called for Reagan to run eighty yards for a touchdown. On that hot summer morning, he’d arrived in time for a heavy, high-cholesterol breakfast, consisting of a greasy bacon-and-egg sandwich, a can of pineapple juice, and coffee.

After his first run, a difficult dolly shot, Bacon ordered Reagan to do the run again. On the second time around, the cameraman still wasn’t pleased with his shot. Bacon yelled out, “Once more, Reagan!”

On the third try, Reagan, with a lump in his stomach, made the dash. He raced past the goal line and headed for a wooden fence that enclosed the field. There, he vomited up all that bacon fat. “My director’s name would also be Bacon—you figure,” he said, after having soiled his football uniform.

Gipp’s final words, supposedly uttered to Rockne before his death in 1920, were repeated by Reagan in the film: “Some day when things are tough, maybe you could ask the boys to go in there and win just one for the Gipper.”

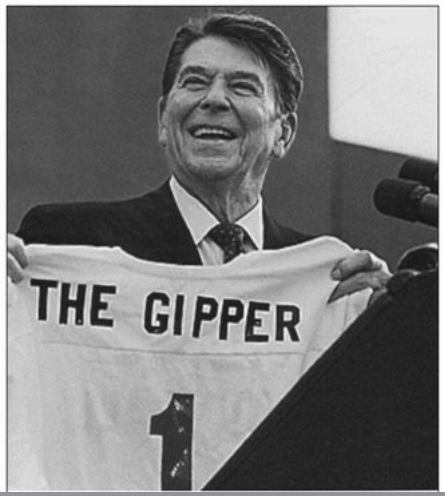
[The American Film Institute ranked the quote “Win one for the Gipper,” as number 89 on its poll of the top 100 most famous quotes ever uttered in a movie. When Reagan ran for president in 1980, he used “Let’s win one for the Gipper” as a political slogan. At that point, he was often referred to as “The Gipper.”]

Years later, looking back on his role as the Gipper, Reagan recalled, “It was a springboard that bounced me into a wider variety of parts in pictures. It’s true, I got some unmerited criticism from sports writers. One of them wondered why the producers never shoehorned real football players into key roles. But since I practically earned my way through college playing football—that disturbed me. However this criticism was balanced by some unmerited praise from the same general source, because another sports writer said I was so accurate in my portrayal of the Gipper that I even imitated his slight limp. Actually, I wasn’t trying to limp. I just wasn’t used to my new football shoes and my feet hurt.”

For the gala premiere of Knute Rockne—All American, Warners rented two trains to chug their way from Los Angeles to South Bend, Indiana. Stars were commissioned, not only Jane and Reagan, but Rudy Vallée, Donald Crisp, Gail Patrick, Ricardo Cortez, Gale Page, and even Kate Smith, with the understanding that she’d be belting out frequent renditions of “God Bless America.” Bob Hope also traveled to Indiana to serve as toast-master. Taking time off from his father’s 1940 presidential campaign, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. also showed up to read a letter of congratulations from the president.



Top photo: George Gipp, dying, is interpreted by Ronald Reagan in a screen interpretation that lasted for no more than ten minutes of the film’s total running time.

Lower photo: During his second bid for the office of President of the U.S. Reagan invoked the role he’d played and the line (“Win one for the Gipper”) he’d delivered in 1940.

Still suffering from a heart condition, Jack Reagan was invited to go along with the troupe. “He revered fellow Irishman Pat O’Brien, putting him in the special category of Al Smith,” Reagan said. “Dad and Pat became instant friends. Unfortunately, they went out every night boozing, returning in the early morning. I was worried about Dad’s heart.”

When Jack returned home to Nelle, he told her, “I’ve had everything now. I’ve seen Dutch get to be a star. Oh, I know the studio hasn’t made him one yet, but the folks back there know he’s arrived. I wish you could have heard the welcome they gave him. As far as I'm concerned, nothing will ever top it. I'm ready to go any time now."

For the first time, Reagan was acclaimed as an actor. He noticed it when he walked onto the Warners' lot every day. "Suddenly, people who had never spoken to me before were calling out, 'Good morning, Mr. Reagan!'"

As contract players at Warners, it seemed inevitable that Jane Wyman would end up in a picture (My Love Came Back; 1940) with her nemesis, Olivia de Havilland. She didn't have anything against Olivia personally, "Other than her being born," she confided to Reagan and others.

Perhaps inaccurately, Jane claimed that she would have become a big star on the Warner lot had it not been for Olivia, "who got all those roles with my name on them, beginning with Melanie in Gone With the Wind (1939)"

"I also should have starred opposite David Niven in The Private Lives of Elizabeth and Essex (1939), with Errol again in Dodge City (also 1939), and most definitely with that gorgeous hunk, John Payne, in Wings of the Navy (1939)."

Jane recalled her first meeting with Olivia. "The bitch had a chip on her shoulder. After Gone With the Wind, and after her suspension, she thought she was entitled to the roles reserved for Bette Davis. We were both cast in this little romantic comedy, My Love Came Back, but Miss Olivia didn't think the film was worthy of her talents. She actually told me that her part was the kind of role that might normally have been assigned to 'a little starlet like me.'"

"My role is such crap that even Priscilla Lane turned it down," Olivia told Jane.

Warners' assigned the German film director, Curtis Bernhardt, to "this little slice of strudel," as he characterized the film. Bernhardt had been arrested by the Nazis because he was a Jew, but he managed to escape in 1933 and had fled first to France and England, and then to Hollywood. The year Jane met him, he had just come to work for Warners.

He told Jane that in an upcoming film, based on a script then being written, he was considering casting her husband. "It's called Million Dollar Baby."

In addition to Jane and Olivia, Bernhardt had assembled an all-star cast of supporting players, including Jeffrey Lynn, Eddie Albert, Charles Winninger, Spring Byington, Grant Mitchell, William T. Orr, and S.Z. Sakall.

In the film, Olivia was cast as a talented, high-strung violin student at a New York academy. She walks out on her music teacher, the cuddlesome S.Z. Sakall.

Later, she is accused of being the mistress of a wealthy and distinguished patron of the arts, as portrayed by Winninger. When he cannot attend a concert with Olivia, he sends his young business manager, the dashingly handsome Tony Baldwin (Jeffrey Lynn). The two fall in love.

Jane was cast as a musical friend of Olivia's. Her boyfriend is played by Eddie Albert, who had made those two Brother Rat movies with her.

To prepare for their roles, both Jane and Olivia each took violin lessons. [In the final version of the film, the music supposedly emanating from their instruments would be dubbed.] But whereas Jane learned how to handle the fingering and bowing on a dummy instrument, Olivia did not, losing patience and frequently shouting at the director.

In his cold German accent, Bernhardt told her, "I do not like incompetence. You should have learned how to finger the instrument like Miss Wyman here."

That did not endear Jane to Olivia.

Bernhardt told Jack Warner that Olivia complained about every single thing. "She is imperial and haughty. She dislikes everybody. The only person who can control her is Jimmy Stewart when he comes onto the set to make love to her in her dressing room."

On the first day Stewart arrived, he kissed Jane. "I enjoyed our previous time together with Hank (Henry Fonda). But I'd better steer clear of you now that you're married to my buddy, Ronnie."

In the middle of the shoot, Olivia, feigning illness, disappeared for a week. "Curtis was cursing her in German, and life was miserable on the set," Jane said.

One day, Bernhardt invited Jane to lunch in the commissary, where he complained at length about Olivia. Jane recalled their meal. "Beer in a large tankard, pretzels, and several slices of Bavarian chocolate cake. Chocolate cake and beer have never been my favorite taste treats."

By now, Eddie Albert and Jane were friends. He had worked on pictures with her before, and, amazingly, would also be appearing on TV with her in the 1980s. They always maintained an innocent but flirtatious relationship.

Jane became very fond of Lynn, and would co-star with him in a future movie. She found the New Englander handsome and exceedingly charming.

"On the screen, and in person, too, you look like the kind of clean-cut fellow you could take home to meet dear ol' mom," Jane said.

"I suffer from always appearing on screen with stronger personalities," he claimed. "In Four Daughters, John Garfield attracted most of the attention. In The Roaring Twenties, I was up against James Cagney and Humphrey Bogart. Now, I've been assigned to film a movie called All This and Heaven Too. What chance do I have when Bette Davis lights up and starts puffing on that god damn cigarette?"

For the most part, critics dismissed My Love Came Back, one calling it "a fluffy little romantic comedy. It's like Chinese food. An hour later, you're hungry. The same holds for this film. An hour later, you'll have forgotten all about it in your search to sink your teeth into something more substantial. The stellar talents of Olivia De Havilland and Eddie Albert are completely wasted. This movie is more suited to the limited talents of Jeffrey Lynn and Jane Wyman. Actually, the supporting stars such as Cuddles Sakall steal any scene they're in."

In May of 1940, Reagan was invited to pose in the nude for a sculpture class at the University of Southern California. Gale Page, who had played Knute Rockne's wife in their recent film, was enrolled in an art class there. She informed Reagan that her fellow classmates had voted him "The Most Nearly Perfect Male Body" among Hollywood's male stars.

After she cajoled him, he finally agreed to model for the class, but only if they allowed him to wear bathing trunks. "They'll have to settle for me in the same swimwear I'd appear in on the beach."

"I think we can make that work," she said. "I have a vivid memory of your genitals, and I'm a very good artist. The assignment is to draw a nude male body. The artists can sculpt your body, but they'll mold a replica of your genitals from my sketch. Of course, regarding those genitals, I would like a refresher course."

"We'll see about that," he said. "As you know, I'm a married man."

"Surely, you wouldn't be the only married man in Hollywood to have something on the side. That's virtually mandatory for a male movie star."

Dressed in a business suit, Reagan drove with Page to the USC campus the following evening. Outside the classroom, he faced her in the hall. She directed him to the men's room, telling him he could change into his trunks there.

A few moments later, he appeared in the classroom, where he was warmly greeted by a group of young women. About five or six young men also crowded around him, asking for his autograph. Some of them wanted him to autograph the publicity picture in which he'd posed in swimwear with Susan Hayward.

The class instructor called him aside. "I hope you'll change your mind about posing in the nude. It's all for art. It has nothing to do with sex. Our students are very sophisticated."

"I'm wearing trunks, or else it's no deal," Reagan responded. He opened his robe to display his body in a white bathing suit.

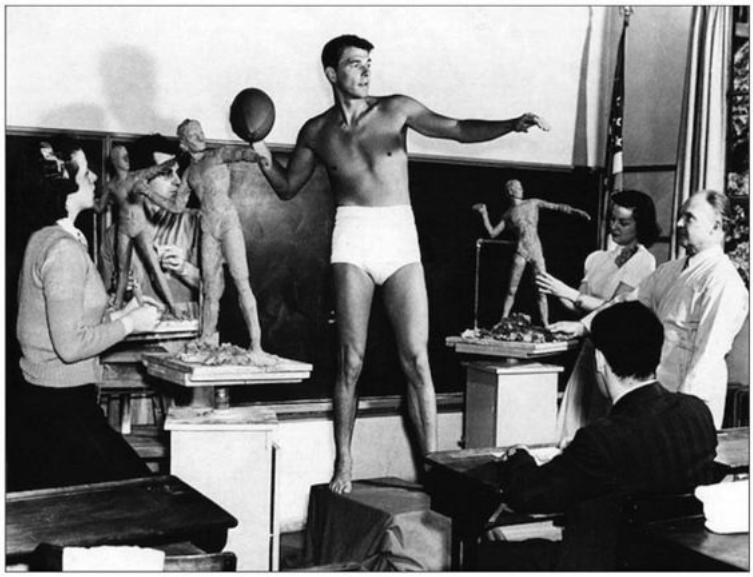
"Many of your greatest fans are here to sculpt your body," the instructor responded. "Several of them are young men who view you as a dreamboat. They collect pictures of you."

"Why aren't these guys collecting cheesecake pictures of Betty Grable or Carole Landis?"



Reagan, chaste and modest, modeling in Grannie's panties.

"Art students have varying sexual tastes," the teacher said. "Just imagine that you're David posing for Michelangelo."

"I will feel red-faced just posing for these gals," Reagan said. "But having all these guys ogling me, too…I don't know about this."

"After five minutes, you'll be relaxed. I'm sure you'll take off that bathing suit. I've seen you shirtless in movies. In one film, you stripped down to your underwear. Here, you can take the final step."

"I think not!"

"All right," the teacher responded. "We'll take you any way we can get you. Perhaps you'll change your mind and do what comes naturally, so we won't have to imagine your genitals. Several in my class have told me that they suspect you have beautiful genitals, nothing to be ashamed of."

During the session, Reagan had to pose uncomfortably, balancing a football in his right hand. Tiring easily, he had to take several breaks. Never in his life had his body been admired by so many at such close range. "Many young women, and even the men, were lusting for my body," as he'd later confide to Jane.

She became angry at him for having agreed to pose in the first place.

En route back to Page's apartment, she asked him to drop in for a nightcap. "I really want to see you again completely nude. If I'm going to draw your genitals, I don't want to rely on a distant encounter, but on a recent memory."

"I don't know how I feel about this," he said.

"Please don't be so square," she said. "You're going to be immortalized with thirty nude sculptures. I bet someday they'll be collectors' items."

"One thing," he said. "You didn't warn me that a photographer would arrive to snap my picture as a nude model. I don't know if I like that kind of body beautiful publicity. My male friends will make fun of me."

"Listen, Ronnie, as I'm sure you've been told by others, especially directors: You've got to start selling yourself as a sex symbol so that you can compete with Clark Gable, Robert Taylor, Tyrone Power, and, most definitely, with Errol Flynn. Flynn would have posed nude for the class, but they voted for you instead."

"I hope you're not giving me bad advice, you cute little vixen," he said, climbing up the stairs to her apartment.

Jane Wyman was reunited with Wayne Morris, her former boyfriend, on the set of their next movie, Gambling on the High Seas (1940). His divorce from Leonora Hornblow had just been finalized, and he was on the prowl again. According to Jane, “Wayne never let a marriage license cramp his romantic pursuits.”

She also revealed, “He wasn’t interested in the B picture we were making. All he could think and talk about, other than romance, was his fascination with flying. It began when we made Flight Angels together.”

“War is in the wind,” he told her, “and I’ve joined the Naval Reserve. Any day, I expect the United States will join the Allies in World War II. When I’m not in front of the camera, I’m studying to be a Navy flier.”

Both of them agreed that their first three movies, Here Comes Carter, Polo Joe, and Smart Blonde, had done absolutely nothing for their careers. Their first Brother Rat movie had done well at the box office, but the sequel didn’t go over. Nor did their two most recent movies, Flight Angels and An Angel from Texas.

Very noir, her performance evoked something akin to a female version of Brass Bancroft.

“I don’t think we play ball in those leagues,” she cautioned him.

He bent down and gave her a kiss on her pug nose. “I know you don’t like to admit it, but we’re also a winning team between the sheets.”

“Is that any way to talk to a married lady?” she asked.

“I’ll give you a pass for now,” he said. “But on our next picture, I bet you’ll come home to daddy.”

The script for Gambling on the High Seas might have been better titled “Mobsters, Mayhem, and Murder.” Its complicated plot revolves around a casino boat operating in international waters off the coast of the United States. Gambling aboard the boat is strictly for suckers who get fleeced. Morris stars as Jim Carver, an investigative reporter accessorized with a big camera and flashbulbs.

Jane was cast as Laurie Ogden, a rather demure young woman who is Morris’ love interest. She is also the bookkeeper to crime boss Greg Morella (Gilbert Roland), who owns the crooked gambling ship. With Morris’ urging, she agrees to testify against her boss in court, but he learns of her scheme and orders her kidnapped and imprisoned aboard his ship. Morris, eventually and inevitably, comes to her rescue.

The gimmick aboard the casino ship is a rigged roulette wheel with a concealed camera, one reviewer noting that the director, George Amy, gave the roulette wheel more close-ups than he gave either Morris or Jane.

Cast as a mobster, Mexican-born Gilbert Roland, dashingly handsome and masculine, was planning to marry screen goddess Constance Bennett, with whom Jane had starred in Tailspin.

She remembered Roland “as an aggressive Latin Lover type, always feeling that he had to flirt with every pretty gringa he met.”

“Originally, before I got hooked on acting—and actresses, I might add—I wanted to be a bullfighter,” he told Jane. “I would have been a big attraction in my suit of lights, if you get my drift.”

“I get your drift,” she shot back. “But let it keep on drifting.”

Even though she turned down a forward pass, she found him an intriguing character. “Gilbert could make me swoon,” Jane said to director George Amy.

To put Roland off, she said, in jest, “I’d go to bed with you, but I suspect you’d tell half of Hollywood, including Ronald Reagan. You're obviously the kiss-and-tell Mexican bandit."

After Jane became a major star, Roland recalled working with her, "There was talent written all over her, but she was a late bloomer in movies, struggling for fifteen long years in programmers. She had a surface bravado. She appeared to be very confident, but I think she was plagued with self-doubt. Over the years, she always had this driving determination to be a big star—and she made it. She knew she had this certain flame burning inside her, and she fanned it, increasing its fire."

When Gambling on the High Seas was released, Variety wrote: "Could the newspapers of the country but hire the see-all, know-all, tell-all reporters trained in the B-picture corner of the Warner lot, there'd doubtlessly be not even space on page one for news from the war in Europe. They would be too full of underworld inside and cracking wide open crooked gambling joints through the smart work of newspapermen who look like the Boy Scouts of America personified."

In spite of the awkward wording of that review, Jane was pleased to read this appraisal of her own involvement in the film: "Miss Wyman makes a very aesthetic vis-à-vis to American Boy Morris."

That night, she showed the review to Reagan. He told her, "Don't worry, hon, you'll do better in your next picture."

She stormed out of the room, heading for the bedroom, where she locked the door from the inside. When he came knocking later, she didn't open it until it was time for her to report to work early the next morning.

Although the previous onscreen pairing of Jane with Reagan, An Angel from Texas, had not generated a lot of excitement at the box office, director Lewis Seiler and producer Bryan Foy decided to take one more chance and re-team them together in Tug-boat Annie Sails Again (1940). The picture was conceived as a sequel to Marie Dressler's highly successful Tugboat Annie in 1933.

Based on its success, Dressler had been immediately scheduled to make a sequel, but she died in 1934, a year after the original film's release. Louis B. Mayer searched for a character actress to follow in her shoes, but found no suitable candidate.

Finally, Jack Warner acquired the rights, and cast the character actress Marjorie Rambeau as the grizzled old salt.

In the film's original version, crusty old Wallace Beery played the role of Annie's husband. But in the sequel, Annie is a widow, skippering a vessel called the Narcissus from the fictional port of "Secoma," a combined depiction of both Tacoma, Washington, and the larger port of Seattle. Most of the outdoor shots, however, were filmed on location in the Port of Los Angeles.

Jane and Reagan worked smoothly with Seiler, who had helmed Jane in He Couldn't Say No and in Flight Angels, and had directed Reagan in Hell's Kitchen with the Dead End Kids.

Appearing with her husband for the fourth and final time, Jane was cast as Peggy Armstrong, a rich young socialite who falls for Reagan, who plays the role of a poor sailor, Eddie King.

Seiler selected a strong cast of character actors to support his three stars, notably Alan Hale, Sr., who played Annie's major rival, the scheming Captain Bullwinkle. Others included Clarence Kolb as Joe Armstrong, Paul Hurst as Pete, and Chill Wills as "Shiftless."

Reagan also arranged a small role for his brother, Moon, in the film.

Maureen Reagan, the first child of Reagan and Jane, claimed that she made her film debut in Tugboat Annie Sails Again. Her face doesn't appear on the screen, as she was still in her mother's womb. In her memoir, First Father, First Daughter, she wrote: "There's a scene in the movie in which Mother gets knocked into the water, and I cringe every time I see it, knowing that I took the fall with her." She later referred to it as her "in utero" performance.

Reagan setting sail with Rambeau & Wyman.

Perhaps Maureen didn't know this, but Jane's dive from the pier required four takes. "I ruined four dresses and got a thorough drenching. When Ronnie found out, he was furious with Seiler, fearing taking such falls would make me have a miscarriage."

In yet another scene, Jane pushes Reagan off the pier as a means of punishing him for giving her a public spanking when she backed her automobile into his, sending his vehicle into the water. In her role as the daughter of a shipping tycoon, before the film's happy ending, she arranges for it to be dredged up and re-painted, returning it to him in good condition.

Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan were feuding and fighting—and eventually loving—in Tugboat Annie Sails Again aboard the Narcissus.

The script of Tugboat Annie Sails Again involves a "tug" of war Rambeau fights with her arch-rival, Captain Bullwinkle (as played by Hale). Annie faces financial troubles, canceled contracts, fights over salvage laws, and a violent storm at sea.

Both Reagan and Jane later asserted that they enjoyed working with Rambeau. "Like Tugboat Annie, Marjorie was a tough old broad," Reagan said. "Born in San Francisco, she was deserted by her father and taken to remote Nome, Alaska, for some reason."

Because Nome was a rough town, filled with far more men than women, Rambeau's mother dressed her as a boy. She sang in and played the banjo in music halls and rowdy saloons. What her mother didn't realize was that an effeminate, rather pretty young boy might also invite lust in the horny frontiersmen. Reportedly, as an early teenager, Rambeau was raped three times, the men perhaps delighted to find that the boy was actually a girl.

Eventually landing in New York, Rambeau made her Broadway debut in the spring of 1911. After that, she drifted to Hollywood, where she starred in silent films.

Ironically, as an early talkie, one of the films she played a role in was Min and Bill (1930), starring Wallace Beery and Marie Dressler, the original stars of Tugboat Annie. Rambeau was cast as a waterfront floozie. Later, one of her best showcases was as the trampy mother of Ginger Rogers in Primrose Path (1940), for which she received an Oscar nomination as Best Supporting Actress.

Although Jane's role in Tugboat Annie Sails Again did not particularly challenge her, Seiler praised her nevertheless. "In spite of the nothing assignments she was given, she seemed to me to be always trying to give the banal lines and situations something extra. We had a lot of great character actors in the film, and she studied them like she was taking acting lessons."

In a release from Warners' publicity department, Jane was quoted as saying, "Ram-beau's seasoned talent and enormous thespic self-assurance awed me at first, and then I discovered the big heart and the wonderfully supportive nature of this fine woman."

Those words reflected Jane's sentiment but not her exact language. Most of the time, she spoke in vernacular slang, never using words like "thespic"

Rambeau also appraised Jane: "I think she was the greater talent, far more so than Ronnie. He had more book learning, but she was street smart and had her own kind of intelligence. She could size up people quicker than Ronnie."

As shooting progressed, Jane's pregnancy began to show. Seiler ordered his cameraman to conceal her expanding belly behind items of furniture or other actors. A dressmaker was hired to design costumes to make her look thin.

When the picture was released, most critics cited Jane and Reagan only in passing. Rambeau attracted most of the attention, and the critics were harsh, stating the obvious: Marjorie Rambeau was no Marie Dressler.

In the film, Reagan got to show off his athletic physique not once, but twice. As one reviewer said, "His torso looks better than this movie."

During the filming of Tugboat Annie Sails Again, Reagan had been so sure that Jane was going to have a son that he printed birth announcements to that effect. "Sperm like mine can only produce a boy," he bragged to Pat O'Brien.

"Don't count on the kid being born with a dick," the veteran actor warned him. "Mother Nature plays some wicked games."

On January 4, 1941, the day before Jane's 24th birthday, she gave birth to a baby girl weighing five and a half pounds. She was named Maureen Elizabeth Reagan. Following in the footsteps of her father, she would become a screen actress before venturing into politics.

When Reagan was shown his baby girl, he told the nurse, "She's a homely little thing, isn't she?"

With his usual frugality, he crossed out the word "boy" on his pre-printed birth announcements and wrote in "girl."

Reagan was fretting not only about the health and welfare of Jane and little Maureen, but about his new role in an upcoming movie. So far, Warners' hadn't notified him of his next assignment as a contract player.

He learned about it in a most unusual way when he was called back to the Warners lot to reshoot a scene with Rambeau.

As he waited for the scene to be set up, he sat in a director's chair reading the latest news about the war in Europe. Suddenly, a man approached him from behind. As he turned around to see who it was, he experienced a close encounter. He was shocked as a tongue darted into his mouth as part of a sudden and passionate kiss.

"You're gonna star with me in my next picture," the man said. "I've been yearning to give you a few pokes, sport, and here is my chance."

It was Errol Flynn.

Chapter Seven

When Quoted by His Enemies,
Reagan's Most Famous Line
"Where's the Rest of Me?"
Becomes a Mockery of His Shortcomings

The Press Hails "Jane & Ronnie" as America's Perfect Couple—But Were They?

In 1940, the Reagans were captured on camera, at home, cracking nuts, as a depiction of America's most perfect, most adorable, and most wholesome couple.

In 1940, Jane appeared in Honeymoon for Three, a film released in January of 1941, the month Maureen was born.

She heard that she'd been cast when Joan Blondell called her one morning at eight o'clock. "Have you read Variety this morning?" her friend asked. "It's been announced you've been cast in Honeymoon for Three with George Brent and Ann Sheridan. "Those two are having such a hot affair that I hope they have something left for the

Reagan had left early for the studio that morning, and Jane and Blondell had a long woman-to-woman talk about husbands, careers, and motherhood.

Blondell surprised Jane by telling her that her upcoming role was part of a remake of a movie that she had appeared in back in 1933. "I have no idea why Jack Warner is recycling this old script again," Blondell said. "When I filmed it, it had already been a hit on Broadway called Goodbye Again. I appeared with Warren William and Genevieve Tobin. It was a passable little piece of fluff, but it was quickly buried in the graveyard of forgotten films."

"We made it pre-Code, before the Breen office began tampering with it, so your writers will have to clean it up to get it past the censors," Blondell said. "There was a scene in our version where it was implied that Warren is taking a piss. It turned out to be running water. And in my version, I slept in the same hotel room with my boss—and it was understood that we weren't married. That's pretty risqué stuff, wouldn't you say?"

"I'd like to see it—sounds like fun," Jane said. "I met Warren William when we appeared together in Stage Struck with you. I saw Tobin in The Petrified Forest with Bogie and Bette Davis. Then Tobin's husband, William Keighley, directed Ronnie and me in Brother Rat."

"I know all that," Blondell said.

"Just trying to let you know what a Hollywood insider I've become."

"I made Goodbye Again when I was recovering from yet another abortion," Blondell confessed. "George Barnes didn't like the idea of having children. He believed that kids take the romance out of a relationship. Unfortunately, he didn't believe in using rubbers."

[She was referring to the famous cinematographer, George Barnes, whom she married in Arizona in 1933, the union surviving until 1936. During the short run of that marriage, Blondell insisted on carrying a child to term. A son was born to the couple in 1934. She named him Norman. The boy was later adopted by her second husband, Dick Powell, and his name was changed to Norman S. Powell."]

"Ronnie wants to have children, but I don't want to settle into the role of a bored housewife looking out for a lot of little Reagans running around the place. I'm going to continue to pursue my film career, as hopeless as it looks at the moment."

"That's not what the fan magazines are claiming," Blondell said. "They say that Ronnie has domesticated you."

Ruth Waterbury of Photoplay was among the hacks promoting Jane's image as a woman wanting to settle down in the kitchen and bedroom as a dutiful wife playing second fiddle to her husband.

Waterbury overlooked the fact that in 1941 alone, Jane would release four different movies. "Jane is madly in love with Ronnie and is devoted to him," Waterbury wrote. "His every wish is her command. He comes first in her life, even if it means sacrificing her own career. She works constantly to build up his ego and confidence."

Blondell later said, "The Jane that Waterbury described was not the Janie I knew. She lacked confidence in her own talent, and didn't spend much time building up Ronnie's confidence as a screen actor from what I saw. She had a steely determination to succeed at all costs. Instead of being a wife and mother, she talked constantly about chasing that elusive dream of stardom."

Two "Dreamboats," John Payne & Dennis Morgan, Pursue Jane, as Reagan is Ensnared by Rival Blondes, Betty Grable & Carole Landis.

"I think Ronnie is cute," Jane told Blondell. "If only he would stop talking about politics, he'd be a hell of a lot cuter. I've failed twice at marriage, and, frankly, I don't know if I can make a go of it this time around, either. We put on our smiling faces for our fans, who read those pulp magazines, but in private, we can be a lot less charming."

Young Jane evolved into the odd girl out, appearing in a wardrobe disaster she hated. Warners' wardrobe department promoted it as "a foulard dress with a wide-brimmed hat." Jane denounced it as "frumpy."

Even at that point in her life, Jane showed a fierce independence. When her friend, Lucille Ball, had called to congratulate her on her marriage, Jane made a frank admission. "Even though I'm married, I still have my eye trained on every good-looking guy I meet, especially if they're named John Payne or Dennis Morgan. A really gorgeous guy can make me forget about home and hearth, at least put aside enough time for love in the afternoon. Which would your rather do, change some kid's shitty diaper or let John Payne make love to you?"

"You know me well enough to answer that question for yourself," Ball said.

The Motion Picture Herald and Fame Poll had designated Jane as a "Star of Tomorrow," but after their forecast was released, she lamented to Ball, "But will tomorrow ever come if I keep appearing in one highly forgettable film after another? I'm on the rocky road to thirty, and still turning out these god damn programmers. Who do you have to sleep with to get ahead in this town!"

Grannie Nelle, childminding Baby Maureen.

"Try Jack Warner, Louis B. Mayer, and Darryl F. Zanuck, and most definitely Harry Cohn," Ball said.

The script for Honeymoon for Three arrived that afternoon. When Jane read it, she was shocked at how small her part was. More than her role as Elizabeth Clochessy, she'd have preferred the part that went to Osa Massen, a Danish actress who had come to America in 1937, after having begun her career as a newspaper photographer. The same year Jane met her, she'd been cast as Melvyn Douglas' unfaithful wife dealing with blackmailer Joan Crawford in A Woman's Face (1941).

That night, when Reagan came home, Jane complained to him about her career frustration. "I was called the Hey Hey Girl. Now I should be renamed the Queen of the Sub-Plots. I'm living through the paper doll years of my career."

"I don't expect much from Lloyd Bacon," she said. "He's the director. He races through a film like he did my appearance in Gold Diggers of 1937."

"I did all right when he directed me in Knute Rockne," Reagan said.

"I applaud your good luck," she said, sarcastically. "Lady Luck hates me."

Jane's competition: Danish beauty, Osa Massen.

"She doesn't at all," he said. "After all, she brought me to you. How lucky can a gal get?"

Sheridan was clearly the star of the picture, playing the secretary to George Brent, cast as the novelist, Kenneth Bixby, who is a literary Don Juan, eagerly sought after by hordes of women fans. One woman, Julie Wilson (Osa Massen, who, it's revealed, is married to the character played by Charles Ruggles), sneaks into his hotel room in the hopes of getting her book published. Thus the action begins. Elizabeth (as played by Jane) is Julie's cousin, who has followed her to Bixby's hotel. Elizabeth is engaged to the character played by William T. Orr, with whom Jane had worked before in My Love Came Back. She remembered him talking obsessively about America's possible entry into World War II.

"I plan to become an Army Air Force officer," he had told Jane.

At the war's end, Orr would marry Joy Page, Jack Warner's stepdaughter. A rosy future in media, especially the fast-emerging field of television, awaited him.

In Honeymoon for Three, Anne (Sheridan) gets her man Bixby (Brent) in the end.

Key roles were also played by Walter Catlett, who has some funny bits as a waiter, and by Lee Patrick, who seemed adept at playing eccentric characters who included nurses, floozies, and dithery socialites. In the movie, as Mrs. Pettijohn, she names her children after her favorite authors, including Booth Tarkington.

Jane enjoyed seeing Charles Ruggles again, an actor whose career would span six decades, a hundred pictures, and a reputation for playing absent-minded authority figures.

On the set, Jane met the screenwriting twins, Julius and Philip Epstein. They were filled with bitterness toward Jack Warner. In spite of their commercial success, Warner despised them, resenting their pranks, their work habits, and the odd hours they kept.

In 1952, the producer would turn their names over to the house Un-American Activities Committee. When asked if they were ever members of any subversive organization, the twins wrote, "Yes, Warner Brothers."

After their farce in which Jane appeared, the brothers went on to better things, winning an Oscar for the screenplay of Bogie's Casablanca (1942). They worked on that script with Howard Koch.

George Brent and Ann Sheridan, the stars of Honeymoon for Three, outshone Jane in this frothy romp, but Jane claimed, “My Day Will Come.”

Like some other cast members, Catlett, defined by Jane as “the ugliest actor I ever met,” was going on to greater things. Playing a testy and pompous waiter in Honeymoon for Three, he would soon be cast in Yankee Doodle Dandy (1942) with James Cagney.

Jane had never appeared this unglamorous on the screen before. Ironically at the same time she was posing for some of the most glamorous publicity shots for Warners. Some critics ridiculed her film outfits, calling them “in preparation for playing an old maid.” Another critic noted, “If Jane Wyman dressed like that in private life, she would never have nailed heartthrob Ronald Reagan.”

Walter Catlett...”The ugliest actor ever.”

During the filming of the movie, Hollywood writers made frequent visits to the set, looking for hot copy about the romance between Brent and Sheridan. Jane was with Sheridan when she was asked if she planned to marry Brent before Christmas. “Honey, I wouldn’t spoil Christmas that way,” she answered.

Even when Brent gave her a square-cut diamond, placing it on the third finger of her left hand, she still denied any engagement. “It’s just a gift from a friend,” she told reporters. “I place it on the finger where it fits best—and that’s all there is to it. We’re not engaged. Every time George gives me something, the press declares we’re on the verge of eloping.”

Honeymoon for Three was an obvious attempt to capitalize off the current flood of Brent-Sheridan publicity. But when the film was released, one critic wrote, “Brent and Sheridan may go up in flames off screen, but on screen, they make one burned-out couple.”

Charles Ruggles... Specializing in mousy, stuttering, henpecked husbands.

To Jane, Sheridan confessed that they were having an affair, and that she was considering marrying him. Up to then, after her divorce, she'd been playing the field, dating David Niven, Allan Jones, and Frederick Brisson, along with directors Jean Negulesco and Anatole Litvak after he escaped from the clutches of Miriam Hopkins. Her dates with César Romero, "The Latin from Manhattan" were strictly platonic, as he was really lusting after Desi Arnaz, much to the annoyance of Lucille Ball.

"Frankly, George doesn't have a good marriage record," Sheridan said. "His first marriage to Helen Campbell lasted less than thirty days. Although he was married to Ruth Chatterton for two years, they didn't live together for most of that time. His third marriage to Constance Worth didn't survive the honeymoon."

"What's the matter with him?" Jane asked.

"I don't know for sure," she said. "As for me, I have a sexual problem with him."

"What kind of problem?" Jane asked.

"Brent bent!" Sheridan said before being called to the set.

[Sheridan's comment about Brent's sexual equipment, unprintable at the time, was made to Hedda Hopper, in explaining why their marriage broke up so quickly.]

Honeymoon for Three opened to bad reviews. The reasons most often cited for its failure included its direction, its acting, and its script. One critic in New York wrote, "George Brent is cast as a Lothario novelist, but it's not apparent why the ladies throw themselves at this dull character. Clark Gable he isn't."

The film opened in January of 1941, the month Reagan and Jane added Baby Maureen to their household.

Many of Jane's friends, such as Paulette Goddard, called to congratulate her. Jane was rather frank. "Thanks, but no thanks. I am terribly disappointed. I was carrying around a girl all these months, and I wanted a boy, really wanted a boy. I had even selected a name for the kid: Ronald Reagan, Jr."

As a new father, Reagan was also being interviewed by the press. "The experience [of having a baby] made all this cartoon stuff about prospective fathers seem cheap. After work at the studio, I would go directly to Jane's hospital room. I was glad to be working because it took my mind off worrying about Jane. When she went into labor, she threw aside the hands of both the nurse and doctor. She grabbed mine and hung on for dear life. That gave me such a thrill, as I can't believe."

After the birth of their daughter, the Reagans found their living space too cramped. Although he held back, she urged him to go into debt and build a house. He had taken her to see the Rosalind Russell film, This Thing Called Love (1940), and she had fallen in love with the house depicted in the movie. She sought out the designer, asking him for a copy of his architectural plans, which he turned over to her.

After searching every weekend, Jane and Ronald bought a plot of land on a steep hill overlooking Hollywood Boulevard. A contractor was hired, and a new eight-room home was built. Jane decorated and furnished the house without any help from Reagan. "All he did was remind me that I was spending too much money," she lamented to her friends.

She was glad when he was cast in Santa Fe Trail (1940) with Errol Flynn. That gave her a chance to put some finishing touches on the house. She, too, was excited to have been cast, almost simultaneously, in another picture, Bad Men of Missouri (1941). As she told Blondell, "It stars my former lover, Wayne Morris, and my future lover, Dennis Morgan."

"Are you worried about Ronnie appearing in a movie with Flynn?" Blondell asked. "Do you think he'll tell Ronnie about the fling you two guys had?"

"No," Jane said. "Errol will be too busy chasing after Ronnie. I think I'll write a message for Flynn on Ronnie's dick—‘This dick is mine.’”

For the most part, Reagan continued to ignore calls from Carole Landis, the celluloid blonde goddess, perhaps wanting to forget their romantic liaisons of the late 1930s. Nonetheless, he continued to tell friends such as Pat O’Brien, Robert Taylor, and Dick Powell, that, “Carole is one of the most luscious dames in Hollywood, but she’s also among the most promiscuous where the competition is stiff for that honor.”

His friends agreed, perhaps having sampled Landis’ charms themselves. He knew that Powell had.

Unexpectedly, an urgent call came in from Landis that he felt he had to take. She informed him she was in the hospital, having been severely beaten. “I trust you as my friend. I need you to come to the hospital and help me figure out what to do.”

When he got there, he found part of her face bandaged, and her nose was causing her a great deal of pain.

After a few minutes, she revealed what had happened. She’d become romantically involved with Pat DiCicco, a so-called Hollywood agent with no clients. He was in reality the front man for gangster Lucky Luciano’s illegal activities in the Los Angeles area. Luciano was the city’s major drug dealer, and those foolish enough to move in on his territory usually ended up with bullets in their bodies.

Reagan talked very earnestly to her, telling her that although he didn’t want to dictate to her, “If you continue to hang out with DiCicco, you might end up dead. He’s already been involved in at least two famous murders, and god knows how many gangland slayings. I know the guy’s handsome and charming when he wants to be, but he’s lethal.”

Pat DiCicco...a documented henchman of Lucky Luciano, a brutalizer of women, and an omnisexual gigolo.

DiCicco was an already well-documented beater of women. During his marriage to actress Thelma Todd (1932-34), he sent her to the hospital several times after assaulting her. Later, he was implicated in her murder.

In time, he’d marry heiress Gloria Vanderbilt, who, as published in her memoirs, stated that he beat her, too.

DiCicco had earned his negative reputation with Reagan because he had been partially responsible for the beating death of Reagan’s friend, comedian Ted Healy. Wallace Beery and Albert (“Cubby”) Broccoli were also involved in that fatal beating.

Landis promised to dump DiCicco. “If I do, I hope that means you’ll start calling on me again,” she told Reagan.

“If you’d divorce Jane and agree to marry me, I’ll straighten out. You’re the kind of guy who can help me.”

After Landis was released from the hospital three days later, she kept her promise to Reagan and dropped DiCicco. She even followed his advice and in 1940, she got married, a state of affairs that remained intact for only two months.

Her groom was an infamous playboy of the time, Willis Hunt, Jr., scion of a wealthy California society family

Bon vivant Willis Hunt, Jr., with Carole Landis at their wedding. He preferred "sex without gender" and desired Reagan.

Hunt thrived on speeding, and officers in the L.A.P.D. let him dress up in a police officer's uniform and arrest speeders along Santa Monica Boulevard and in the Hollywood Hills. At night, he was a party boy, often throwing orgies described as featuring "sex without gender" inside his deluxe apartment.

"I'm not really a homo cocksucker, because I'm always the top," he assured Landis.

During his two-month marriage to Landis, they were often seen cruising around Beverly Hills in his custom-made Lincoln convertible. On weekends, he took her flying, piloting his own plane. Later, in the evening, they were seen dancing and drinking at the Mocambo or at the Trocadero.

When Landis could take him no more, she walked out, filing for divorce. The very next night, he was seen dating Betty Grable, who had divorced Jackie Coogan. Landis later told Reagan, "I'm seriously pissed off. He's going out with Grable because he knows she's my rival at Fox, and he's dating her to spite me."

Dysfunctional playboy Willis Hunt chased blondes. In addition to Carole Landis, he heavy-dated Martha O'Driscoll.

Hunt was also seen dating New York actress Eleanor Frances, a dead ringer for Landis. He was also involved with starlet Carol Gallagher.

Hunt's most serious involvement was with Florida-born Martha O'Driscoll, who had appeared in 1939 with Mickey Rooney in Judy Hardy and Son. She was also set to have a minor role in Preston Sturges' classic comedy The Lady Eve (1941), starring Barbara Stanwyck, and also in Cecil B. DeMille's Reap the Wild Wind (1942).

Hunt called Reagan and invited him—"without Jane"—to one of his infamous parties. Reagan politely turned him down. Not put off, he phoned Reagan two days later and invited him to Bakers Field. He explained that at the airfield, he had become friends with some Royal Air Force pilots, who had a fleet of six two-seater fighter planes. They were training Americans who wanted to volunteer to shoot down Nazi planes flying over England during the Battle of Britain. With his fear of flying, Reagan turned down that offer. Hunt, however, was persistent, consistently calling Reagan and annoying him with his invitations.

Finally, he called Landis to protest Hunt's calls. "Why does he keep calling me? Are you behind this? Have you told him about us?"

"I hope you don't mind, but I did," she said. "He's not jealous—in fact, he finds you really cute. Actually, he wants to make it with you, perhaps join us in a three-way. He keeps calling because he never accepts the word 'no.'"

"Tell him to butt out, god damn it!"

"I'll not only do that, but I'm divorcing the fucker. I've had it. Since he can't get you, he's settled for Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., who swings both ways. If you don't believe me, ask Joan Crawford. Of course, she swings both ways, too."

After her divorce, in reference to her brief marriage, Landis told the press that, "It took exceptional forbearance just to make it through those sixty days."

She called Reagan to ask him to come by her home one night after work, but he refused. A short time later, she phoned him again, telling him she was going on a location shooting in Florida and asking him to slip away with her for a short vacation.

"The star of the picture is that bitch, Betty Grable, whom I detest. She claims she knows you, Like I'd believe you'd hang out with trash like that bleached blonde whore."

He wanted to say, "It takes one to know one," but he held his tongue. "I can't go away now. I'm making a movie with Errol Flynn."

"Better take along your chastity belt, darling," she said before hanging up.

A call from Warner Brothers came in to the Reagan home at six o'clock that morning. Jane was already awake, but Reagan was still sleeping. She called him to the phone. "It's Warners."

On the line, he learned that he was to report at eight o'clock for a costume fitting for Errol Flynn's new picture, Santa Fe Trail.

Ronald Reagan impersonated George Armstrong Custer (right) in Santa Fe Trail, a loosely historical tale of an anti-slavery rebellion in Kansas.

"Wayne Morris is off the picture," the voice said. "You're taking over the role of General Custer."

In the wardrobe department, a bright new cavalry uniform, blue with gold braid, had been crafted specifically for him. On the floor, he noticed a crumpled, discarded uniform with Morris' name pinned to it.

In his memoirs, Reagan recalled that that uniform had made a lasting impression on him. "It occurred to me that it would be just as easy someday to throw my clothes in the corner and hang some other actor's in their place. It's a highly competitive business."

Santa Fe Trail was the only film set in the Old West that Reagan would make for Warners. On the set, he was greeted by screenwriter Robert Buckner, who had also written the script for Knute Rockne—All American. "I've just been polishing your lines,"

"Michael Curtiz will be on the set soon," Buckner said, "But I've got to warn you: The bastard didn't want you in the role. He didn't want Morris either. Those two guys had a big fight and the Mad Hungarian ordered Morris off the set. Curtiz wanted John Wayne, who turned it down. He sent Curtiz a note: 'I REFUSE TO PLAY FLYNN'S PUSSY."

Before leaving Reagan to read the script, Buckner told him, "Actually, it was Jack Warner who wanted you to play Custer. He said war is coming, and he was about to lose his leading male actors. He told us the Army won't take you because you're blind as a bat."

Reagan sat down to read the script through his contact lenses. "Do I make my last stand against the Indians?"

“It’s not that kind of role,” Buckner said. “The plot revolves more around John Brown, the abolitionist crusader. It’s not history. I’ve taken poetic license.”

As he read Buckner’s script, Reagan realized that little of it made sense from a standpoint of historical fact. The script called for Flynn to interpret the early military career (i.e., during the 1850s) of J.E.B. (“Jeb”) Stuart, later the Confederacy’s most renowned cavalry commander. Reagan had been hired for a sanitized (and chronologically incorrect) interpretation of George Armstrong Custer’s career before the Civil War, covering events which might have happened years before the 1876 massacre by Native Americans of his military contingent at the Battle of the Little Bighorn.

When the film opens, Custer and Stuart are graduating from West Point in 1854, although in reality, Custer was a fifteen-year-old schoolboy at the time. Jefferson Davis also factors into the narrative, as do future Civil War generals such as Philip Sheridan, James Longstreet, James Hood, and George Pickett. Raymond Massey was cast as John Brown, a fanatical American abolitionist who advocated the use of armed insurrection as the only means of overthrowing slavery in the United States.

From behind him, Reagan heard the thick Hungarian accent of the film’s flamboyant director, Michael Curtiz. “I want you to do good job. Earl Flint will be asshole as usual.” [The director always botched the names of people.]

To many viewers, Buckner’s script seemed to haphazardly combine the dramas associated with the westward expansion of the U.S. with a retelling of the abolitionist crusade of John Brown, a love story between the characters played by Errol Flynn and Olivia de Havilland; and a story about the growth of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe Railroads.

“It’s eight parts entertainment, two parts fact,” Bruckner told Reagan. “Or, as Curtiz with his accent says, ‘It’s not the exact facts and we haff the facts to prove that.’”

Warners’ re-enactment of salad days at West Point in the years immediately preceding the Civil War:

Before the day was over, Reagan met most of the cast—some new faces, but a lot of familiar ones with whom he'd worked before. Guinn ("Big Boy") Williams shook his hand, and Reagan smiled at him, though he detested the braggart. Ward Bond came up to greet Reagan. "I play Windy Brody," he said. "I think they mean for me to fart a lot."

Olivia de Havilland was most gracious, extending her hand to Reagan. She discussed working with Jane Wyman on My Love Came Back. In Santa Fe Trail, she played Kit Carson Halliday. "In the movie, both you and Errol are in love with me. In the end, he wins. But in real life, I'd much prefer you."

A shifty villain in an era of shifting alliances: Van Heflin

"Thank you," he said. "I'm flattered."

"Alas, Jane saw you first," De Havilland said. "But fortunately, right now, I have James Stewart to keep my company. He keeps talking about marriage, but his voice doesn't have a sincere ring."

De Havilland later told her biographer and film archivist, Tony Thomas, "My problems with Errol on the set of Santa Fe Trail are purely personal. He deliberately and provocatively up-staged me in two scenes, something he had never done before. Since then, I have wondered if his behavior might have something to do with the fact that I was seeing a lot of James Stewart and that our affable co-star, Ronald Reagan, spent a lot of time talking to me on the set. Errol was still married to Lili Damita, albeit unhappily, and he was hardly in a position to court me, but I knew he was fond of me, as I was of him. Someone else paying attention to me seemed to bother him a bit."

Reagan losing De Havilland.

Flynn was not scheduled to appear on the set for a few more days, so Reagan went around greeting the cast.

Alan Hale had just made Tugboat Annie Sails Again with Jane and him. Before that, he had been a regular sidekick of Flynn in such movies as The Adventures of Robin Hood. Hale and Reagan, in their near future, would be making more films together. Hale later said, "I like guys you can hang out with—Errol Flynn, Ward Bond, John Wayne. Reagan was too stiff and formal for my tastes."

Flynn winning De Havilland.

Reagan also greeted such familiar faces as Henry O'Neill, who had been cast as De Havilland's father. He had a warm reunion with John Litel, who had played his boss in two of the Brass Bancroft movies. Hobart Cavanaugh also greeted him.

Reagan met an up-and-coming star, Van Heflin, who had been cast as Rader, a disciple of John Brown. In the movie, he too attends West Point, though he is discharged for distributing anti-slavery pamphlets.

Emerging from the bowels of Oklahoma, stage actor Heflin seemed to hold Reagan in contempt, though it was not obvious. He'd later refer to both Reagan and Flynn as "Hollywood pretty boys. They're not actors at all."

Heflin had appeared on the Broadway stage with Katharine Hepburn in The Philadelphia Story. He was still angry that he had not been cast in the play's screen version, the role eventually going to James Stewart.

In one of the coincidences of that day, Stewart himself showed up on the set to take his girlfriend, De Havilland, for lunch in the commissary. An angry Heflin confronted him, eventually cursing him. Before they came to blows, Reagan came between them. "C'mon, guys, if I fought every actor in Hollywood who got a part I wanted, I'd be beating up someone every day…or getting my ass licked."

When Heflin wasn't needed on the set, he hopelessly pursued De Havilland.

Unlike Reagan, Heflin would achieve early success in Hollywood, winning an Oscar as Best Supporting Actor for his role in Johnny Eager (1942), wherein he played the boozy, philosophical pal of gangster Robert Taylor.

Reagan chatted with William Lundigan, learning that most of the cast shunned him, dismissing him as "Flynn's plaything." Flynn consistently placed him in minor roles within his films. Reagan and Lundigan shared joint memories of their days as radio announcers.

He told Reagan, "If the United States goes to war, I'm joining the Marine Corps."

"Will your buddy, Flynn, join too?" Reagan asked.

"He doesn't want this known, but he can't pass the physical. From the outside, he looks gorgeous, but inside, he's a mess."

The craggy-faced Canadian actor, Raymond Massey, seemed so self-absorbed in his portrayal of the spooky fanatic, John Brown, that he had little time for Reagan. Jack Warner had personally supervised his makeup to ensure that he came off looking like a lunatic. A critic later defined Massey's interpretation of John Brown in Santa Fe Trail as "frighteningly demented, vaguely echoing Hitler's evil."

[Massey would make a far more lasting cinematic impression the same year when he appeared as Hollywood's definitive Abraham Lincoln in Abe Lincoln in Illinois (1940). Two years later, he would appear with Flynn and Reagan again in the wartime action and aviation story, Desperate Journey (1942). And in 1955, Massey would star in the low-budget film, Seven Angry Men, in which he presented the character of John Brown as a far more sympathetic figure than his portrayal of him in Santa Fe Trail.]

Finally, four days later, Flynn arrived on the set. He attempted to kiss Reagan on the mouth as he'd done before. Since Reagan was now aware that the swashbuckler was a kissing bandit, he turned away. Flynn's lips only managed to brush against Reagan's ear. "Just a friendly gesture, sport, since we'll be making our first picture together, I thought we might as well get cozy."

“And ain’t it fun, sweet cheeks?” Flynn said. “I’d better read the god damn script. That asshole Curtiz has been shooting scenes with Massey for four days without one call for me, the fucking star of this flick. If that doesn’t change soon, Curtiz is going to face big trouble and a one-way ticket back to the goulash factories of Budapest.”

Although he tried to conceal his jealousy, Reagan envied Flynn as America’s fourth-ranking box office star in America. Reagan didn’t even place in the first one hundred.

“I once swore I’d never speak to you again,” Flynn said. “Perhaps bloody your nose if we ever met up. But time has passed, and I’m in a more forgiving mood.”

Reagan was dumbfounded and wanted an explanation, but none was forthcoming from Flynn.

Years later, a Flynn biographer, David Bret, provided a possible clue. “It was rumored that Ross Alexander had taken his life because he believed that Ronald Reagan had been signed by Warner Brothers to replace him. Although he would work with Reagan in the future, Errol would always detest him and hold him personally responsible for his friend’s death.”

If Flynn had felt such an emotion, it wasn’t obvious when they co-starred together. Actually, during the making of Santa Fe Trail, Flynn spent a lot of time talking to Reagan, enough to incite a jealous rage in Lundigan.

Flynn discussed his troubled marriage to Lili Damita. “We are in a connubial war,” he said. “I play the field from my base in a bachelor apartment. Damita doesn’t accept this. She watches and pursues me as Javert pursued Jean Valjean.”

“Her possessiveness upset our marriage from the start. As you’ll find in your marriage to Jane, it’s not man’s nature to be monogamous. Neither is it woman’s. The proof of this is in the well-known rejection of the whole standard of monogamy by so many people. You’ll find what I’m saying to be true in your own marriage once you and Jane settle in. You’ll stray and so will she. Movie stars are faced with challenges to their morality that are far greater than what’s faced by 99% of the population.”

“I plan to remain faithful,” he protested.

“I was just speculating,” Flynn said. “Call it a wild guess. Of course, I don’t have any personal experience… with your maiden fair.”

“If only I could believe that,” Reagan said. “Let’s drop the subject.”

Seething with anger, he turned and walked away.

He soon forgave Flynn, mostly because of De Havilland’s urging: “Errol can’t help being Errol.”

The very next afternoon, between takes, Flynn was talking with Reagan again, yesterday’s embarrassment seemingly forgotten.

“I want to be taken seriously,” Flynn said. “I feel I’m inwardly serious, thoughtful, even tormented, but in practice I yield to the fatuous, the nonsensical. I allow myself to be understood abroad as a colorful fragment in a drab world.”

Later, Reagan would write in his first memoir, “Errol was a strange person, terribly unsure of himself, and needlessly so. He was a beautiful piece of machinery, likable, with great charm, and yet convinced he lacked ability as an actor. As a result, he was conscious of every minute of scenes favoring other actors and their positions on the screen in relation to himself. He was apparently unaware of his own striking personality.”

As a means of proving his point, Reagan recalled an all-night shoot at the Warner ranch. “My fellow actors and I were sitting around the campfire with Errol. I was right next to him, and he asked Curtiz to move me. I was placed behind two actors taller than me. My face would barely show in the shot—in effect, there would be only a glimpse of me. But I set out to protect myself. During rehearsal, I secretly piled up a mound of loose earth with my feet. When the cameras rolled, I quietly moved to the top of my newly created gopher mound so that my head showed above the two actors in front of me. I then dropped my one line like the gentle rain from heaven on the heads of the tall ones in front.”

Ava Gardner: At a party, Mickey Rooney described this sultry star to Reagan. “She has big brown nipples which, when aroused, stand out like some double-long, golden California raisins.”

But when Reagan saw the final version, he was horrified. Flynn had demanded that Reagan’s only line, uttered from the top of a low mound next to the campfire, be cut.

Late one afternoon, a luscious Tarheel beauty from North Carolina arrived on the set. Ava Gardner introduced herself to Reagan. She had arrived to meet Flynn, who had promised to take her to Palm Springs for the weekend.

She told him, “If I were a man in a picture with Errol Flynn, I’d be terrified—the competition would be too great. He’s probably the most beautiful man I’ve ever dated. He has a perfect body—one that’s at home in a swimsuit or on a horse. Actually, The Perfect Specimen (did you catch his movie?) looks better with no clothes on at all. He’s fun, gallant, well mannered, and with a sense of humor. When he walks into a dark room, it’s like a light being turned on. He drinks too much, and he fucks too much, but he’s got style, honeychile. Real style.”

Before heading off to Flynn’s dressing room, she kissed Reagan on the cheek. “Give Ava a call some night. I might help liberate you. I’ve been known to turn many a square into a bouncing ball.”

During the shoot, Reagan couldn’t believe how vicious Curtiz was. The Hungarian threw a fit when he learned that he had to use a dummy instead of Massey’s real body during his hanging scnee. “Wardrobe knows how to put choke to protect Massey’s neck. Maybe he won’t really hang, maybe. I don’t want god damn dummy. But Warner moron insists.”

When the filming began, an elderly actor playing the minister stood on the scaffold with Massey, who would then disappear as a ségué shot showed the dummy dangling. Curtiz kept yelling, again and again, for the elderly actor to step back. After he screamed to step back a final time, the older actor fell off the scaffold, a vertical distance of twelve feet.

“That ruthless tyrant, Curtiz, walked over and looked down at the actor, who was in agonizing pain, and crying out for help,” Reagan said. “He’d broken his leg. Curtiz took one look at him and then yelled at his production assistant, ‘Get me another god damn minister!’”

A handsome young actor, Gene Reynolds, played Jason Brown, John Brown’s son. In a scene, as he lay dying, Errol Flynn bends over him, offering him loving comfort. When Warners’ released a publicity still of Reynolds together with Flynn, Lundigan was furious. “Hell, Errol, you look like you’re playing a love scene with Reynolds. I bet you want him more than you want me.”

Flynn rushed to Lundigan’s side to assure him that “You’re my one and only.”

During the second week of the shoot, Reagan was introduced to a young beauty, Susan Peters (formerly known as Suzanne Carnahan) from Spokane. Spotted by a talent scout, she had recently been given a contract at Warners.

Although the script of Santa Fe Trail ordained that Reagan would lose De Havilland before the end of the movie, it called for him to be introduced to “the right girl” and for him to subsequently fall for the character played by Peters. He found her a lovely girl, and befriended her, and she seemed to view him as a kind of father figure, although he was only a decade or so older than her.

During the months ahead, after the picture was finished, Peters continued to call Reagan for advice. She felt lost and lonely in Hollywood, and he offered her reassurance.

In 1942, in a panic, she came to him after Warners’ failed to renew her contract. Consequently, he advised her to go to MGM. Within weeks, she had a contract with Metro, which had offered her a role in Greer Garson’s Random Harvest (1942). [This film eventually brought Peters an Academy Award nomination as Best Supporting Actress.]

The doomed and very depressed Susan Peters turned to Reagan as a father figure, not as a lover.

[For Peters, at least, triumph was followed by tragedy. She had married Richard Quine, the film actor and director. On January 1, 1945, he had invited her to go duck hunting with him. During the hunt, his rifle accidentally discharged and a bullet lodged in Peters' spinal cord.

When Reagan visited her in the hospital, he learned from her doctor that she would be permanently paralyzed, and that she'd have to live in a wheelchair.

Because of her physical limitations, she appeared in only a few productions after that. (One of them was a role in a regional production of Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie.) In 1952, she died at the age of 31. Doctors noted that her death was hastened by starvation and dehydration because Peters' had "lost interest" in eating and drinking, and had lost the will to live.]

The shooting schedule of Santa Fe Trail took place in the oppressive heat of midsummer, the temperature often soaring to 110°F. The men were dressed in heavy military uniforms, the women in long 19th-century dresses. One location was Sun Valley in the arid Santa Susanna Mountains, a short distance north of Los Angeles. Stars and first-tier cast members were housed in small cabins. There weren't enough cabins for singles, so even the stars doubled up, Flynn sharing his cabin with Lundigan. The extras and crew slept dormitory style.

William Hopper, Hedda's son, had been assigned an uncredited role in the film as a military officer. When he arrived on the set, he informed the production assistant making housing assignments that he was Reagan's closest friend, and that he wanted to share his cabin.

Reagan had continued his friendship with William and occasionally went out with him, but he felt uncomfortable sharing such small quarters with him. William made it even worse when he told Reagan, "My passion for you has continued unabated."

"Get over it!" Reagan cautioned him.

"I won't get over it until my curiosity is satisfied," William said.

"If you think having sex with me one time will satisfy you, you're wrong. It would only whet your appetite. You'd be begging me every night for more."

"Perhaps you're right." William said.

The two men slept peacefully in a double bed, and William respected Reagan's privacy and did not move in on him during the night.

The next morning, Reagan woke up hot and sweaty and headed for the shower. He turned on the cold water. When he emerged, William, in his underwear, was sitting on the toilet, holding up a bath towel for him.

"What the hell?" Reagan said. "Get out of here."

"You mean I can't even look? What harm is that causing?"

"None, I guess," Reagan said, taking the towel. "Look, but don't touch."

"You really know how to break a guy's heart," William said.

He faced more disappointment when he went to a screening of the final cut of Santa Fe Trail. His only scene had been removed from the narrative.

During location shooting, some of the staff suffered injuries. Flynn got a saber cut on his thigh, and Massey's right leg was seared with a blank cartridge. Some of the horses also suffered leg injuries and had to be put down, which prompted an investigation by the ASPCA.

At the end of the shoot, Flynn, against Reagan's wishes, gave him a kiss on the mouth. Reagan wanted to pull away, but didn't want to antagonize Flynn, since he'd learned that they might be co-starring soon in another picture together.

He would later tell Jane, “Now I know how a woman feels when she suffers unwanted attention from the male animal.”

Reagan did not attend the film’s premiere in Santa Fe, but De Havilland accompanied Flynn. Warners sent three men from their publicity department to ensure that their star stayed sober for the premiere. They did not succeed. On the night of the big event, Flynn showed up drunk.

When the film opened across the country, it was a big success, earning some one and a half million dollars, a lot of money in the early 40s.

Reviews were mixed. The highly critical Bosley Crowther of *The New York Times*had faint praise: “It’s got everything that a high-priced soap opera should have—hard riding, hard shooting, hard fighting, and a bit of hard drinking by Errol Flynn.”

Variety weighed in with slight praise for Reagan, claiming, “He also scores.”

He was annoyed by a review written by Charles Whittaker. “Ronald Reagan recedes into the scenery when confronted with Errol Flynn’s charismatic and magnetic on-screen personality.”

Many critics noted that politically, the movie seemed to reflect a Southern point of view, with Brown cast as a villain. Another noted that “blacks are depicted as wide-eyed simpleton Sambos. However, Reagan’s Custer seems more sympathetic to Brown wanting to rid America of slavery.”

[In later years, Santa Fe Trail is often confused with another loosely historic Flynn movie, They Died With Their Boots On (1941). Directed by Raoul Walsh, it represented the eighth and final film collaboration of Flynn with Olivia de Havilland. In this release—in vivid contrast to Santa Fe Trail*—Flynn portrayed General George Armstrong Custer in a not historically accurate rundown of his life and career, including a heroic spin on his last stand, and death, in the Battle of Little Bighorn*.

In 1968, United Artists Television, the owner of the copyright for Santa Fe Trail, did not renew it, and the Flynn/Reagan movie entered the public domain.]

Reagan learned that after the premiere of Santa Fe Trail, Flynn invited Lundigan and some other friends to go on what he defined as a “Good Will Tour” of Central and South America. The exact venue of that tour would be hotly disputed for decades to come.

Among Flynn supporters, it was said that he was on a spying mission for British intelligence. His detractors, however, including author Charles Higham, claimed that he was meeting with foreign agents, especially in Buenos Aires, turning over secret information to the Nazis.

As a film star, Flynn was invited by various U.S. ambassadors to visit American Army and Navy installations.

As part of his South American tour, Flynn took along his pimp, Johnny Meyer, also known for working for Howard Hughes. On what became defined as Flynn’s “chicken hawk” tour, Meyer rounded up beautiful boys and girls in the twelve-to-fourteen year old bracket. They were invited aboard Flynn’s yacht for sex orgies.

Lundigan later told his gay friends, “Usually Errol has to go to Mexico for such pleasures. Hell, in the States, he could be charged with statutory rape.”

Reagan later discussed these rumors about Flynn with key administrators of the Screen Actors Guild. “I don’t trust Flynn,” Reagan told the board. “Never did, never will. I think he’s capable of almost anything, at least in sexual terms. But thinking of this Aussie as a Nazi spy is a bit much for me, although he does have a number of suspicious friends.”

In a phone call to Paulette Goddard, Jane Wyman was ecstatic. “I can’t believe my good luck,” Jane said. “Although I don’t like Ray Enright as a director, the bastard called to tell me I’m going to co-star with my dream man, Dennis Morgan, in this thing called Bad Men of Missouri (1941). Of course, Wayne Morris is in the picture, too, but I can keep him at bay. Tell me, am I going to break my marriage vows?”

"The only faithful husband in Hollywood is my dear Charlie [Chaplin]," Goddard claimed.

"Now you're being sarcastic, my dear," Jane said.

"Keep me posted on this Morgan thing," Goddard said. "And pray that he doesn't have a small dick. I've been so disappointed by these so-called Hollywood studs—Clark Gable and John Wayne come to mind. Of course, Charlie makes up for it. Right now, he's sleeping with this blonde bitch, Carole Landis. I think your Ronnie knows her. Watch out for her! On a movie set, she's known as 'Legs Apart' Landis."

Jane's script was sent over to her that afternoon. As usual, Bad Men of Missouri was a disappointment to her. It told the story of the Younger brothers who, enraged by carpetbaggers infringing on the war-ravaged American South, move to the lawless frontier in this fictional western. They include Cole (Dennis Morgan); Bob (Wayne Morris); and the very talented Arthur Kennedy, cast as Jim. Jim is in love with Mary Hathaway, the character played by Jane. Ohio-born Alan Baxter had been hired to play a ruthless Jesse James.

After reading the script, Jane felt that its writer "should be horsewhipped. I have to repeat lines to the Younger brothers like, 'They say you did a lot of bad things—but a lot of good things, too.' I get to kick Walter Catlett in the shins and call Victor Jory a 'no good, low-down carpetbagger.'"

When Jane reported to wardrobe, she learned that she was to wear a snood and shapeless gingham dresses in many of her scenes. "I'd dyed my hair a whorish blonde, but it was to be hidden in some scenes with a bonnet. Actually, a snood was coming back into fashion since women were using them to secure their hair when working with machinery in defense plants."

When she met the film's scriptwriter, Charles Grayson, she protested, "I wish you'd given me something more to do. I'm playing second fiddle to a bunch of men who outnumber me by a thousand to one. Now and then, amidst all that gunfire, I'm permitted a meow or two. I get to look through a window as the rain comes down. I get to shake the hand of Dennis Morgan. Imagine with Dennis in the movie, you cast Kennedy as my lover. Who in hell is going to believe that? Wayne Morris would be better as a lover than Kennedy. Kennedy's very average looking—not the kind of guy a girl would go for when hunks like Dennis and Wayne are in the picture."

When she met her on-screen boyfriend, he introduced himself as "John Kennedy" of Massachusetts. "I thought Grayson said your name was Arthur Kennedy."

"It is," he said. "But I haven't gotten used to it yet. Arthur, which is my middle name, is my new billing. Up to now, I've billed myself as John Kennedy."

He had just appeared with James Cagney, playing his brother in City for Conquest (1940). "Jimmy discovered me. He likes to discover young men." He sighed. "To each his own."

[This was not the only picture Jane would make with Arthur Kennedy. In their future lay Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie*.]*

Enright appeared with Victor Jory, introducing the actor to Jane. He'd been cast in their upcoming movie as the villain, William Merrick, a crooked banker who buys warrants on back taxes and then dispossesses farmers and their families. As the plot unfolds, the Younger brothers set out to avenge his misdeeds. Their father, Henry Younger (Russell Simpson), had been killed by Merrick's henchman. The brothers then begin a series of bank and train robberies, often stealing from Merrick, before turning their loot over to the impoverished farmers.

Jane congratulated Jory on his success playing Jonas Wilkerson, the brutal and opportunistic overseer in Gone With the Wind. "I don't think I can ever forgive you for being so mean to Scarlett," Jane said. "You were such a bastard. I think you're terrible."

"You won't believe that when I started out, I was cast in romantic leads," Jory said. "Then directors got a glimpse of my coal-black and threatening eyes. I've been the bad guy ever since."

Jane also met actor Howard da Silva, thinking he was Portuguese. He corrected that impression. “I was born to Bertha and Benjamin Silverblatt, two Yiddish-speaking Jews in Cleveland. I have no relatives in Brazil or Portugal. I just liked the sound of Da Silva.”

Jane was intrigued with Faye Emerson, a Southern belle who would later marry into the First Family at the White House. By the end of the 1940s, she would become “The First Lady of Television.” Reagan was soon to work with her in one of his future movies, and he’d get to know her far better than Jane did.

Although Emerson had married a naval aviator, William Crawford, she was known to be sleeping around. She aroused Jane’s jealousy by making a play for Morgan, who spurned her advances. When she didn’t get him, she pursued Morris, finding him an easy conquest. Jane saw her leaving Morris’ dressing room on several occasions.

During the making of the film, Jane had several intense talks with Virginia Brissac, born in San Jose, California, in 1883. Upon meeting her, Brissac asked Jane for her autograph. “I want to add it to my collection, along with those of Sarah Bernhardt, Eleonora Duse, Henry Irving, and Rudyard Kipling.”

Brissac had had a long stage career when she was young, later appearing in such movies as Dark Victory with Bette Davis and Ronald Reagan and in Destry Rides Again (1932), with Marlene Dietrich and James Stewart. Brissac would retire from the screen in 1955 after playing James Dean’s grandmother in Rebel Without a Cause.

Jane always found comic actor Walter Catlett amusing, having appeared with him in Kid Nightingale with John Payne and more recently, in Honeymoon for Three.

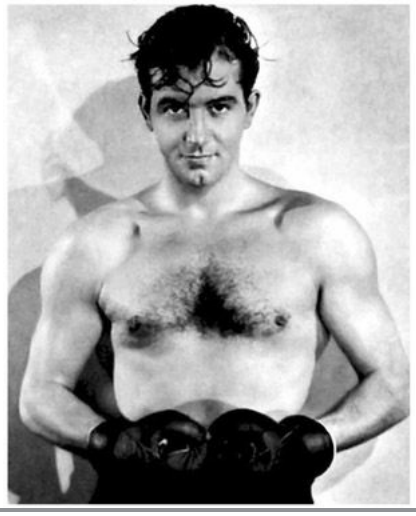
Jane on Howard da Silva: “He is the kind of man so easy to detest.”

During a rainy afternoon, when she was told she would-n’t be needed for the rest of the day, Catlett approached her. “One of your dear friends is waiting for you in a car outside.”

At first, Jane refused to approach the car in the pouring rain unless he told her who was waiting for her inside. “He wants it be a surprise. He’s a dear friend.”

Under a heavy black umbrella, she approached the car on its passenger side as the door was thrown open for her. Sitting behind the wheel was Payne himself.

Once inside, he took her in his arms and passionately kissed her. “I’ve missed you so, darling. My heart is breaking for being separated from you for so long.” Then he started the motor. “I’m taking you away to my hideaway.”



When Jane saw this publicity still of John Payne, she exclaimed, “the fantasy come true of every fair maiden.”

As she’d reveal to Catlett the next day, “I once made a movie called He Couldn’t Say No. Well, you’re looking at The Girl Who Couldn’t Say No. Let’s keep my little rendezvous with John our secret.”

“My lips are sealed,” Catlett promised.

From that day forth, Payne became a fixture in Jane’s life, coming and going at frequent intervals. His marriage to Anne Shirley was falling apart. He told Jane that she was still involved in an affair with her co-star, John Garfield.

“Shirley is out of her mind,” Jane said. “What gal in the world would want Garfield when John Payne, the sexiest man in pictures, is available?”

Linking up romantically with Payne again didn’t diminish Jane’s passion for the dashing Dennis Morgan. She eagerly awaited their reunion on the set.

During her absence from him, he was often the subject of Hollywood gossip. He’d made Kitty Foyle, The Natural History of a Woman (1940) with Ginger Rogers, the former dancing partner of Fred Astaire, in a drama about a working girl, which had brought her a Best Actress Oscar.

In the picture, Rogers found herself caught between two of the handsomest actors in Hollywood, not only Morgan, but James Craig, hired as a “replacement” for Clark Gable, to whom he bore some resemblance.

Rogers later wrote about Morgan in her memoirs, finding him “extremely handsome and intensely romantic, without manufactured overtones.” However, in the celluloid world of Kitty Foyle, the character she played found only unhappiness after she married him.

Morgan had also completed Affectionately Yours (1941), a charming comedy [which somehow flopped at the box office] starring Merle Oberon and Rita Hayworth. Rumors abounded that both Oberon and Rogers had taken “leading lady’s privilege,” and seduced Morgan.

As regards her involvement in Bad Men of Missouri, Jane later told Goddard, “I’m the leading lady in this Missouri western, and I, too, am going to take leading lady’s privilege with this super cute guy.”

During the shoot, Jane got to know Morgan, and she took delight in their romance. She began to arrive later and later at home every night, telling Reagan that she was held up at the studio. He couldn’t understand why such a small role in the picture would be such a burden to her, requiring so many late hours. She didn’t bother to explain.

Nine years older than Jane, Morgan, whose birth name had been Earl Stanley Morner, had briefly worked under the acting pseudonym of Richard Stanley. At the debut of his association with Warners, the studio assigned him the new name of Dennis Morgan.

He told Jane that if not for a whim of fate, she might have been playing opposite Humphrey Bogart instead of with him. At the last minute, Bogie had turned down the script and had been placed on suspension.

Jane interpreted Morgan as the antithesis of the gritty Bogart, and wondered why Jack Warner had assigned him as Bogie’s replacement. That would happen again when Bogie rejected the script for God Is My Co-Pilot in 1945, and Morgan had great success with the role.

He had married his childhood sweetheart, Lillian Vedder, way back in 1933. “It was love at first sight,” he said, “when I saw her selling poppies to passersby at a war veterans’ benefit.”

Originally, he was signed by MGM as a “threat” to Nelson Eddy, the singer-actor who often co-starred with Jeanette MacDonald.

As Morgan would later confide to his best friend, Jack Carson, “MGM didn’t quite know what to do with me. Off the screen, even though I love my wife, I had the time of my life. Let me see: Jean Harlow in Suzy (1936).”

“Instead of fucking these MGM beauties, who did nothing for my career, maybe I should have let some of MGM’s homo directors blow me, but that’s not my style.”

As one reporter claimed, “Warner’s put Dennis Morgan on the assembly line with Wayne Morris, Arthur Kennedy, Jeffrey Lynn, Eddie Albert, and Ronald Reagan—likable young lugs squiring the heroine until Bogart, Cagney, or Flynn came crashing down to sweep her up.”

Later, Jane told Goddard, “Dennis stands six feet two inches, and weighs 175—and he’s all man. And yes, even in that department you worried about.”

Jane later talked with Goddard about her affair with Morgan and the understanding they’d reached. He’d told her, “We’re very attracted to each other, but we won’t let our romance interfere with our marriages. In fact, by letting off some pent-up love steam with each other, I’ll be a better husband to my wife and you’ll be a better wife to Ronnie.”

“You’re very special to me, and I’d marry you in a minute if both of us were free,” she’d told him. “But I think you’re right. Instead of getting married, we’ll have a back street affair.”

As she’d later relate to Goddard, “Bad Men of Missouri was, for me at least, the worst of my movies. But I’d rate Dennis a ten on a scale of ten. John Payne is more sex driven, but Dennis combines romantic love with kindness. He worships a woman and makes her feel like a goddess.”

One night, he’d told her, “You fit into my body so smoothly, it’s like you were meant to stay by my side forever. I think we’re going to know each other for many a year.”

As he once told Jane, “I’m always faithful to my wife in my heart. Where I put my prick is my own god damn business.”

Before its release, cast members were shown the final cut of Bad Men of Missouri. In the darkened screening room, Jane sat next to Morgan, and he held her hand.

After he’d seen it, Kennedy later recalled how unhappy Jane was with her role. “There’s talent in that girl, and Enright should have taken advantage of it. The film would have been better if there were less horse chases and more of Jane. She gave it her best. But bigger and better things awaited her in her future roles.”

Critic Jennifer Logan wrote, “The love scenes with Jane Wyman and Arthur Kennedy go by in a blur of speed. Wyman, a very pretty girl, has what must be one of the shortest romantic roles in the history of horse opera.”

Variety weighed in: “Bad Men of Missouri is a cinematic glorification of that daring band of desperadoes, the Younger Brothers, operating in Missouri after the Civil War. It’s strictly a shoot-em action melodrama, with plenty of excitement for a programmer. Expect lots of tough riding, robberies, and dusty chases.”

In between films, Reagan took time off to catch up with Betty Grable, who was finally getting star billing after years of slaving in minor roles. Her divorce from child star Jackie Coogan had been finalized a few months before, and she told Reagan that she was enjoying “my role as a bachelor gal with a roving eye.”

She had just completed Moon Over Miami (1941), a Fox Technicolor musical co-starring Don Ameche and Robert Cummings. “Unfortunately, that bitch Carole Landis was in it, too. She hates me. She wanted to be me, and resents Zanuck for building me up. Zanuck is fucking her, not me. When he called me to his office and took his dick out for me, I said, ‘Darryl, that’s very beautiful, but you can put it back now.”

“I’m having a turbulent private life, but at least stardom has come to me,” she said. “After I rejected Zanuck’s sexual advances, he’s gotten even by casting me with Landis. He has this thing about pitting one star against another. He used me to remind Alice Faye to stay in line. Now he’s using Landis to remind me that I can be replaced. She and I hated each other on sight.”

“Landis makes it worse than it is with her big mouth,” Grable said. “She’s telling everybody that she stole Moon Over Miami from me. She also claims she’s far more beautiful than I am. She told Zanuck, Don Ameche, and others that ‘Grable is so full of herself, it’s a wonder she doesn’t explode.’”

In the passenger seat of his car, she hiked up her dress. “I don’t want you to have an accident, but my gams have been voted the most beautiful in the world. Fox has insured them for $1,250,000.”

“How do you feel about all this publicity about your legs?” he asked.

“It would have been fine when I was a struggling chorus girl,” she answered. “But right now, I’d rather the guys wrote about me as an actress. Frankly, I always felt the face of an actress was more important than her figure.”

“I’m not so sure about that, except for someone like Garbo or Katharine Hepburn,” he said.

At that point, Grable asked about the welfare of Jane Wyman. “I haven’t seen her for some time. You may not know this, but Jane and I, along with Paulette Goddard and Lucille Ball, got our starts together in this clunker called The Kid From Spain, a vehicle for Eddie Cantor way back in ’32. Jane was billed as Sarah Jane Fulks. Give the kid my love, won’t you? Congratulate her on snaring a prize like you. I know what a treat it is to get pounded by you.”

Hot, Competitive Blondes: Landis with Grable in Moon Over Miami.

“I’ll give her your regards, but leave out that bit about what a prize I am,” he said. “Sometimes, I don’t think she appreciates me like some of my gal pals.”

After they’d talked and had a few drinks, Grable asked Reagan to drive her home, since it was starting to rain heavily. She’d been driven to Warners that morning by a dancer friend.

En route back to her place, she suggested that she would be willing to become his “mistress in waiting,” as she defined it.

“You’re the most gorgeous gal in Hollywood, and I may be a god damn fool, but I’d better take a raincheck, although that is the most tempting offer I think I’ll ever receive in my life.”

“Too bad,” she said. “I’m even more experienced than I was since our last round. It looks like I’ve got to take the bull by the horn.” Then she reached over and swiftly unzipped his pants. Before he fully realized what was happening, she was voraciously fellating him.

Biographer Mart Martin, among others, wrote, “Grable had a lifelong affection for chorus boys and dancers, many of whom were homosexual. When she couldn’t find other sexual partners, she’d press her demands on them to service her. But she really preferred rough men of the truck driver and bartender type and especially liked to fellate them.”]

As she later bragged, “I brought Ronnie to a climax that rivaled the eruption of Vesuvius.” As she got out of the car, she blew him a kiss. “That will have to do until next time, Big Guy.”

He looked a bit stunned at first, trying to recover from the assault. He seemed to have changed his mind about her offer. “When can I call you again?”

She later relayed details of her sexual encounters of the 1930s and the World War II era to her homosexual dancer friend, Bob Foster, who wrote Betty Grable’s Men, whose publication was ultimately rejected by a number of publishers. In it, he described her affairs with Jackie Coogan (she married him), Desi Arnaz, Victor Mature, George Raft, Tyrone Power, Mickey Rooney, Robert Stack, Don Ameche, John Payne, Dick Haymes, Buster Crabbe, George Montgomery, and Ronald Reagan.

The final two chapters were devoted to her second husband, band leader Harry James.

After appearing in some twenty-three films for Warners’, Reagan was cast in the 1941 version of MGM’s The Bad Man.

[Note that Reagan's The Bad Man is an entirely different film from Bad Men of Missouri, a Jane Wyman film, which, confusingly, was also released in 1941. The Bad Man represented Reagan's first loan-out by Warner to another studio, in this case, MGM.]

MGM had requested Reagan for the role of Gil Jones, an impoverished but well-intentioned American running a ranch in Mexico. MGM's decision to hire him was based on executives there who saw his performances as George Gipp in Knute Rockne and as General Custer in Santa Fe Trail.

Conceived as a remake of a remake of what had originated as a Broadway play more than twenty years before, The Bad Man, in addition to Reagan, featured Laraine Day, cast as his leading lady, and the veteran warhorses Wallace Beery, playing a noble-hearted Mexican bandit, and Lionel Barrymore.

[Earlier versions of its script had been released in 1923 as a silent film, starring Holbrook Blinn, and again in 1930 as a pre-Code talkie starring Walter Huston.

Beery had been selected as a leading player in the 1941 version because of his authenticity as a Mexican bandit in Viva Villa! (1934). But in this 1941 reincarnation, he played the character like a buffoon, blustering and mugging, booming out his lines in an annoying rendering of pidgin English.]

The film's director, Richard Thorpe, was in a bad mood when Reagan greeted him. Variety had just revealed in painful detail the circumstances of his firing as director of Judy Garland's The Wizard of Oz after only two weeks of shooting. He was pondering a libel suit.

Among his previous achievements, Thorpe had directed Jane Wyman in a bit role in The Crowd Roars (1938), starring Robert Taylor.

Thorpe warned Reagan that Beery and Barrymore were notorious scene stealers, "using every trick in the book and adding a few never invented. That asshole Beery even stole a picture from Rin-Tin-Tin, The Wonder Dog."

For that and for other reasons, Reagan approached Beery with a certain disdain. He'd never liked him on the screen. He held a personal grudge against him as well:

In the 1941 version of The Bad Man, Beery plays a kind of Mexicano Robin Hood, helping Gil Jones (Reagan) and his wheelchair-bound Uncle Henry (Barrymore) avoid the loss of their ranch to greedy bankers. Complications materialize when Gil's childhood sweetheart (Laraine Day) arrives at the ranch with her difficult and quarrelsome husband (Tom Conway). Predictably, the ranch will be saved, Conway will be chased away, and Reagan will be free to get involved once again with his love from yesteryear.

Beery, a veteran actor who during the course of his lifetime would be a player in 205 films, originated in Missouri, He ran away from home in 1901 at the age of 16 to work for the Ringling Brothers Circus as an elephant trainer until he was attacked and mauled by a leopard.

From there, he migrated to Hollywood, appearing with his future wife, Gloria Swanson, in Sweedie Goes to College (1915). He married the vamp a year later, and she wrote about her horrendous time with this brute, beginning with his drunken, bloody rape of her on her wedding night. His violence and alcoholism led to her divorce from him in 1919.

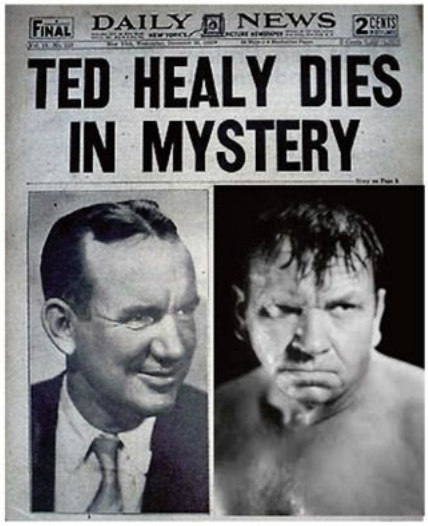
One of his most successful pictures had been Min and Bill (1931), starring the formidable Marie Dressler. For The Champ in 1931, he'd won an Oscar as Best Actor. He'd also appeared with Dressler in Tugboat Annie (1933).

When he met Reagan, he told the young actor that he'd seen the sequel, Tugboat Annie Sails Again, and that he was not impressed. "You and your blonde floozie wife sure fucked up that picture. Poor Dressler must be turning over in her grave."

"How can anyone, even Marjorie Rambeau, follow in Dressler's footsteps?" Reagan asked. "And Jane is not a floozie. She's a lady."

"You might also wonder how any actor can follow in the footsteps of yours truly here," Beery loutishly answered.

During his heyday in the 1930s with MGM, this unlikely star became the highest paid actor in the world, starring with such luminaries as Clark Gable, Jean Harlow, George Raft, Fatty Arbuckle, Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., and Joan Crawford.



Because the editors feared libel, this frontpage of New York's Daily News was yanked at the last minute, before the newspapers hit the streets.

In the version that replaced it, the Wallace Beery photo (on the right) was removed, along with a caption which identified him as a murder suspect.

In its place, the editors ran a photo of a woman from an unrelated story.

Although during the shoot, Reagan never directly confronted Beery, he held him responsible for the December, 1937 death of his friend, Ted Healy. Following a dispute in a tavern, Beery, along with Albert ("Cubby") Broccoli and Pat DiCicco, had attacked Healy and severely beaten him, kicking him in the head, abdomen, and ribs, knocking his left eye from its socket, delivering major bruises and lacerations to his head, neck and trunk.

An autopsy and subsequent investigation deemed these men not guilty of (directly) causing his death, but Reagan knew better. He blamed Eddie Mannix [VP and General Manager of MGM] and Howard Strickling [MGM's Head of Publicity] for covering up the scandal.

Reagan had always been fascinated by Lionel Barrymore's screen work, ever since he'd seen A Free Soul (1931), in which he played an alcoholic lawyer alongside Norma Shearer and Clark Gable. For his performance in that film, Lionel, the older brother of the famous siblings, Ethel and John, won an Oscar as Best Actor.

Lionel had begun his stage career in the 1890s. By 1911, he was making films with D.W. Griffith at Biograph Studios. In 1915, he starred with the legendary Lillian Russell in the movie Wildfire. Like Beery, he had worked with all the big names, including John Gilbert, Gable, Greta Garbo, Spencer Tracy, Jean Harlow, Marie Dressler, Lon Chaney, Sr., and even his sister, Ethel. He'd faced off on the screen with Beery before, appearing with him in Grand Hotel (1932), and with John, his younger brother.

Thorpe seemed to take delight in telling Reagan about all the rumors swirling around Lionel's head. Because of the pain from his crippling arthritis, Lionel was said to be a morphine addict. It was also rumored that Louis B. Mayer was purchasing $400 worth of cocaine every day as a means of keeping him out of pain and allowing him to get some sleep.

In addition to having broken his hip twice, Lionel, again according to rumor, suffered from having contracted syphilis in 1925 during an affair with a young stage actor. Lionel was known for developing crushes on actors, notably Clark Gable when they co-starred together in A Free Soul. It was said that the fellating of young men was his favorite form of sex.

Reagan later said, "Lionel was theater through and through. An actor such as myself was made better by his great ability—provided you keep from being run over. He was confined to his wheelchair at the time, and he could whip that contrivance around on a dime. It's hard to smile in a scene when your foot has been run over and your shin is bleeding from a hubcap blow."

Lionel Barrymore in December of 1939, performing A Christmas Carol for radio broadcast.

Originating in Utah, Laraine Day was Reagan's leading lady. This time, he didn't fall in love—far from it. She was dating Ray Hendricks at the time, a singer turned airline executive. She'd marry him a year later, but divorce him in 1947. The following year, she married Leo Durocher, manager of the baseball team then known as the New York Giants. Subsequently, she became known as "The First Lady of Baseball."

Reagan told Thorpe that Laraine, a devout member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (i.e., the Mormons), was the most rigidly puritanical of his many leading ladies. She was so intensely dedicated to the teachings of her faith that she did not smoke, drink, or swear, and refused to even drink tea or coffee. "Nothing tastes better than a glass of cold milk, or ice water, on a hot day," she told Reagan.

Onscreen with Laraine Day, Reagan cozied up to his co-star, but didn't develop any particular case of "Leadinglady-itis."

An MGM contract player, she was known as "Nurse Mary Lamont," the title character she played in a string of seven Dr. Kildare movies, beginning with Calling Dr. Kildare in 1939, where she co-starred with Lew Ayres.

On occasion, Laraine and Reagan discussed politics. Whereas he was still a liberal Democrat, she was a staunch Republican. She told him, "If your friend, Dick Powell, doesn't make you see the light politically, I'll enlist César Romero, Ginger Rogers, Adolphe Menjou, Irene Dunne, even Mary Pickford, to convert you."

Like Reagan, she detested Beery, refusing to speak to him except on camera. When she'd played his daughter in Sergeant Madden (1939), she claimed he'd pinched her bottom until the cheeks of her buttocks were black and blue. "He's nothing but a filthy, dirty old man," she complained to Reagan.

One day, when Jane arrived on the set for lunch with her husband, he introduced her to Laraine. Later, Jane told him, "She's pleasant enough, but she lacks star quality. She'll never be a front-rank actress. Hollywood is filled with these fluffy bits. I think she'd be passable playing the secretary to some boss."

"Meow!" was Reagan's response.

He got along better with the film's supporting actors than he did with the stars. He met Russia-born Tom Conway, the brother of the more famous actor George Sanders. Conway would be remembered in the '40s for taking over the role from his brother of the sleuthing "Falcon" in a detective serial.

When Reagan met Conway, he was already showing signs of alcoholism, which in time would lead to his sad death in a flophouse in Venice, California.

Over lunch one day, Reagan found him very resentful of his brother, George Sanders. "I love George, but I also hate him, too. I live in his shadow…He takes roles from me that I could have performed better. He is so imperious, so suave, so sure of himself. He looks down on the whole world, including me. His shit stinks just as much as mine. So do his farts. I used to sleep with him."

Cast as Red Giddings in The Bad Man, Texas-born Chill Wills was folksy and shaggy-haired, always bringing a dollop of color to any western. "He was the type you'd expect to find sitting around the campfire under a full moon some night in Texas," Reagan said.

Actually, Wills had started out as an amateur singer in minstrel and medicine shows, later forming a group called "Chill Wills and His Avalon Boys."

After the release of The Bad Man, critics suggested that the picture should have been far better. Beery and Barrymore got most of the attention. Reagan was barely mentioned in most critiques.

He told Jane, "I don't think Mayer will be using me again anytime soon."

Later he described his experience making that film.

"I survived the Dead End Kids. And I survived Hollywood's two curmudgeons, Wallace Beery and Lionel Barrymore. Even so, I probably couldn't survive playing a leading man to Joan Crawford, even though I'm one tough hombre."

"I learned one thing working for Mayer," Reagan said. "MGM is the Tiffany's of Hollywood, whereas Warners is a hash house specializing only in meat and potatoes."

Late in April of 1941, Reagan and Jane stopped by the house of Jack and Nelle Reagan. He wanted to say goodbye to his parents before heading to the East Coast on a publicity jaunt, with Jane, to promote The Bad Man. He hugged Jack and kissed his mother goodbye. Then, on an impulse, he exited from his car to wave a final goodbye to them. Standing near their doorstep, his parents waved back. It was the last time he'd ever see his father alive.

The night of May 17, Jack had been out on an all-night drinking binge with his newly minted friend, Pat O'Brien. "When two Irishmen get together to gab, there is some serious drinking of good ol' Irish whiskey, the nectar of the gods," he said.

Nelle had begged him not to go, citing his ill health. "I'm as robust as an ox," Jack had boasted.

During a stopover of his tour in Atlantic City, New Jersey, Reagan received the call from Nelle that he had long anticipated. She informed him that his father, age 57, had died of a heart attack on May 18.

He had collapsed on the floor of their living room, and she had immediately summoned an ambulance. She had phoned the wrong company, an inadvertent error whose timing might have contributed to Jack's death.

It seemed that there was a jurisdictional dispute between emergency medical teams serving Beverly Hills and West Hollywood. Whereas she should have contacted a service based in West Hollywood, she had phoned one in Beverly Hills instead. When the company researched the Reagans' street address, they discovered that their home lay outside the city boundaries of Beverly Hills. Therefore, they opted not to answer the call, and failed to ring Nelle back to inform her of that. During all the confusion and delay, Jack had died unattended.

Nelle fully understood that her son had a fear of flying, despite all his daring aerial exploits in those Brass Bancroft Secret Service movies. "If you and Jane got in a plane to fly back, and something went wrong, I could never forgive myself. The thought of burying my younger son and my husband on the same day would kill me. Take the train. I'll delay the funeral until you and Jane return."

When Jack Warner called Reagan, offering him the use of his personal plane—a TWA DC-21, which happened to have been at Idlewild Airport in New York City at the time—Reagan graciously rejected the offer.

It would take five days before Reagan, with Jane, could arrive in Los Angeles. Years later, he would recall the moment of their arrival to his daughter Maureen. "It was a grand California day when your mother and I arrived at Union Station. We hadn't been in the state long enough not to grasp the beauty of a California day. But despite the lovely weather, I was desolate."

The funeral was held at St. Victor's Catholic Church in West Hollywood, which attracted a small group of mourners, the most notable of which was Pat O'Brien. As Reagan recalled, "I'm sure Jack knew that Pat and his new friends were there in that little church off Sunset Boulevard to say goodbye."

Before the funeral, Reagan learned that Jack had started attending church—a Catholic one—again. As James Cagney later described it to Reagan, "Your father heard the flutter of wings in heaven."

Moon Reagan was at the funeral, and he appeared grief stricken. "Dutch's older brother had always been closer to Jack than Dutch was to him," Nelle claimed.

With a stoic face, Reagan listened to the funeral service for his father, the former shoe salesman, wanderer, binge drinker, and lapsed Catholic. Nelle, in a dress of lavender prints, sat between her son and Jane. The light from the stained-glass windows illuminated her Gothic American face, and in her lap rested a tattered Bible with dogeared pages.

At the end of the service, she looked over at her son with her gray-blue eyes. "Dutch," she said, taking his hand and holding it tightly. "You're all that I have left in the world now. I know you'll be there for me until the end."

Weeks later, Reagan talked to his friends about his feelings during the burial of his father. "I was beyond crying. My soul was desolate, desolate and empty. All of a sudden, I heard somebody talking to me, and I knew it was my father. He was saying, 'I'm all right. I'm in a place that's very nice. Please don't be unhappy and take care of Nelle for me. Give my love to Jane and my new grandchild.' After I heard that soothing voice, my desolations just went away. The emptiness was all gone."

[As a contract player with a steady income, Reagan had been giving Jack and Nelle $175 a month to live on. Since they had almost no house or car expenses, that represented a most adequate income early in 1941.

During World War II, after Reagan was drafted, he made a deal with Warners' to provide Nelle with $75 a week to answer his fan mail. Because of the number of movies he'd made in the early 1940s, his fan mail had continued, though not in the volumes before. Jack Warner agreed to deduct all the paychecks sent to Nelle from Reagan's future services to the studio upon his return from the Army.

Baby Maureen was only five months old when Jack died, and, of course, she had no memory of him. But she had great and lasting affection for Nelle, whom she called "Gramsie."

She later claimed that her grandmother "was something of a clairvoyant. She was absolutely convinced that one of her sons, 'My beloved Moon or Ronnie," would one day become President of the United States. One afternoon, she told me, 'My greatest goal in life is to travel with you and Dutch to Washington for the swearing in of Moon to lead our nation.'"]

One night in her living room, Jane turned to Reagan, dropping the latest script she'd received (The Body Disappears; 1941) onto her coffee table. "It's just a silly little comedy," she said, "by Erna Lazarus and Scott Darling, whoever the fuck they are."

Although Reagan didn't seem to care too much about the script, he urgently wanted to know who her leading man would be. "Am I in danger of losing my gal to some hot stuff?"

"I'm going to play opposite that darling Jeffrey Lynn," she said. "He's such a gentleman, unlike the other ruffians at Warners."

"What a coincidence," he said. "He's also the leading man in my next picture, Million Dollar Baby (1941). I resent him. He's getting star billing over yours truly."

In addition to Lynn, Jane's co-stars included her gay friend, the very prissy Edward Everett Horton; a former New York model, the sultry Marguerite Chapman; David Bruce; Ivan Simpson; and Willie Best. The director, Ross Lederman, was unknown to Jane.

Two days later, at Warners, she met Lederman. He annoyed her, telling her, "I'm the only prima donna on this lot. Get it right the first time. I don't go in for retakes."

At home that night, she accused Lederman of being "brusque, crude, rude, and a son of a bitch."

It was obvious to Jane that the storyline of The Body Disappears had been stolen from James Whale's The Invisible Man (1933). As she'd later recall, "It was the worst movie I ever appeared in in the 40s."

In this daffy comedy, a young millionaire, Peter de Haven (Lynn), is behaving outrageously. His fellow partygoers, each of them studying to be doctors, decide to teach him a lesson. When Lynn passes out drunk, some of the young men kidnap him and place him on a slab of marble in the college dissecting room reserved for cadavers.

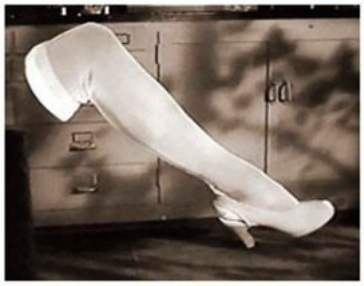
As an outrageous and mad scientist, Horton is working on a serum which will make a person invisible. He injects Lynn with an experimental serum, making him appear headless when he awakens. Jane is cast as Horton's daughter and as Lynn's love interest. She, too, receives the serum and loses her head.

As predictable, both Lynn and Jane get their heads restored before the end of the final reel. Science fiction is combined with romance and what passes as mystery in this cinematic flop.

In The Body Disappears, Jane maneuvers a face-off with Edward Everett Horton, that champion scene stealer and comic mugger champ.

Jane enjoyed renewing her friendship with Horton, whom she had met while filming her bit part in All the King's Horses (1935). He would later invite her to visit his 22-acre tract of land in Encino. Dubbing it "Belly Acres," (actually Belleigh Acres), he told her. "All it lacks is its own post office."

"I brought my Scottish mother to live there," he said, "although she objects to my acting as a sissy on film. She demands that I attend church more often. When reporters come snooping around, I tell them I'm a confirmed bachelor. I hide my lover [Gavin Gordon] in the closet until the press departs."



No, It's not a prosthesis...It's Jane's leg, the only part of her body still visible after ingesting "The Serum."

"All the actors, including myself, learned a lot from Edward," Jane said. "The director offered us no guidance. We more or less had to direct ourselves."

"I hold Jane in the highest esteem," Horton later said. "It took a long time for her big break to come."

[In the late 1950s, during one of Jane's visits to "Belly Acres," Horton was complaining that the State of California was forcing him to sell a portion of his land to make way for the Ventura Freeway, a major traffic artery that opened in 1960.]

Jane found her leading man, Jeffrey Lynn, "dreamy. If I didn't have Ronnie, I would have dated him. The trouble with Jeff was that he was too polite to fight the gang of carpetbaggers who ran the studios. He didn't know how to become a star. He did just what they told him to do. He made all those movies with the Lane sisters, including Four Daughters (1938). The year I worked with him, Four Daughters had inspired yet another family melodrama starring Lynn, Four Mothers (1941)."

"I didn't see Jeffrey for years after the movie was made," she said. "I heard from Ronnie that he was in Army Intelligence. He and this blonde starlet, Marilyn Monroe, had small roles in Home Town Story (1951). And he did a little bit better in BUtterfield 8 (1960), with Elizabeth Taylor. But the Hollywood sun never shone bright enough on this leading man. He ended up leaving show-biz to sell real estate. Actually, he never recovered from the loss of the role of Ashley Wilkes in Gone With the Wind (1939). He once confessed to me that he would have been a bigger star were it not for Ronnie, who got the roles most suited for him."

Craig Stevens had only a bit role in Jane's newest film, but he would figure into her future after the war. She found him handsome and charming, noting that he exuded masculinity. Horton admitted to her that although he had a crush on Stevens, "It won't do me any good. I'm not in his league."

Stevens would later marry actress Alexis Smith, who would become Reagan's leading lady in his first movie role after the war. Reagan would then follow that role by co-starring with Stevens in his next film after that, too.

By now, Jane was critically inspecting every young beauty appearing in her movies, attempts to evaluate any player who might one day challenge her tenuous position as a Warners' contract player. It was commonplace for a starlet's options not to be renewed, and Jane had been lucky to hold onto her contract, such as it was.

She turned an envious eye on one of the movie's supporting stars, Marguerite Chapman, a former switchboard operator who evolved into a New York model. She had parlayed her victories into a Hollywood contract, making her film debut in 1940.

Jane was right about sensing future stardom for the lovely young woman. In time, Chapman would appear opposite such stars as Edward G. Robinson and George Sanders. Big stardom never came, however, and Chapman ended up in supporting roles. One of them was a 1955 appearance with Marilyn Monroe in The Seven Year Itch.

Chapman later recalled an unpleasant experience she had with Reagan when dining with three other cast members, including Jane, in the Warner commissary. Reagan had joined his young wife for lunch.

"He was a real big shot back then," Chapman said. "Headed for stardom, as everybody thought. I was sitting at table between Jane and Horton. When Reagan joined us, he immediately embarrassed me."

Marguerite Chapman—a serious threat to Jane's sovereignty at Warners, or so she thought at the time.

"I heard from Jane that you're Catholic," Reagan said. "Why are you Catholic?"

"Because I was born one," she answered.

"That doesn't mean you have to stay one," Reagan said.

"I never liked the man after that," she said, "and I certainly never voted for him in future elections."

Other than its silly plot, The Body Disappears sometimes causes additional embarrassments when screened today on such networks as Turner Movie Classics. They revolve around the on-screen behavior of Willie Best, known back then as "Sleep n' Eat." An African American actor from Sunflower, Mississippi, he was a rival of the now notorious Stepin Fetchit, an actor who's reviled today because of his screen portrayals of dark-skinned, stereotypically lazy simpletons. That was exactly the role that Best was called upon to play in The Body Disappears, in which he was filmed as an eyeball-popping illiterate fool.

Best, who would soon appear in High Sierra (1941) with Humphrey Bogart and Ida Lupino, had been playing a variation of this role in other films since 1930. As he told Jane, "I don't mind acting witless. That is, if the paycheck is fat enough. I call it 'bringing home the bacon.' It's better than pickin' cotton in Mississippi on a dog day in August."

Jane talked mostly about the frustration of her new career," Lynn said. "She seemed 'put upon' by her new duties as a wife and mother."

"I'm tired of playing a sidekick to a bigger star," she told him. "I'm always cast in that secondary position, or else as a reporter turned detective or a glasses-wearing bookworm. I should have some of the roles going to Ida Lupino. There's got to be something better for me—and for Ronnie, too. All the roles I want to play go to either Lupino or to Ann Sheridan, who is my friend, or else to Olivia de Havilland. If you think I'm turning green with envy, you've got that right."

The release of The Body Disappears ended up as a second-tier programmer, and didn't even play in some of North America's major cities. Instead, it was dumped into small town movie houses from Peoria, Illinois, to Pocatelo, Idaho.

Critic Clive Hirschhorn claimed that, “The only thing not injected with an invisible serum was the film itself—which, in the circumstances, was an oversight and not easily forgiven.”

Back at his home studio, after his brief stint for MGM, Reagan was once again cast opposite Priscilla Lane, this time in Million Dollar Baby (1941). Although the ardor which had once blazed between them had dimmed, they remained very friendly and supportive of each other.

After Reagan read the script of Million Dollar Baby, he told Priscilla that he was delighted to get the girl in the end. “I was afraid that Jeffrey Lynn would walk off with you. After all, he’s billed before me in the credits.”

It’s somewhat ridiculous plot was based on a Leonard Spigelgass story called “Miss Wheelwright Discovers America.” For some reason, it took three of Warners’ most talented writers—Casey Robinson, Richard Macaulay, and Jerry Wald, to come up with an only mildly entertaining film script.

As the plot unfolds, a young attorney, James Amory (Lynn), travels to England to meet with an American multi-millionaire, Cornelia Wheelwright (May Robson), who has been living abroad for thirty years. He tells her that her father earned his fortune by defrauding his former business partner. She is also told that the granddaughter, Pam McAllister (Lane), of the defrauded partner is alive and living in a very modest boarding house in New York.

Feeling guilty, Robson journeys to America and checks into the boarding house herself, where she discovers Pam living across the hall from her pianist boyfriend (Reagan). She anonymously makes a gift of a million dollars to the shocked young woman, who works as a sales clerk in a department store. Elated, Pam immediately buys gifts for her friends in the boarding house—including Reagan, her true love.

Their reaction is not what she expects—in fact, she finds them resentful. Her new-found wealth threatens her relationship with Reagan, who does not “want to marry money. I prefer to make my own way in the world.”

In a totally unbelievable development in the plot, Lane ultimately donates her fortune to charity, winning back the heart of her hard-working musician boyfriend. Presumably at the end of the movie, they start out on their life together as poor as they were when they were dating.

Unusual for him, Reagan had gone to work two weeks in advance of the shooting date, hoping to master some of the visual aspects, at least, of his role as a pianist. He went to Warners’ Music Department, where he engaged a pianist to teach him how to play a piano keyboard, if not musically, at least for how it would appear on camera. Up to then, he had no musical background except for singing with a barbershop quartet in the Middle West. He was taught how to manipulate his fingers on a dummy keyboard, making no sound.

“A lot of acting is imitation anyway,” he later said, “and I became pretty good, as long as the piano remained silent. For a while, I almost convinced myself I could play.”

Although his hands seem to be playing the piano in the film, the actual sound came from dubbing by a concert pianist.

For several days, as Reagan studied the keyboard, David Lewis, the associate producer of Million Dollar Baby, showed up to take him to lunch.

Reagan had tangled with Lewis before, in his earlier capacity as associate producer of Dark Victory with Bette Davis. He resented Lewis for his continued sexual pursuit of him. “God, you’re aggressive,” he told Lewis. “Why not accept a no as a no?”

“Don’t hate me because I’m rich!” The Million Dollar Baby, as interpreted by Priscilla Lane, begs her strange-valued fiancé, Reagan.

“Because I firmly believe that if you spent one night with me, I’d win you over and you’d switch to my side.”

"That would be the day," Reagan said, sarcastically.

"I'm not a studio hack, and if you play along with me, I can really help make you an A-list star by getting the right roles for you. I believe that the producer and the writer account for 80 percent of a film's success, the director and actor (or actors) only twenty percent. I like emotional dramas like the work I did on Camille with Garbo and Robert Taylor. I did a lot for Taylor, and he was most cooperative with me."

"I learned everything from Irving Thalberg at MGM, and he was the best in the business. I found out that the script based on a controversial novel, Kings Row, is in pre-production. It includes themes relating to both incest and homosexuality, but that can be toned down for a movie. I could use my influence to get you one of the screen's top roles. I could be a breakthrough for you. I see an Oscar in it for you."

"Why can't you help me win the role without turning me into a male whore?" Reagan asked. "C'mon, give me a break."

"And you want me to do this for you without anything in return?" Lewis asked. "That's not how we play the game in Tinseltown."

"Are we negotiating?" Reagan asked.

"Think over my offer," Lewis said. "I can get the role for you if you'll cooperate. Jeffrey Lynn on this very picture is practically signing a contract that he'll do my bidding if I get the role for him. You're so goddamn stubborn."

"Listen, I want to cooperate, and I need your help. But I can't…I just can't."

"Will you meet me halfway?" Lewis asked.

"Exactly what would that entail?" Reagan asked.

"Nude massages. You've been massaged before in the nude at your golf club. I know that for a fact. The masseurs there working you over are homos. So you've already been that route before—and you ended up paying the guys to paw your beautiful body."

"But nothing happened with those guys," he protested. "It was just a massage."

"If you'll let me massage you, nothing will happen either," Lewis said. "I promise I won't go all the way."

"Well, since you put it that way, and since such a thing has already happened to me at the golf club, I'll have to consider it. I really want a breakthrough role. I guess we might make some sort of deal."

"You're one hard bargainer," Lewis said. "Years from now, after you become a big star—with my help—you can omit this sordid detail from your memoirs."

"You can count on me doing that," Reagan vowed.

Several of his friends read the manuscript and urged him to destroy it. Later, instead of a tell-all, he wrote a rather vanilla and harmless book, The Creative Producer: A Memoir of the Studio System.]

On his first day on the set, Reagan met with the film's German director, Curtis Bernhardt. He discussed not about Reagan's role in the movie, but about events in Germany, out of which he had escaped from the Nazis. He was morbidly worried about his Jewish family and friends he'd left behind.

"Bernhardt really filled me in on what was actually going on," Reagan later said. "The massacre of the Jews and other atrocities. He convinced me that America was asleep at the wheel, claiming that the country should mobilize. He predicted that the Nazis would one day invade the U.S. from the East Coast, the Japs from the West."

"He was actually a very talented director," Reagan said. "He shouldn't be handling the fluff he'd been given. He'd directed both Jane and Olivia in My Love Came Back and now he was tackling our project, with its stupid plot. In my role, I was virtually insisting my girlfriend give away a million bucks. If Jane brought home a million bucks, I'd be worshipping at her altar."

During the shoot, Reagan lunched with Priscilla Lane, his leading lady. Instead of romancing her, as he'd done during his past, he listened to her pour out her career woes. "Even when I was big box office at Warners, I made only $750 a week. I was constantly demanding more money from Jack Warner. I also turned down roles and went on suspension."

She showed him a copy of the London publication, Picturegoer. "Even the magazine is asking, 'Why is Priscilla Lane still knocking on the door of major stardom?' The magazine got it right. I've just been a stooge to John Garfield or Cagney. I deserve much larger and bigger parts."

Then she congratulated him on his marriage to Jane.

"Men are going to be scarce during the war," Reagan said. "Maybe it'll last until war's end."

After six decades on the stage and screen, the Australian actress, May Robson, was coming to the end of a distinguished career. As the eccentric lady of wealth and good conscience, she virtually stole the picture, Million Dollar Baby, from its other actors. She would die the following year at the age of eighty-four. During the shoot, she invited Reagan to see a screening of her recent film, Granny Get Your Gun (1940). "An amusing little trifle," she told him, and he agreed.

She claimed that there was a certain irony in her appearance in Million Dollar Baby. "I feel I've made this movie in reverse. In 1932, I starred in a film called If I Had a Million. I played the resident of an old folks' home who suddenly gets a new lease on life when I'm given a check for one million big ones from a dying business tycoon. Now, in your movie, I'm playing a dying lady dispensing a million—you figure."

Reagan had not gotten to know Johnny Sheffield when he'd played the childhood version of the title character in Knute Rockne—All American the year before. But he made it a point to meet and talk to the ten-year-old on the set of Million Dollar Baby, where he'd been assigned the minor role of Alvie Grayson.

His father had once read in the Hollywood Reporter an article entitled "Have You a Tarzan Jr. in Your Backyard?" Reginald Sheffield felt that his son, Johnny, fitted the bill, physique and all, and arranged for an interview for him to appear as the adopted son of Tarzan in the next jungle movie, starring Johnny Weissmuller and Maureen O'Sullivan.

During the audition, Weissmuller selected Johnny from among 300 juvenile actors interviewed. He soon appeared as "Boy" in Tarzan Finds a Son (1939). That same year, Sheffield also starred with Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney in Babes in Arms.

It was bound to happen that a fellow actor would eventually transmit gossip about Jane Wyman to her husband, Ronald Reagan. The comic actor, Walter Catlett, had recently appeared in Bad Men of Missouri with Jane. A heavy drinker, he always carried around a secret flask, although his large consumption of alcohol never seemed to interfere with his work. He was living proof that the art of gossip wasn't confined to women.

One day, he cornered Reagan during a break in filming, claiming, "I want to speak to you man to man. I promised Jane I wouldn't squeal on her, but I was never good at keeping a secret. I think a husband should know what a wife is up to so he can put a stop to it."

"And what is this hideous secret?" Reagan asked. "She's a Nazi spy? A lesbian in the closet?"

"I hate to be the bearer of bad news, but Jane is slipping around seeing John Payne on the side. I know. I arranged a rendezvous between them during our last picture together."

Swinging on a vine, Johnny Weissmuller teaches Johnny Sheffield how it's done.

In private, they became "Big John" and "Little John," and developed a strong affection for each other during the decade in which they made eight Tarzan movies together, including Tarzan Finds a Son (1939).

Reagan looked stunned. "Spare me—I don't really want to know the details."

"I'm sorry I had to tell you that, but I got fed up reading in all those fan magazines about what a perfect couple you guys were," Catlett said. "If you confront her, don't let her know that I was the one who let the cat out of the bag."

"I won't," Reagan said. "Actually, I don't plan to confront her at all. Jane's business is her own."

"You're a very understanding husband—far more than I would be," Catlett said. "If I found out that my wife was cheating on me, I'd beat the shit out of her."

"I'm sure you would," Reagan said before walking away.

Two days later, when Betty Grable called to confirm a Saturday afternoon date, he went to it, as he'd later confide to Dick Powell, "with less guilt than before."

Over drinks on Betty Grable's terrace, Reagan laughed at the title of her latest movie, Hot Spot, co-starring Victor Mature and her nemesis, Carole Landis. It was based on a novel, I Wake Up Screaming, by pulp fiction writer Steve Fisher.

"I can't believe the Breen Office is letting Fox get away with a title like that. Guys all over the country will be making jokes. Do you play the title role of Hot Spot?"

[Reagan was right. Producer Darryl F. Zanuck ordered the title of Fisher's novel restored. Although the posters had already been printed defining the film's name as Hot Spot, it was retitled I Wake Up Screaming after violent objections from the Legion of Decency.]

At one point, publicly and on the set, Grable and Landis had become embroiled in a hair pulling catfight until they were separated by Mature. "Not only is the blonde whore my worst enemy," Grable told Reagan. "She and I are sharing the sexual favors of Victor."

"I'm surprised you're making such a stark drama," he said. "No song-and-dance numbers?"

"My mother wants me to take my place up there with the marquee drama queens— Barbara Stanwyck, Joan Crawford, and Bette Davis. But Zanuck figures I'd better stick to musicals. In fact, many fans came to see Hot Spot thinking it was a musical."

"Landis won't shut up bad mouthing me," Grable continued. "She's played third lead in two of my recent pictures, not only Hot Spot but Moon Over Miami. The hooker is telling everyone that she's stolen both pictures right out from under me."

Grable tossed Reagan a copy of a newspaper with a column by Jimmy Fiddler. I tread: "20th Century biggies are boasting that if any of their singing stars go temperamental, they have an ace in the hole—Carole Landis, who has been improving her fine natural voice by industrious study."

Grable also showed him a copy of American Magazine. "Though Carole has appeared in big roles in only four pictures, she has been dubbed by columnists from coast to coast as Hollywood's top glamour girl with the most gorgeous figure in moviedom."

"What does that make me?" Grable demanded to know. "Chopped liver?"

"You have a unique talent," Reagan told her, "and you need to concentrate on it and develop it. You can never escape competition. The same is true at Paramount and especially at MGM. At Warners I've got plenty of competition. Right now, Jeffrey Lynn is breathing down my neck, wanting parts assigned to me. And I want the roles given to George Brent. That's how studio politics work."

"After divorcing Jackie Coogan, I was looking forward to my new life as a swinging bachelor gal, but it has its dark side. I'm doing a lot better than Jackie. I don't think he's worked since we did Million Dollar Legs (1939). We're still friends. But both of us agreed that ours was just a childhood affair—we were too young to settle down. Unlike me, this former child star isn't finding any demand for his services. He claims that his fickle public couldn't stand for him to ever grow up."

Sexual innuendo, censorship, film noir, Betty Grable, A corrupt NYPD, and Victor Mature

"I think the same thing will happen to ShirleyTemple," he answered. "She lacks the talent to endure as an adult star."

After Reagan had helped cool Grable's rage about Landis, he suggested they go inside. Over a second drink, he confessed that he'd learned that Jane was having an affair with John Payne, with whom Grable had worked before.

She did not look surprised. "John and I had an affair when we made Tin Pan Alley (1940), and, years before that, we were a singing duet on a 15-minute daily show for CBS. Like you and Jane, John and that wife of his, Anne Shirley, are written up as 'The Perfect Couple,' but we both know that that isn't true. Both of them cheated on each other all the time."

"John plans to do what Gable did at MGM—that is, seduce all the beautiful leading ladies like you did at Warners. Not just me, but Linda Darnell, too. Now, he's making Sun Valley Serenade. When she's not on her skates, Sonja Henie summons him to do the dirty deed. I suspect he's already had Alice Faye, and he's got Gene Tierney in his sights right now, too. His thing with your Jane will be over before it really begins."

"I certainly hope so," he said. "I'm worried. Payne is a tough act to follow. I have doubts I can't satisfy Jane the way he does."

"Have no doubts," she assured him. "You do just fine. That reminds me." She got up and excused herself, appearing fifteen minutes later in a see-through black négligée. "Let's quit talking about all these other hunks and hussies, and get down to the main attraction of this fast-fading afternoon—you and me, baby!"

After the longest kiss (upper photo) in cinematic history until then, Jane told her leading man, Regis Toomey (lower photo), "Don't even think about ever trying that again."

Jane would later remember her 1941 film, You're In the Army Now, because of one scene with the Pittsburgh-born actor, Regis Toomey, who played her love interest, Captain Radcliffe. They indulged in what had been until then the longest kiss in cinematic history, lasting three minutes and five seconds, or four percent of the film's duration.

She later told Reagan, "Thank god our director, Lewis Seiler, didn't call for retakes. Regis had bad breath. He must have eaten skunk meat for supper. The sacrifices I make for my career!"

Alerted the day before the kissing scene was to be filmed, Reagan appeared on the set as an observer. Jane complained that his presence there made her uncomfortable, but her husband handled it very well, according to Toomey. At the end of the liplock, Reagan approached Toomey. "I didn't know if he was going to punch me in the nose—or what. Actually, he was quite friendly and shook my hand. He said, 'How did you get Jane to sit still that long'?"

Betty Grable, the #1 pinup girl in the world.

The film dealt with a timely topic. President Franklin D. Roosevelt knew that the United States would eventually enter World War II, and he had re-in-stated the draft. It became the topic of the day, as young men throughout the nation speculated on getting drafted and how it would disrupt their lives, or even end their lives.

Warners had cast Jimmy Durante and Phil Silvers as Jeeper Smith and Breezy Jones, two vacuum cleaner salesmen who accidentally get inducted into the Army.

Jane played "Bliss Dobson," the daughter of Colonel Dobson (Donald MacBride), who is opposed to Jane dating Toomey. Her leading man had started out in romantic roles in 1929. His scenes with Jane would virtually be the last of those kind of parts, as he'd soon switch to character roles minus his toupée.

Emerging from the streets of the Lower East Side of New York, Jimmy Durante was known as "Schnozzola," because of his big nose. When Jane worked with him, he was one of the most popular comedians in America, known for his throaty way with a song, his jovial good spirits, his one-liners, and his clipped gravelly speech, along with his comic butchery of language, all of it delivered with a New York accent.

On the surface, Durante had a bubbling, upbeat personality, yet Jane sensed a deep sadness in him. Finally, he told her the bad news. A doctor had informed him that his wife, the former Jean Olson, whom he'd married in 1921, had a serious heart ailment and had only months to live.

Emerging from Brooklyn, the son of Russian Jews, Phil Silvers was hailed as "The King of Chutzpah." A veteran of vaudeville and burlesque, he'd been appearing on stage since the age of eleven. Jane found him "all frantic schtick, acting with buffoonish, idiotic behavior, even stealing scenes from Durante."

Although the film clearly belonged to Durante and Silvers, within its context, Jane had at least one moment in the spotlight, including the long kiss.

In a sexy dress that revealed her legs—and as Silvers claimed, "she has beautiful gams"—Jane sang "I'm Glad My Number Was Called" for a USO show. She was followed by Silvers, who, as Jeepers, performs an Apache Dance.

His comic behavior was just a front he put up. She discovered that most of the time, he suffered from a deep depression. Sometimes he had to be physically dragged out of his dressing room to perform on camera. He always managed to pull himself together to go through his routine.

Jane had no trouble working with Seiler again. He'd directed her in He Couldn't Say No (1938), and he'd also helmed Reagan in Hell's Kitchen (1939). He told her how sorry he was that the public didn't line up to see the other film he'd directed, Tugboat Annie Sails Again (1940), in which he'd cast Reagan and Jane as a screen team. "This new picture is a cinch," he told her. "Silvers and Durante will direct themselves."

Jane reported to work every day, but often was not needed, since Silvers and Durante were monopolizing most of the scenes—two comedians and an Army tank.

Seiler noted that during the movie's shooting, John Payne paid many visits to Jane's dressing room. She was getting to know the handsome actor, and liked what she learned.

"Before hitting pay dirt at Fox, where they are building me up as a big star, I drifted around Paramount and also Warners," he said. "They didn't know what to do with me."

In 1940 alone, Payne had been cast in six films at Fox, including Star Dust, in which Linda Darnell had made her screen debut, and The Great Profile, in which John Barrymore spoofed himself during his dying days.

"Like most Hollywood hunks, John is worried that he'll be sucked up into the war," Jane told Paulette Goddard.

"If we go to war, I'm going to enlist in Army pilot training, and I hope I'll be stationed in Long Beach, so I can continue seeing you," he'd told Jane.

"Instead of Errol Flynn, I get Phil Silvers (left), 'the King of Chutzpah,' and Jimmy Durante (right), 'Schnozzola,' as my leading men," Jane (center) said. "How lucky can a gal get?"

She said to Goddard, "John does not take acting very seriously. He views it merely as a fun job with good pay."

"A lot of people seem to think he's just a pretty boy with a lot of gals fluttering around him, but he's a real gentleman with a serious side," Jane said. "He's much deeper than people think or the roles he plays. I mean, he reads philosophy, stuff like that."

"I've fallen into the Robert Taylor category at MGM," he told Jane. "Fox is building me up as the studio's pretty boy, their rival to Taylor."

When Jane poured out her feelings to Lucille Ball, the actress said, "You sound like you're in love."

"I am," Jane said, "but in John's case, love and marriage don't necessarily go together. He told me that when he divorces that Anne Shirley thing, he may never marry again. But then again, he might. He seems very confused. Do you think I should continue sleeping with John and betraying Ronnie?"

"Get it while you can, honey," Ball responded. "That's what I do, since Desi [Arnaz] is always on the road. I'm sure he knocks off a piece or two in every town in which he appears."

When You're In the Army Now was released, Jane didn't expect good reviews, knowing that all the attention would be devoted to the manic comedy of its male leads. One reviewer did single her out, however, citing her for "playing a piquant, saucer-eyed good sport, looking like she was having some fun." For the most part, the movie was attacked for its heavy slapstick and corny situations.

A week later, Lloyd Bacon, the director, called her. "In our last picture, Olivia (De Havilland) had the female lead, but in my new picture, Larceny, Inc. (1942). I'm giving the female lead to you. You're going to be the leading lady to Edward G. Robinson."

"In my last picture, I had a record-breaking kiss of three or so minutes. If you're telling me I've got to kiss Ol' Liver Lips for that long, I'm walking."

"It's not that kind of picture," Bacon said. "Show up on the set at 7AM tomorrow morning."

Before the final casting of Casablanca (1942), many actors were suggested. The drama had originated as an unpublished play, Everybody Comes to Rick's. Stephen Karnot, the first reader at Warners, had suggested for the male lead (Rick Blaine), either Humphrey Bogart, James Cagney, or George Raft, with Mary Astor cast in the female lead.

The story was set in that Moroccan city of mystery, Casablanca, the action occurring after the fall of France, as refugees from that Nazi-occupied country gathered there, many of them waiting for exit visas.

Karnot called it “sophisticated hokum,” but predicted, “It will play.” Based on his favorable report, Jack Warner agreed to pay $20,000 for the adaptation, the highest amount ever paid for an unproduced play.

When the director, Michael Curtiz, read the first draft of the script, he thought that the role of Rick would be a good vehicle for Raft. The actor read the script and immediately rejected the role. He said he was tired of playing gangsters and that in his past, Rick had been a hoodlum.

As for Hal B. Wallis, after he reviewed the script, and as he was mulling over which actors might populate it, he sent out a “trial balloon,” a list of candidates. It was published in newspapers nationwide on January 5, 1942. His tentative cast nominated Ronald Reagan as Rick, Ann Sheridan as Ilsa, and Dennis Morgan as Victor Laszlo, the Czech freedom fighter.

[When he was in the White House, Reagan was asked if he had ever been offered the role of Rick. “It appeared as an item in The Hollywood Reporter*,” he answered, “but I don’t recall ever seriously being offered the part.”*

When Ann Sheridan was asked about it, she said, “The female lead was originally to have been that of an American heiress, but the writers turned her into a Europeanwoman. I was never formally offered the role.”

We remember it well—Casablanca: “We’ll always have Paris.” Depicted above, Ingrid Bergman and Humphrey Bogart.

Morgan corroborated his colleagues’ statements, saying, “I was never asked to play Victor Laszlo.”

As for Raft, although some movie writers claim that he was never offered the role of Rick, Raft’s biographer, James Robert Parrish, wrote, “Warners decided to test Raft in a more or less ‘straight’ role, that of Rick Blaine, ex-smuggler and present café owner. World War II had dampened the gangster film cycle (or, more correctly, Adolf Hitler and crew becoming the new gangsters). Raft rejected the role, reportedly because he did not like the taint of ex-gangster.”

Years later, at a casino in London, Raft—who was fully aware of Hollywood commentators who claimed that he was never offered the role of Laszlo—was asked about his inclusion in the list of possible contenders for the role of Rick in Casablanca*. In response, he asserted, “Warners wanted me to play Rick, and I turned them down. Anybody who says that isn’t true is a god damn cunt!”]*

Before shooting began, Wallis changed his mind, recasting the roles with Bogie, In-grid Bergman, and Paul Henreid as the three main protagonists.

Hedy Lamarr had lobbied for the role of Ilsa, but MGM would not release her. Actually, Bergman had not wanted the role, viewing it as a B picture, little realizing that she was the star of a movie that would be hailed as the greatest ever made, even better, in the eyes of many critics, than Orson Welles’ Citizen Kane.

When Casablanca was released in November of 1942, Reagan expressed his regrets to Dick Powell that he never got to play Rick. He stood idly by, looking on in envy as the role of Rick became a personal triumph for Bogie, establishing him as a romantic star and not just a screen villain. Casablanca brought him his first Oscar nomination, and also made him the reigning male star at the studio, “The King of Warner Brothers.”

To his regret, Reagan ended up assigned instead to a routine sixty-three minute programmer, Nine Lives Are Not Enough (1941), to be directed by the London-born A. Edward Sutherland.

At first, he was delighted to learn that Jane Wyman would be his leading lady, but he was later informed that she’d been assigned to another picture.

Reagan’s first question was, “Who is going to be my new leading lady?” He was told it would be the very beautiful Joan Perry, the Florida-born New York City model, a career which had led to a Hollywood contract with Columbia 1935. She had previously appeared with such actors as Melvyn Douglas, Lew Ayres, and Ralph Bellamy. But her biggest coup involved receiving a proposal of marriage from the studio boss, the much-feared Harry Cohn.

During the hour that the film’s director, A. Edward Sutherland, spent with Reagan on the first day, he talked more about himself than he did Reagan’s upcoming role. Arriving in Hollywood from England, he’d appeared as a bungling police officer in Tillie's Punctured Romance (1914), starring Charlie Chaplin, Mabel Normand, and the formidable Marie Dressler. Sutherland had become known for directing comedians, claiming, "I'd rather dine on tarantula than make another movie with Stan Laurel." However, he got along with the acerbic W.C. Fields.

Among Sutherland's five wives was the legendary Louise Brooks (1926-1928). During their tumultuous marriage, both of them were known for numerous affairs on the side.

Finally, Sutherland, who had been a protégé of Chaplin, got around to giving Reagan his overall direction as the newspaper reporter, Matt Sawyer, in Nine Lives Are Not Enough. "Play the role with a flip brashness. You know, the aggressive reporter with his hat resting on the back of his head. You can be resourceful and come up with some moves on your own. Play it frantic, like you're always in a jam. But, remember, you always land on your feet."

"With those directions, I should surely win an Academy Award nomination," Reagan said, sarcastically.

He studied his script. As a reporter for "The Daily News," he is known around the office as the "Boy Crusader." He is constantly getting into trouble with his tough boss, Howard da Silva. Reagan writes an exposé of a local mob boss (Ben Welden), but the gangster clears his name and files a libel suit against the paper.

Enraged, Da Silva demotes Reagan to the police beat, and threatens to assign him to writing the lonely hearts column if he slips up again.

Reagan makes the nightly rounds with two policemen (James Gleason and Edward Brophy) in their patrol car. Reagan particularly liked working with Gleason, who was also a playwright and screenwriter. He always played tough but warmhearted characters. Known as the master of the double-take, he was bald, with a loud, craggy voice.

According to the plot, during their patrol one night, Reagan and the cops discover the body of a missing millionaire. Reagan, as journalist, writes it up for his paper as a murder, although the coroner rules it as a suicide. Once again, Reagan is in trouble with Da Silva, who fires him.

He is determined to prove it was murder, and he enlists the help of the slain millionaire's daughter (played by Joan Perry in her role of Jane Abbott.)

Complications ensue, but in the end, Reagan discovers that it was murder after all. In the meantime, Perry falls in love with Reagan and marries him. She also buys the Daily News for him. His first move as its new owner involves assigning Da Silva the lonely hearts column.

Reagan with Joan Perry in Nine Lives. Before filming began, Reagan received a memo from Harry Cohn, the mogul who ran Columbia: "Hands off Joan. Got that, Reagan?"

During filming, actress Faye Emerson, cast as Rose Chadwick, paid special attention to Reagan, although he more or less ignored her. He would later regret that.

As he told Dick Powell, "I wish I had sucked up more to Faye. She was divorcing her first husband, William Crawford. How did I know that within months, she'd be married to Elliott Roosevelt and would move into the White House. If I had become a close friend of hers, I, too, would have been a frequent visitor to the White House, advising Franklin Roosevelt on how to conduct the war."

The character played by Reagan didn't like Da Silva in his screen role, and Reagan, as a private individual, detested him in private. The actor had just completed Bad Men of Missouri (1941) with Jane, Like Walter Catlett, who had blabbed to him about Jane and John Payne, Da Silva was also a nasty gossip. He and Reagan got into several bitter political arguments. Although still a liberal Democrat, Reagan viewed Da Silva as a card-carrying communist.

Concealed behind the draperies in Nine Lives: Reagan, playing a nosy reporter ("Give me the City Desk") looks unpresidential.

[Da Silva was later blacklisted by the House Committee on Un-American Activities. After that, he was unable to find work in the movies or on television.]

One day, after Reagan had angered Da Silva, he struck back. "When I made Bad Men of Missouri with your wife, she spent more time with Dennis Morgan than she did before the camera. You'd better check to see what's going on. Sometimes, a husband is the last to know."

Coming so soon after the equivalent allegation about Jane and John Payne, Reagan became deeply depressed, trying to convince himself that Da Silva was a liar.

In the middle of the shoot, Jane invited Joan Blondell and Dick Powell for dinner. They were obviously having their own marital difficulties.

Blondell recalled, "I sensed that Ronnie was greatly depressed. He was polite and he even told a few jokes, but he kept looking at Jane when she wasn't looking back. It was like he was studying her with a questioning look on his face. I suspected that some nasty little shit had been spreading gossip about Jane. But he had his own guilt. I'd heard through the grapevine that he was slipping around knocking off a piece here and there. Dick was doing the same with me. I just brushed off his infidelities. I referred to arrangements such as ours as a typical Hollywood marriage."

James Gleason: Played tough guys or cops, always with a suspicious whine in his voice.

Cast in a small role as a mechanic, John Ridgely had appeared with Reagan in Secret Service of the Air (1939) and with Jane in He Couldn't Say No (1938). Now, he observed Reagan closely, sensing something was wrong. "He had changed," Ridgely said. "He seemed depressed, and his heart wasn't in his work. I felt he was going through marital troubles, like most couples do after they get hitched. He also talked about the draft, wondering if he'd be called up. Because of his bad eyesight, he couldn't fight on the front lines, but he might end up in some desk job. With his contact lenses, he could always push papers."

During the shoot, Reagan spent most of his time with Joan Perry. The two bonded and often had lunch together, but it wasn't a case of "Leadinglady-itis."

He knew that Perry was marrying one of the most powerful figures in Hollywood. He feared that Jack Warner might not renew his contract, and that he might find himself pounding on the door of Columbia, looking for work.

The way he figured it, if he were a close friend of Harry Cohn's new wife, he'd have a better chance of getting a contract with that studio.

To his surprise, he found that Perry had also been announced as the leading lady in his next picture, [The title of that film, originating as Eagle Squadron and later changed to Flight Patrol, would eventually be released in 1941 as International Squadron.]

John Ridgely: He found the future president "a troubled soul."

As regards his acting technique in Nine Lives Are Not Enough, Reagan had taken Sutherland's advice. One critic defined his performance as "helter-skelter."

The film had taken just twenty-two days to shoot, and Jack Warner had ordered the rough cut sent to his office for a screening. In a somewhat confusing memo, he claimed that Nine Lives Are Not Enough was "a peachy picture." But then he wrote, "I have about a half dozen more revamping shots, inserts, and effects to put in, and I cannot understand why they were not done in the first place, especially in the off-scene fight where Reagan slugs the newspaper reporter and throws him off-scene. Undoubtedly, they had mufflers on their black jacks."

Warner also said that he detested the title Nine Lives Are Not Enough, since it had little connection to the plot. He promised he'd send over a new title, but he never did.

Reviews were tepid, as were attendance and box office receipts. One critic called the film, "a mystery-comedy —and not much of either."

In a Manhattan night club, in 1935, a beautiful model, Betty Miller, 21, danced by the table of Harry Cohn, aged 44, the chief honcho at Columbia pictures. Miller was in the arms of another man, but Cohn was intrigued by her striking figure.

As a fast worker, he offered her a Hollywood contract before the night was over, telling her "to dump that faggot you're with."

When she reached Hollywood, she found that he was in the process of trying to divorce his first wife, the former Rose Barker, whom he had married in 1923. Cohn personally drove Miller to Columbia, where he ordered both makeup and wardrobe to transform her natural beauty into something very glamorous for her screen test. He approved the test himself, and the newly re-christened "Joan Perry" found herself co-starring in The Case of the Missing Man (1935) opposite Roger Pryor. Cohn had told her that "Betty Miller" was too commonplace. "Sounds like a cobbler's daughter."

Perry moved in with Cohn long before his divorce was finalized. They lived together on Lexington Drive in Beverly Hills. After marrying her on July 30, 1941, at the St. Regis Hotel in Manhattan, he returned with her to their home in Hollywood. Now that she was his bride, they began to entertain the Hollywood elite, including Louis B. Mayer, Irene Dunne, Katharine Hepburn, Mae West, Cary Grant, even Sabu and Humphrey Bogart.

On the set of Nine Lives Are Not Enough, Perry invited Reagan and Jane to one of her fabulous dinner parties. As a stunning hostess, she appeared in a gown designed by Jean Louis of the Columbia Wardrobe department. She presided at one end of the table, with Cohn at the other end. Placed on either side of him were phones which were constantly ringing.

After dinner, Reagan joined Cohn in his library, where the male guests gathered for cigars and brandy. Perry was entertaining the women guests, including an emerging star, Rita Hayworth, in the adjoining saloon.

"Did Joan tell you?" Reagan asked Cohn. "She's starring in my next picture, Flight Patrol."

“I prefer for you to refer to her as Mrs. Cohn,” he said.

In spite of that slight embarrassment, Reagan was amused by Cohn, who seemed more well-versed in Hollywood legend and lore than anybody he’d ever met.

Before meeting Cohn, Reagan had heard many stories about him. He’d been born in 1893 into a working class Jewish family in New York City. Eventually, he landed in Hollywood and helped open Columbia Pictures on Poverty Row. His fortunes changed after the release of It Happened One Night (1934), a Frank Capra comedy starring Clark Gable and Claudette Colbert. The picture swept up five major Oscars at the Academy Awards ceremony that year.

Behind his back, Cohn was derisively called “White Fang,” ruling like a tyrant, and presiding over Columbia like it was his own private police state.

Perry had admitted to Reagan that her new husband had a personality like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. He was loud, brash, and had an intimidating personality. On his desk rested an autographed portrait of Mussolini, which he’d obtained in Rome during a visit there in 1933.

He was also known for demanding sex from his starlets as part of their employment. Over the years, he would seduce an array of established actresses, starlets, and extras, often deflowering A-list stars who included Marlene Dietrich, Marilyn Monroe, and Lucille Ball.

Joan Perry (aka Betty Miller, aka Mrs. Harry Cohn).

He maintained a secret passageway that led directly from his office into a dressing room filled with starlets, in a style something akin to a harem.

Everyone in Hollywood had an opinion about Cohn, usually negative. Hedda Hopper told Reagan, “He’s a man you stand in line to hate.”

Director Elia Kazan asserted, “Cohn is the biggest bug in a pile of horse shit.”

In the library of his home, Cohn put his arm around Reagan and whispered in his ear, “Let me tell you about Hollywood: It’s all about horses and cunt.”

Reagan later recalled him: “Cohn was a great vulgarian, but at moments he had a certain charm. To him, all women were broads who could be had. At one point during our dinner party, when he cornered my Jane, he told her, ‘If that Reagan boy can’t satisfy you, you’re looking at a man who can.’ On that very night, he told me, ‘I kiss the feet of talent. I won’t be kissing your feet, Reagan.’”

Above is the logo/avatar inspired by the physicality of Mrs. Harry Cohn. It became recognizable throughout the world. Hail Columbia!

That night, he also told Reagan that he'd seen him only once on the screen—and that was with Bette Davis in Dark Victory (1939). "You were supposed to be playing a homo, but you didn't do it right. In that bar scene with Bette, when you held up your drink to your mouth, you should have raised your little pinkie. That way, you'd signal the audience that you were a homo."

"I didn't see the role that way," Reagan protested.

"Bullshit!" Cohn said. "Edward Everett Horton could have given you lessons in how to play a fag."

He told Reagan that long after she'd been a silent screen goddess, Gloria Swanson arrived at Columbia with two screen treatments she wanted him to produce. "I scanned both of them and turned each of them down. Three weeks later, the little over-dressed dwarf arrived with another screen treatment, which she insisted on reading to me, all twenty-five pages of it. I found it far too depressing, about a heroine who goes blind at the end of the picture. You guessed it. I turned down Dark Victory."

Before Reagan left Cohn's home at around midnight, the drunken mogul approached him. "I know you'll be working with Mrs. Cohn again, and that you'll be in close proximity to her, perhaps even playing love scenes. I also know what can happen when a hot-to-trot stud like you meets a horny broad like my young wife."

"I assure you, Mr. Cohn, I'll be a perfect gentleman," Reagan said. "You can count on that. Any love scene between us will be strictly in the script."

"Thanks for that," he answered. "It's not just having my wife cheat on me. It's a health issue."

"I don't understand," Reagan said. "I'm not contagious."

"It's like this," Cohn said. "You guys with uncut dicks can cause a vaginal infection in women. Joan is used to clipped men like me. We Jews are a hell of a lot safer than you Protestant germ carriers."

Cast as "Denny Costello," Jane Wyman had the female lead in her latest movie, Larceny, Inc. (1942), wherein she played the adopted daughter of "Pressure" Maxwell (Edward G. Robinson).

They worked with three strong supporting players: Broderick Crawford as "Jug" Martin, a dim-witted gangster; Jack Carson as Jeff Randolf, a fast-talking salesman; and Anthony Quinn as the villainous gangster, Leo Dexter. Its plot was based on a Broadway play, The Night Before Christmas, by the distinguished humorist, S.J. Perelman, although this comedy-drama was not one of his greatest achievements.

Its director, Lloyd Bacon, welcomed Jane to the set and gave her a copy of the script, where she learned that Carson was the unlikely choice for her love interest. Bacon had most recently helmed Jane in Honeymoon for Three (1941).

The plot of Larceny, Inc. evokes Woody Allen's much later film, Small Time Crooks (2000). It spins around a supposed bank robbery that never quite comes off. A fellow inmate at Sing Sing, Dexter (Quinn) tries to intrigue Pressure (Robinson) and Jug (Crawford) into joining him in a bank robbery after their release from prison.

Pressure actually wants to purchase a dog-racing track in Miami with Jane, but the bank turns down his request for a loan. Along with Jug, he purchases a luggage shop next door to the bank. From the basement of the luggage store, they plan to dig a tunnel into the bank's vault.

In the meantime, a slick salesman (Carson) arrives to entice them into buying an inventory of fine luggage, wholesale, for their otherwise virtually empty store. Advertising gimmicks are devised by Carson to line up customers. Eventually, based on the spectacular success of his luggage business, Pressure decides to become legitimate and stops digging the tunnel.

Tension rises after Dexter (who's still in jail) hears that Pressure has "stolen" his idea about digging a tunnel, and that he'll pocket the money from its success. Vengefully, Dexter breaks out of jail, with the intent of extorting money from Pressure. Burglar alarms are set off, there's gunfire, a police raid, and the luggage store erupts into flames. Dexter is captured and returned to Sing Sing, Pressure rebuilds his store and becomes a mogul in the merchandising of luggage and a civic-minded patriarch. Jane and Carson end up in each other's arms.

Robinson told Jane that he had accepted the comic role of Pressure Maxwell to off set the tough guy image he'd established in his star-making role of "Rico" in Little Caesar (1931).

With the world at war, Warners was making fewer films. In 1942, Jane's only release was Larceny, Inc. In it, she was teamed with "tough guy" Edward G. Robinson. He turned out to be a man of culture, unlike his portrayals on screen.

Perhaps awed by his reputation, she was prepared not to like Robinson until she actually met him. In private, he was soft-spoken, cultured, and spoke seven languages. Born to Romanian Jews in Bucharest, he had emigrated to Manhattan, where he launched his acting career in Yiddish theater on the Lower East Side. His success in Little Caesar typecast him into gangster roles at Warners. His chief rivals for parts became George Raft, James Cagney, and Humphrey Bogart.

"Eddie wasn't the prettiest mug ever to appear on the screen, but I learned a lot from this sensitive, talented man," Jane recalled. "He was a real pro."

Larceny, Inc. Jane appears here with Jack Carson, marking the beginning of a long friendship.

He later said, “I found Jane a delight, totally professional and very pretty. I’m amazed that Jack Warner kept her dangling on the vine for so long before giving her a meaty roles like Ginger Rogers had in Kitty Foyle. Jane was one hell of a dame, who could do both serious drama and light comedy, each equally well.”

Although Robinson praised Jane’s talents to reporters, she was disappointed when he published his memoirs, All My Yesterdays in 1973. He didn’t even mention her. All he wrote about their film was this line: “Then back to Warners’ for Larceny, Inc.”

“Eddie had this pug face with a snarling, snapping delivery that I had a hard time keeping up with,” Jane later said. “He could play a milquetoast on occasion, although he excelled as a tough guy. No, he did not begin every sentence by saying, ‘See.’ I was a bit nervous working with him. When I met him, he’d just made Manpower (1941) with Marlene Dietrich. I could hardly imagine at the time that one day little ol’ me would be cast opposite the formidable ‘Kraut’ in a movie shot in London.”

Jack Carson, from the windswept plains of Manitoba, had made it to Hollywood, “kicking around” in movies since 1937. Usually, he was cast as an overbearing boor or some beefy lug, a hapless target of derision. But by the 1940s, he had been recognized by Warners as a first-rate comic actor who deserved better roles. At the time Jane met him, both of them were getting bigger parts. Between 1937 and ’38, Carson had appeared as a minor player in some two dozen films. Larceny, Inc. marked the first of several movies in which he would be cast with Jane.

Today, Carson is best remembered for his dramatic roles, including that of the rejected suitor to Joan Crawford in Mildred Pierce (1945), and the oafish brother of Paul Newman and the father of those “no-neck monsters” in Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1958) by Tennessee Williams, co-starring Elizabeth Taylor.

“Jane and I truly bonded,” Carson later said. “We’d both survived a lot of crappy movies, and she, like myself, was a real trouper. I was also the best friend of Dennis Morgan, and he truly adored her. The three of us often hung out together. I was used as the ‘beard’ to cover up their romance. I didn’t mind at all. I knew when I’d served my purpose. I’d frequently disappear into the night back in those days.”

“On the set, I had to watch Jane,” he said. “If not, she’d steal every scene we were in. I thought she had real potential. For all I know, one day she’d be the Queen of Warners after she dethroned Bette Davis. I knew she’d have to compete with Olivia de Havilland for the crown.”

According to Jane, the screen didn’t reveal just how big Carson was, standing 6’2” and weighing some 225 pounds. “Over the course of a life, he was married four times. At the time I met him, he was wed to Kay St. Germain Wells. [For many years, Kay was the radio voice of Elsie the Cow.] When they divorced in 1950, Jack indulged in some heavy dating with Doris Day and wanted to marry her. Day was also indulging in heavy dating with another divorced man I knew so very well—Ronnie himself. Doris dumped both Ronnie and Jack to marry Martin Melcher, and brother, did she live to regret that choice.”

Broderick Crawford: He had an unlikely look for a movie star.

Actress Helen Broderick's son, Broderick Crawford, was burly and brutish on the screen, but, in Jane's view, "a lovable lug off the screen." In 1937, he'd become famous for brilliantly playing Lennie in the Broadway production of Of Mice and Men. Ironically, and to his deep chagrin, he was not awarded that role in that drama's Hollywood remake in 1939. The role Broderick had developed (and coveted) went to Lon Chaney, Jr. instead.

"When Broderick and I used to go for a drink," Jane later reflected, we never thought for a moment that B picture stars like us would each end up one day winning an Oscar for Best Actor or Best Actress of the Year." [Cast as Willy Stark, a charismatic, rough-edged character based on the crooked Louisiana politician, Huey Long, All the King's Men (1949) would bring Crawford a Best Actor Oscar.]

During the filming of Larceny, Inc., Jane and Reagan invited Crawford to join them at a steak house, a style of restaurant he'd specifically requested. "That night, I saw the beginning of his downfall: Lots of liquor and heaps of food. I couldn't believe it. He ordered three big steaks cooked blood rare and told the waiter to keep his glass of liquor full at all times."

When Jane met Anthony Quinn, he'd just finished playing Chief Crazy Horse in They Died With Their Boots On (1941), starring Errol Flynn. Throughout his career, Quinn would not only play Indian chiefs, but Hawiian chiefs, Filipino Freedom fighters, Chinese guerillas, and, in Lawrence of Arabia (1962), a clever and dynamic desert sheik.

"A seductive bundle of impish charm," is how Jane described him. Born in 1915 during Mexico's revolution, Quinn had always claimed that whereas his mother was of almost pure Aztec descent, his father, Francisco (Frank) Quinn, had been the offspring of a Mexican mother and an Irish immigrant father from County Cork. Francisco Quinn had ridden with Pancho Villa, the Mexican revolutionary.

Quinn became the first Mexican-American actor to win an Oscar—in his case, in 1952 for his supporting role in Viva Zapata!. Marlon Brando, its star, lost the Oscar that year to Gary Cooper for his role in High Noon. Actually, Quinn had originally wanted to play Zapata, but director Elia Kazan preferred Brando.

On the set of Larceny, Inc., Quinn told Jane he was a master painter, and surprised her with his request to paint her in the nude. She politely refused, but he persisted. He told her that his painting would immortalize her the way Goya's The Naked Maja had done for the Duchess of Alba. Jane still refused.

"If you won't let me paint you in the nude, can I fuck you in the nude?" he asked.

"I must also turn down your gracious offer, your request put so delicately," she said.

In 1937, Quinn had married Katherine DeMille, the adopted daughter of Cecil B. De-Mille. He was never faithful to his wife. When he tangled with Jane, he was also having an affair with Rita Hayworth, his co-star in Blood and Sand (1941). Other recent conquests had included Mae West and Carole Lombard.

He'd told actress Ruth Warrick, "I want to impregnate every woman in the world." Years later, to author Darwin Porter, Warrick mused, "I didn't realize at the time how literally he meant that."

Evelyn Keyes, "Scarlett O'Hara's younger sister," said "There was simply too much of Tony. Yes, down there, too."

At the conclusion of filming of Larceny, Inc., Robinson threw a wrap party, and most of the stars and supporting actors showed up. Broderick Crawford arrived already drunk.

Quinn appeared to be suffering that evening from a deep depression. Speaking to her privately, he told Jane he'd be leaving the party soon. His two-year-old had drowned in the lily pond of his next door neighbor, W.C. Fields. After having a drink, and greeting the other guests, he quietly departed. She noticed tears running down his cheeks, and she ran out into the yard and embraced him warmly.

Robinson, the party's host, pointed out some of his choice paintings. She was very impressed with his knowledge of art, of which she knew virtually nothing.

Young Jackie Gleason..."How sweet it is!"

At the party, Jane made the rounds, talking with a Brooklyn-born actor, Jackie C. Gleason, who played a soda shop clerk in their film. "He told me he'd been born a pool hustler and a night club comic before trying to break into the movies," Jane said. "I found his brief role in our film uninspired, and I told him so. He said he was off to play Bogie's pal in a picture, All Through the Night (1941). I stupidly predicted he should try some field other than acting. How wrong I was! He did much better when he billed himself as Jackie Gleason."

As Reagan moved into production of the fourteen films he made that were released between 1940 and 1943, a Gallup poll conducted during the summer of 1941 placed him at number 82 in the roster of American box office attractions. The number one spot went to Clark Gable, largely because of the success of his portrayal of Rhett Butler in Gone With the Wind (1939), which, in 1940, was still playing in movie houses across America.

Much to her disappointment, Jane Wyman did not rank among the top one hundred box office draws.

As far as paychecks went, "The King" (Gable) made $210,000 per picture; Errol Flynn $157,000; and Reagan $52,000 per film.

A more in-depth survey of movie audiences found that Jack Warner's attempt to turn Reagan into a romantic lead had largely failed. Reagan's greatest fans were young men and boys eighteen and under, no doubt stemming from his roles as Secret Service agent, Brass Bancroft.

Surveys showed that one out of ten movie fans would go see a film if Reagan's name was on the marquee. In contrast, 30 to 40 percent of Americans asserted that they would go see any film starring Flynn.

Reagan was slightly more popular with women than with men. Most of them seemed to feel, "He's a Mr. Average Nice Guy, but he's no Adonis." One woman wrote, "I find his crinkly eyes and wide grin a good substitute for glamour."

One fan wrote, "My Mom would approve of him if I brought him home."

Another commented, "Ronald Reagan suggests home for Christmas, football games, summer jobs at gas stations, junior proms with white carnations, and a fraternity pin worn on a girl's sweater."

Responding to the polls, Reagan admitted, "I know I'm no Errol Flynn or Charles Boyer. A man doesn't have to stand out from his fellow man to make his mark in the world. Average will do."

Flight Patrol (whose name would later be changed to International Squadron; 1941) was Reagan's 27th film. When he asked its director, Lothar Mendes, the names of his leading ladies, it was confirmed that he'd be working with Joan Perry (Mrs. Harry Cohn) again. This time, she'd been reduced to fifth position in the star lineup. His other two leading ladies included Olympe Bradna and Julie Bishop, actresses unfamiliar to him.

Reagan was a bit leery of Berlin-born Mendes because he had a negative stereotype of German and Austrian directors, gained in part from the stormy legend of Erichvon Stroheim during the Silent era.

Mendes' most famous film was the 1934 Jew Süss. [In the U.S., it was released as Power—Jew Süss. That film, which condemned Nazi atrocities, is not to be confused with the notorious anti-Jewish film, Jud Süss (1940), which was commissioned by Josef Goebbels through the UFA Studios in Berlin.

Jew Süss was a British historical drama based on Lion Feuchtwanger's 1925 novel of the same name. It starred the German actor, Conrad Veidt, who later achieved screen immortality in Casablanca (1942).]

Screenwriters Kenneth Gamet and Barry Truivers met with Reagan to talk over how they had conceived his role of Pilot Jimmy Grant in International Squadron. "Grant is a cocky man, a real son of a bitch," Trivers said. "His devil-may-care attitude leads to the death of two of his comrades. This experience turns him from a trouble maker and a braggart into an aviator hero."

In the early part of the film, Grant appears as a playboy, a loner, full of bravado. Behind the wheel of a plane, he says, "I'm going to get this baby to six hundred (MPH) If I have to get out and push. I can fly any crate they give me."

As a Yank in war-torn Britain, he joins fellow pilots from such countries as Nazi-controlled Poland, Belgium, and Czechoslovakia. "Sounds had a Notre Dame back-field," Grant quips.

The dreaded Breen office raised objections to the first draft of the script, which depicted Grant (i.e., Reagan) as a fun-loving womanizer. No sweetheart of any pilot was safe from his amorous advances. Facing the objections, one of the producers, Edmund Grainger, ordered the writers to tone down the seductively manipulative aspect of Grant's character. As Grainger so graphically phrased it in a memo, "Don't have Reagan's tongue hanging out to lap pussy every time he sees a broad."

In its promotion of Reagan, Warners went to great lengths to portray Reagan as a great aviator, labeled in private and on the screen as an "unconquerable and intrepid pilot." For the release of International Squadron, the men in Warners' publicity department pulled out the stops, writing that "Reagan plays an avenging angel hurtling out of the heavens to shoot down Herman Göring's Luftwaffe pilots before they could bomb London." Another line associated with the role Reagan had been assigned shouted, "He is a man who lives only for today, because he might be placed in a hole in the ground tomorrow."

At the time America entered the war in December of 1941, Reagan was one of only a handful of men associated with valor in the air, even though his only experience in aviation had been faked in a movie studio. After one dreadful experience during a flight, he swore he'd never take another. Of course, by the time he became President of the United States in the 1980s, he had overcome that fear of flying he'd had as a young man.

In International Squadron, Reagan (as Jimmy Grant) plays a crack stunt pilot who accepts the job of delivering, transatlantic, a U.S. bomber to the embattled R.A.F. in war-torn Britain. After his successful arrival in England, he meets friends from the States, including squadron commander Charles Watt (James Stephenson) and Reg Wilkins (William Lundigan), another fighter pilot.

Reagan isn't interested in joining the R.A.F. until he witnesses a Luftwaffe air raid over London during the Battle of Britain. After he sees a child killed, he changes his mind and joins the Eagle Squadron, a British-sponsored air unit composed entirely of foreign fighters, including Americans, flying for Britain against the Nazis.

As described in a 1941 critique by The New York Times, "No ace among war films, it is none the less a brisk, brash flier in pulse-quickening entertainment…it is the familiar yarn of the cocky American [as played by Reagan] who joins the squadron, creates romantic havoc among his buddies' fiancées, and grows up after his breaches of discipline have cost the lives of two companions…Ronald Reagan is excellent as the slaphappy hell-diver who finally pays for his moral failures with his own death in combat."

Frank Wead, aviator, screen-writer, and critic of Reagan's reputation as an aviator.

A week into the shoot, Reagan learned that International Squadron was "the bastard copycat of an equivalent movie, Ceiling Zero (1935), that had starred two of his friends, James Cagney and Pat O'Brien. That picture had two starring male leads, each cast as a pilot. Originally, Jack Warner had wanted the script of International Squadron to have two male leads, Errol Flynn and John Wayne, each cast as a pilot. But when they weren't available, the script was refashioned to make Reagan, as a pilot, the sole male star.

Within ten days from the debut of shooting, Mendes visited Warner and complained to him about Reagan. "He's supposed to be so sexy that he creates havoc among the girlfriends of his fellow pilots. Flynn could have pulled off a role like that. But try as I might, I can't find any overpowering sex appeal in this Reagan boy. He's too clean cut, too American, the kind of guy you'd find coaching a Little League team."

The fabled aviator, Frank Wead, a stunt pilot turned screenwriter, had written the script for Ceiling Zero. During one of his visits to California, he visited Reagan on the set of International Squadron to see how this recycled version of his story was coming along. Based on Warners' flood of advance publicity, he just assumed that Reagan was a daring aviator like himself. With that preconceived notion in mind, he shared several long talks with him, discussing his own former exploits in the air.

Like Reagan, Wead was originally from Illinois. But, unlike Reagan, he was a bona-fide American aviation hero. During World War II, he had been promoted to the rank of commander.

As a screenwriter, Wead, in 1938, had received two Academy Award nominations, one for Best Original Story for Test Pilot, starring Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy, and a second for Best Screenplay for The Citadel with Robert Donat, Rosalind Russell, and Rex Harrison.

At one point, Wead invited Reagan to drive from Los Angeles south to San Diego with him so he could make a test flight, accompanied by Reagan, of an experimental Naval aircraft.

Reagan politely refused, claiming that Warners wouldn't permit him to take such a risk during the shooting of a movie.

Lovely and patriotic Julie Bishop, as portrayed by YANK magazine as one of their choices for Armed Forces "pinup girl" of 1944

Wead became very friendly with Reagan, proposing that the young actor should refer to him by his nickname of "Spig." Reagan later told Pat O'Brien, "Spig's life story should become the subject of a film, entitled Spig, about his life's involvement with aviation."

In International Squadron, Reagan was surrounded with an array of talented supporting players, including Julie Bishop, a California-born actress who'd begun making films in 1923. As a child, she'd appeared in Laurel and Hardy movies. During her work with Reagan, she would sign for roles in Princess O'Rourke (1943) with Olivia de Havilland, Robert Cummings, and Jane Wyman; and also with Humphrey Bogart in Action in the North Atlantic (also 1943).

Bishop would appear in a few more movies, including a role in The Sands of Iwo Jima (1949) as a down-on-her-luck waitress, with John Wayne, but that dream of a big career faded. In 1944, she married General Clarence A. Shoop, a test pilot for Howard Hughes who later became a vice president of Hughes Aircraft.

Perry was upset that the film's lead female role had gone to Olympe Bradna and not to her. The French dancer and actress was born in Paris, and Reagan found her an intriguing personality, the daughter of two world famous bareback riders. At the age of eight, she'd become a professional acrobatic dancer, later joining the Folies Bergère in Paris. After moving to Hollywood, she launched her film career in 1933, appearing over the years with such notables as Gary Cooper and George Raft.

Ironically, Bradna would pose no further career threat to Perry or to any other actress either. After she completed International Squadron, she retired from acting and settled into a marriage with Douglas Woods Wilhoit, CEO of the Stockton, California, Chamber of Commerce and a political appointee to the Juvenile Parole Board and the local Board of Corrections. After seventy years together, both of them died in 2012.

French-born Olympe Bradna, a former dancer at the Folies Bergére, being courted by "The Face of America" (Reagan) in International Squadron.

Before Bradna settled down with Wood, she had a final fling with Anthony Quinn, who had just made a movie with Jane. Although married to Katherine DeMille at the time, Quinn visited the set of International Squadron five times for rendezvous with Bradna. They had become romantically involved when they'd starred together in the 1941 Warners' movie, Knockout, which had cast Arthur Kennedy as a boxer.

Reagan had met Quinn at the home of Edward G. Robinson. Although he had only recently recovered from the drowning of his young son, he was back on his familiar circuit of seducing starlets.

One day, as he was leaving, Quinn spoke to Reagan. "I love my wife, as I know you love Jane—she's a dear—but speaking man to man, a guy like me has to have something on the side. It's my hot Latin blood."

"I understand," Reagan assured him.

By now, thanks to her wedding to studio autocrat Harry Cohn, Reagan's friend and third female co-star, Joan Perry, had become one of Hollywood's most gracious hostesses. Jane and Reagan were often invited to her formal dinners or cocktail parties. Sometimes, Jane would opt out, claiming, "I have to look after Maureen."

Reagan actually liked to arrive stag at Joan and Harry's parties, enjoying the flirtatious attention bestowed on him by such beautiful starlets as Rita Hayworth or the sultry Evelyn Keyes.

It was at the home of the Cohns that Reagan was introduced to some of the power brokers who would later lend him political and financial support during his bids for governorship of California and President of the United States.

On the set, Reagan sometimes lunched with Perry. One afternoon, she discussed her honeymoon with Harry Cohn. "I headed for the pool, and he told me he'd join me there. But when I got there, I realized I had forgotten my suntan lotion. I returned to the room to discover Harry fucking our very young Mexican maid."

"What did you do?" Reagan asked.

"I told them to carry on, as I went to the bathroom and retrieved my lotion, then headed back to the pool."

"That's what I call an understanding wife," he said.

"I knew about Harry's reputation before I married him, and I didn't think he would change after we exchanged our vows. You can't expect Harry to be faithful. I talked it over with Virginia Fox, who married Darryl Zanuck back in 1923. She told me she never expected Zanuck to be faithful, and I couldn't demand fidelity from Harry, either. We had to enjoy the money, the luxury, the power, and prestige of being married to a studio mogul, and we had to forgive their womanizing. Every day at the studio, Harry, at around noon, has what he calls a 'fuck break,' and he summons the starlet of his choice for an afternoon lay."

Reagan had worked previously with his co-star, James Stephenson, most recently in the final installment of the Brass Bancroft films, Murder in the Air.

He learned from Stephenson that he had signed to play the psychotic Dr. Gordon in Kings Row (1942), an upcoming picture in which Reagan also wanted to be cast. But on July 29, 1941, Reagan heard over the radio that Stephenson had died. He later recalled, "He was to have been the doctor who cut off my legs in Kings Row. But instead of him, Charles Coburn had to perform that sadistic act."

The handsome, blonde-haired actor, Helmut Dantine, born in Vienna, had a brief role in International Squadron. He'd already been assigned another part in the upcoming film, Casablanca (1942). In it, he'd appear as a desperate Norwegian newlywed gambling as a means of raising money for an exit visa out of Morocco.

Dantine told Reagan that since 1938, he'd been involved in the anti-Nazi movement in his native Vienna. When the Nazis took over Austria during their Anschlüss, he was arrested and imprisoned in a concentration camp outside Vienna. His father had used his influence to get him released, after which he'd fled to California.

Helmut Dantine, as a Nazi aviator in Mrs. Miniver.

In addition to his performance in Casablanca, he would also make a startling appearance as a Nazi soldier in Mrs. Miniver (1942) with Greer Garson.

Reagan renewed his friendship with William Lundigan, Errol Flynn's boyfriend, with whom he had worked on Santa Fe Trail.

When Reagan had lunch with him, the handsome young actor was very candid. "Errol treats me like a Saturday night pussy. He ignores me for days, then calls and expects me to come running, which I always do. He never treats me like an equal, but like some boy in his harem. Right now, he's seeing a lot more of Bruce Cabot than he is of me. He calls him 'Big Bruce,' for obvious reasons, I guess."

"I find Errol a bit hard to take," Reagan said.

"I find him hard to take, too," Lundigan said.

"I didn't mean it that way," Reagan said. "You boys always twist a man's words."

"Sorry…And by the way, I've got some news for you," Lundigan said. "It's been announced that Errol is going to make Desperate Journey (1942), an anti-Nazi movie. He asked Jack Warner to designate you as his co-star. He liked you a lot when we made Santa Fe Trail. In fact, he told me that he's going to get you yet. How do you think that makes me feel?"

"Rest assured," Reagan said. "I can fend off any advances from Mr. Flynn. He should know by now I don't go that route."

"Perhaps you will," Lundigan said. "Others, both men and women, have said that, but they finally collapse under Errol's charms. He's very persuasive. If his charm fails, he can revert to rape."

"I'll call for your help if he tries that," Reagan said.

One afternoon, Flynn arrived on the set and greeted Reagan. "How's about a kiss, sport?"

"Instead of that, how about a punch in the nose?" Reagan asked.

While waiting for Lundigan to complete a scene, Flynn was introduced to Dantine. As Reagan stood witnessing it, Flynn was instantly attracted to the Austrian actor, and made his intentions obvious. The young actor seemed mesmerized by Flynn, in a way that implied, according to Reagan, that Lundigan would suddenly face competition for Flynn's affections.

It came as no surprise, months later, when Dantine was announced as one of the supporting actors in Flynn's upcoming picture, Desperate Journey.

Tod Andrews was cast in International Squadron as a French pilot, the boyfriend of the character played by Bradna. In their movie, Andrews played a character named Michele Edmé. He liked the name so much, he changed his professional name to an English-language derivation of it, being henceforth known as "Michael Ames." Reagan would soon find himself competing with Ames for the role he wanted in Kings Row.

The brass at Warners' became upset at the slow pace of International Squadron, and Mendes was replaced by Lewis Seiler as director. He had previously helmed Reagan in Hell's Kitchen with the Dead End Kids. "I thought Mendes was a rough taskmaster, but Seiler, anxious to conclude filming on schedule, was reckless," Reagan said. "He almost caused me to go up in flames."

Reagan had requested a double for one or two of his character's dangerous stunts, but Seiler rejected his requests. In one scene unfolding inside the cockpit of a plane, Reagan was to set a mop on fire, open the cockpit's hood, and toss the blazing mop outside. That stunt was intended to incite Luftwaffe pilots into thinking that his plane was on fire and to move on to other targets.

Reagan ignited the mop. But then, when he tried to open the hood of the cockpit, it jammed, and the cockpit began filling up with flames and smoke. Two grips eventually forced the hood open and rescued him. Reagan was rushed to the hospital for treatment of smoke inhalation.

When he was released two days later, Seiler demanded that the scene be reshot immediately. Against his better judgment, Reagan performed the same scene with a new mop. This time, the scene went off without incident.

International Squadron bore remarkable similarities to 20th Century Fox's A Yank in the R.A.F. (1941), a "hero aviator" film co-starring Tyrone Power and Betty Grable.

Consequently, Darryl F. Zanuck at Fox wrote threatening letters to Jack Warner, accusing him of stealing the plot of A Yank in the R.A.F. "You're planning a low-budget picture to capitalize off the fame of our movie," Zanuck charged.

Warners' position was that International Squadron was a remake of its 1935 movie, Ceiling Zero. Consequently, they went ahead and released the Reagan film without going to court to defend it.

Upon the release of International Squadron, many reviewers hailed the movie as Reagan's best work to date, although he had little competition for that honor, considering the lackluster reviews generated by his previous string of B movies.

However, when the film was screened in England, some technically savvy members of the audience laughed. The "Spitfire" Reagan's character had piloted was nothing more than a doctored-up Ryan monoplane that didn't even have a retractable landing gear. In his memoirs, Reagan wrote that "people accepted our makeshift props with the same kindly understanding they gave the local high school play." In writing that, perhaps he didn't hear the mocking laughter that howled out of England at the time.

Patriotic Fervor: Tyrone Power with Betty Grable in Darryl Zanuck's sword-rattling answer (A Yank in the RAF) to Jack Warner's International Squadron.

Although America had not yet entered World War II, Jack Warner ordered major promotion of the film, knowing that audiences, except for "America Firsters" and German-Americans, were siding with the British.

International Squadron was blatantly anti-Nazi, a slant which censors interpreted as a flagrant violation of America's neutrality.

Warner wanted to promote Reagan as a star, with the understanding that if he was rejected by the Army because of his eyesight, he'd become the biggest star at Warners, especially in wartime movies about airplane pilots.

Ads for International Squadron proclaimed: "This is the role that zooms Ronald Reagan to the heights of stardom." History would demonstrate, of course, that that advertising slogan was a gross exaggeration.

Isolationists in Washington were outraged by the anti-German slant of International Squadron. Warners was accused of "war-mongering," and the Warner Brothers were specifically blamed as "Jews selfishly maneuvering American troops into World War II."

A politically motivated investigation was called. A Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate Commerce summoned Harry Warner to Washington for questioning. Since the release of Confessions of a Nazi Spy, Warners was considered the most anti-Nazi film studio in Hollywood.

Before the committee, Warner delivered an eloquent defense of his studio, claiming a responsibility to let the American public know about what was happening in Europe and the world. He said that of all the books published the previous year in America, seventy percent of non-fiction books were anti-Nazi, and ten percent of all fiction reflected the same point of view. He also claimed that ten percent of all film scripts submitted to Warners were virulently anti-Nazi.

But in early December of 1941, within days of the surprise Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, the committee's war-mongering charges against Warners were dropped. At that point, all Hollywood studios began churning out pro-America wartime propaganda films that were not only anti-Nazi, but anti-Japanese as well.

A sprinkling of snow early one morning hinted at a cold upcoming autumn in Dixon, Illinois. Louella Parsons set out with Ronald Reagan to celebrate "Louella Parsons Day" in their native town of Dixon, where both of them had grown up.

Seizing the moment, Jack Warner rushed an early cut of International Squadron to a movie theater in Dixon for a world premiere.

Using her power as a ruthless Hollywood columnist, Parsons rounded up a bevy of Hollywood stars, spearheaded by Bob Hope, to accompany Reagan and her on their tour of her native Midwest.

Others in her all-star troupe included the comedian Jerry Colonna, along with Ann Rutherford, who had played Scarlett O'Hara's sister, Coreen, in Gone With the Wind. The handsome leading man, George Montgomery, went along too, as did silent screen star, Bebe Daniels. She was accompanied by Ben Lyon, who had scored such a hit in the Howard Hughes production of Hell's Angels in 1930, the year in which he'd married Daniels.

Jane Wyman, recovering from minor surgery, was not able to make the trip, so Reagan's mother, Nelle, accompanied her son instead, lamenting, "I'm so sorry that Jack didn't live to see this day." Her husband (Reagan's father) had died that May.

To take over when Hope's humor failed him, comedian Joe E. Brown, Jane Wyman's least favorite film partner, also joined the troupe aboard the train heading east.

A few moments after the train's arrival at Dixon's railway station, Parsons stepped in front of a waiting microphone to deliver a "thank you, thank you, thank you," to the assembled crowd.

Then Hope claimed the microphone from her. "Ladies and gentlemen," he said. "Over there is the birthplace of your townswoman, Louella Parsons. Do you wonder that this glamour girl—ablaze with orchids, dressed to the teeth, bedecked and bejeweled— wants to forget it? Do you wonder that the little lady is overcome with emotion?"

Parsons was irritated at such an enigmatic and downbeat introduction, but flashed an insincere smile nonetheless.

A crowd of 50,000, many from neighboring homesteads and hamlets, had journeyed to Dixon to see the stars. A ten-block parade, with five bands and fifteen floats, was staged along the elm-lined Galena Street, the shop-flanked main artery of the little city. Parsons would recall the parade that seemed "to spin in my memory like a happy but dizzy dream."

She rode in an open convertible, waving her white-gloved hand to the bystanders in a style she'd lifted from watching newsreels of British royalty moving through the streets of London.

In all his Brylcreemed glory, Reagan rode in a separate car with a frail Nelle, as both waved to the crowds. The parade ended near Geisenheimers Department Store, where Parsons had once worked as a sales clerk in the corset department, merchandizing contoured undergarments to restrain the flesh of her corn-fed customers. This was near the old store where Jack Reagan had once fitted shoes onto local farmers who came from outlying fields into Dixon to shop.

Louella Parsons, accompanied by Ronald Reagan, returns to the little town of Dixon, where she once sold undergarments and corsets to farmers' wives.

Later, Parsons dedicated the Louella Parsons Children's Ward, a new facility within the town's Katherine Shaw Bethea Hospital.

The hospital visit was followed by speeches in the park. At the podium, Reagan delivered a rather long-winded speech, much to Parsons' obvious annoyance.

"I want all of you to know that I did not sleep last night, thinking of my trip back here, where I could meet old friends. I counted the seventy-seven persons whom I have been credited with pulling out of the Rock River at Lowell Park many times during the night."

Snapped in Dixon, and portraying a finger-pointing Ronald Reagan, the face of the mystery woman in the photo above is obscured in shadow.

Some newspapers labeled her as Louella Parsons; others as Nelle Reagan. You be the judge.

Then, Parsons managed to grapple the microphone from Reagan. Before that, Colonna had whispered in her ear, "Reagan thinks he's running for Congress."

Two hundred special guests were invited to a "rubber chicken" luncheon paid for by Warners. These box lunches were served on the lawn of Hazelwood, the Myrtle Walgreen estate.

In the afternoon, Reagan visited Lowell Park, where he discovered that the log on which he'd notched a record of the seventy-seven men and women he'd saved from the Rock River had washed away. At a ceremony, he was presented with a clock with the engraving, "From 77 Grateful People." Before the crowd, he said, "I came to know the victims better in five minutes than their mothers did in a lifetime."

Following a banquet at Dixon's Masonic Temple, a local movie house held the premiere of International Squadron, which, at its conclusion, received a standing ovation.

Parsons announced that director Frank Capra wanted Reagan to star in his upcoming film, Arsenic and Old Lace (1944). That role, however, was later awarded to Cary Grant. Parsons also announced that Jack Warner wanted Reagan to star in The Will Rogers Story. That didn't happen either.

[Ironically, a decade later, in 1952, The Will Rogers Story would be made, but its star was Will Rogers, Jr., playing opposite Jane Wyman, by then divorced from Reagan.]

Reporters from Hollywood interviewed the locals for firsthand memories of either Parsons or Reagan. Several women remembered Louella as "a silly romantic girl, a big sentimentalist with dreams of being a writer." Several recalled " her gooey personality." She had attended Dixon College followed by a year of teaching in a country school. Later, she worked part time as a reporter on the Dixon Star.

Biographer Edmund Morris rounded up some opinions of Reagan at the time: "Loves to talk, hates to listen. Exaggerates his college football prowess. Dislikes tennis and tomatoes. Combs his hair the wrong way. Keeps on his shoes as he undresses. Also keeps a scrapbook of flattering news clips of himself. Nurses a beer longer than Carrie Nation. Likes Bing Crosby and macaroni and cheese. Steals jokes from George Burns and Jack Benny. Dick Powell and some Republicans want him to run for Congress on their ticket, but Reagan remains a passionate New Dealer."

A reporter for the Dixon Star wrote: "If beauty-starved Dixonians were looking forward to ogling Ronald Reagan's curvaceous wife, they were doomed to disappointment. Instead of an eyeful of Jane Wyman, they got an earful of Louella Parsons." Newspapers proclaimed that Louella Parson's Day generated more excitement than did the parade dedicated to Charles Lindbergh when the fabled aviator visited Dixon. All media hailed the rags-to-riches story of both Parsons and Reagan, citing them "as typically American Sunday supplement heroes."

On a broadcast over CBS's Chicago affiliate, Reagan proclaimed that the event in Dixon "fulfilled a dream which probably every boy has at some time—that of coming home and being acclaimed by the local folks."

After recovering from minor surgery (a curettage), Jane Wyman reported to work as a loan-out to RKO. Her next picture, a vehicle for bandleader and singer Kay Kyser, was entitled My Favorite Spy (1942), a comedy caper revolving around Nazi spies working undercover in America. After reading the script, she was displeased with her role, regarding the film as a vehicle for the musician. "I'm just the blonde fluff," she claimed in a call to Reagan.

"So what else is new?" he asked her.

During her brief stint in the hospital, she'd been discreetly visited, on separate occasions, by both John Payne and Dennis Morgan. They brought flowers and well wishes, and Payne even talked about the possibility of marriage if they ever divorced their respective spouses.

In response, she told him she had no intention of divorcing Reagan. "But check with me later," she said. "I might change my mind."

Morgan, as he'd told her before, never planned to divorce his wife, but preferred their present sexual arrangement. Jane seemed in agreement.

During his final visit, Payne brought casting news: "I heard from Gregory Ratoff, who's directing, that you're going to be loaned out again, this time to Fox. We're going to appear in this thing called Footlight Serenade (1942) with Betty Grable and Victor Mature. Those two are involved in a torrid affair."

In the aftermath of her surgery, she'd returned home. There, the producer of My Favorite Spy, Harold Lloyd, the famous silent screen comic, dropped in for a visit.

Kay Kyser, bandleader and entertainment mogul, gets amorous with Jane in My Favorite Spy.

As a little girl, she'd seen him on the screen playing bespectacled nebbishes in peril. In the pantheon of silent screen comics and their popularity with movie-goers of that era, he had placed third after Charlie Chaplin and Buster Keaton.

In a moment of levity, she told him, "The last time I met Chaplin when I was a little girl, he tried to molest me. How safe am I with you?"

"Very safe," Lloyd said. "I molest no one. I'm the one who's usually molested."

She told him that as regards their upcoming My Favorite Spy, she'd been disappointed to find herself taking third billing after Kyser and Ellen Drew, a former beauty contest winner who, in the film, would play Kyser's bride.

Ellen Drew

"I think it'll be a big hit," Lloyd predicted, not addressing her concern.

Kyser, at the time, was a popular bandleader and singer, a well-known radio personality of the 1930s and the war years. His big hit on radio was as the quizmaster of an ongoing variety show, "Kay Kyser's Kollege of Musical Knowledge."

[A native of North Carolina, Kyser was also a vocalist, a Big Band director, and a master of swing and jazz. To capitalize off his fame, Hollywood had cast him in a number of movies, including That's Right You're Wrong in 1939 and You'll Find Out in 1940. His last film had also been John Barrymore's last, Play mates, made in 1941. Barrymore died in the spring of the following year.]

Before shooting of My Favorite Spy began, Jane lunched with its director, Tay Garnett. He was very blunt. "I asked RKO to hire you because I wanted your fine acting and style to camouflage the fact that Kyser is a swinging musician, but a lousy actor."

A native of Los Angeles, Garnett won Jane's approval. She'd seen two of the films he'd directed, including Eternally Yours (1939), which had co-starred Loretta Young and David Niven. [In future years, Jane would appear with Niven in film, and Young would become her best friend.] Before the end of their lunch, Garnett invited Jane to a screening of his latest movie, Seven Sinners, starring John Wayne and Marlene Dietrich as a torch singer.

On the set, Jane had a reunion with William Demarest, who'd been cast in a minor role. In the 1930s, he'd been her friend, mentor, and agent. She chided him: "After you discovered her in an ice cream parlor, you seemed to do better with Ellen Drew's career than with mine."

"Those are the breaks, sweetheart," Demarest said. "I did my best for you, gal. At least I kept you working."

In 1944, she'd switch from Paramount to RKO, where she appeared on screen with leading men who included William Holden, Basil Rathbone, Robert Preston, and Ronald Colman.

When My Favorite Spy opened across America, this whirlwind of dizzy intrigue received lackluster reviews. As the sultry blonde, Jane personified most of its sexual energy. Movie posters provocatively presented her as bosomy in a filmy black négligée.

Screenland magazine defined the zany film like this: "A spy comedy with Kay Kyser playing a not-too-bright bandleader who is called to Army Service on his wedding day. He is later released and made a counter-espionage agent. Of course, Kyser bags the spies in the end, returns to his bride (Drew), while Jane plays his blonde secret operator-partner. It's not our favorite Kyser film."

Another movie magazine asked, "How can we win WWII with bandleader Kyser as our spy? Nonsensical music-comedy tried to explain."

In 1973, Kyser, in an interview, remembered Jane, reflecting on her sense of humor and her keen sense of loyalty. "She had a heart as big as the outdoors. She's also big on soul, too, and can sing a pretty darn good song herself."

"She also gave me many good tips on acting, though claiming she couldn't act herself," Kyser said. "After she won an Oscar for Johnny Belinda, I accused her of being a liar for telling me she couldn't act."

Garnett, the film's director, later commented, "Because of Jane, our troupe had great chemistry on the set while making My Favorite Spy. Too bad that chemistry wasn't reflected on the screen. The picture should have been much better than it was."

The surprise is that Kings Row, a controversial novel by Henry Bellamann, ever made it to the movie screens of America in 1942. Its release coincided with the debut of America's entry into World War II.

It seemed that every theme in this novel about a small town in the Middle West in the 1890s was flagrantly contrary to the Hayes Production Code: Homosexuality, incest, suicide, insanity, premarital sex, nymphomania, sadism, and mercy killing.

Jack Warner first asked Wolfgang Reinhardt to produce the film. But after reading the novel, he wrote back: "As far as the plot is concerned, the material in Kings Row is for the most part either censurable or too gruesome and depressing to be used. The hero finding out that his girl has been carrying on incestuous relations with her father; a host of moronic or otherwise mentally diseased characters; people dying from cancer, suicides—these are the principal elements of the story."

Warner turned to Hal B. Wallis and asked him if he'd produce the film, and he agreed, signing David Lewis as his associate producer. As he'd promised Reagan months before, Lewis began to lobby for the role of the second male lead, the character of Drake McHugh, to go to Reagan.

However, Wallis had other stars in mind. But first, he sent galley proofs of the novel to screenwriter Casey Robinson, who had scripted the film Dark Victory with Bette Davis in which Reagan had played a homosexual. Robinson had also worked on the script of Million Dollar Baby, starring Reagan.

Wallis hired producer Sam Wood as director. He'd already directed many films that evolved into hits, beginning his career in 1915 as an assistant to Cecil B. DeMille. Over the years, he'd helmed some of Hollywood's biggest stars, including Gloria Swanson, the doomed Wallace Reid, Marion Davies, Clark Gable, and Jimmy Durante.

A liberal, Jack Warner admired Wood's talents, but found him such a right winger as to be objectionable. Groucho Marx had worked with him on A Night at the Opera (1935) and A Day at the Races (1937), calling him a "fascist," denouncing him as anti-Semitic, and abhorring his racist comments about black people.

Wood had previously directed Robert Donat in Goodbye, Mr. Chips (1939), which had brought that actor an Oscar. That same year, Wood had been nominated for an Oscar as Best Director, but lost to Victor Fleming for his direction of Gone With the Wind (1939). [Ironically, Wood had been an uncredited director of many of that film's scenes.] The following year, he'd been nominated as the year's Best Director for Kitty Foyle (1940), but lost to John Ford for his The Grapes of Wrath.

Setting out on a cruise in Asia, Robinson leisurely read Kings Row and was horrified, although he admitted he found it a page-turner. "I also found it personally revolting," he later said. "It seemed to be an attack on the very moral fiber of an American small town at the turn of the century. After finishing it, I took the galley proofs and tossed them into the Sulu Sea near Bali. But no sooner had the galleys hit the water than I realized how the story might be saved. Step by step, I'd have to eliminate the controversial scenes without losing the power of the book. For example, instead of the doctor committing incest with his daughter, I would have him covering up her insanity. I wired Wallis to purchase it, but warned him that we'd have trouble with those censors at the Breen Office.

Bellamann's view of small-town America as a sexually decadent, sadistic Hell was not compatible with the patriotic ferver then sweeping over the entertainment industry.

The miracle, partly because of the howls of protest from censors, was that Reagan's acclaimed film ever got made at all.

On Robinson's recommendation, Wallis purchased the film rights to the novel for $35,000, just $5,000 less than he'd unsuccessfully offered for the film rights to Gone With the Wind, [David O. Selznick eventually paid $50,000 for them.]

Originally, Fox had wanted Kings Row with Henry Fonda, but later rejected it because of its censorship problems. Jack Warner liked the idea of Fonda playing the sensitive role of Drake that eventually went to Reagan. Warner even suggested to Darryl F. Zanuck at Fox that he'd consider hiring Tyrone Power to play the lead role of Parris Mitchell, but Fox refused to release its major star.

After it had become clear that neither Fonda nor Power was available, Wallis and Warner penciled in several actors who might be ideal for the role of Parris, including Laurence Olivier (an odd choice for a dyed-in-the-wool resident of a small Midwestern town), Cary Grant, Robert Taylor, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., Glenn Ford, Alexander Knox, Arthur Kennedy, John Garfield, Errol Flynn, and even Ronald Reagan. Warner rejected both Flynn and Garfield as "too sexy for the part."

For the role of Drake—the trust fund playboy who loses his money and later, his legs—the list of contenders being considered included Robert Cummings (who eventually was cast as Parris), Lew Ayres, Dennis Morgan, Franchot Tone, Fred MacMurray, Ray Mil-land, Lew Ayres, Robert Preston, Eddie Albert, John Garfield, Arthur Kennedy, and, finally, at the bottom to the list, Ronald Reagan.

Wallis was more intrigued with an unknown newcomer, a young and handsome actor, Michael Ames, who had previously appeared in a brief role with Reagan in International Squadron (1941) when he was identifying himself, professionally, as Tod Andrews.

Wallis had more or less assigned the role to Ames, but then news came in that the actor had been drafted into the Army. There went his one big chance, an acting opportunity which would never come again. Ames remained resentful throughout the rest of his life for losing the role.

The role of Cassandra Tower, the neurotic daughter of the incestuous Dr. Alexander Tower (as played by Claude Rains), attracted far more interest from actresses than the more wholesome female lead of Randy Monoghan, the tomboy from the wrong side of the tracks.

Bette Davis actively campaigned for the role of Cassandra, but Wallis thought she'd be overpowering and would distort the focus of the movie. Ida Lupino was sent the script, but returned it, finding it "degenerate." Ginger Rogers was mailed the script, but didn't respond. Warners' own Olivia de Havilland was a distinct possibility, but she wasn't interested. Vivien Leigh was under consideration until she left Hollywood, returning to war-torn Britain with Laurence Olivier.

Linda Darnell and Anita Louise were two other candidates, along with a virtually unknown actress, Adela Longmire. Warner sent a memo to Wallis, asserting that "Adela is a great actress," but Wallis didn't agree. Warner came up with some other actresses, none of whom met with Wallis' approval either. They included Susan Peters, Joan Leslie, and Priscilla Lane, who had appeared with Reagan in those Brother Rat movies. Wallis strongly approved of Gene Tierney, finding her ideal, but Zanuck at 20th Century Fox had already signed her to another film, Tobacco Road (1941).

Then, unexpectedly, the publicist for Marlene Dietrich announced that she had won the role of Cassandra, but nobody in Hollywood believed that.

The part finally went to Betty Field, a Bostonian with sad, sultry eyes. She had scored a success in Hal Roach's production of Of Mice and Men (1939), playing Curley's sad, slatternly wife.

Humphrey Bogart had read Kings Row, and he called his friend, Ann Sheridan, to suggest that she pursue the role of Randy, the well-adjusted girl who ultimately wins Drake's heart. She read the novel, thinking at first it would never reach the screen because of its taboo subjects.

When she became convinced that it could, she settled her contract dispute with Warners and aggressively sought the role—and won it. In fact, in the ads, she would take star billing, followed by Robert Cummings, Ronald Reagan, and Betty Field.

Wallis lined up one of the best supporting casts of any drama ever filmed at Warners—Charles Coburn, Claude Rains, Judith Anderson, Nancy Coleman, Maria Ouspenskaya, Harry Davenport, and many lesser but very talented lights. He also had to cast child actors, Ann Todd; Scotty Beckett; Douglas Croft; and Mary Thomas to play childhood versions of the lead roles.

"As I read the novel, with all its hypocrisy and narrow-minded people, it evoked for me my memories of growing up in Denton, Texas, where I fought against those traits and those people," Sheridan recalled in 1966. "Like Ronnie, I would give my best performance in any picture."

By the time Robinson sent his fourth screenplay to the Breen office, he had eliminated any hint of homosexuality between Parris and Drake; cut out Parris' mercy killing of his grandmother; and axed the death scene where Drake dies of cancer. Everything connected with Dr. Tower's incest with his daughter, Cassandra, was replaced with a theme of insanity. Tower kills her instead, thus keeping her from marrying Parris and ruining his life.

Kings Row was a precursor of Grace Metalious' Peyton Place that dominated the bestselling novel lists of the 1950s.

The Breen office even objected to the dialogue between Cummings and Reagan when Parris had to sleep over at his friend's home. Originally, Reagan was to say: "You have to bunk with me. I hope you don't mind the change."

In a decision that left its actors trying to figure out their motivation and meaning, the Breen censors ordered that the dialogue be changed to: "You have to bunk with me. I hope you don't mind, Mr. Mitchell."

Wood didn't want Reagan to wear a lot of makeup in Kings Row. But Cummings, a drag queen in private life, insisted on heavy makeup, so much that a critic later said, "In Kings Row, Robert Cummings looks like he's made up to be third girl in a chorus line."

Reagan knew from the beginning that he was facing his most challenging role. He recalled, "I drew upon some of the traits of Moon [his brother, Neil Reagan.] My brother was rakish, charming, and of good humor, a spicier version of myself. I felt the town of Kings Row in the movie could easily have been Dixon."

During the course of the filming, Reagan spent a lot of time with Sheridan. Always attracted to each other, they resumed their romance, as Wood closely observed. “I made sure that Reagan got advance notice when Jane visited him on the set. I knew she and Ann were good friends, a friendship that would have come to an abrupt end if she’d caught her husband banging Ann in her dressing room. Fortunately, that never happened.”

“The role of Drake was an acting chore that got down and deep inside me and kind of wrung me out,” Reagan recalled, years later. “The early scenes were easier. In those, I played a gay blade who cut a swathe among the ladies.”

“Ann was a great help, practically giving me acting lessons. We spent a lot of time rehearsing the scenes, not just of the two of us. Sometimes, she played Parris when Cummings wasn’t around to rehearse with me.”

During the making of Kings Row, Sheridan told him that she’d heard “a rumor that Bette Davis wants your strong brown arms around her in her upcoming film, Now, Voyager.”

“I thought Bette detested me,” Reagan said.

“Don’t kid yourself,” Sheridan said. “She wants you to fuck her in spite of your rejection of her offscreen in Dark Victory.”

Both Sheridan and Reagan knew that Cummings was better suited to comedies than to heavy drama. However, Alfred Hitchcock didn’t think so. The Missouri-born actor told them that Hitchcock had just signed him to star in Saboteur (1942).

In the controversial adaptation of the novel Kings Row, Reagan played Drake, a young trust-fund philanderer, a radical change of pace for him.

Just as Reagan hated flying, Cummings had a passion for it, and kept urging Reagan to “come fly with me.” Sheridan had told him that their fellow actor, who was to marry five times and father seven children, “Liked an occasional boy.” Reagan assumed that Cummings’ invitation “to come fly with me” was actually a sexual pass.

To attend a cast party, Sheridan made Cummings up and let him wear her clothes to the informal event.

In later life, Reagan was saddened to see Cummings, an advocate of natural foods and a healthy diet, succumb to drug addiction.

Within a year after making Kings Row, Cummings would join the U.S. Army Air Corps, becoming a flight instructor.

Reagan recalled, "Robert fell for all that Warners publicity crap about what an ace pilot I was. In all my talks about flying with him, never once did he see through the ruse. I must have sounded like the aviator I certainly wasn't."

"Young Reagan was such an easy-going and fun person to be around that he was clearly the best-loved actor on the set," said Coburn. "I really hated it later when I had to amputate his legs," he joked.

Rising from the swamps of Georgia, Charles Coburn, born in 1877, said he started his theatrical career handing out programs in the local Savannah Theater. He'd made his debut on Broadway back in 1901. He often performed on stage with his first wife, actress Ivah Wills. After his wife died in 1937, he came to Hollywood to begin film work. Today, he is best remembered for his appearance opposite Marilyn Monroe in the 1953 Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. At the time he met Reagan, he'd just finished The Lady Eve (1941), with Barbara Stanwyck.

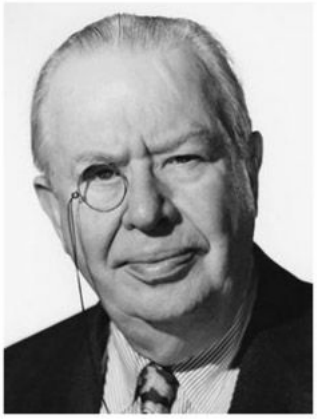
In the same year that he played a sadistic doctor in Kings Row, he also made In This Our Life. Reagan kidded him: "As Bette Davis' pathetic uncle, you seemed to display an unnatural interest in your niece."

An associate producer, David Lewis, was on the set almost every day. As Sheridan noted, "David seems to follow Ronnie around with panting tongue."

[But did Reagan keep his promise to let Lewis give him nude massages during filming? The only source for that is Wood, who claimed he walked in one day on Reagan as he lay nude on a cot receiving a sensual massage from his associate producer.

"I told the boys to carry on and left," Wood told Sheridan. "I suspect it's one of those George Cukor/Clark Gable director/actor seductions.]

Reagan later recalled that two of the most formidable actresses he ever worked with were Maria Ouspenskaya and Judith Anderson. Born in 1876 during the days of the Russian Empire, Ouspenskaya became an acting teacher and a stage star. She came to Hollywood and had early success in Dodsworth (1936), which brought her an Oscar nomination as Best Supporting Actress. When she met Reagan, she was at the peak of her career, appearing as an old Gypsy fortuneteller in the horror film, The Wolf Man (1941). She had had other hits in The Rains Came (1939), with Tyrone Power, and in Waterloo Bridge (1940) with Robert Taylor and Vivien Leigh.



A major-league sadist masquerading as a decent, small town doctor: Charles Coburn.

Anderson, an Australian, had just been nominated as Best Supporting Actress for her portrayal of the malevolently lesbian Mrs. Danvers (the housekeeper) in Alfred Hitchcock's Rebecca (1940). After Kings Row, she would go on to appear in many memorable films, including Laura (1944), and in Tennessee Williams' Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1958), with Elizabeth Taylor and Paul Newman.

London-born Claude Rains had first thrilled Reagan in his appearance in The Invisible Man (1933). "From Casablanca (1942) to Mr. Smith Goes to Washington (1939), Claude was one of the most talented actors who ever appeared before a camera," Reagan claimed.

Nancy Coleman, who came from Washington State, was a minor actress who played Louise Gordon (the daughter of Coburn's character, the sadistic Dr. Gordon) in Kings Row. Her early romance with Reagan prompts the doctor to (sadistically and unnecessarily) amputate his legs after an accident at the railroad tracks.

Coleman would work with Reagan and Errol Flynn in their upcoming movie, Desperate Journey (1942).

Three talented technicians contributed greatly to the success of Kings Row. They included a Chinese American cinematographer, James Wong Howe, a master of the use of shadow and one of the first to use deep-focus cinematography.

An American composer of Austro-Hungarian birth, Erich Wolfgang Korngold was one of the leading composers of Hollywood's Golden Age, rivaled by Max Steiner and Alfred Newman.

For the film's production design, there was no one better than a Connecticut Yankee, William Cameron Menzies. At Hollywood's first Academy Awards ceremony in 1929, Menzies had won an Oscar for Best Art Direction for his work on The Dove and the Tempest.

Maria Ouspenskaya, a relic of the Romanov Empire.

Reagan knew his most challenging moment would be the scene where he wakes up to discover that the sadistic doctor had amputated his legs. "I had to find out how it really felt, short of actual amputation," he said. "I woke up in the morning, rehearsing the line, looking up at the ceiling. I even rehearsed in front of mirrors in the men's rooms of restaurants. I consulted doctors and psychologists. Anything to summon up the cauldron of emotions a man must feel who wakes up one sunny morning to find half of himself gone. Ann worked with me over and over again on the scene. I had to get it right."

He later said, "Perhaps I never did quite as well again in a single shot."

Claude Rains told Reagan "I am Bette Davis' favorite actor."

Reagan replied, "I'm her least favorite."

The day he walked onto the set in pajamas and a nightshirt, Jane had come, with little Maureen, to greet him and wish him well.

He discovered that the prop men had cut a hole in the mattress and installed a structural support, with a void, beneath the opening. Reagan had to sink his legs into that hole.

"Lights! Camera! Action!" the director commanded at the beginning of the shot

Then Reagan, as Drake, screams, "Randy!" Again, "Randy! Randy!" In desperation, his hand reached down, grasping for but not finding his thighs. He quivers like a slain animal in his death throes. "Where's the rest of me?"

With the delivery of that line, Reagan entered screen immortality.

Wood pronounced it a wrap after the only one take.

Playing an almost demented, deeply repressed daughter: Nancy Coleman

Cummings later recalled, “When Ronnie delivered that line to movie audiences, across the country, at first, they thought his genitals had been cut off, too. There were gasps of horror.”

Amazingly, Wood revealed that Reagan’s scene of post-amputation was almost cut from the film’s final version. “Too many American servicemen in 1942 were getting their legs amputated. There was a fear that audiences would react in horror to Reagan’s scene, as it was too close to what was going on in the real world. Jack Warner suggested that I shoot the scene so that Reagan discovers that only one leg was removed, but I held out for both legs being amputated. Finally, I persuaded Warner to agree to it.”

In the movie, unlike events as they transpired within the book, when Drake dies of cancer, Reagan recovers from a deep depression and finds personal redemption through the love and support of his beloved Randy (Sheridan). She helps him become a successful real estate developer, and he recognizes that life is worth living, even without legs.

Also cast in Kings Row, Judith Anderson had previously appeared in an even more famous movie as Mrs. Danvers, the cold, imperious, and ultimately, psychotic, housekeeper in Rebecca (1940).

In 1945, the year of his death, the novelist, Bellamann, was working on his novel’s sequel, Parris Mitchell of Kings Row. Katharine, his wife, finished the novel for him, publishing it posthumously in 1948.

Although Kings Row—Reagan’s greatest screen role—became a classic, it did not get good reviews. Bosley Crowther, writing for The New York Times described it as “gloomy and ponderous.”

Harrison’s Reports defined it as “A powerful but somewhat depressing drama.”

In spite of the attacks, Kings Row was nominated for three separate Oscars: Best Picture, Best Director, and Best Black and White Cinematography. But MGM’s Mrs. Miniver carried off all three of those prizes.

In general, Reagan fared better than Cummings. Crowther, for example wrote, “Cummings looks and acts like a musical-comedy juvenile trying to find his bearings in this heavy Ibsenesque plot.”

There was talk that Reagan might be nominated for an Academy Award, but Warners decided to throw its powerful support behind Yankee Doodle Dandy, starring James Cagney, instead.

The American Medical Association strongly attacked the movie because of its portrayal of doctors in such an unflattering glare.

“Kings Row was the finest picture I ever appeared in, and it elevated me to the degree of stardom I had dreamed of when I first came to Hollywood in 1937,” Reagan said.

The film developed something of a negative image after its release in February of 1942. “America had gone to war, and Kings Row was hardly a morale booster," Reagan said. "All the other studios were rushing into production of pictures to lift the American spirit and imbue us with hope of winning the war. Our picture presented a depressing view of small town America, quite unlike those Andy Hardy films with Mickey Rooney. I bet Hitler would have loved Kings Row if Josef Goebbels could slip a pirated copy into Berlin."

Before Reagan could really capitalize off his breakthrough role, he'd have to join the Army. He failed to take advantage of his new position as a top star at Warners, and noted to his severe disappointment the juicy roles he lost between 1943 and 1946.

After the war, his film career would never regain the momentum it had momentarily achieved.

Reagan to Ann Sheridan, in reference to his amputated legs: "Where's the Rest of Me?"

Kings Row had another downside. Jane Wyman later confessed to Joan Blondell. "It may ultimately have contributed to my divorce from Ronnie. He screened it countless times, every time someone came over, although they might have seen it already. Night after night, I had to watch that film. I came to know every line every actor in it delivered. I got so I couldn't take it anymore. Finally, I told Ronnie, 'Why in hell don't you make another movie instead of reliving your one moment of screen glory?' That pissed him off."

Chapter Eight

After His Success in Kings Row, Reagan Becomes MCA's "Million Dollar Baby"

Drafted into the Army, Reagan Objects to Medical Personnel Fondling "The Family Jewels"

In a mink coat with some strings of pearls, Jane Wyman salutes 2nd Lt. Ronald Reagan, of the Army Air Force Personnel Office, in the autumn of 1942. Granted referrals, he had continued to make movies that year until he was finally called up for duty.

Since he was "blind as a bat," he was not fit for active duty. Instead, he'd begin to make war propaganda movies.

In Juke Girl (a secret reference to a prostitute), Ronald Reagan gave Ann Sheridan, his sometimes mistress, the most passionate kiss of his screen career.

When Jane Wyman saw this publicity still, she lamented, "If only he kissed me this way at home!"

In the summer of 1941, with Europe at war, many young American men faced being drafted into the military. Millions of Americans believed that the United States could stay out of the war—but not Reagan. He was convinced that an American involvement in World War II was inevitable. But because of his poor vision, he didn't think he would ever be drafted.

Actually, he didn't want to go into the Army. At long last, he was on the verge of major stardom, a dream cherished for so long, and he had a beautiful wife and a baby girl.

A uniformed movie star with wholesome, Midwestern roots and a mother, Nelle, who adores him.

Nelle paid a visit in September of 1943 to "Fort Roach," the headquarters of Reagan's film production unit. He always responded in anger when someone accused him of "being a draft dodger avoiding danger."

He cited how valuable to the war effort war propaganda films were.

To his chagrin, during the making of Kings Row, his status as a member of the U.S. Cavalry reserve was revoked, thereby making him immediately eligible for active duty.

He was devastated. As he complained to Dick Powell, "I've worked and labored for this moment, and now that it's here, it seems that the government has other plans for me. If I'm drafted into the Army and spend several years away from Hollywood, I won't have any fans left when I get back."

"That's always a possibility," Powell said. "In Hollywood, our replacements are always pounding on studio doors. The old-timers like Clark Gable will return to face a new crowd of good-looking guys at Warners, MGM, Paramount, whatever. By the end of the 1940s, a whole new generation of younger guys will be enlisted as replacements for Errol Flynn, Tyrone Power, and Robert Taylor. The stars of the 1930s will be viewed as over the hill, long in the tooth, and washed up."

"Stop!" Reagan said. "You're just too depressing."

In response to a letter he received, Reagan got up early one morning, kissed Jane goodbye, and drove to March Field for his physical. His athletic body passed the medical examination. As he later said, "I didn't like some young guy, just out of medical school, fondling my balls, but it's all in the game."

Two doctors later, however, bluntly informed him that although he'd passed the physical, "You're as blind as a bat. If we gave you a gun, you'd probably end up accidentally shooting at General Eisenhower."

"And based on your lousy vision, you'd probably miss," the other doctor said.

Reagan was given a copy of his medical report. It recommended "Limited service— eligible for corps area service command, or War Department Overhead only."

At the time, men so designated were rarely drafted. Reagan told friends, "It's highly unlikely I'll ever be called."

However, while he was still asleep, on Sunday, December 7, 1941, a call came in from Neil (Moon) Reagan. "Wake up, Dutch!" he shouted into the phone. "We're at war. The Japs attacked Pearl Harbor this morning."

At the time of America's entry into World War II, Reagan was only thirty years old— and still draftable. Within a week, he was instructed to report to Fort Mason at the port of San Francisco, where warships were launched for action in the Pacific.

Right after the Japanese attack, young men across America, many of them either outraged or in a state of numbed disbelief and/or shock, lined up at their local draft boards. Based on his association with Warners, Reagan, however, was not among them.

Lew Wasserman, Reagan's agent at MCA, called on Jack Warner, asking him to write a letter to the Assistant Secretary of the War Department, seeking temporary deferment. Warner claimed that Reagan was vital to the financial security of his studio. He also stated that he planned to cast Reagan in "propaganda films," conceived to boost the morale and resolve of the American public.

Within thirty days, Reagan received notice from the War Department that he would be deferred until April of 1942. Then, after reappraisal, if inducted into the Army, he'd be assigned the rank of second lieutenant.

The implications of Reagan being drafted meant that Jane would, in essence, become the breadwinner of the household. Wasserman, who was also her agent, managed to renegotiate her contract, raising her salary to $750 a week, although she was still mired in B pictures—and would be for some time.

With that increase in salary, she could easily afford the $15,000 mortgage they'd taken on their new home in the Hollywood Hills. It called for a payment of only $125 a month.

Although Reagan's contract with Warners wouldn't expire until 1944, Wasserman urged him to let him try to re-negotiate his movie contract anyway. During Wasserman's subsequent meeting with Jack Warner, the agent pressed his case. "I think that when Kings Row is released, Ronnie is going to move into the top tier of male movie stars. You'd better sign him for another seven years, or I'll let his contract expire and I'll freelance him. Louis B. Mayer has already hinted to me that he'd like to make Reagan a boy star at MGM."

Warners had seen a sneak preview of Kings Row and agreed with Wasserman's assessment. The new contract called for him to pay Reagan $758,000 over a seven-year period.

Reagan had an ally in Col. Lewis B. Hershey, director of the Selective Service, who viewed morale-boosting movies as "essential to the national health, safety, and interest of America."

He cited war movies under production as a virtual "second front" in its propaganda wars against both Japan and the Nazis. Now that America was no longer neutral, Hershey requested that all studios, including Warners, make "the Japs the most evil monsters who ever inhabited the Earth and Hitler's Nazis devil worshippers intent on enslaving the world."

Warner told Reagan, "I want to get deferments for you until you've made three more pictures after Juke Girl (1942) and Desperate Journey (also 1942). I'll try to convince the War Department that it's more vital to have you turning out American propaganda movies that taking some desk job in the Army. With your eyesight, that's exactly what you'll become, a paper pusher."

"If you can make a lot of films, at least five in 1942 and 1943, I'll release one a year. That way, your fans won't forget you. You know, those jerks are a fickle lot, but they keep us in pussy, potatoes, and Porsches."

Reagan immediately went into production on Juke Girl with his favorite actress and sometime lover, Ann Sheridan. She had married George Brent on January 5, 1942.

Originally, Warner had cast Ida Lupino in the lead, but when Kings Row opened with such success, he wanted to reteam Sheridan with Reagan. "I probably should make five or six pictures teaming you and your Ronnie boy, our answer to MGM's Spencer Tracy and Hepburn, the faggot and the lesbian," Warner said to Sheridan. "At least you and Reagan are heterosexuals—as far as I know. In Hollywood, of course, you can never be sure."

After Reagan read the script, he was disappointed. So was Sheridan. "This is not exactly a great wedding present from Warners," she told Reagan.

As a follow-up to his success as Drake in Kings Row, he had wanted something stronger. Juke Girl was a dreary story about a slovenly group of itinerant crop pickers in Florida, highlighting conflicts between laborers in the field and management's taking advantage of them.

"I'd call it the truck farmer's version of Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath," Sheridan said. "A grim melodrama."

A.I. Bezzerides and Kenneth Gamet had adapted the story from Theodore Pratt. Although Pratt had originated in Minnesota, most of his novels were set in Florida, where he lived. Originally, he'd entitled his story "Jook Girl." Jook was a reference to a small roadside joint in the southeastern United States where one could eat, drink, and dance to music from a jukebox.

After reading the script, Reagan called Sheridan. "What in hell is a Juke Girl?"

"It's a euphemism for whore," she answered. "It's not spelled out in the script, but juke gals work a tavern catering to farm workers."

Once again, Reagan was helmed by the German director, Curtis Bernhardt, who did not seem happy with his latest assignment. He later said, “I did not like either of the pictures I made with Mr. Reagan, neither Million Dollar Baby nor Juke Girl. He was a sort of unimportant, pleasant, healthy, typically American boy, nothing special about him at all. I did not expect much of a future for him in films. He had a nice smile that might work better if he were an insurance salesman.”

“The only time he heated up on camera was when he made love to Annie Sheridan,” Bernhardt claimed. “In one love match, shooting began on Wednesday and ended on Friday. She’d just come off her honeymoon, but it looked like she was getting ready for a second honeymoon with Reagan. When I finally finished the scene, I advised the two of them to get a room. It appeared to me that they took my advice, but I suspected that something was going on between those two long before they came together in Juke Girl. I hoped George Brent wouldn’t find out.”

Cast as Steve Talbot, Reagan played a drifter who arrives in Florida with his friend, Danny Frazier (Richard Whorf). They seek work in the tomato fields. Their friendship is strained when Steve sides with a farmer, Nick Garcos (George Tobias), in his struggle with Henry Madden (Gene Lockhart), who controls a fruit farm and packaging plant.

In a complicated plot, the story moves forward with violence, killings, commercial intrigue, even mob justice. Reagan would forever remember the battle of the tomatoes. At one point, he squashed a big, fat, juicy tomato into Lockhart’s face.

In one scene, hired thugs try to break the resolve of an independent farmer by smashing truckloads of his tomato crates. After wallowing in squashed tomatoes for three nights, Reagan said, “With all the misconceptions about pampered stars, none is so far afield as the belief that physical discomfort isn’t tolerated. On the first night, we used real tomatoes in the trucks. A crew placed them back in the trucks for the filming on the third and fourth nights. By this time, the tomatoes were rotten and stunk like hog heaven. Not only that, but I always despised tomatoes.”

The film was supposed to take place among crop pickers in the humid heat of Florida. But actually, it was shot in the wintry cold of Central California, the temperature dropping one night to 27° F. Since the actors needed to have sweaty faces, they often rubbed glycerine on their skin to create the illusion. Bernhardt asked some of the men to smoke cigarettes to explain the vapor in the night air. When the breath vapor became too visible, Bern-hardt would have to call for a halt in filming.

Sheridan was given star billing as Lola Mears, the Juke Girl herself. Steve (i,.e, Reagan) romances Lola, but she seems reluctant to commit because of her shady past. She takes a job in Atlanta, Georgia, telling Steve he’ll be better off without her. However, they become closer when a lynch mob goes after them both. Before the final curtain, Lola and Steve, united in love, agree to settle down on their own farm and give up their tumbleweed lives.

When not occupying his time with Sheridan, Reagan spent evenings with William Hopper, Hedda’s son. He’d been cast in Juke Girl in an uncredited role as a postal clerk. “Stardom seems to have eluded me,” he told Reagan.

On location, he asked to bunk with Reagan as he’d done before, and Reagan agreed. He no longer felt as uncomfortable around William as he had before. He was free to undress in front of him, take a shower, and share a bed with him. At one point, he asked William, “Have you gotten over your crush on me?”

Sheridan claimed that, in some perverse way, “I think Ronnie gets off on the adulation Bill heaps on him. After all, it’s pretty god damn hard to reject being adored. Bill flattered him constantly. After even the simplest scene, Bill would praise him, calling him the most brilliant actor in films today.”

Sometimes, as Reagan sat with William and Sheridan around a campfire, they listened to music composed and performed, informally, by Lockhart. Although he played the villain in the film, off screen, he was polite and charming. He wrote lyrics for songs, and sang many of his creations for them.

He told Reagan, “I’m in the bio period of my career—Abe Lincoln in Illinois (1940); Edison the Man (1940); Billy the Kid (1941); and The Devil and Daniel Webster (1941). He had just filmed They Died With Their Boots On (1941) with Errol Flynn cast as General Custer.

Reagan told him, “I’m seriously pissed off that I didn’t get to play General Custer. After all, I was Custer in Santa Fe Trail. I think Jack Warner fucked me by not giving me the role again.”

Reagan was distressed to learn that Howard da Silva had been cast as Cully in Juke Girl. He had detested that actor ever since he’d told him that Jane was having an affair with Dennis Morgan during their work together on Bad Men of Missouri.

Two weeks into the shoot, Reagan also had a reunion of sorts with Faye Emerson, who had flirted outrageously with him when they’d shot Nine Lives Are Not Enough. Once again, she flirted with him, and once again, he showed no interest in her at all.

In one of the more dramatic moments of Juke Girl, Reagan smashes a big, rotten tomato in the face of Gene Lockhart, who plays the vicious owner of a fruit farm and packing plant.

Reagan was the most physically violent of all U.S. presidents—that is, on the screen.

Cast as a fellow drifter and itinerant worker, Whorf was very talented, later becoming an author, director, and designer. At the time he met Reagan, he was appearing in far better A-list pictures, including Yankee Doodle Dandy with James Cagney (1942); and Keeper of the Flame (1943), with Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn.

One night at a local tavern, Reagan and Whorf joined Alan Hale, Sr., and associate producer Jack Saper, who were also involved in the filming of Juke Girl. Both Saper and Hale told Reagan they looked forward to working with him and Flynn on their upcoming movie, Desperate Journey.

Reagan had recently made Tugboat Annie Sails Again with Hale. Reagan later said, “There was one thing Hale could do— and that was drink. He played a drunk on Santa Fe Trail with Errol and me, and he wasn’t acting. I could nurse a drink for an hour or two. Hale could drink all night. He obviously had a hollow wooden leg. He told me that once in Texas, he’d drunk for thirty-six uninterrupted hours. I told him, ‘That’s impossible.’ He claimed that every hour or so, he went to the toilet and threw up and then came back for more. What a man! What a disaster!”

In Reagan’s view, Tobias, a New Yorker, was pleasant and easy to work with. He had signed with Warners in 1939, playing supporting roles in such movies as Yankee Doodle Dandy (1940), with James Cagney, and in Sergeant York (1941) with Gary Cooper. Tobias said he’d gotten his start by appearing as a Russian visa officer in Greta Garbo’s 1939 Ninotchka.

Otherwise deeply involved in wartime film and propaganda production, Jack Warner had given producer Hal B. Wallis a clear hand without any interference during the shooting of Juke Girl. At first, based on the title, Warner thought it was a musical. That was partially true: In the movie, as Lola, Sheridan is a singer, warbling "I Hates Love."

But when Warner was screened a rough cut of the film, he was horrified at its pro-union stance. During his long and turbulent battles with union workers, Warner had sided with Walt Disney's anti-labor stance.

Juke Girl marked the beginning of the end of Warner's long association with Wallis He would make only one more movie for Warners, Casablanca (1942), before leaving the studio.

Reviews were lackluster, if not hostile, when Juke Girl opened across the country. The New York Times defined it as "another Warner's semi-social life-in-the-raw-drama, where a lot of slangy lingo is tossed fast and loose. As a cynic, Sheridan contrasts with Reagan, an idealist, who is stanch (sic) as a young hero. The whole smacks too much of the synthetic. It's like a tune that comes out of a jukebox."

Sheridan and Brent on their honeymoon in May of 1942.

No sooner was Reagan back in Hollywood, than he received a call from Warner, who with his typical vulgarity, said, "Get yourself some pussy and head out again. You don't want to keep Errol Flynn waiting on his Desperate Journey."

On location for Juke Girl, Reagan had come to know Ann Sheridan as he never had before or would ever again in the future.

It was obvious to him that she was very unhappy about her recent marriage to George Brent, with whom Reagan had co-starred in Dark Victory. "George's marriages usually don't make it through the honeymoon," she said. "I also suspect that he's resumed his affair with Bette Davis."

"He's a real penny pincher," Sheridan complained. "He recently told a reporter, 'I'm saving my money. You can't play Shirley Temple forever.' He told me I had to buy all my own clothes and that I had to pay half of the household expenses."

"That's a better deal than I'm offering to my poor Jane," he told her. "If I go into the Army, she'll have to pay all of the household expenses, including bringing up Baby Maureen. On a soldier's pay, Jane can't expect me to buy her expensive gowns."

"Oh, you men," Sheridan answered. "Excuses, excuses." It's more than the money thing. George is very withdrawn at times, going into deep, dark moods. He'll lock himself away and not speak to me for days. I think he hits the bottle during those periods of isolation. Right before marrying me, he had this affair with Ilona Massey when they made International Lady (1941). Apparently, he likes her Hungarian goulash. The picture should be retitled An International Affair."

"You know better than most that all of us—the handsome hunks of the screen—face impossible temptations," he said. “After all, we’re horny guys and they cast us with the most desirable women on the planet—and that means you, sugar.”

“You’re right, she said. “I didn’t really expect a womanizer like George to be faithful. Frankly, I’m a ‘man-nizer’ if there’s such a word. I think an actor and an actress should not marry. I wonder at times how you and Jane will make it. It’s inevitable that one star will become a bigger star than the other—call it professional jealousy. I’ve already become a bigger star than he is. You saw A Star is Born, of course. George is low octane; I’m high octane. Some reporters are already referring to him as a has-been of the 1930s with a career in decline. Annie Gal is going up, up, just like you.”

“As Hollywood stars, you and me, baby, the King and the Queen of the Bs, are going to become the King and Queen of Warners—forget that smokestack, Bette Davis. As for Flynn, he’ll probably end up in jail for raping an eight-year-old girl…or boy, perhaps.”

During the course of the evening, she admitted that she went to Jack Warner to protest against having to appear in Juke Girl. “He threatened me with suspension again.”

On location, both of them shared their dreams. She had learned that Warner had acquired the rights to Edna Ferber’s sprawling novel, Saratoga Trunk. She was “burning with desire” (her words) to play the heroine of the novel, whom she described as a Creole version of Scarlett O’Hara.

Two bathing beauties, Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman, on their honeymoon in Palm Springs, 1940.

Reagan was astonished to learn that she’d recommended him to Jack Warner, suggesting that he play the male lead, a cowboy, in Saratoga Trunk. He’d never read the novel, and she told him she’d lend him her copy.

“I’m already working in Hollywood with a French teacher,” she said. “Right now, he’s got me speaking ‘Franco-Texan.’ I’m even willing to don a blonde wig for my screen test.”

[Reagan did read the novel and, indeed, thought he could play the role of the cowboy. But his getting drafted into the Army ended that possibility. As for Sheridan, she made a screen test, which, according to Jack Warner, was “so god damn awful I couldn’t even show it to her.”

In 1945, Saratoga Trunk was released, the role of the Creole vixen having gone to a Swede, Ingrid Bergman, playing opposite cowboy Gary Cooper. One critic claimed that “at times, it is unbearable to sit through this disaster.” That made Reagan feel better that he’d lost the role.]

On long, lonely nights, Reagan and Sheridan talked about their upcoming projects—Desperate Journey for him, and the flag-waving Wings for the Eagle (1942) for her. “My co-star is that dreamboat, Dennis Morgan,” she told him. “He’s got all the starlets at Warners salivating.”

“I know that Morgan has been married for years,” he said. “Do you think he messes around with his leading ladies?”

He didn’t want her to know that their co-star, Howard da Silva, had told him about rumors of an affair between Morgan and Jane. He was, in essence, fishing for information.

Sheridan was trying to escape the Oomph Girl image and wanted to be viewed more seriously as an actress. “I don’t know if this recent publicity will help me,” she said.

She showed him an article that defined her as “a hash house version of Carole Lombard who combines comedy with sex appeal.” The article also noted that it was appropriate that she was working on a movie with truck drivers. “Sheridan is known for her foul language and can outcurse any truck driver.”

He noticed that on her dressing table she kept a picture of herself as Clara Lou from Denton, Texas. “I was all pudgy fat with kinky hair and a space between my teeth. But in a few months, I turned myself into a beauty contest winner, even though I’ve got no tits.”

I think you’re lovely, and your tits are just fine with me.”

“I like your balls, too,” she said.

[George Brent drove up from Los Angeles and made a surprise visit to the set of Juke Girl, where Curtis Bernhardt was shooting a scene at night.

What happened is not exactly known, except it became fodder for Hollywood gossip. All that is known for sure is that Brent gave Reagan a black eye. Someone told him that Reagan was having an affair with his wife. The culprit was the gossipy Howard da Silva, who had revealed Jane’s earlier indiscretion with Dennis Morgan.

What is known is that Bernhardt had to order heavy makeup to camouflage Reagan’s black eye. “Fortunately, I was shooting night scenes, and I could cast his left eye in shadow,” the director said. “He told me he bumped into a door when he got up one night to take a piss. Brent told me he punched ‘the hell out of Reagan.’ I prefer to believe Brent.”]

Not wanting to alert Jane to the incident, Sheridan temporarily quit accepting invitations to the Reagan household for dinner. Sheridan and Jane would make two more pictures together in the 1940s. Apparently, Jane never learned of the affair between Sheridan and her husband. If she did, she never confronted Sheridan about it.

According to Joan Blondell, when rumors of Reagan’s infidelity reached Jane, she had a tendency to brush them aside.

As she once told Blondell, “How can I expect fidelity from him when he can’t expect it from me? The pot can hardly call the kettle black.”

Paulette Goddard picked up the phone to hear Jane’s voice bubbling over with excitement, even though it held a hint of anxiety. “You won’t believe this, but that Russian bear, Gregory Ratoff, has cast me in Footlight Serenade (1942) with John Payne as my leading man. Betty Grable and Victor Mature are in it, too.”

Betty Grable (left) and Jane Wyman duke it out in Footlight Serenade. Jane worried that her legs weren’t as beautiful as those of Grable.

“I heard that Grable and Mature are really going at it,” Goddard said. “With them teamed up with lovebirds like you and John, the film should be retitled Lovers Quartet. You might steal Mature away from Grable one night just to find out what the excitement is all about."

"Your suggestions are always so outrageous—that's why I adore you so," Jane said.

"You are one lucky girl," Goddard said. "John Payne and Mature are the two sexiest men in Hollywood. I got John Wayne on my last picture. What a dud! Guess what? I'm now making another movie. Are you sitting down? It's called The Forest Rangers (1942)."

"Who's in it?" Jane asked.

"That red-haired bitch, Susan Hayward, is the other leading lady. In the movie, and perhaps later in real life, too, we've got to fight it out for Fred MacMurray. I saw a picture of him shirtless. He's got a great body, and I must investigate below the belt. Did you have to duke it out with Hayward for Ronnie boy?"

"I did and you can declare me the winner," Jane said. "He promised he'd never see her again."

"I met Regis Toomey," Goddard said. "He's in my picture, too. You and Regis, as you know, hold the world's screen kiss record. Frankly, I wouldn't even let that loser kiss me on the cheek."

"I did it for a day's pay," she said. "He knows he has no future as a leading man. He actually said something smart. He told me, 'I'd rather be a supporting actor than a star—supporting actors last longer.'"

"True, true," Goddard said. "But he left out something. A true female movie star, after the blush of youth fades, can always marry a very rich man and live in luxury for the rest of her life. Men love to marry movie stars."

Incidentally, my divorce from Charlie [Chaplin] is coming through in June [1942]. I'm a bachelor gal once again—thank God. I'm playing the field, darling."

While preparing for her third picture in 1942, Jane read Robert Ellis' script of Footlight Serenade. "Hell in a basket," she told Reagan and others. "Here I am, playing Betty Grable's sidekick. Always a sidekick, never a star. I get to rub Grable's ankles when she's tired from dancing. Betty and I started out in the chorus line with Goddard and Lucille Ball. Now Betty's heading for the bigtime, and I'm still taking the leftovers."

"It's not so bad," Reagan assured her. "At least you're drawing a fine paycheck."

When Reagan read the script, he said, "I see that John Payne plays your husband. I worked out with him when you guys did Kid Nightingale. My god, that guy practically did a striptease on camera. I hear the gals really go for him. But in this flicker, he's got to compete with a guy they call 'The Body Beautiful.'"

Cast as a conceited boxer, a shirtless Victor Mature is interviewed by an admiring news reporter.

[The reference was to Victor Mature, cast as a conceited heavyweight boxing champion who wants to put on a Broadway show with a part for Betty Grable. Unknown to Mature, Jane, in a secondary role, is secretly married to Payne, also in the cast. The predictable complications ensue. No one ever accused Ellis of being a great screenwriter.]

"Ellis must have been on something when he came up with the name of my character," Jane said. "Flo La Verne. Isn't that just too precious for words?"

Ellis gave Jane a line that would have no special meaning for 1942 audiences, but which would get a laugh when shown to audiences in the Reagan 1980s. At one point, Grable tells Jane that she plans to become the understudy to the star of the show. Jane quips, "You have as much of a chance of being the understudy as I have of being the First Lady."

Torn between two hunks, John Payne (left) and Victor Mature, Betty Grable called herself "The luckiest girl in the world. I had both of them. Jane Wyman prefers John."

[As Jane told Goddard in the early 1980s, "Had I stayed married to Ronnie, I'd be First Lady now, going down in the history books. The way it is, history will shine on that little MGM starlet, instead. What was the poor dear's name? Nancy something? I went to see one of her movies only because it had my friend, Barbara Stanwyck, in it. I fell into a deadly coma."]

Although Jane had met Grable at the same time she had been introduced to Goddard and Lucille Ball, she'd never been as close to Grable as she was to the other two actresses.

Ratoff told Jane that Darryl F. Zanuck at Fox had granted Grable some leeway in the selection of her female co-star. Ironically, the two choices were Jane and Ball. Grable chose Ball because she said, "Her career has fallen into the briar patch."

When Ball arrived for lunch with Jane and Grable, Grable was not available, as she had retreated with Mature.

At table, Ball said to Jane, "Long time no see, kid."

"I heard you turned down my role," Jane said. "Is my part that bad?"

"It was okay, rather routine," Ball said. "My real reason is that I wanted to star in The Big Street (1942). If I'd accepted Footlight, I wouldn't be available for The Big Street. By the way, I hear RKO is not going to renew my contract."

"I hope that's just a rumor and that it isn't ture," Jane said. "All of us live in fear of losing our contracts. I think you're great, and I loved you and Desi [Arnaz] in Too Many Girls (1940)."

"I did, too," Ball said, "and at least I met Desi. I'm mad about the boy. So are a hundred other women. Darling Desi likes to service all of us, including, on occasion, the cocksucking mouth of César Romero."

Both women shared memories of the early 1930s and their struggles at the time, remembering when they'd been cast in the chorus line of The Kid From Spain. Although Jane wasn't delighted with her current role, she vowed to make the best of it.

"For me, the highlight of the movie will be when I put on boxing gloves and duke it out with Betty," Jane said. "My anxiety is that we've both got to wear shortie short shorts, and her legs were voted most beautiful in the world."

"We all fall short in some department," Ball said. "As for me, I'm always getting cast with well-stacked broads, and I'm known as the 'No Tit Wonder.'"

For the most part, Jane and Grable got along during the shoot. So far, it seemed that Jane was still unaware of any involvement with the blonde goddess and her husband.

Jealousy did arrive on one occasion, and that was when the costume designer, Earl Luick, presented Grable with a very sexy gown. Grable rejected it. "I'd prefer to wear skunk," she told Luick.

He then crossed out Grable's name on the garment's design sketch and wrote in Wyman's name in its place. After the gown was made, Jane wore it in a scene. At its conclusion, the crew "wolf-whistled" her. In Jane's words, "Betty was seriously pissed off."

Four days later, Grable had recovered from her upset and invited Jane to go with her to Zanuck's office. "I want you to sit outside the door in the secretary's office. If Zanuck tries to rape me, and if you hear me screaming, call security."

Grable remained in Zanuck's office for nearly an hour, and Jane heard no screaming. When she finally emerged, Grable's face was beaming. "No rape, darling, but I got a pay raise to $2,000 a week. Also, a promise to shoot all my future films in Technicolor. And you know how gorgeous I look in Technicolor. He told me he would have shot Footlight Serenade in color, but he was in short supply of color stock because of the war."

Jane later said to friends, "I adore Betty, but the green bug bites me, hard, ever so often. Especially that afternoon when she left Zanuck's office. It was not just the pay raise, but she told me she was getting some 5,000 fan letters a week, mostly from servicemen."

Grable had a tough dancing number with her song, "I Heard the Birdies Sing." She had to (cheerfully) engage in a boxing match with her own shadow. For help, she called in her sometimes boyfriend, George Raft. Jane had been seduced by him during the production of Rumba, when she had a bit part opposite the female lead, Carole Lombard. Jane came over to him to shake his hand. She later complained to Grable, "The conceited bastard once fucked me. Now he doesn't know me."

"What does it matter?" Grable asked. "By the way, I think he's a latent homosexual. He lived with Valentino in New York, and I heard those roomies really went at it. During my so-called affair with George, about the only time he ever touched me was to beat me up."

As always, director Ratoff rattled off instructions in his thick Russian accent filled with more malapropisms than Samuel Goldwyn. When he saw that Jane didn't like her role, he suggested, "You should become a bobcat (perhaps he meant 'wildcat'?) like Olivia de Havilland and Bette Davis. They barged into Jack Warner's office and demanded stronger parts. They're getting them."

"I can't do that," Jane said. "Frankly, I'm glad to be employed. Let's face it: Those wisecracking blondes of the 30s, of which I was one, are being shown to the door. Take Glenda Farrell and Joan Blondell, for instance. I fear I might be next. At least, I'm occasionally given the female lead, as when I co-starred with Edward G. Robinson. It's better to work than it is to stand at the gate of Warners looking through the iron bars."

Jane found herself appearing with Phil Silvers again, after having co-starred with him and Jimmy Durante in You're In the Army Now.

"This time around, poor ugly Phil, a scene stealer himself, had to compete with two handsome hunks, and he was no match for John and Victor," Jane said. She introduced him around, presenting him as a comedian. He corrected her. "I'm a comic actor. I don't do stand-up." Because he'd just completed filming My Gal Sal (1942), he needed no introduction to that picture's male star, Mature himself.

Many envious stars had become profoundly bored with the constant barrage of fan magazine fluff about what an ideal couple Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan were. Consequently, they were eager for news of infidelities associated with either member of the marriage of "America's Sweethearts."

One case emerged when Jane invited singer Joy Hodges to the Fox commissary for lunch. Reagan remembered Hodges fondly for her help in snagging his first screen test. Involved in a car accident, Hodges couldn't make it to the luncheon, but Mature wandered in and asked Jane if he could share her table.

He had been freed of Grable that afternoon because she and John Payne were meeting with director Irving Cummings about their next co-starring vehicle, Springtime in the Rockies (1942). "I don't envy Payne," Mature told Jane. "In this upcoming movie with Betty, he's got to fight off the sexual advances of both César Romero and Carmen Miranda."

Throughout most of the luncheon, Mature was quite flirtatious with Jane. She didn't exactly welcome his advances, but didn't reject them either. A photographer snapped a picture of the two of them as he was holding her hand. The next morning, when it appeared in the papers, the rumor mill began grinding out tales of a torrid affair that Mature was conducting with Jane during the filming of the picture. Jane was not as upset as she might have been, because the faux romance with Mature threw "the hounds off the scent of John and me," as she told Goddard.

In front of his assembled cast, Ratoff predicted that Footlight Serenade would become the hit musical of 1942. He was wrong. Nonetheless, it attracted a reasonable box office success, in large part because of Grable's marvelous dancing and the authentic-looking backstage sets.

Footlight Serenade marked a key moment in Grable's increasing visibility as the box office champion of World War II. Based partly on the success of that film, "The Girl With the Million Dollar Legs" would become the most famous pinup queen of World War II.

Juke Girl wrapped late on a Saturday night. By Monday morning, Reagan was rushed into shooting Desperate Journey, a sort of anti-Nazi action/adventure/propaganda film with Errol Flynn as his co-star. The script depicted Nazis as dunderheads and nincompoops.

With the exception of Michael Curtiz, Reagan didn't always get a first-rate director, certainly not for his B pictures. That changed with Desperate Journey, directed by Raoul Walsh.

"His characters are projected on the world by their own energy and committed to a space that only exists for ther actions, fury, spirit, craft, ambition, and unbridled dreams."

Walsh, a New Yorker, had worn an eyepatch ever since his was driving through the Utah desert and a jackrabbit crashed through his windshield, spraying his face with shattered glass and putting out his right eye.

Prior to his accident, Walsh had portrayed John Wilkes Booth, Lincoln's assassin, in D.W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation (1915). As an actor, he had also interpreted the role of Gloria Swanson's boyfriend in Sadie Thompson (1928). After the loss of his eye, this hard-core Hollywood veteran directed such stars as John Wayne, James Cagney, and Humphrey Bogart.

[Marlene Dietrich told people that Walsh was the biggest "pain in the ass I've ever known."]

Reagan wasn't thrilled at being directed by Walsh, who had just completed They Died With Their Boots On (1941) with Errol Flynn cast as General George Armstrong Custer.

Reagan still resented losing the role to Flynn, after he'd portrayed Custer in Santa Fe Trail. Reagan's resentment—jealousy, really—increased when he learned that Walsh and Flynn were contemplating five more films in their immediate future—Gentleman Jim (1942); Northern Pursuit (1943); Uncertain Glory (1944); Objective, Burma! (1945); and Silver River (1948).

Ironically, although many of these upcoming Walsh films contained roles that could have been handled by Reagan, he had to serve in the military. Cynically, he frequently wondered, "If Flynn were such a 'perfect specimen' (as the title of one of his movies had implied), why hadn't he been drafted, too?"

He'd heard rumors of Flynn's ill health, but didn't believe them. "The guy's body looks too terrific to have anything wrong with it," Reagan told his friends. "Walsh and Flynn are so close, they look like brothers…or should I say, lovers? They've got their arms around each other, and they go out at night lowering Hollywood's liquor supply and bursting maidenheads even if there aren't many of them around these days."

Flynn called Walsh "Uncle," the director referring to his star and best friend as "The Baron."

"He's my kind of man," Flynn said to Reagan. "He was an athlete, a stunt rider, a man's man. He's also a man's director, the exact opposite of cocksucking George Cukor, the so-called Women's Director."

Reagan was provocative when he discussed Flynn privately with Walsh. "Does Flynn's homosexuality bother you?"

"Hell, no!" Walsh said. "A stiff prick has no conscience. A hole is a hole is a hole. If it provides sexual relief, it does its job. Why would the gender of a person matter if either one brings sexual satisfaction?"

"I've never heard it put that way before," Reagan said.

“I don’t know how many times Flynn has told me he’s in love,” Walsh said. “Right now, he has the hots for Helmut Dantine. This weekend it will be someone else. He doubles his chances by not being gender specific.”

Unusual for him, Reagan was also provocative when he talked privately with Flynn. “You look in great shape, man,” he said. “But Walsh told me you were classified 4-F.”

“I’ve been examined by private doctors and Army doctors,” Flynn said. “My decadent lifestyle has caught up with me—too much sex, too much liquor, too much opium and cocaine, too many cigarettes. I was told that my heart and lungs are irreparably damaged. One doctor predicted that I have only two years to live.”

Flynn leaned over to Reagan and whispered, “I don’t want this to get around, but I occasionally have recurrent bouts of venereal disease, although I’m clean for now, at least. I have a heart murmur and recurrent malaria. Get this: I also have tuberculosis in my right lung.”

“Sorry to hear that,” Reagan said. “You’d never know any of that crap by looking at you. How are you going to handle all this?”

“I’m going to double up on my smoking and drinking,” he said. “I’m thirty-two years old now, and if I have to leave this earth so soon, I’m going to have sex three times a day—twice with women, the other with some boy ass. If I get horny in between, I’m going to take it out and masturbate, regardless of who’s looking. Would you like me to demonstrate, sport?”

As Flynn started to unzip, Reagan protested, “Not today…maybe a week from now.”

Of the many pictures snapped of Errol Flynn, dressed or undressed, this was his all-time favorite.

He had only one complaint: “It doesn’t show my most celebrated asset.”

Flynn admitted that he had specifically requested Reagan for the role, even though he resented any scene where he might shine. “I found on Santa Fe Trail that you and I blend in well together on the screen—good chemistry. Frankly, if you weren’t such a square, we could blend together perfectly off screen, too, as we’re well matched.”

“Errol, I told you—it was NO yesterday, NO today, and NO tomorrow.”

“You’re really missing out on the time of your life, sport,” he answered.

As shooting progressed, Reagan began to take Flynn’s health claims seriously. Before the picture wrapped, his weight had dropped to just 165 pounds. Wardrobe had to re-tailor his wardrobe and in some cases, use padding.

“They don’t have to pad me in the crotch, though,” he told Reagan. “That remains as fat as ever.”

In spite of his bravado, he often didn’t make it to the set until noon, which inevitably brought a lashing from Walsh.

“But ‘Uncle’ was the eternal forgiving father,” Reagan said. “No matter how many times Flynn fucked up in this preposterous Rover Boy-like saga we were making.”

In its production of Desperate Journey, a film that was increasingly interpreted as a useful propaganda film suitable for viewing by audiences within each of the nations allied against Hitler, Warners made it a point to include portrayals of aviators from most of the Allied Nations.

In Desperate Journey, Errol Flynn (left) and Ronald Reagan, wearing Nazi uniforms, make nincompoops out of the Germans in this preposterous, implausible yarn.

In the movie, the leader of the mission is an Australian, Flynn himself, playing Flight Lieutenant. Forbes. Reagan got second billing—in letters as big as Flynn's—cast as the American flight officer, Johnny Hammond. Alan Hale, Sr. played an R.A.F. veteran, Flight Sergeamt Kirk Edwards, who hailed from Scotland. As flying officer Jed Forrest, Arthur Kennedy represented Canada; and a very young Ronald Sinclair portrayed an Englishman, Lieutenant Flight Sergeant Lloyd Hollis II, the "baby" of the crew.

The plot contained no real love interest, but Nancy Coleman was cast as Kaethe Brahms, who comes to the aid of the downed pilots. Reagan had appeared with her in Kings Row, in which she'd been cast as his first girlfriend. He told Walsh, "With Nancy, there is no way I'm going to come down with my usual disease of Leadinglady-itis. You've dressed her up to look like a dyke librarian."

Ronald Reagan: the only U.S. President to publicly impersonate a Nazi.

The villain of the piece was the veteran actor Raymond Massey, playing Major Otto Baumeister, no longer John Brown or Abe Lincoln from Illinois. Wearing a monacle, no less, and menacing, he interpreted his role as a Nazi commander of a prison for Allied soldiers in a sneering, utterly unconvincing way.

The mission of the Allied pilots involved flying over Schneidemühl, close to the Polish border, and bombing the railway junction that channeled Nazi munitions trains on to other parts of the Western and Eastern Fronts.

After successfully bombing their target, the heroes' plane is shot down and they are rounded up and imprisoned. They are interrogated and threatened in Massey's office. But through a ruse, they escape and begin a cross-country trek through Germany, with the Nazis hot on their trail. At one point, they slip aboard a train and secretly enter Hermann Göring's private railroad car, where they break into the Nazi's private stocks of food and liquor until they're discovered.

As part of the process, they unveil a treasure trove of secret Nazi documents, including the locations of secret Messerschmidt factories manufacturing planes to bomb Britain.

As they cross Germany, they leave a trail of destruction, including setting fire to chemical works in Berlin and mowing down hundreds of Nazis.

Flynn declares, "We're going to be the first invasion to hit Germany since Napoléon." Their feats, as later appraised by critics, "would put even Superman to shame."

As Bosley Crowther of The New York Times put it, "The frenzied action is filled with hair-raising, side-splitting adventures, a wild goose trek across Germany, including slugging guards, knocking out Raymond Massey, car chases, and incidental sabotage. You need to turn to the comics to see action like this."

At the end, only three of the original crew, depicted as "The Three Musketeers," remain alive. In a feat of astonishing daring, they manage to mow down fields of armed Nazis as part of their plan to commandeer a German aircraft ready for a bombing attack on the waterworks of England.

After subduing the Nazi security guards protecting the plane, the three Allied airmen take off. But before they reach the English Channel, they release a bomb aboard the plane to destroy a German munitions factory.

At the end of the movie, Flynn proclaims, "Now for Australia and a crack at those Japs."

Flynn had to memorize many lines in German, which he delivers fluidly and smoothly during scenes depicting his friends' interrogation by Nazi guards.

At one point, Flynn tells Reagan, "I don't want you to upstage me. I've become used to sharing co-billing with females like Ann Sheridan or Bette Davis. But sharing such a billing with a male is a bit hard for me to take, sport."

Ultimately, Flynn demanded that Reagan's best scene be transferred to him, a demand that eventually led to a widely observed argument between Flynn and Walsh. Of course, the two men later made up, but Walsh nonetheless insisted he wanted Reagan to interpret the scene. In it, Massey has prisoner Reagan brought into his office, hoping that the American might reveal the secrets of a newly developed American bomber plane.

Desperate Journey's incarnation of a malicious but incompetent Nazi: Raymond Massey.

Although the character played by Massey speaks English, Reagan uses double-talk, inventing works such as "thermacockle" and "dermodyne." He later knocks Massey out, eats his breakfast, and helps the other prisoners escape from the heavily guarded Nazi compound.

Reagan delivers a few good quips, although some of them come at inappropriate times. The Allied soldiers are being chased by a Nazi patrol intent on killing them. When the pilots' stolen German car runs out of gas, Reagan says, "This is the first time I ever ran out of gas with a couple of guys."

There was a certain irony in one of Reagan's lines. He is awakened by a member of his crew. He complains, "Why do you have to wake me up when I was having a date with Ann Sheridan?" He'd just completed Juke Girl with Sheridan, with whom he had had shared intimacies that went way beyond those of a mere "date."

When Kennedy, a co-star in Desperate Journey, lunched one day with Reagan, he had just completed They Died With Their Boots On with Flynn.

"I heard on every picture, Flynn has some young actor following him around panting," Kennedy said. "On this one, it's not Helmut Dantine, but Ronald Sinclair. In the General Custer movie, it was a young man named William Meade. He was a rich kid set to inherit a fortune and was a great guy, just the kind Flynn likes—handsome, athletic, fabulous body, and a crack polo player. In spite of all his money, he wanted to act. Flynn got him a job as an extra. Then tragedy struck. During the filming of the massacre of Custer and his army at the Little Bighorn, Meade fell from his horse onto his sword, which pierced his heart. Flynn went into mourning, and rightfully so. The whole cast was saddened by the passing of that kid."

Alan Hale, Sr. was by now a familiar face to Reagan, having worked with him before, most recently on Juke Girl. He usually liked to have lunch with Flynn, but that ritual was put on hold whenever Flynn retreated at noontime to his dressing room with Sinclair.

Hale amused Reagan, telling of his adventures making movies with Flynn. "Once I, along with three other actors, were chatting and having a few nips with Flynn in his dressing room. All of a sudden, Lupe Velez appeared. She just walked right in, ignoring us, and unzipped Errol and went down on him. As she was sword swallowing, she looked up and saw this statuette of the Madonna and Child on his dressing table. She broke off her suction to cross herself and beg for forgiveness from the Madonna, then resumed her work. She's a complete exhibitionist."

Flynn kept badgering Reagan to come to his Mulholland Farm, high above Los Angeles on Mulholland Drive, for drinks and dinner. Finally, Reagan agreed, but insisted on bringing Jane, warning Flynn, "My wife is a lady—so cool it."

Flynn obviously must have found that amusing, as he'd seduced Jane long before her husband ever did.

Later, Jane and Flynn pulled off the charade, never letting Reagan know that, years prior to their get-together, she'd been an overnight visitor.

An article in Photoplay, quoting Reagan, revealed his newest impression of the Aussie: "Here was not a swashbuckler's eyrie, but the home of a man with quiet culture. Books on philosophy, adventure, the best fiction, copies of bespoke travel in foreign lands, a musical library of the best symphonic records, everywhere the evidence of taste and thoughtful living. I had to revamp my image of Errol. Here was a man with a capacity—and a need—for friendship."

In Desperate Journey, unlike in most Flynn pictures, romantic entanglements almost didn't exist, since the cast was mainly male except for Coleman. Nonetheless, Flynn maintained his reputation as an ace seducer, although he ran into trouble with Dantine.

The handsome, gracious Austrian was twenty-five years old.

He told Reagan, "It's so ironic. Here I am playing a Luftwaffe pilot and also a Nazi pilot in Mrs. Miniver, and I'm one of the most anti-Nazi men around."

Biographer David Bret summed up Flynn's sexual dilemma during the filming of Desperate Journey.

"Dantine, like actor Patric Knowles, soon found himself fighting off Errol's amorous advances—though had Errol been aware that the young man was Jewish, he most definitely would not have been interested. Dantine had long since set his sights on Tyrone Power, and according to a statement given at the time by his friend, Tallulah Bankhead, as Power was away fighting in the war, Dantine was 'saving himself' for his lover's return."

Back on the set, Flynn turned his sexual attention onto the youngest actor on the set, Ronald Sinclair, who was only "barely legal" at the time. A native New Zealander, he was known as a pretty boy with a baby face.

Flynn confided in Reagan, "Unlike you, this Ronnie is a hell of a lot more cooperative in satisfying my sexual desires. He's a sodomite's dream fantasy come true. I think he's straight, and he complains that I hurt him, but he always gives in to me. He would-n't dare turn down the star of the picture."

In the middle of filming, the U.S. government sent word to Reagan that he had only two weeks to finish his work on Desperate Journey. Jack Warner had not succeeded in getting him a more extended deferment. Walsh had to reschedule his shooting, and begin to film scenes out of sequence. There was great pressure. Reagan later wrote: "Long shots of my back were saved for a double after I was gone."

A minor actor, David Casey, later said, "My claim to fame is that I once played Ronald Reagan in a movie, but only my back."

To Reagan's amazement, he learned that Wasserman had renegotiated an even more profitable contract than his recent one, this one authorizing a salary of $3,500 a week for forty-three weeks of work annually.

"But I thought Warner contracts usually called for forty weeks of work, annually. Why the extra three weeks?" Reagan asked.

Wasserman explained, "I knew that Warner wouldn't go higher than $3,500 a week. That's more than he's paid any star, including Flynn. Those forty-three weeks, spread out over seven years, will eventually total more than a million dollars. As you know, you once made a film called Million Dollar Baby," Wasserman said. "Thanks to this contract, you, Mr. Reagan, are now MCA's Million Dollar Baby."

Baby Maureen and Jane tell Reagan goodbye as he heads out early to report for duty at the War Propaganda Department. For a while, at least, Jane's parting sally to him was, "Win one for the Gipper."

At long last, success," Reagan lamented. "The moment it happens, I go into the Army on a soldier's pay of $250 a month."

Unlike Jane Wyman, Reagan often liked to stay home at night, reading newspapers or listening to the war news. In contrast, she wanted to go dancing almost every night. Before he went into the Army, he made a deal with her, agreeing to take her out as often as possible.

With a nanny looking after Maureen, Reagan and Jane became regulars at the Brown Derby, followed by dancing at the Cocoanut Grove or the Trocadero. Chasen's became their favorite dining venue, as Reagan considered its chefs the finest in Los Angeles.

Increasingly, they went out with other couples, especially Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor. Apparently, neither Stanwyck nor Reagan ever learned that their respective spouses had had a brief fling together during the filming of The Crowd Roars.

Sometimes, particularly at Chasen's, Jane and Reagan were seen dining with their boss, Jack Warner, and his wife, Ann Page. They were also friendly with agents Lew Wasserman and his wife, the former Edith Beckerman, and with Jules Stein and his wife, the former Doris Jones.

But Jane detested Reagan's new friend, director Sam Wood, who'd helmed him in Kings Row. Politically, she viewed him as "to the right of Josef Goebbels." Still a liberal Democrat, Reagan seemed to enjoy endless political debates with the virulently anti-communist Wood. Perhaps this was the beginning of Reagan's training for his presidential debates of the 1980s.

Finally, Jane told him, "I've had it! I've got other things to do than sit around listening to you guys go at it. From now on, count me out. I'll make other plans."

It was at that time that Jane began to "date" Van Johnson, the strawberry blonde, freckle-faced singer, actor, and dancer, who was being groomed to appear in all those "Boy-Next-Door" roles in World War II-era movies.

Her friend, Lucille Ball, had introduced them. Ball had been instrumental in launching Johnson's movie career. He'd appeared with her and with Desi Arnaz in the movie, Too Many Girls (1940).

She told Jane, "I just adore Van, and he'd be the perfect escort to take you dancing. Not only is he a good dancer, but he won't put the make on you…ever! He plays ball for the opposite team."

"Oh, I see," she said.

Jane explained the situation to Reagan about her need for an escort, telling him that "Van is harmless, although I doubt if I can trust him around you."

He told her, "This Johnson boy sounds like a fine choice for you."

Johnson and Jane became intimate friends on their first date. She later said, "Van is marvelous. He's dedicated to having a movie career, but he's also a lot of fun. He's a fabulous dancer, but I kept up with him. I was flattered when he complimented me on my dancing. In some clubs, we took over the floor, the other couples standing back to watch us go. I felt the years disappear from my age. At the end of the evening, I got a peck on the cheek."

Over the next few months, Jane was photographed with Johnson many times. Insiders such as Hedda Hopper and Louella Parsons knew that Johnson was a "vanilla date," but much of the public began to believe that Jane was cheating on her husband while he was at home changing Baby Maureen's diapers. There were rumors that "Hollywood's Most Ideal Couple," as they were dubbed in the press, were actually on the dawn of breaking up.

Reagan knew that he would be away from Jane for weeks at a time during his military service, and it seemed that Jane's arrangement with Johnson would be most suitable.

Johnson was often invited to the Reagan's house for one of her home-cooked dinners, since he was leading the bachelor life. He jokingly kidded Jane in private, "If you ever decide to dump that handsome hunk of yours, I get first grabs."

"Oh, Van," she answered. "How you boys talk."

Jane and Johnson had reasons other than dancing as motivations for their dating.

Each served as a "beard" for the other. Johnson was carrying on a clandestine affair with the dancer/actor Gene Kelly. On Broadway, Johnson had been Kelly's under-study during his hit show, My Pal Joey, where he played a womanizing louse. With a Hollywood contract, Kelly had made For Me and My Gal (1942) with Judy Garland, in which he'd played another heel trying to avoid the draft.

Reagan gave Jane permission to "date" handsome Van Johnson, with his clean-cut boy-next-door look. Perhaps Van's gender preference for men reassured everyone that he wouldn't pose any serious threat to the Reagan marriage.

Jane and Johnson deliberately were seen together in the early part of any given evening. But often, they slipped away and separated before the night was over. Sometimes, Jane didn't arrive home until two o'clock in the morning. Apparently, Reagan never questioned the lateness of her returns home.

Johnson often disappeared into the arms of Gene Kelly, Jane preferring the arms of Dennis Morgan or John Payne. This arrangement would continue through the war years and beyond.

No one seemed to suspect what was really going on behind the scenes, with the possible exception of Reagan, who had already been alerted to his wife's dalliances with both Payne and Morgan.

Unlike her own slow rise to fame, Johnson seemed to be "storming through 1942" (Jane's words) in his movie career. He'd been cast as a cub reporter opposite Faye Emerson in the filming of Murder in the Big House (1942), during which he was asked to dye his eyebrows and hair black. He'd also had a small role in MGM's Somewhere I'll Find You, starring Clark Gable and Lana Turner.

"Gable and I played poker a lot," Johnson later said, "although he told me in the beginning, 'I don't like fags.' Not so Lana. She adores us boys. Problem was, the damn director, Wesley Ruggles, terrified me so much I kept blowing my lines."

Since Broadway, Gene Kelly had been dancing into the arms of Van Johnson.

On a few nights, Jane was seen with both Johnson and his new friend, Keenan Wynn, who had made his screen debut in Somewhere I'll Find You.

Wynn had married Eve Lynn Abbott, but in the beginning—for obvious reasons—she was not included in their outings. Kelly was usually involved with actress Betsy Blair (his eventual wife) and wasn't always free. Johnson admitted, "Keenan is not the prettiest face in the world, but I love him dearly. We're an item. In spite of his looks, he's a hot number in bed."

Keenan Wynn...Van Johnson's secret love.

Johnson, when not with Jane, was often seen out with "Keenan and Evie," as he called them. Rumors spread that they were a threesome, as Jane revealed to Reagan one night.

"That's fine with me," he said, "providing you don't make it a foursome."

Amour and Scandals Royal: Princess O'Rourke (Olivia de Havilland), disguised as a "commoner," is helped and hosted by the kindly Jane Wyman, who is married, as part of the plot, to Jack Carson.

Before heading to Warners to play a supporting role in Olivia de Havilland's latest movie, Princess O'Rourke, Jane complained to the ever-patient Reagan: "I detest Olivia. I don't have anything against her personally, but I envy her roles, which I think should have gone to me. On the set, I'm going to be ever so polite to her. After all, I'm an actress and can pull that off. It wouldn't do me any good to let her know how I feel about her. I'll have to talk to her sister one day. I hear Joan Fontaine loathes Olivia. Maybe Joan could deliver the real story about her sister."

"It sounds like you have the same kind of envious relationship with Olivia that I have with Errol Flynn. We don't want to be them, we want merely to take over their movie roles."

When Jane reported to work at Warners for the filming of Princess O'Rourke, the first person she encountered was De Havilland, who had arrived early. The star of the picture graciously invited Jane for a morning coffee in her dressing room. To Jane's astonishment, she discovered that De Havilland envied the choice roles being funneled to Bette Davis, just as much as Jane envied parts going to De Havilland. In spite of her envy, however, De Havilland maintained an uneasy friendship with Davis.

"Jack Warner still thinks of me as an ingénue and doesn't give me the meaty roles I want." De Havilland complained. "I wanted to star in The Letter, a role which, of course, went to Bette. I even wanted the role she played in The Man Who Came to Dinner opposite Monty Woolley. I think Ida Lupino often gets better roles than mine. I wanted her part in The Hard Way (1942), but I was turned down."

After enough Hollywood gossip, De Havilland became very businesslike. “Now, let’s go over this script. It not only will be directed by Norman Krasna, but he wrote its script. That will make it extra difficult for me when I have to tamper with some of his lines.”

Before even going over the script, De Havilland told Jane, “Remember, I’m of royal blood in the movie, and I act regal even when incognita as a princess. You are a commoner—in fact, I want you to act drab and common, married to a slob like Jack Carson. At no point are you to take the spotlight off me. Imagine yourself as a lady-in-waiting in my shadow.”

Originally, Fred MacMurray had been slated for the Robert Cummings lead, and he probably would have been more convincing as an airplane pilot studly enough to produce male heirs, the hope of the princess’ uncle (Charles Coburn). MacMurray, however, dropped out, pleading previous commitments to Paramount.

When she’d first read Krasna’s script, De Havilland rejected the role of the princess, claiming that she would not report to work if she was assigned the part. Confronted with her defiance, Jack Warner ordered that she be suspended. As her replacement, he contacted Alexis Smith, asking her to test for the role and go through a wardrobe fitting. But before a contract could be drawn up with Smith, De Havilland had a change of mind and reported back to work, adhering to an erratic, diva-driven schedule that forced Krasna on many a day to shoot around her.

Love, American style: Jack Carson and Jane Wyman set a good example for a lonely, misguided monarch.

Princess O’Rourke was a Cinderella-in-reverse tale, evoking a precursor of a roughly equivalent movie released in 1953, Roman Holiday, that starred Audrey Hepburn as a demure but rebellious princess in Rome.

Princess O’Rourke was a light comedy set in wartime Washington, D.C., with Olivia de Havilland cast as Princess Maria, fleeing from an unnamed European country after being driven out by the Nazis.

She is on a visit to the nation’s capital with her Uncle Holman (Charles Coburn). Claude Rains had lobbied for the role, but lost it to Coburn.

Disappointed with the traditional and tired blood lines of conventional European royalty, Coburn is seeking a fresh, “virile” American as a proper consort prince for Maria.

Traveling incognito, and presumably terrified of flying, she swallows some sleeping pills aboard a flight piloted by Eddie O’Rourke (Robert Cummings). When the flight has to turn back because of bad weather, Cummings can’t arouse Maria from her pill-induced slumber, so he graciously hauls her off to his apartment, where she will presumably recover, unharmed, from the effects of the pills.

From there, the plot thickens. When the Princess awakens, Cummings assumes that she is “Mary Williams,” an impoverished European refugee. “Mary” is subsequently befriended by a very down-to-earth couple, Jean Campbell (Jane), the wife of Dave Campbell (Jack Carson.)

The mistaken identity plot thickens and complications ensue.

Finally, it all ends happily, with a White House wedding presided over by Harry Davenport, playing a Supreme Court Justice. A lookalike for the president’s dog, Fala, makes his screen debut.

In the early 1940s, Fala was the most famous dog in America. He's depicted here beside his owner, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

In Princess O'Rourke, the role of Fala as a symbol of the president himself was assigned to a (canine) stand-in.

In the film, the princess writes a note to her suitor, Cummings, which the little Scottie dog delivers to his room. The setting, which accurately replicated the interior of the White House, was created by designers on Warner backlots.

A New Yorker, Norman Krasna was a playwright, screenwriter, producer, and film director. Jane had first met him when she had a bit role on his movie, The King and the Chorus Girl.

Gladys Cooper: Aristocratic and domineering.

Krasna was mostly known for writing screwball comedies involving mistaken identity. For his script of Princess O'Rourke, he won an Academy Award.

Not only did Carson and Jane lead a strong supporting cast, but they were joined by other major talent, notably an elegant Londoner, Gladys Cooper, playing a governess and secretary to the princess. Jane frequently had tea with her at four o'clock.

She later recalled, "Dame Gladys was the most impressive actress I ever worked with."

Born in 1888, Cooper had begun her career on the stage as a teenager in Edwardian musical comedies before going into dramatic roles in silent films. She delayed her arrival in Hollywood until 1940, where she began to play a series of character parts, often cast as a disapproving, snobbish, aristocratic society woman. Famous roles include her casting in Rebecca (1940), starring Laurence Olivier and Joan Fontaine. The year Jane met Cooper, she was also cast as the domineering mother of Bette Davis in Now, Voyager (1942), which would bring Cooper an Academy Award nomination as Best Supporting Actress.

Jane chatted briefly with Julie Wilson, who had been cast as a stewardess. She was terribly disappointed in her reduced status as an actress. As Jane well knew, she'd been one of Reagan's leading ladies in International Squadron.

During the year he'd filmed Princess O'Rourke, Coburn also starred in The More the Merrier for which he would win a 1943 Oscar as Best Supporting Actor.

"Because Ronnie has screened Kings Row countless times, I must confess I've come to hate you," Jane said. "You seem so nice in person, but such a monster on screen."

"Don't let my niceness fool you," Coburn said, jokingly. "I have a black heart—in fact, I'm just a dirty old man."

During the making of Princess O'Rourke, Carson, in later life, admitted that he'd served once again as the "beard" for Jane during her illicit romance with Dennis Morgan. Ostensibly, Morgan made frequent visits to the set to see his best friend, Carson. "We lunched with Jane in the commissary and later retreated to my dressing room," Carson recalled. "I'd slip out discreetly and leave Dennis and Jane to pursue whatever perversions they wanted to—just kidding, folks. The meetings with Jane and Dennis became easier in the future because Warner cast all of us in pictures together. In fact, my next picture was with Jane."

De Havilland conflicted on several occasions with Cummings. He ran into frequent scheduling conflicts, as he was also filming Between the Girls at Universal. Knowing that he was a secret cross dresser, film crews teased him endlessly about the title of the movie.

When De Havilland did show up on the set, she was infuriated to find that Cummings was shooting at Universal. Often, she'd have to deliver her lines to a stand-in. She was also frustrated that Coburn kept forgetting his lines, calling for numerous retakes in his scenes with her.

The tension between De Havilland and Warners intensified as shooting progressed, or didn't progress, on Princess O'Rourke. Suffering from low blood pressure, De Havilland began to arrive late and leave early. Some days, she called in sick.

Her frustration with Warners led to a lawsuit. Unlike Bette Davis, who lost her own bitter legal battles with Warners, De Havilland ultimately prevailed.

The production of Princess O'Rourke was one of the most troublesome vehicles ever turned out by Warners. Although filmed mostly in 1942, its release was held up for almost a year because of legal issues, most of them revolving around De Havilland and her lawsuit to get out of her contract.

Before the eventual release of Princess O'Rourke, a firestorm of criticism came from Washington and its wartime Bureau of Motion Pictures. A copy of the film was shipped for screening. Within a day, a strongly worded letter of objection arrived from BMP officers, citing that the script had not been pre-approved. Nelson Poynter, the director of the BMP Office in Hollywood, called on Warner at Burbank. He accused Warner Brothers of "recklessly using the war for background incidents in an opportunistic attempt to capitalize off America's epic battle rather than to interpret it."

He also objected to the depiction of the President, who remained looming somewhere in the background. "You make him sound like a busybody," Poynter charged. "You've also caricatured the Secret Service and made fun of our Allies among European nobility." In spite of these stern objections, BMP did nothing to stop the eventual release of the picture.

In general, Jane was mostly singled out for decent reviews, and in some ways, Princess O'Rourke marked a turning point in her career as it provided a showcase for her comedic talents. She was especially good and appraised as "Sparkplug capable with her foil, Jack Carson." For the most part, the picture got good reviews, Variety defining it as a "spritely, effervescing, and laugh explosive comedy-romance." It enjoyed moderate success in its day. When it was re-released decades later, modern viewers were not as kind.

When gossips got word of Robert Taylor's entry into the armed forces, they joked that an even more effective fighter might be his wife, Bloody Babs, shown here brandishing scissors in the tough, lady-like but macho style for which she had become infamous.

It was early morning in the household of Barbara Stanwyck and her husband, Robert Taylor. Pouring her morning coffee, Stanwyck went to the phone to hear Reagan's cheerful voice. "You're always so god damn pleasant," she said to him. "Not me in the morning. I'm like a caged tiger who hasn't been given any red meat in four days."

She put down the phone and walked down the long hallway toward the bathroom. “Junior, she shouted through the closed bathroom door, over the sound of running water, “your boyfriend is on the phone.”

“I bet that’s what you say to him,” she said, sarcastically.

Stanwyck had always taunted him about his homosexuality, and she accused him of having a crush on Reagan. Taylor had repeatedly denied that.

Reagan was driving Taylor south, to a local marina, where their mutual friend, actor Robert Stack, had rented a small yacht to take them on a weekend sail to Catalina. Jane didn’t want to go, and Stanwyck wasn’t invited.

Fan magazines propagandized the marriage of Barbara Stan-wyck and Robert Taylor as another ideal couple, evocative of the marriage of Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman.

Over a quickie breakfast, Stanwyck demanded to know why she couldn’t come along. “I know that the late, much-lamented Carole Lombard used to accompany Gable, you, and the other guys on hunting trips.”

“This is different,” Taylor told her. “It’s like boys’ night out. The guys will be nude on the boat wanting to get a suntan all over. No place for a woman.”

“God knows what you boys will do with your dicks hanging out,” she snapped.

At the sound of a honking horn, he jumped up from the table and grabbed his bag. “Take care, Queen!” He always called her that.

“Aren’t you going to kiss me?” she asked.

“Later, when I come back,” he said, heading out the door and racing toward Reagan’s car, since they were running late for their rendezvous with Stack, an actor as handsome as they were.

Reagan was much closer to Taylor than he was to Stanwyck, an actress he found intimidating, although Jane seemed to admire her style and commanding presence. Since their marriage in 1939, Taylor and Stanwyck had become Reagan’s closest friends, included in their inner circle of Joan Blondell, Dick Powell, James Stewart, Claudette Colbert, and Eddie Albert from their Brother Rat movies.

The night before picking Taylor up, Reagan had told Jane, “Barbara treats Bob like an unruly child, and she always humiliates him, suggesting he’s not a real manly man. You know, unlike us, they occupy separate bedrooms.”

“Even on their honeymoon?” she asked. She’d heard rumors that Taylor and Stan-wyck had a “lavender marriage,” Both of them were known for sleeping with others on the side. Taylor had had affairs with Howard Hughes, Errol Flynn, and Tyrone Power, but with some females, too, including Virginia Bruce and even Greta Garbo, when he’d made Camille with her. He’d just completed Johnny Eager (1942), in which he’d been intimate with Lana Turner. Stanwyck had had her own affairs, dating from the A-list with Marlene Dietrich and Joan Crawford.

“Bob and Barbara must come together sometime,” Reagan told Jane. “The other day, Bob told me that she always wants to control the fuck. As for their honeymoon, Bob claimed he’d found her so overpowering and commanding that he became impotent— and she’d mocked him.”

“Evenings with them can be rough,” he said.

“Better than time out with the Battling Bogarts,” she said. “Mayo Methot, as you remember, once pulled out a revolver and threatened to kill him."

He recalled an evening at dinner when Stanwyck was on a rampage, attacking her husband's masculinity.

"No wonder the press is hailing us instead of them as the ideal couple," Jane said. "It looks like we're going to remain unchallenged as Hollywood's most ideal couple," he said. "Me in uniform while you're staying behind."

"I guess the press will write about all your daring aerial combats shooting down Göring's Luftwaffe pilots," she said. "Of course, you'll still be in California behind a desk somewhere."

On the boat to Catalina Island, about a mile offshore, Reagan, Stack, and Taylor sailed with a three-man crew. The rental of the yacht was a gift from Howard Hughes, the aviator and billionaire. Reagan had heard rumors that both Stack and Taylor on occasion were "Hughes' boys."

It was Stack who first stripped down and suggested that Taylor and Reagan drop their trunks, too. "Let's get a suntan all over."

Not afraid to take off his trunks, Reagan stripped down and headed for a mat on the deck. Taylor was the most reluctant, but, he too, took off his trunks.

On the trip to Catalina, Stack had talked about his friend, John F. Kennedy, who had just left Hollywood for Navy duty. Reagan was familiar with Ambassador Joseph P. Kennedy, but knew nothing of his children. Stack said that, "After the war, he plans to get into politics from his home state of Massachusetts. Probably run for Congress. After that, the Senate. And, then, the Presidency."

"I wouldn't take that ambition too seriously," Reagan said. "Doesn't every red-blooded American boy want to be President of the United States, even me?"

Robert Stack (seen above with Barbara Stanwyck) often went swimming with Stanwyck, Jane Wyman, Reagan (when available), and Robert Taylor.

The first time Stanwyck saw Stack in a bathing suit, she told him, "Your body is perfect, a piece of sculpture when compared to Bob or Ronnie."

To Blondell, Jane recalled the last dinner party she had hosted for Stanwyck and Taylor. "It was a disaster."

"Ronnie held back, but Bob and Barbara were drinking heavily. Bob teased Ronnie about his first days in Hollywood when Ronnie was touted as "the next Robert Taylor.'"

"I'm still working on it," Reagan had retorted.

At the party, Taylor had revealed that he'd never seen the 1940 movie, Waterloo Bridge, in which he'd played a soldier and Vivien Leigh had played a ballet dancer/prostitute in London.

"I don't get off on too many of my pictures," Taylor said. "When Louis B. Mayer learned I'd not seen Waterloo Bridge, he held a special screening of it in his living room in front of friends."

"You seem so casual about the movies you make," Jane said. "How unlike Ronnie. When tour buses stop by our house, Ronnie runs out the door and invites them in for a screening of Kings Row."

"Jane exaggerates," Reagan said, looking embarrassed. "I have shown it on occasion to a very select few of our friends."

"Yeah, right," Jane retorted. "He defines 'friends' as anyone listed in the Los Angeles phone book."

"I understand why Junior doesn't want to see his own films," a rather drunk Stanwyck had chimed in. "After all, I've made a couple with the guy myself. I prefer to work with a real man. I've just finished Ball of Fire with Gary Cooper (1942). Talk about a real man."

Then she looked over at Reagan. "You look like a real man," she said. "Not like pretty boy over there. How about it, Reagan? Why don't you and I make a movie together one day?"

"I'd love it, but I don't see that happening."

On the night before Reagan's departure for San Francisco and his new post with the U.S. Army, Jane threw an intimate dinner party for him, inviting Joan Blondell, Dick Powell, Jack Benny, and Mary Livingston. Pat O'Brien showed up with his wife, Eloise, and George Brent escorted his wife, Ann Sheridan. Reagan and Brent had made up in the aftermath of Brent giving him a black eye when he and Sheridan were filming Juke Girl.

Taylor said he was anxious to put on a uniform, but that his wife objected.

"You're too old," Stanwyck told him. "They want young men, not grandfathers."

Taylor was only thirty-one.

[In February of 1943, Taylor would be sworn into the U.S. Navy under his original name of Spangler Arlington Brugh. Although he would apply several times for active duty, he was turned down because of his age. Instead, the Navy sent him to Livermore, California, to make seventeen training films for Naval Air cadets. Reagan, in contrast, would find himself making films for the U.S. Army Air Force.]

Upon the release of Desperate Journey, The New York Times referring to it as "comic book stuff," but the fast-paced action scenes, under Walsh's direction, were generally singled out for praise.

Hollywood, 1942: Lt. Ronald Reagan shows up in uniform with his wife, Jane Wyman, for the premiere of Tales of Manhattan at Grauman's Chinese Theatre.

Warner was horrified that Desperate Journey opened at the same time as Flynn's notorious trial on charges of statutory rape, where the term "in like Flynn" was coined.

The fear was not real. The courtroom revelations about Flynn's romp with underage girls actually generated publicity that sent audiences flocking to movie houses. Desperate Journey earned more than $2 million, considered a big success in 1942 dollars.

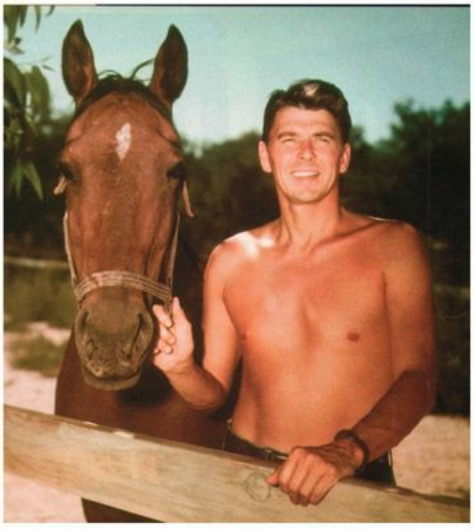
By the time the film was released, Reagan was not wearing a military uniform from the Warners' wardrobe department, but a real one issued by the U.S. Army.

Chapter Nine

Jane and Reagan Go to War

Drafted Into the U.S. Army, Reagan Becomes a "Bloodless Celluloid Commando"

His Popularity Roars to an All-Time High, Even Though Jane Refers to Him as a "Has-Been"

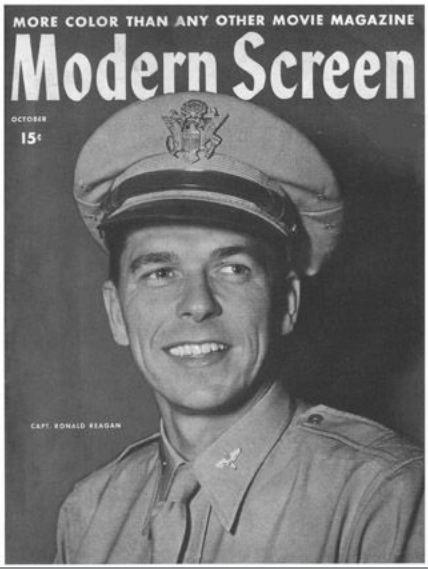


Ronald Reagaon, on the ranch with his favorite horse, "Baby," took an athlete's pride in the grace of his body's "mechanics." But his poor eyesight kept him off the battlefields in World War II, although he promised to "kill as many Nazi beasts as I can."

He made propaganda films instead.

During a War Bond fundraising tour with John Payne, Jane wrote to her close friend, Paulette Goddard. “I’m traveling with the obscenely handsome John Payne. Men as sexy as he is should be rounded up and placed in a male harem for the girls to enjoy, especially me.”

The day after Jane hosted Reagan’s farewell party at their newly christened “dream house,” she drove him to Glendale, where he caught the night train north to San Francisco. During their tearful farewell, he left her with a cliché: “Jane, keep the home fires burning, and take care of yourself and our baby girl.”



Poster Boy: America, in league with Hollywood as symbolized by Ronald Reagan, goes to war.

Aboard the train, his identity shifted from that of a Hollywood movie star to a commissioned officer in the Army Air Corps, the predecessor of the U.S. Air Force.

As his train headed north during the frightening month of April, 1942, the publicity department at Warners was ordered, in cooperation with the U.S. Army, to inaugurate a massive buildup for Reagan and Jane. “We’re going to use them as our propaganda couple to promote the U.S. War effort,” Warner said.

Almost within the week, the studio’s publicity department launched a campaign with such headlines as “MR. AND MRS. AMERICA FIGHTING THE WAR.” One feature story was headlined, “REAGAN & WYMAN—SO LONG BUTTON NOSE.”

In spite of how it misled the public, Reagan and Jane aided Warners’ publicity campaign with zeal. Variety reported: “Ronald Reagan left today to join an Army unit in San Francisco, leaving behind his beloved young wife (Jane Wyman), and their daughter, Maureen. She told the press, ‘I will wait for him, pray for him, and live for the day when Ronnie comes marching home.’”

Before heading out, Reagan had been photographed looking at horrific pictures of the swollen bodies of dying boys and girls being deliberately starved to death by Nazi soldiers in the ruins of Warsaw. “I hate war,” Reagan told the press. “But the scourge of Hitler’s Nazism has to be wiped from the face of the earth.”

He would never be sent to fight on the battlefields of Europe or the Pacific. He did not reveal that his poor eyesight would keep him stationed in California throughout the duration of the war.

Jane was quoted as saying, “Now the war is real for us. Now it’s Ronnie’s war, and it’s also my war.”

Although Jack Warner had powerful political influence in Washington, time had run out on his ability to get any more deferments for Reagan. In his final call to Reagan, Warner held out a titillating promise: “There’s a hell of a lot of buzz going around that you’re a shoo-in for the Oscar for your performance in Kings Row.”

Northbound on that train, Reagan was saddened to think that the lucrative contract that Lew Wasserman had negotiated with Warners wouldn’t help him now. Household and living expenses would have to come out of Jane’s salary. It was clearly understood that studio paychecks ended whenever an employee entered the Armed Forces.

Jane Finds “My True Love” in the Arms of John Payne.

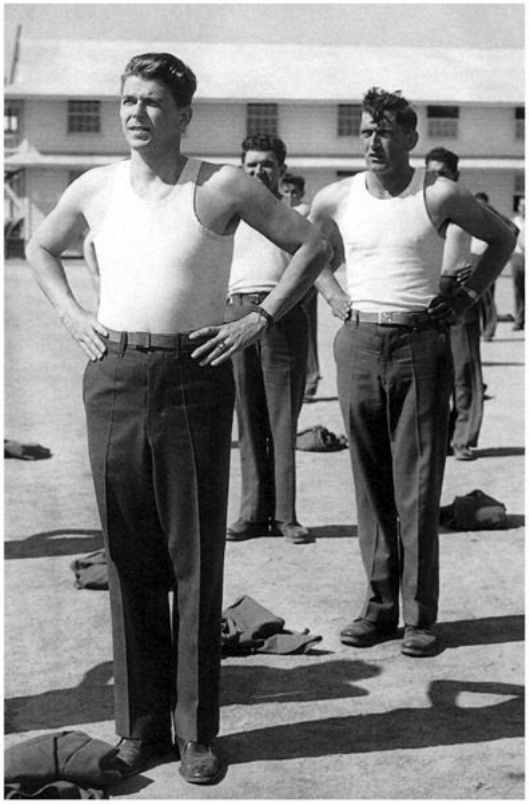
As reported by Screenland magazine, “Just when Reagan’s career and his personal life are rich with fulfillment comes his call to duty. If he is called, the one hindrance may be his deficiency of eyesight. Without his glasses, he can't see clearly more than five feet from him. Ronnie's adoring wife, Jane Wyman, isn't saying a word. But there's a hurt in her face as she goes gaily around Hollywood these days. Little Maureen Elizabeth, the Baby Reagan, is too young and healthy to realize the scope of the drama."



In the spring of 1943, Reagan took his orders like any other man in military service. They included early morning calisthenics. Surely he could not have imagined at the time that one day, he would be Commander-in-Chief.

Arriving at Fort Mason, Reagan had to submit to another physical, a medical procedure which he continued to define as "jiggling my balls." He was assigned the job of supervising the loading of convoys heading for Australia. "Our strategy was to build up a force there to prevent Japan from pinning down its flank on Australia and then being able to turn that attack onto the West Coast of the United States."

He often chatted with soldiers heading out to the Pacific. "They talked the same lingo," Reagan said. "They were enraged at the attack on Pearl Harbor. Most of them had the same goal. To quote them, 'I want to kill as many Japs as I can before they come for us.' Never in my life have I met so many young Americans seeking revenge—and they'd get it, too."

At the time, the somewhat archaic Fort Mason was configured mainly as a Cavalry post, and Reagan felt at home there, as he went horseback riding in his riding breeches, boots, and spurs. Men not in the Cavalry often mocked "these cowboys on horseback," reminding them that the Polish Army on horses had been "systematically slaughtered by the mechanized might of Nazi tanks."

Long after he left Fort Mason, Reagan recalled his most terrifying experience there. "I had to stand in line in my underwear with a long line of guys waiting to get vaccinated. The day before, seven of our men had died from inoculation from a faulty vaccine. I could only pray that the problem had been solved. When that needle was jabbed into my arm, I paused for a silent moment, waiting to see if I were going to drop dead. Obviously, I survived. But now I know what is meant when someone says, 'I was sweating blood.'"

On his second day at Fort Mason, Colonel Bob Ferguson came out to greet him. They were friends, from having served together in the 11th Cavalry. Ferguson had worked on Reagan's movie, Sergeant Murphy, way back in 1938. After warm greetings, Ferguson turned Reagan over to his supervisor, Colonel Philip Booker.

In his memoirs, Reagan described the colonel as "a small, slim man with the wiry physique of a horseman… blunt, quiet, and all business." He soon learned that Booker was a fan of his Brass Bancroft films, in which he'd played an agent of the Secret Service. "But just because I'm a fan of yours doesn't mean that you can give me any shit."

One night, Booker invited Reagan and three of his fellow lieutenants to his home for dinner. At table, Reagan learned that Booker was a graduate of the Virginia Military Institute, as had been depicted in Reagan's movie, Brother Rat. Reagan brought this up at table.

The reaction from the colonel came as a shock to him. "I saw that piece of crap," Booker raged. "Nothing has made me so god damn mad in my whole life. You guys libeled my Alma Mater."

At Fort Mason, Reagan avidly followed the war news from Europe and the Pacific. It was grim—in fact, 1942 was the darkest year of the war for America. Reagan's fellow officers and enlisted men were despondent over bulletins coming in from the Pacific. Bataan had surrendered "to the Japs," the papers said, and that stunning defeat was followed by the fall of Corregidor. The Japanese attacked Mandalay [the second-largest city and the last royal capital of the country then known as Burma], forcing the colonial British to flee from Indo-China to India. In Europe, the news was consistently horrible. The Nazis had launched V-2 rockets onto war-torn London, thereby obliterating massive acreage in the British capital's densely populated East End.

Among his fellow servicemen, Reagan could not escape the fact that he was a movie star, the only one serving at Fort Mason. Many of his fellow soldiers asked for his autographed picture and posted it on the inside of the door of their locker. When quizzed about the implications of that by Colonel Booker, Reagan said, "I'd feel more comfortable if their pinup was Betty Grable instead of me."

"I would, too," replied the colonel. "I guess it takes all kinds to make up an Army."

At night, the horny young men quizzed Reagan endlessly about what they inelegantly termed "Hollywood pussy." They wanted to know which female stars "put out" and what their bust measurements were. He answered each question with his usual good nature, without giving too many specific details and definitely avoiding insights into any of his own sexual relationships with the stars at Warner Brothers.

Sometimes the questions were very provocative, even salacious. Larry David of St. Louis said, "I once saw a picture of you in the paper with Lana Turner. I heard this rumor that one night in New York, uptown in a night club in Harlem, she sucked off five big, dark-skinned bucks in the men's room. Is that true?"

"That's a new one on me," Reagan said. "I know Miss Turner. She's really a fine lady."

On some nights, Reagan—even though he didn't really seem to belong—went out "on the town" with his fellow servicemen, trying to fit in with their pursuit of hell raising, female flesh, and liquor.

Back in Los Angeles, he shared some of those memories with Dick Powell, telling him that San Francisco was crawling with prostitutes who'd flocked there to service the military men shipping out. "Any guy could get laid, providing he had at least ten bucks in his pants," Reagan said.

He recalled meeting a "dyed blonde vixen" (his words) from his native Des Moines. She tried to pick him up, and when he turned her down, she focused on a handsome young lieutenant instead. "She told a bizarre story that one night, she seduced a man with two penises. I guess when it comes to a man's body, anything is possible, certainly a freak. She disappeared that night with the lieutenant, although he assured her he had only one dick."

"The town was also crawling with homos," Reagan said. "They, too, were flocking in droves to San Francisco, and they scored plenty. Unlike the prostitutes, they didn't charge. Men turned to them when they had spent their monthly stipend from the government."

He later said, "I was always opposed to gays in the military, although realizing, of course, that they were already there and had been since the days of Alexander the Great. There was a lot of stuff going on in the Fort Mason barracks at night, but I said nothing. It was a touchy issue, and I didn't want to get involved. 'Hear no evil, See no evil'—that's who I am."

In the late 1940s, Reagan recalled another issue associated with his experiences at Fort Mason. One night in a bar, he was approached by a homosexual with a Southern accent who told Reagan he was a playwright and had written a drama for Tallulah Bankhead. "He was drunk and volunteered to give me a blow job," Reagan said to Powell. "After the guy told me I was the best-looking thing in pants, he reached out and felt me up and I almost punched him, but then, decided not to. He didn't look like the violent type."

"I thought nothing of the matter until I was introduced to Tennessee Williams at a Hollywood party. I was divorcing Jane Wyman, and he told me that she was being considered as the star of the (1950) movie version of his stage play, The Glass Menagerie. Williams claimed we'd met during the war in San Francisco and that he'd unsuccess fully propositioned me in a bar. Then I remembered that nasty little encounter."

Tennessee Williams in Key West, Florida, 1947. He once propositioned Reagan.

"I thought you were very aggressive just reaching out and feeling a man like that," Reagan told Williams. "For copping that feel, I want you to write a great role for me, the equal of that Stanley Kowalski part you gave to Brando."

"Your request is my command," Williams later quoted himself as having said to his friend, the author Donald Windham. "As a movie star, I'd place Reagan in the same position I put Lana Turner when MGM assigned me to write a movie scenario for her."

"I remember that," Windham said. "You called it 'a celluloid brassiere.'"

"In Reagan's case, let's change that to a celluloid jock strap," Williams said.

Reagan later admitted to Dick Powell and Robert Taylor, "I was sometimes overcome with guilt as I watched these scrawny little boys boarding ships heading for the war in the Pacific while I, robust, virile, and more than six feet tall, stood by, sending at least some of them to their deaths."

Sometimes, Reagan's duties included showing teenage schoolboys around the public areas of Fort Mason. "If the war had lasted long enough, some of these guys with pimples would have been drafted into the Army themselves," Reagan recalled.

Entertaining the troops: Marlene Dietrich at a USO show...trying to make the boys happy.

"I was usually asked three questions: How many Nazis have you mowed down? How many Japs did you kill? Did you ever date Betty Grable?"

Despite his rank as an Army lieutenant, Reagan never escaped his status as a movie star. His superior officers ordered him to give interviews to the press and to deliver short speeches at local benefits and War Bond rallies. His big night came at the San Francisco premiere of Kings Row. Colonel Booker ordered him to deliver a morale-boosting pep talk before the first-night audience. Seats for the first showing of his proudest cinematic achievement would be reserved for select members of the Armed Forces. From the podium, Reagan faced a sea of combat-ready men in uniform.

Near the end of his tour of duty at Fort Mason, Reagan was ordered back for three days in Los Angeles to help launch the USO program, spearheaded by, among others, Bette Davis and John Garfield, with such stars as Joan Crawford and Marlene Dietrich lending their support as well.

Back from her War Bond tour of the Southeast, Jane welcomed him home, but he later expressed concern about her dark mood. "She was polite and loving on the surface, but seemed strangely distant as if her interests were elsewhere," he said. "Something was on her mind, and I didn't know what. It seemed that without my presence, she had done just fine on her own. On the train back to San Francisco, I was left feeling rather empty about my homecoming."

He confided these concerns to his agents, Lew Wasserman and Jules Stein, and to Dick Powell, who may or may not have known that Jane had fallen deeply, perhaps hopelessly, in love with John Payne.

Back at Fort Mason, Reagan claimed, "I smelled trouble," when he was ordered to report at once to Colonel Booker's office. There, he was told that he'd been summoned to the office of the commanding general of the post. Booker thanked him for his help with the USO program before warning him, "In the presence of the general, you'll address him in the third person, and you stand at attention and salute."

"Yes sir!" Reagan snapped.

Reagan recalled that he was very nervous when he was summoned into the office of the Commanding General. When it came time to write his memoirs, the general's name escaped him.

"In fairness to you, I've heard complaints that you're sick and tired of being a showhorse for all our starstruck Cavalry brass," the General said. "You are, after all, our only resident movie star here, eating cauliflower and hot dog stew with the rest of us."

"With your permission, sir," Reagan said. "I only make personal appearances when ordered to do so by my superior officers. In the future, sir, I will refer all such requests to your office for your approval. You can decide whether the request is from some starstruck fan wanting an autographed photo and a look at a movie star. You know best, sir, what is needed for morale and the War Effort."

"That sounds about right to me, Reagan," the General said. "I thought all these appearances were just your attempt to keep your name before the public. A lot of fans will forget a lot of you stars by the end of the war."

"I hope not, sir," Reagan said. "Sir, right now, I've been placed in the position of 'Ronald Reagan, have uniform, will travel.' I do, sir, what I am ordered to do."

"Good to hear that, Reagan," the General said, "because I have an order of my own. I have a directive from the office of President Roosevelt. He has declared that throughout the country, cities are to celebrate 'I Am an American Day,' with military parades, entertainment, and pep rallies with morale-boosting speeches. All of that will be followed by a War Bond sale. It's all for the War Effort, of course. And we'll need a major Hollywood star to sing the National Anthem."

"Sir, my wife, Jane Wyman, is a singer, and I'm sure she'd love to fly to San Francisco to sing the National Anthem."

The General cast his most disapproving look on Reagan. "I'm sorry to deny you a conjugal visit, but I had something else in mind. Frankly, I'm a Jeanette MacDonald fan myself. I never miss one of her pictures with Nelson Eddy, although I find him a piece of fluff. I have no idea what she sees in that silly fart. I understand you've bedded most of the Hollywood beauties. I'm sure you know Miss MacDonald."

"Sir, she's an MGM star," Reagan said. "I worked with the women of Warner Brothers."

"I don't give a flying fuck what studio she works for," the General said. "All I know is I want Miss MacDonald in San Francisco to sing the National Anthem and to meet me. Otherwise, it's your ass, Reagan. DISMISSED!"

After leaving the General's office, Reagan, as instructed, reported to Colonel Booker. He had already received a report from one of his liaison officers. "Good work, Reagan," Booker said. "I understand you pulled the General's stinger before he even got warmed up."

Back in his office, Reagan immediately placed a call to Louis B. Mayer in Culver City. Getting his secretary on the phone, he told her that he had an official request from the Commander General of the U.S. Army base in San Francisco. His call was put through to Mayer right away. In the conversation that ensued, Reagan conveyed the General's request for the services of MacDonald.

"I'm the wrong man to ask for any favors from Jeanette," Mayer said. "She hates my guts. I just terminated her contract. But I'll have a friend of hers convey the request."

"Thank you, Mr. Mayer," Reagan said.

"Anything for the War Effort," Mayer answered. "Otherwise, Hitler will be burning Jews on Hollywood Boulevard."

Within two days, MacDonald called Reagan, claiming that she would appear. Assuming that she would, he had by then worked out arrangements for her appearance.

Reagan and members of the press were on hand to greet the singing star at the San Francisco airfield where her plane landed. In front of reporters, she told Reagan, "You're far more handsome in person than you are on the screen, and you look good in your movies, too."

"Flattery will get you anywhere with me," he said, jokingly.

It seemed that half of San Francisco turned out for the holiday celebration. MacDonald gave the grandest rendition of "The Star Spangled Banner" he'd ever heard. "Her voice could be heard all the way to Tokyo," Reagan recalled.

She agreed to another performance, one that Reagan had arranged just for men in uniform.

Throughout San Francisco, thousands of men were waiting to be shipped out from temporary housing in, among others, the mammoth Cow Palace and abandoned factory buildings. The soldiers had been confined to these dreary quarters and, in most cases, weren't allowed off base, based on the government's fear that they might accidentally reveal classified information. In those days, San Francisco was crawling with spies for the Japanese.

The venue for MacDonald's performance, and the 17,000 servicemen slated for attendance, was the infield of San Francisco's Greyhound racing track.

When Reagan announced MacDonald, she was received with wild applause. "Maybe you guys would have preferred Betty Grable," MacDonald said from center stage. "But what you see is what you get." At that, the servicemen applauded even more loudly, as she launched into a repertoire of hit songs from her movies.

At first, Reagan had been concerned that the singer would be "too operatic, too high brow" for the audience, but she won them over.

Of course, "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" was mandatory, but she got the most applause when she sang "San Francisco," the name of the song and the title of her hit 1936 movie with Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy. In the film, MacDonald had belted out her anthem, cheerfully and defiantly, in the dusty, earthquake-ravished ruins of San Francisco, "singing in that hokey but entertaining way," Reagan said. "Although Judy Garland had mocked Jeanette's performance in that film, the boys loved the song."

“The soldiers were so young, so full of hope,” Reagan later said. “For hundreds of them, it would be their last night in America. Jeanette knew that. I knew that. Tears were in our eyes as Jeanette and I embraced at the end of her concert.”

Without his knowing it, the brass was about to end Reagan’s days as an officer at Fort Mason. One morning, Colonel Booker demanded his appearance in his office. “Kid, we’re shipping you back home to Los Angeles. In your new assignment, you’ll be able to spend most nights in the bed of that beautiful wife of yours, the one the press calls ‘Pug Nose.’”

“What gives?” Reagan asked. “I got the impression that the Army deliberately likes to assign soldiers to bases away from home.”

Booker filled him in on the details: Although Jack Warner, who had been assigned the rank of Lieutenant Colonel, had not succeeded in getting yet another deferment for Reagan, he had nonetheless used his considerable influence to get him transferred to a newly created propaganda division of the Army Air Corps. It was called the First Motion Picture Unit (FMPU). Its task involved the production of morale-boosting films. Lew Wasserman, Reagan’s agent, had also been instrumental in arranging Reagan’s new assignment on his home turf.

New films!! From a wartime production company whose government-sanctioned, government-funded mission rocked Hollywood. It’s the U.S. Army’s FMPU (First Motion Picture Unit)!

“At last the Army got something right in your new assignment,” Booker said. “In my thirty-four years in the Army, this is the first time I’ve seen the brass make sense by putting a square peg into a square hole.”

[Reagan later claimed, “I’ve been called a square several times, but that was never seen as something to be proud of. I just wish the Colonel had used a different image, calling me a round peg fitted into a round hole.”]

After a final salute, and as Reagan was heading out the door, the Colonel called him back. “I never told you this, kid, but I liked you a hell of a lot more than I ever let on. In my short time with you, I came to think of you as my son. Now get the hell out of my sight before I get too god damn sentimental.”

Before departing for San Francisco, Reagan had given Jane a public relations lecture. “Exchange that mink coat for an apron from the kitchen. No more dancing with Van Johnson at the Troc. Hide that costume jewelry, even though it’s fake. Wear sensible clothes and shoes, none of that glamorous stuff that will look whorish to soldiers fighting in the mud. At all times, appear as a dutiful housewife and loving mother. After all, you and I are the poster young man and woman of Hollywood at war.”

“As much as I dislike what you’re ordering me to do, I think you’re right—god damn it and to hell and back,” she answered.

For the most part, Jane followed Reagan’s suggestion and toned down her nightclubbing and partying. But she had another boss, too, and that was Jack Warner.

The call from her mogul boss had come in at ten o’clock on Saturday morning. That was an unusual hour for Warner to call, but he said it was an emergency. She thought some star had fallen ill, and that she was being summoned to replace her on a film set.

A star had, indeed, fallen ill, and Jane was being summoned to replace her, but not in a film. Warner had been informed by the Victory Committee that Rita Hayworth had become ill just prior to her scheduled departure on a War Bond fund-raising, month-long tour of America's Southeast. Warner wanted Jane to replace her.

"You're to tour with John Payne," Warner said. "I loved you two together in Kid Nightingale (1939). You both are singers and can both entertain a crowd. You get along with him okay, right?"

"I admire his talent and found him pleasant to work with," she said, demurely, concealing the depth of her passion for her upcoming traveling companion. She agreed to the tour and its terms, and Warner gave her the names of the people to contact about transportation and logistics.

After concluding the call with her boss, bubbling over with enthusiasm, she phoned Joan Blondell. "If there's any man who can make me forget that Ronnie is away, it's John Payne," she said. "For me, that's like winning Lotto. I could have gotten César Romero for a traveling mate. I'll really get to know what it's like to be the wife of John on this tour."

"Have fun, kid," Blondell said.

Before leaving on her tour, Jane met with actor William Demarest, who had been her agent in the 1930s. He weighed in on his opinion of Reagan's tour of duty in the Army. "I don't think he minds it as much as some of the guys like Robert Taylor and Jimmy Stewart. They are leaving booming careers. In spite of Kings Row, Reagan is still mired in B pictures, so he's not giving up that much. Of course, he'll miss you and the baby."

"I'm not sure Ronnie agrees with you," she said. "He thought his career was about to blast off like a rocket. Also, he'd just signed a million dollar contract, and now the money's been cut off."

After talking to Demarest, she had only a day to pack and make herself ready for the tour, leaving instructions with Maureen's nanny. In a call to Payne, she learned that he, too, was eager to depart.

On September 9, 1942, Jane embarked on a month-long tour of the South, beginning in the bluegrass State of Kentucky.

At many of the rallies, Payne auctioned off his necktie and was forced to keep buying new ones, many of them selected by Jane. One woman offered to pay $1,000 for Payne's underwear—"or $2,000 if it's soiled a bit." He politely declined.

Unlike Reagan, she did not suffer from a fear of flying. "I flew a few overcrowded crates during that tour," she recalled, "but I wasn't afraid. John was by my side, and he gave me security. Occasionally, I had nightmares about my friend, Carole Lombard, going down in that plane. Clark (Gable) was still mourning, despite the tons of mail from women around the world, many of them willing and able to replace Carole as his fourth wife."

In every town in which they stopped, there were endless luncheons, usually with the town mayor, the councilmen, and anybody viewed as a local dignitary. "But why must they always serve chicken à la king?" Jane asked Payne.

From the very beginning, she had been served chicken wings in hot sauce. She found the dish usually made her ill, and she complained later that the food was too greasy. "Southern cooks seem to cook all their vegetables in what they call fatback," she said. Complaining of stomach troubles, she switched to hot tea, fruit juices, and unbuttered toast, losing fifteen pounds before the end of the tour.

The question most asked of Payne was, "How's your love life?" He had a pat response: "How's yours?" The most frequent question put to Jane was, "What is Ronald Reagan really like?"

Her pat answer was, "A scholar and a gentleman…in all, a very nice and kind man. Great husband. Great father."

Payne usually sang first, followed by a song from Jane, then a duet from their joint appearance in Kid Nightingale.

Because of hotel room shortages, Jane and Payne were not always able to get a suite, or even adjoining rooms. Sometimes, they were on separate floors. No matter, he planned to slip into her room at night to sleep with her, leaving before dawn and heading back to his own quarters.

As Jane later told Goddard, "I fell in love with John in Kentucky and even more in love with him when we visited his native Virginia. We did shows in Roanoke. In the South, John reverts to his Southern gentleman accent. They love chittlin' talk in these parts. The only time he is not a gentleman is when he makes love. Then he becomes Tiger Man."

"What a lucky gal you are," Goddard said. "You get Payne and I'm settling for Burgess Meredith."

At one point, Jane found herself in the same airport with her longtime friend, Lucille Ball. "It took a god damn war for Hollywood to recognize me as a singer," Jane complained. "Instead of getting cast as the lead in a musical, like Betty Grable, I'm allowed to sing in bond rallies. They're lining up camp shows for me, too."

"Even so, we're late to the game," Ball said. "Bob Hope was shaking his butt and Dorothy Lamour was bouncing her twat before servicemen even before Pearl Harbor."

"I hear they're even sending Hedy Lamarr on tour," Jane said. "She can't sing, can't dance, and can't tell jokes."

"All she has to do is stand before an audience and let the guys look at her," Ball said. "Perhaps she can take off her clothes like she did in Ecstasy. Or, better yet, she might tell the guys what it's like to get fucked by both Mussolini and Hitler."

"My friend, Jack Carson, can tell jokes," Jane said.

"Don't forget Orson Welles," Ball said. "He can do magic tricks. Astaire can dance, and Veronica Lake, the midget, can show off her peek-a-boo hairdo."

Sometimes Jane was asked "Who is taking care of Baby Maureen?" She answered that it was Nelle Reagan, her mother-in-law.

As the tour progressed, Jane began to part with some of the possessions in her handbag, beginning with a tube of lipstick which she gave to a woman who bought a $1,000 War Bond. Later on, she sold her earrings, telling Payne they were costume jewelry. She even gave away her compact and her gold cigarette case, a gift from Reagan, as an incentive to persuade someone to buy $2,000 worth of War Bonds.

In Norfolk, Virginia, at their most successful bond rally, she and Payne netted $52,000 worth of War Bond sales.

In North Carolina, one man asked if they had a War Bond worth $15,000.

"Business must be good for you," Jane said to him.

"I'm a gambler," he told her. "Like marines and doctors, we gamblers also contribute to the War Effort. Therefore, I'm glad to invest some of my profits in War Bonds. By the way, I cheat at cards."

"You come up here with that $15,000, and I'll give you a kiss," Jane promised.

Anne Shirley...John Payne's wife, and Jane Wyman's competition.

That promise of a kiss inspired her with an idea: She'd heard that some of the stars were selling mouth-to-mouth kisses on their tours. Hedy Lamarr had once sold a kiss for $25,000. When Jane tried that, there were no bidders.

Later, she suggested that Payne should try to sell a $25,000 kiss. Amazingly, at one stop, he got a taker—a rather effeminate man. "I'm loaded and I'm buying."

The crowd booed him and Payne rejected the offer. "You should have gone for it," Jane scolded him that night. "As you kissed the guy, you could have said to yourself, 'I'm doing this for god and country.'"

After heading a War Bond rally in Spartanburg, South Carolina, Jane retired to her hotel suite, where Payne joined her within the hour. For the first time, he talked to her extensively about his recent divorce from Anne Shirley, with whom he had not been living during the final turbulent months of their marriage.

Throughout the tour, but especially on this evening in Spartanburg, Jane expected a proposal of marriage from Payne, with a recommendation that she divorce Reagan. But, as she'd later confide to Goddard, "He never asked me —not once—even though he told me he couldn't live without me."

"How like a man," Goddard quipped.

Throughout the remainder of World War II, Payne enjoyed his life as a bachelor. Shirley's public image as a sweet, dewy-eyed innocent was beginning to wear thin with the public, and her audience was dwindling. In 1944, she abandoned her screen career.

For Jane, the highlight of her tour, other than the love-making of one of Hollywood's greatest studs, was a luncheon at the White House sponsored by Eleanor Roosevelt as a means of thanking the entertainers for their contributions to the War Effort. Years later, Jane remembered the event with a certain irony. "I never became First Lady, but at least I married a future President of the United States."

At the end of the tour, Payne revealed his plans. He was only a year younger than Reagan, so he knew he wouldn't be sent to fight the war in Europe or the Pacific. But he decided he was going to enlist as an Army pilot. He was already an expert aviator. "I'll teach young guys how to fly planes, at least the mechanics of it. War veterans will teach them how to handle themselves in aerial combat."

Three weeks after his return to Hollywood, he showed up to take her dinner in uniform. "He looked like a poster boy for Uncle Sam," she said.

He told her that he'd been assigned to the base at Long Beach, California, where, as it turned out, he remained for the next two years. She promised she'd slip away and drive down to see him every chance she got.

No sooner had Jane returned from her tour of the South than she received a call from Bette Davis, who informed her that she and John Garfield were opening the Hollywood Canteen in premises that had originally been conceived as a stable. The premiere of "this home away from home" for servicemen was scheduled for October 3, 1942.

Davis wanted Jane to be there at least one or two nights a week to entertain the servicemen, dance with them, and serve coffee and doughnuts.

Jane agreed, and Dennis Morgan was often her escort. Singing with him at the canteen provided the perfect cover for their continuing affair.

One night, Morgan told her about some casting news at Warners that surprised her. "As you know, I was supposed to be the freedom fighter in Casablanca, opposite Reagan and Ann Sheridan. Of course, that didn't happen. You may remember that I replaced Bogie as Cole Younger when he bolted from our film, Bad Men of Missouri. But did you know that I was the original player slated to appear as the star of The Sea Hawk? But Jack Warner decided that Errol Flynn would play a better swashbuckler. I was also set to play General Custer in Santa Fe Trail opposite Flynn, but that part went to Reagan."

"Well, now that Ronnie and a lot of other stars are in the military, you can clean up as Warners' leading actor," Jane said.

She was right. Two years older than Reagan, and therefore not immediately eligible for the draft, Morgan did not enter the service, and continued to make movies throughout the war, beginning with Wings of the Eagle (1942) in which he co-starred with Jack Carson and Ann Sheridan. "It was a real flag-waver," Morgan told Jane. His last such film was the controversial World War II drama, God Is My Co-Pilot (1945).

As Jane later said, "Dennis fought the war on the screen, not off it."

Only weeks before she departed for her tour with Payne, the Treasury Department in Washington had launched its War Bond tours, calling on Hollywood stars to provide the entertainment. Stars were assigned to seven separate units, each sent to various destinations that included 353 cities and towns during the month of September alone.

Jane was notified that she'd been assigned to Group 5, whose other players included Veronica Lake, Greer Garson, and Payne. At a launch party, Jane chatted with Garson and Lake and with some of the stars from Unit 6, which comprised her friend, Goddard, along with James Cagney, Reagan's friend, as well as Hedy Lamarr and Irene Dunne.

Jane also became a performer at the USO's Camp Shows. She preferred not to travel too far afield, and she therefore confined her appearances to bases in California, where she was joined by stars who included Lucille Ball, Betty Hutton, Lena Horne, and the Andrew Sisters.

From 1941 to 1947, the USO sponsored some 400,000 shows with such stars as Bing Crosby, Judy Garland, Frank Sinatra, and even Hattie McDaniel—"Mammy" of Gone With the Wind. As Jane remembered it, "Danny Kaye was a tough act to follow."

Wayne Broyhill, an enlisted man, had a different point of view. "Danny was okay telling jokes and all. But we were surrounded by guys all day. We wanted female flesh, and that was provided by Jane Wyman. She did a sexy number and showed us her gams. The boys yelled and hooted until they were hoarse. That Ronald Reagan is a lucky bastard."

Jane never went overseas for camp shows, although she was often invited to do so by the likes of Edward G. Robinson, her former co-star, or such luminaries as Martha Raye, Merle Oberon, and Al Jolson. Demurring, she said she needed to be near her young daughter.

Many stars were asked to appear in film clips slated for screening in theaters across the country. A Newsreel Division of the War Activities Committee of the Motion Picture Industry was formed in connection with this War Bond drive. Payne was asked to make one of these clips with Dorothy Lamour. On the day of the shooting, Jane went with him to the studio.

"My God," she later told Goddard. "Lamour practically tore John's pants off him. She was one hot-to-trot bitch, who wouldn't control her horny paws. He actually seemed to enjoy the attention. He'll pay for that."

Beginning with Carole Lombard in 1942, twenty-eight performers lost their lives during their War Bond and morale-building tours because of illness, diseases, and plane crashes. In 1943, a plane carrying a USO troupe crashed outside Lisbon, Portugal, severely injuring Broadway singer Jane Froman. Despite her confinement at the time to a wheelchair, she fought her way back to the stage to entertain again.

[Jane later noted that Hollywood was adapting Froman's story into a Technicolor movie entitled With a Song In My Heart (1952). She lobbied aggressively for the role, only to lose it to Susan Hayward. "I desperately wanted that part, almost more than any other role. But it went to Susan Hayward, that red-haired bitch. At least I managed to tear Ronnie away from her entangling web. Hayward can't sing. They had to dub her with Froman's voice."]

Leaving Fort Mason, Reagan reported to work in Hollywood, joining the newly created First Motion Picture Unit (FMPU), created by General Henry H. Arnold, who was nicknamed "Hap." He commanded the Army Air Corps, which later morphed into the U.S. Army Air Force.

Reagan would stay at this command post throughout the duration of the war, never leaving the United States, although many of his fans were made to believe that he was fighting with Allied troops in Europe.

As the months passed, Reagan was amazed at the growth of the Air Corps. In 1939, at the beginning of the armed conflicts in Europe, it had some 25,000 men and fewer than 3,900 planes. By the time of the June, 1944 D-Day invasion of Normandy, Arnold commanded some 2.5 million men. American factories were turning out 150,000 planes per year.

Photoplay carried the news that "Jane Wyman and wee daughter are probably the happiest people in town, since husband and daddy Ronald Reagan has been temporarily sent back to Burbank to make government film shorts."

Before Reagan signed on, Warner had already been making propaganda films for the War Department, including such releases as The Tanks are Coming and Service with the Colors, each targeted at young men who had not enlisted.

When Reagan went into the army, only three percent of men in the movie colony had signed up. Dozens upon dozens of directors, actors, screenwriters, sound engineers, producers, cameramen, and other technicians had not joined.

Reagan's first office was at the old Vitagraph Studios in Los Angeles until that location proved too small. At that point, he and the vast crew were transferred to the Hal Roach Studios in Culver City. Because of the undisciplined crew there, and reports of "outrageous behavior" among the former movie people, locals referred to it as "Fort Wacky." It also became better known as "Fort Roach."

Star Power as Hollywood Goes to War: Lieutenant Reagan (who defined himself, facetiously, as "the American Goebbels" after Nazi Germany's notorious propaganda chief), at the FMPU, organizing propaganda and training films.

At Fort Roach, Reagan faced 1,000 enlisted men and officers, most of whom had had no military training except for what they'd received working on war pictures at the various studios. As one technician, Ralph Davidson, told Reagan, "We know how to stage a war only if it's called for in the script."

Reagan's superior officer was Paul Mantz, who had been the most famous stunt pilot in Hollywood. In 1937, he'd helped Amelia Earhart learn navigational skills, but had rejected her offer to fly with her as co-pilot during her ill-fated (final and disastrous) attempt to fly around the world.

Mantz had once run an air charter service dubbed, "The Honeymoon Express" because it carried so many illicit lovers to secret rendezvous destinations. His clients had included Howard Hughes, Clark Gable, James Cagney, and Errol Flynn. "I should write a tell-all," Mantz told Reagan. "You won't believe some of the love duos—even trios—I flew, with genders getting all mixed up." Mantz had also worked on flight scenes for such pictures as Test Pilot (1938), starring Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy.

During his tenure at Fort Roach, Reagan constantly appeared on the covers of magazines. He was always in full uniform, always with a smile, and most often with the Stars and Stripes waving behind him. In the history of the Presidency, no man, other than Dwight D. Eisenhower, had ever been photographed so frequently in uniform.

Hollywood at War: Hollywood's most celebrated stunt pilot (Paul Mantz) found a huge demand for his services at Reagan's FMPU. Much of it involved staging aerial dogfights for the Army's propaganda and training films.

Reagan met many young recruits who complimented him on his daring aerial exploits as depicted in such films as Murder in the Air and International Squadron. He didn't tell them that those scenes had been faked, and that any daring aviation feats had been performed by stunt pilots.

During Reagan's first week at Fort Roach, Jack Warner arranged for him to meet General Henry Arnold, nicknamed "Hap," the chief of staff of the Army Air Corps. These two men had jointly developed the idea of the First Motion Picture Unit for the production of Army training and P.R. films. Hap and Reagan blended harmoniously and learned to work well together. Hap told Warner, “The Reagan boy is my kind of soldier, my kind of man, a sharp shooter. I hear he’s a real lady’s man, too.”

Arnold had several long talks with Reagan, focusing on military issues and convincing him that the future of the United States as a world power depended on its supremacy in the air. Amazingly, Arnold never learned that Reagan, one of his chief protégés, was plagued with an irrational terror of flying.

He viewed Reagan as one of his most effective propagandists. During his time at Fort Roach, FMPU would produce some 225 films, most of them with a running time of 30 minutes, although some lasted on the screen for only nine minutes. The cheaper ones were completed for less than $5,000, although longer ones cost as much as $15,000. Reagan starred in some of these films and narrated dozens more. Many of them have been lost or destroyed in the years since the war ended.

During his first months at Fort Roach, Reagan was deeply troubled about moral issues associated with the war and his films. He told Jane and some of his closest friends, such as Dick Powell, “Sometimes I lie awake thinking about these guys: Our films are shown to high school and college students. We glorify flying—just read our press releases. We claim flying is full of inspirational splendor, the roaring engines of bomber formations gliding through the clouds. In reality, as any R.A.F. pilot can tell you, flying is a grim and dangerous business. A man can die—in fact, he usually does.”

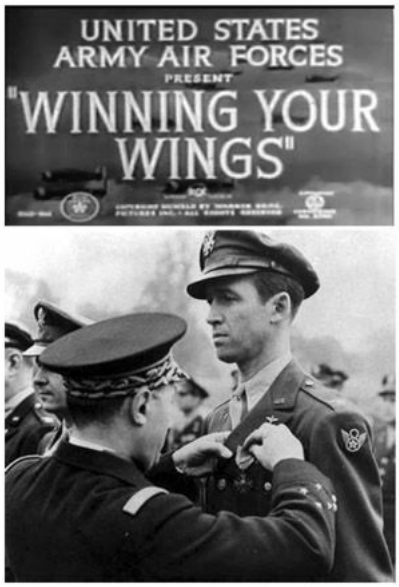
Warner told Reagan that the U.S. government had more or less taken over the direction of his studio, using its facilities, when needed, to make propaganda and training films. The Army also provided outlines for A-list feature movies for them to shoot. “At our peak in 1939, we were turning out about a hundred films a year. In 1943, we were reduced to making only about three or four dozen. Of course, that means less work for Jane. Naturally, the war has really cut into our profits.”

On most nights at Fort Roach, Reagan was allowed to go home to spend the night with Jane. On many a night, she wrote him a note that she’d be late, leaving Baby Maureen in the care of a nanny. Jane never explained where she was, and he was too polite to ask. Occasionally, she’d mention casually, “Oh, I was out with some friends, and forgot how late it was getting.”

Reagan had met Oklahoma-born Owen Crump when he was a writer at Warner Brothers. In his new role with FMPU, Reagan found himself taking orders from Crump. A dynamic, rather overpowering personality, Crump was described by Reagan as “terse and tough.”

At the time Reagan worked with him, Crump had wed Lucile Fairbanks, which made him the nephew-in-law to Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., and Mary Pickford. In time, that would lead to Reagan being invited to Pickfair, the home of the reclusive Pickford, America’s former sweetheart, and her husband, Buddy Rogers.

Crump took Reagan to the screening of a picture he’d co-directed with John Huston. Called Winning Your Wings (1941), it starred Jimmy Stewart. “The aim of Jimmy’s film was to inspire young men to forget baseball games, summer romances, football in autumn, and family vacations,” Crump said. “The suggestion was that men should abandon those pursuits and enlist in the Air Force.” Crump then uttered a statement that appeared to be outrageous: “When that film was shown in theaters, it incited 500,000 young men to enlist. I want you to turn out films as powerful as Jimmy’s.”



It was Jimmy Stewart, who made the most successful American propaganda film, Winning Your Wings.

Repeatedly honored by the military, he rose to the rank of Brigadier General by 1959.

"It's a tough act to follow, but I'll try," Reagan said.

During the war, magazines were brimming with stories of male stars who had either been enlisted, been drafted, or somehow managed "to elude Uncle Sam."

Reagan came into contact with many of them, and read about those he didn't encounter. Among Reagan's closest friends was Robert Taylor, who appeared in war movies such as Bataan (1942), but he was told too old to be drafted. Nonetheless, in 1943, he enlisted in the Naval Air Corps and became a flight instructor. He also narrated the 1944 wartime documentary, The Fighting Lady.

Too old to enlist, Bob Hope and Reagan's friend, Pat O'Brien, traveled thousands of miles to entertain the troops.

James Stewart was one of the actors who became a genuine hero during the war. He joined USAAC in 1940, although initially he was refused entry because he was five pounds under the required weight of 148 pounds. But he talked his recruitment officer into ignoring his weight. He became a colonel and flew combat missions, eventually awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross.

After seeing some of Reagan's training films. Stewart told him, "Real war is not like you depicted it. It's more deadly and insane, at times without reason or any type of morality, nothing but senseless death. It was execution in the air of young men who would never be allowed to finish their lives, either in Germany or in America."

Cary Grant and Errol Flynn each avoided military service, but David Niven volunteered and left Hollywood to return to war-torn England where he became a hero, his exact role in the service never fully explained.

Frank Sinatra avoided the draft and never served in any branch of the military.

A World War I veteran, Humphrey Bogart was in his 40s and too old to be drafted, although he frequently appeared in war movies, including the classic Casablanca.

Reagan said, "Bogie was in, the king of Warner Brothers, and I was out. And damn it, I didn't win the Oscar for Kings Row. Neither did Bogie, but his time would come again. Mine would not."

On August 12, 1942, the "King of Hollywood," Clark Gable, turned down a commission and entered the Army as a private. Perhaps as a swipe at Reagan and others, he said, "I don't want to entertain. I just want to be sent where the going is tough."

In January of 1943, after his involvement in a training program known as one of the Army's "90-day wonders," Gable graduated as a second lieutenant and aerial gunner. In England, he became part of a flying squadron, the 351st heavy Bombardment Group, known as "Hatcher's Chickens," named in honor of their colonel.

Gable did not escape the attention of Josef Goebbels' Nazi propaganda machine. From Berlin, a broadcast was made: "Welcome to England, Hatcher's Chickens, among them the famous American cinema star, Clark Gable.

We'll be seeing you soon in Berlin, Clark."

Lower photo: evidence of the growing military might of the US's wings of war.

Before the war, Gable had been Hitler's favorite male movie star. Der Führer issued a specific order to try, if possible, to capture Gable alive, especially if his plane was shot down behind enemy lines. "If not that, I want his dead body brought to me."

While based in England, Gable carried out dangerous missions over Germany, including the bombing attack on the synthetic oil plants at Gelsenkirchen. In that raid alone, twenty-five Allied bombers were lost. Gable's plane returned safely, but riddled with five bullet holes. He was so daring in combat that many of his crew members felt—perhaps as a reaction to the fatal plane crash of his wife, Carole Lombard, in circumstances not associated with active combat—that he harbored a secret death wish.

After his military service in England, Gable asked to be transferred to the continuing war in the Pacific against the Japanese. He waited and waited until, as he said himself, "I felt discarded." After serving for nearly two years, he asked for a discharge from active duty. Ironically, that request was granted by a captain, Ronald Reagan, at Fort Roach.

An effeminate pic of the director of Germany's Luftwaffe, the sadist, art collector, and morphine addict, Hermann Göring.

[In the closing months of the War, Jane and Reagan visited Gable after his return to California. Jane had never mentioned her sexual encounter with Gable so long ago. At Gable's ranch in Encino, they discovered an aging movie star, graying at the temples and putting on weight. They learned that he consumed a quart of Scotch a day, having purchased an entire truckload of it when war had first erupted in Europe.

Gable told Reagan, "If Hitler had caught me, the son of a bitch would have put me in a cage like a gorilla and exhibited me throughout Germany. If my plane were going down, I would not have bailed out and allowed my capture by the Nazis for delivery to whatever fate lay in store for me."

Hermann Göring of the Luftwaffe had designated Gable as "one of the most wanted of war criminals."

The King of Hollywood enlists! Clark Gable gets inoculated, just like every other guy, during his basic training.

An upcoming king of Hollywood—at least in terms of box office receipts— was John Wayne.

Having met during the late 1930s, when both of them were struggling for stardom, Reagan and Wayne knew each other only casually. It wasn't until the late 1940s and early 50s that they finally bonded in their mutual goal of ferreting out communists who were allegedly "infiltrating" the movie industry.

But these two men did have a few tense encounters during World War II, when both of them remained in Hollywood. Across the country, boys in their late teens or young men in their early 20s flocked to see Wayne ("The Duke") in the movies. During the war he made some movies, including The Fighting Seabees (1944); Back to Bataan (1945), and They Were Expendable (1945).

This military magazine documents how appealing the idea of Clark Gable's capture would have been to the Nazi propaganda machine. Hitler wanted him tortured and paraded, nude, and in chains, through the streets of Berlin.

These movies once prompted Reagan to quip, "To judge by his movies, John won the war against the Nazis and the Japs single-handedly."

When The Duke heard that, he told Ward Bond, "When you see Reagan again, tell him I'm going to rip out his right eyeball and eat it as an appetizer. I haven't seen him mowing down any Japs in this man's war."

Owen Crump called Reagan to his office one day to "bounce an idea off your head. "What about setting up recruiting desks in the lobbies of movie theaters, nationwide, that happen to be screening any of Duke's films?"

"I think it would work," Reagan said.

"John is even more of a hero to young boys than Jimmy Stewart is, and look at all the recruits he enlisted with his propaganda film"

Reagan rendezvoused with Wayne for dinner one night at the Cock n' Bull in Hollywood to feel him out on Crump's idea.

Over steaks, Wayne became very defensive about not having enlisted. "You know I'm too old for the draft. I'm classified 3-A, which is a family deferment."

"I talked to your man John Ford, and he thinks you should do more for the war effort. That led Crump to come up with this idea about the lobby enlistments."

"I wish Ford would shut his god damn mouth about my status," Wayne said, flashing anger. "He's always urging me to enlist."

"That's what Ford told me, but he claims that you always come up with the excuse that you've got two more pictures to complete."

"It's not so easy," Wayne said. "Over at Republic, Herbert J. Yates is threatening to sue me if I walk out on my contract. He's even called the War Department seeking a permanent deferment for me."

He wasn't always overweight, pompous and jowly: John Wayne in a studio publicity shot for Back to Bataan (1945).

Wayne also confessed a personal reason for not wanting to enlist. “I know it’s selfish of me, but I’ve been waiting for years for my big break in films, and it’s finally here. If I walk out now, I may never get this chance again. Don’t you see the gamble I’m taking if I enlist?”

“I see it clearly,” Reagan said. “I faced the same thing after Kings Row, but the War Department would not grant me any more deferments. I was carted off willingly.”

“Hooray for you, the American hero,” Wayne said, mockingly. “You’ve got to understand something. Some of the leading men of Hollywood, stars like Robert Taylor and Clark Gable, are in the military. All sorts of roles are opening up for leading men, and I want to take advantage. Hell, I’ve appeared with Marlene Dietrich and Joan Crawford, even Claudette Colbert. I got to fuck Marlene and Crawford. Not Colbert, of course. She’s as much of a duke as I am.”

Before the end of Reagan’s dinner with Wayne, Duke had agreed to the theater lobby enlistment campaign and even promised to go on a three-month tour of U.S. bases and Army hospitals in the South Pacific.

Years later, when Ford talked to Reagan about his dinner with Wayne, the director said, “I think the Duke has become a superpatriot mainly as an attempt to atone for sitting out World War II.”

Not just Ford, but a lot of men Reagan knew in the movie industry had enlisted, including Robert Montgomery and Fox producer Darryl F. Zanuck.

In 1942, Jane and Reagan had attended the wedding of Wayne Morris, their Brother Rat co-star and Jane’s former lover, to Patricia O’Rourke, an Olympic swimmer and sister to B-movie actress Peggy Stewart.

That same year, Morris became a Navy flier, piloting F6F Hellcats off the aircraft carrier USS Essex. A daring pilot, he shot down seven Japanese planes and contributed to the sinking of five large ships in service to the Japanese Empire. For his daring feats, he would be awarded four Distinguished Flying Crosses and two air medals.

Back at Fort Roach, Reagan met Brooklyn-born Dane Clark and co-starred with him in a wartime propaganda movie. Reagan later told Meredith, “Dane calls himself ‘Joe Average,’ but he really isn’t. He has a law degree, and during the Depression, he was a boxer, baseball player, construction worker, and nude model. He told me as a model he got a lot of propositions, especially from homosexuals.”

Previously stationed at Fort Roach, Clark had managed to make such war movies as Action in the North Atlantic (1943) with Humphrey Bogart, and Destination Tokyo (1943) with Cary Grant. Reagan arranged for both of these films to be shown at his military base.

[After the war, as Reagan floundered to find a suitable movie role, he noted that Clark at Warner Brothers shot way ahead of him, playing the surly artist opposite Bette Davis in A Stolen Life (1946). He’d just appeared in God Is My Co-Pilot (1945) with Jane’s good friend, Dennis Morgan. Exhibitors in 1945 named him the 16th most popular star at the box office.

Clark was one of the first Hollywood actors to appear on television, which in the late 1940s was just emerging. He advised Reagan to do the same, but Reagan told him, “I can’t see myself appearing on that little box.”

Diminutive Dane Clark, a former nude model and boxer in New York, hit Hollywood in 1943. He tried to promote himself as a sex symbol, but suffered from the stigma of labels defining him as "the poor man's John Garfield."

How wrong he was.]

Actor Arthur Kennedy, who had played Jane's boyfriend in Bad Men of Missouri, was assigned to a post in the FMPU's wardrobe department, but he disliked his sergeant. When he applied for a transfer, he was very polite in describing his plight to Reagan. "Sir, my sergeant isn't the type to stand on a blood-soaked beach and yell, 'Onward men!'"

"I understand," Reagan said. "I'll see what I can do.' He obtained Kennedy a new post as assistant to the gardener at Fort Roach. "He spent a lot of time clipping hedges, but usually sneaked off the base at three o'clock and never got caught. That way, he could keep up with his drinking."

Reagan would appear for the first and last time in a movie, made on base, with Burgess Meredith.

Meredith admitted to Reagan, "I'm not a dashing swain, but in a kind of mongrel way, I chased the foxes." Over a period of time, that had included a group of A-list stars such as Hedy Lamarr, Ingrid Bergman, Olivia de Havilland, Peggy Ashcroft, Ginger Rogers, and Norma Shearer, plus a ménage à trois with a wealthy German lady and her lesbian lover.

As a means of avoiding confusion with a certain politician, the actor, John Kennedy of Massachusetts (photo above) opted to bill himself as Arthur Kennedy.

A talented, brooding actor of great intensity, Kennedy was assigned by Reagan the task of clipping hedges on their Army base.

Meredith was filled with amusing stories, telling Reagan that during sex with Tallulah Bankhead, she had shrieked, “For god’s sake, don’t come inside me! I’m engaged to Jock Whitney!”

Meredith was arguably the most accomplished actor Reagan ever appeared with, having starred in some of Hollywood’s biggest movies and also achieving success on Broadway. Before joining the Army, he had scored big in the 1939 film adaptation of the John Steinbeck novel, Of Mice and Men, a story about hope, despair, migrant workers, and marital infidelity during the Great Depression.

“Most of the time, the guys thought Reagan was a square,” Meredith said. “Very formal, very stiff, a man who obeyed the rules. But he had his ribald moments. His favorite (comedy) routine, believe it or not, involved demonstrating the Seven Stages of a Man’s Life through a pissing routine.”

Edmund Morris, in his biography of Reagan, described it as follows: “First, Reagan would imitate the Little Boy with bursting bladder, hoisting himself high on tiptoe. Then the furtive adolescent, a copy of Esquire in hand, making vague masturbatory motions. Next came Mr. Regular Fella, who unzipped, peed, zipped, washed, and exited whistling. The pansy followed, mincing up to the wall and ogling to the left and right, while taking as much time as possible in flagrante. He was pushed aside by the Athlete, who unfurled a prodigious member (he used the full length of this tie) and hosed the mahogany with such force that he staggered in recoil. Then the wobbling Drunk, spraying everybody in sight. Finally and pathetically, the Old Man doddered in, fumbling at his fly buttons—here he became cruel.”

Arthur Kennedy, Burgess Meredith, and Dane Clark weren’t the only actors working at Fort Roach. Reagan became lifelong friends with the strikingly handsome George Montgomery. After he married singer Dinah Shore in 1943, the newlyweds often doubled dated with the Reagans.

Reagan became aware of an argument percolating its way through Fort Roach, mostly in the makeup department, as to which was the better-looking actor, Reagan or Montgomery. Standing 6’3” and weighing 210 pounds, Montgomery usually won. Much of his well-muscled body had been developed by riding horses and working cattle on his family ranch in northern Montana, where he’d been born the youngest of fifteen children to Ukrainian immigrant parents.

As he told Reagan, he’d landed a job as a stunt man on an MGM Greta Garbo picture in 1935, only two days after his arrival in Hollywood. That had led to stunt work in cowboy films, and by the early 1940s, he was co-starring with such stars as Ginger Rogers and Gene Tierney. Coincidentally, he’d also co-starred with—and been seduced by—two of Reagan’s girlfriends, Carole Landis and Betty Grable. Just prior to joining the U.S. Army Air force, Montgomery completed a wartime movie, Bomber’s Moon (1943), in which he and Kent Smith escape from a prison camp.

Tall, rugged, and handsome, George Montgomery wanted to be an interior decorator, but became a boxer instead. Drifting to Hollywood, he became a movie star.

He frequently went out on romantic dates with Reagan. Don’t get the wrong idea: Singer Dinah Shore and Jane Wyman went along for the fun.

While at Fort Roach, Reagan made future best friends in the most unlikely of places.

“I hated the son of a bitch when I first met him,” said William Holden, who, during the war, became a Second Lieutenant in the U.S. Army Air Force, working in collaboration with the First Motion Picture Unit.

He recalled an early episode of his involvement in the Armed Services: “My friend, Richard Webb and I, from Paramount, went to Reagan’s office at Fort Roach to present our credentials. He ordered us to stand at rigid attention while the fucker read laboriously all the regulations. I hated his guts. Once freed from this god damn dictator, I called him a son of a bitch when I left his office.”

Holden had really wanted to join active service, and he resented having to report to the Motion Picture Unit. Its only advantage, he maintained at the time, was that he got to go home every night to his wife, the American actress Ardis Ankerson, who acted under the name of Brenda Marshall.

He related a memorable incident when, early one morning, Reagan and a camera crew were roughly shuttled into the desert for a training mission. “It must have been 120° F., and our bodies were soaked with sweat,” Holden said. “At noon, we were given a horrible lunch, Spam or something, and some rotting cabbage.”

It was the beginning of a beautiful, life-long friendship between William Holden and Reagan. But it began under unlikely circumstances.

Hours later, back at the base, Holden said, “There must have been something wrong with the Spam. Every guy in the unit got the runs. At the barracks, there was a stampede to the urinals where 18 toilet bowls with no seats were lined up. In a mad dash it was first come, first dump. At one point, the noise sounded like fiesta night in Guadalajara.”

“On the seat, I turned to look at the guy unloading next to me. It was Mr. Ronald Reagan, our captain. After that, Ronnie and I became best friends, or more aptly, ‘asshole buddies’ as Southern boys say. It was the beginning of a beautiful friendship.”

Sometimes, Reagan was embarrassed that he had not served on the front, even though his eyesight had prohibited it. That was especially true when he had a reunion with his Brother Rat star, Eddie Albert.

Albert’s career with the Army had begun long before the United States entered the war, and even before the beginning of his film career. As a clown and high-wire artist with the Escalante Brothers’ Circus, he had performed in Mexico. Privately, he was working for U.S. Army Intelligence, photographing Nazi U-Boats in Mexican harbors.

On September 9, 1942, he’d enlisted in the U.S. Navy, later becoming a lieutenant in the U.S. Naval Reserve, where he was awarded the Bronze Star for his bravery in the invasion of Tarawa in November of 1943. He rescued some 75 Marines under heavy enemy machine gun fire.

Back in Hollywood, Albert presented Reagan with an intricately carved fastener [netsuke] removed from the “uniform of a dead Jap.” Reagan accepted the gift with a red face.

Reagan immersed himself in his latest gig as a military propagandist.

“Even when he came home, he talked about nothing but the war, speculating how the world was going to line up politically when victory came,” Jane told her friends. “He detested Josef Stalin, our ally, telling me that politics make strange bedfellows. He hated communists, especially home-grown Reds.”

At Fort Roach, Reagan found himself making films again. Either in front of the camera, or as a narrator, his film and radio experience was highly valued.

In his first Army film, he interpreted the title role of Mr. Gardenia Jones (1942), even though he objected to his character’s name. “Somehow, Gardenia doesn’t strike me as a fit name for a man.” Lending their talents was an impressive cast, beginning with Laraine Day, his leading lady from when both of them had starred in The Bad Man

Supporting players included Charles Winninger, Fay Bainter, and Chill Wills. The director was George B. Seitz, whose career had begun in the Silents when he'd directed The Perils of Pauline (1914).

Mr. Gardenia Jones was a documentary depicting the work of the USO, showing how it provided both recreational and morale-boosting services for American troops. In the movie, Gardenia has enlisted before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. When the invasion occurs, Reagan is seen in aerial combat, mowing down Japanese planes, a bit of fantasy for a man afraid to fly.

In a surprise to both the cast and their director, this flag-waving war propaganda film ran into threatened censorship problems with the War Department. Despite the film's patriotic overtones, their objections almost prevented MGM from releasing it. The War Department censors objected to scenes that depicted soldiers jumping up with joy at the opportunity of taking a shower in the canteen, or sitting in overstuffed, comfortable chairs. "This Army," as noted by The New York Times, "feels this is not good for morale, as it implies that there are no showers or other comforts for soldiers in military camps."

After expressing its objections, the War Department allowed the film to be released anyway. Eventually, it won a nomination for an Academy Award as the Best Documentary of 1942.

Lewis Seiler, who had directed both Jane and Reagan in Tugboat Annie Sails Again, was brought in to helm Reagan and others in Beyond the Line of Duty (1942). Seiler seemed anxious to speed his way through production of this 22-minute film, as he wanted to move on to his next assignment directing Marlene Dietrich and John Wayne in Pittsburgh (1942). Even if it were a rush job, Beyond the Line of Duty would go on to win an Oscar as Best Short Subject (two reel).

The film is unique in that it cast both a sitting president, Franklin D. Roosevelt (in archive footage), and a future president, Reagan (as narrator).

The star of the film was a bomber pilot hero from Texas, Captain Hewitt T. Wheless, cast as himself. A week after the raid on Pearl Harbor, Wheless, as the pilot of a B-17, had attacked Japanese warships in the Philippines and shot down seven Japanese fighter planes.

In his next film, formally entitled Recognition of the Japanese Zero Fighter (1943), but identified around Fort Roach and to thousands of enlisted men as simply Jap Zero, Reagan found himself at the center of an instructional film teaching Allied airmen to correctly distinguish between enemy Japanese aircraft (the Zero) and the American P-14 fighter plane, which resembled it in many ways. Reagan played the role of a pilot who not only recognizes, but then destroys a Zero over the Pacific. He later said, "[In making this film] I relied on my experience filming sequences for International Squadron (1941)."

Months later, after watching the film, Crump sent out a rather sour memo, stating "Ronald Reagan is too famous a face to use in films involving instructional procedures. Our job is to save lives, not entertain."

From then on, Reagan was banned from appearing in equivalent films, although Crump did not issue that mandate to such actors as Van Heflin, George Montgomery, Lee J. Cobb, Arthur Kennedy, and William Holden, whom Crump defined as "boozy and ridiculously charming, a poster boy to get young men to enlist."

Reagan (right) teaches, instructs, commands, inspires, and urges his companions and the nation onward in Rear Gunner.

Reagan would, however, be allowed to work on other "War Effort" films not conceived strictly as "instruction manuals."

Without question, the most ambitious of all of Reagan's war propaganda shorts was Rear Gunner (1943), with an all-star cast headed by Burgess Meredith as Army Private Pee Wee Williams. Supporting players included Reagan himself, cast as Lieutenant Amers, along with instructor Tom Neal and Dane Clark, playing an enlisted man who likes Coney Island shooting galleries.

When she heard that her husband was working with Burgess Meredith, Jane was concerned that Reagan might learn some of her sexual secrets. Before leaving for military duty, he'd dated her best friend, Paulette Goddard. He would marry her in 1944. Goddard was Jane's confidante, and she wondered how much the actress had told Meredith. As she said in a call to Goddard, "Please warn him that discretion is the better part of valor, or however the line goes."

The film traces the odyssey of Pee Wee, a shy Kansas farm boy who is transformed into a killing machine, thanks to his assignment as an aerial gunner in the tail turret of a U.S. bomber.

Ray Enright, who had recently helmed Jane and Reagan in An Angel from Texas (1940), was called in to direct. Reagan had to leave town to shoot the film on location, both in the desert outside Tucson and also at the Las Vegas Gunnery School.

The film was blatantly patriotic, aimed at encouraging young men to go to gunnery schools in preparation for aerial combat. Most men who enlisted wanted to be pilots, not rear gunners. Gunnery schools frequently advertised with the slogan "We are always on the lookout for men short on height, but long on ambition." These schools were in the business of training "shorties" to become killers in the sky.

One of Reagan's lines proclaimed, "The film is about creating a modern knight of fire." He defined the position of a rear gunner as "a passport into the vistas of victory." In one sequence, an instructor tells Meredith, "A rear gunner knows that the fire from your guns is the fire of freedom."

After a film sequence demonstrating a rear gunner in action, Reagan asserts, "It's shooting like this that will knock them on their Axis."

In just twenty-six minutes of frenzied aerial combat, the farmboy evolves from a hayseed to a war hero, winning the Distinguished Service Cross.

One sequence depicts Reagan in the cockpit, evoking one of his Brass Bancroft movies when he played an "Agent in the Air" for the Secret Service.

Viewed today, the film seems to have emerged from a time machine. Some references evoke a snicker, as when the dialogue includes a reference to the Air Corps having a "gay day."

Unlike most of the films from FMPU, Jack Warner paid for the cost of Rear Gunner's production and wanted to release it as a commercial feature, with exhibitors paying to show it. The War Department objected, claiming, "Actors such as Ronald Reagan and Burgess Meredith, who have been commissioned into the Army, should not be exploited for commercial gain by any film studio."

Consequently, Rear Gunner was released, without charge, to theaters nationwide as part of their regular programming. It was not, however, specifically promoted as a special feature, as Warner would have preferred.

With a duration of twenty-two minutes, Target Tokyo (1942) was narrated by Reagan. It was a glorification of the B-29 bomber, a virtual flying fortress created to bomb the Japanese homeland into submission. Before the advent of the B-29, Japanese generals had claimed that their homeland was beyond the reach of any American bomber. The B-29 proved what a false statement that was.

The film begins on an early dawn in Nebraska, where the B-29s begin their long journey, with stopovers en route

As narrator, Reagan claims that for the Japs to stop them, their task would be "as hopeless as trying to stop the flow of water at Niagara Falls."

At one point during a bombing raid, the B-29 is shown flying over a munitions factory in the environs of Tokyo. Reagan asks the pilot, "Well, bud, what are you waiting for?" Immediately, the bombs rain down, destroying the factory.

General Douglas MacArthur had to evacuate The Philippines during the epic battle for those islands against the Japanese, vowing, "I shall return!" Reagan became involved in yet another film, Westward Bataan (1944), which paid homage to MacArthur and his island-hopping military strategy. It depicted and dramatized the U.S. campaign to cut off supply routes to Japanese soldiers maintaining beleaguered strongholds in New Ireland and New Britain. Reagan declares, "The Japs can surrender or rot."

An officer in the movie tells his men that the Japanese should be watched "like you would a deadly rattlesnake."

The enemy is depicted as a pack of fanatics, willing to fight to the last man, woman, or child, giving up their lives for their emperor. Viewers are told that the Japanese are willing to sacrifice ten million of their people. As narrator, Reagan grimly asserts, "Well, life isn't cheap in America." A Japanese mother is shown as she is presented with a box containing the ashes of her son. "We don't raise our boys to be god in little white boxes," Reagan assures his viewers.

Tarket Tokyo promoted the technological sophistication of the B-29, a flying Superfortress with Twelve 1/2-inch (12.7 mm) remote controlled M2 Browning machine guns and 20,000 pounds of "Earthquake bombs."

The atomic bombs that later fell on Japan were delivered by this aircraft.

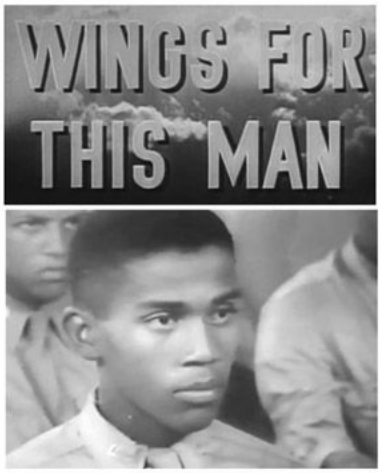
In For God and Country (1944), Reagan had an unusual role. Cast as a Catholic chaplain, he tells his fellow soldiers, "Gunsare not for chaplains." His two closest friends are a Protestant and a Jew, both of whom are killed trying to save the life of a Native American. "We were trying to cover all religious fronts in this film, all except Moslems and atheists," Reagan said. "There was a famous saying, 'There are no atheists in a foxhole.'"



Racial issues in the then-segregated U.S. army were touched upon delicately and lightly, very lightly.

For God and Country is a plea for racial and religious harmony among men allied against a common enemy. As part of the film's narrative, the chaplain asks, "What better weapons can a soldier carry with him into battle than those of courage, of unswerving devotion to his faith, and to his fellow man? The obvious answer to Reagan's question is "a gun."

Very few of these wartime propaganda films depicted African American servicemen, who were referred to as Negroes in most World War II movies. Wings for This Man (1945) was an exception, as it was devoted entirely to black pilots training in Alabama at the Tuskegee Air Base.

The movie begins with Reagan as narrator dramatically depicting an outnumbered U.S. squadron in a dogfight with planes from the Luftwaffe. The Nazi planes are shot down. Back at the base, it is revealed that the American pilots were black. To find their place in the sun, Reagan suggests, "These airmen had to overcome misunderstanding, distrust, and prejudice."

For the most part, racial issues are not hit upon too heavily. Reagan states: "One thing was proven here: That you can't judge a man by the color of his eyes or the shape of his nose. These men were pioneers, and pioneers have never had it easy."

At the film's end, a white officer is seen decorating a black pilot, giving him "Wings for This Man," the title of the short.

Jimmy Doolittle salutes in Fight for the Sky. When it was released, Reagan said, "We've already beat the Krauts and the Japs. We're just waiting for the Fat Lady to sing."

The Fight for the Sky (1945) was one of the last of Reagan's propaganda films. The documentary details the exploits of the American fighter escort pilots during bombing raids of Nazi Germany. They are depicted destroying the Luftwaffe.

Reagan's co-star was Jimmy Doolittle, the aviation pioneer who earned the Medal of Honor as commander of the famous "Doolittle Raid" over Japan during World War II. In 1942, Doolittle and his fellow pilots shocked the Japanese by flying the first retaliatory air raid unleashed upon the Japanese mainland. The attack force of sixteen B-25s set off from an aircraft carrier, the U.S.S. Hornet [now permanently moored as a museum ship in Alameda, California, near San Francisco.]

Targets of the raid included, among others, Tokyo, Yokohama, Osaka, and Kobe. After the raid, Doolittle's plane, now out of fuel after twelve hours of fighting, went down in a rice paddy on the Japanese-occupied mainland of China. Rescued by Chinese guerillas, with the assistance of the American missionary, John Birch, Doolittle was smuggled into territory controlled by the Allies. Although Doolittle survived for other heroic missions and flying records, four of his crew members lost their lives as a result of being captured and tortured by the Japanese.

The Fight for the Sky focuses on Thunderbolts (B-47s), Mustangs (P-51s), and Lightnings (P-38s), planes that smashed Hermann Göring's Luftwaffe during its desperate attempts to maintain control of the skies of the Fatherland.

As Reagan asserts during his narration of the film, "Into these three great fighters, America poured its genius. No American fighter ever failed because of enemy odds, however great."

As bombs fall over Germany, the film ends with praise for heroic Allied pilots "who in the decisive hour smashed the Luftwaffe and gave freedom of the air over Europe."

The film was released in both a 20-minute version and as a longer feature with a running time of 40 minutes. Reagan narrated only the shorter version. The movies are packed with camera footage of strafing runs and aerial combat. Images of several fighter aces are shown on the screen. Each pilot survived the war, though some were captured when their planes went down and they were held as POWs.

The message sent out to these pilots was "Attack! Attack! Attack!"

One day, Reagan received a call that informed him that the Armed Services were releasing him to make a film at Warner Brothers.

The number of Jane Wyman films produced at Warners was greatly reduced during the closing years of World War II. She appeared in only a fraction of the movies she'd rushed through in the 1930s and early 1940s.

A highlight of her film production during World War II had included co-starring with Olivia de Havilland in Princess O'Rourke in 1943. Her schedule was busier in 1944 when she was cast in three B-pictures and made a guest cameo appearance in Hollywood Canteen alongside such stars as Bette Davis and Joan Crawford.

The war did not devastate her small family in the way it did thousands of other American homes. Reagan drove home from Fort Roach most evenings, and Baby Maureen was healthy, except for a tendency to cry hysterically at three o'clock in the morning.

Jane continued to see a lot of her personal friends, usually visiting them at their homes for private dinners or parties. Occasionally, at obscure locations, she went out dancing with Van Johnson.

As the war dragged on, Jane continued her affair with Dennis Morgan, who—because he wasn't otherwise committed to military service—was still making movies for Warners.

Also, with high anticipation and whenever she could, she drove down to Long Beach, where John Payne was a flight instructor with the Army Air Force.

After his divorce from Anne Shirley in 1942, she had fully expected him to urge her to divorce Reagan and to marry him. When they had gotten together, both of them had expressed their "undying love" for each other. But there was no talk of his eventually marrying her.

One Sunday afternoon, with no warning whatsoever, he told her that they needed to talk. Their weekend, at least in her view, had been glorious, "almost the dearest, yet most passionate, I ever spent with John"

John Payne dumped Jane Wyman so he could marry Gloria DeHaven.

But that afternoon, as they faced a dying sun sinking in the west, Payne delivered news that devastated her. He told her that he was ending their relationship because he'd proposed marriage to the MGM music star, Gloria DeHaven. As Jane later revealed to both Blondell and Goddard, "I was in a state of shock. I had no clue this was about to happen. I guess John wants a wife more than he desires a married off-the-record gal like me hanging on to him."

Battling Blondes: June Allyson.

At the base, after his kiss-off speech, Payne reached for her hand after opening her car door. "Maybe we'll meet again, kid, after the war is over. That is, if I grow tired of my bride and you finally get up enough courage to ditch Reagan."

...and her nemesis, Joan Blondell.

"Maybe," she said, declining a farewell kiss.

She later told Goddard, "I cried all the way back to Los Angeles. I lost what was never mine in the first place."

Goddard knew DeHaven, who was the daughter of actor Carter DeHaven. He'd used his influence to get her cast in minor parts in two Charlie Chaplin films—Modern Times (1936) and The Great Dictator (1940)—made during the course of Chaplin's marriage to Goddard.

Jane had seen DeHaven in the 1943 Best Foot Forward with June Allyson and again with Allyson in Two Girls and a Sailor (1944).

Payne had told her that DeHaven, who was seven years younger than Jane, would retire from the screen after their marriage.

Blondell and Dick Powell also ended up in the divorce courts, freeing themselves from each other in 1944. Powell soon became involved with Allyson, whom he would marry the following year. Powell and Reagan still continued as friends. But after his marital reshuffling, instead of showing up at the Reagan home for dinner with Blondell, he appeared there with Allyson on his arm.

Jane remembered her first meeting with the short and perky MGM star. As she later told Blondell, "Right in front of Dick and me, June flirted outrageously with Ronnie."

"I'm not surprised," Blondell said. "She's a nympho, in spite of that syrupy personality of hers. The bitch lived with me for a time at my apartment in New York when she was trying to break into show business. I know all about that one."

"Grab him, darlin', if he's in uniform." Burgess Meredith marries Paulette Goddard.

After her messy divorce from Chaplin, Goddard began dating actor Burgess Meredith, who was making war propaganda films at the time with Reagan at Fort Roach. She married him in 1944, much to the consternation of Jane. "She didn't marry him for his looks or for his money, of which he had none. Surely, it wasn't because of his talent as an actor."

Meredith himself explained to Jane what had attracted him to "P.G.," as he called her.

"She walks into a room and you feel a sinuousness about her, a sense of danger. On top of that, she produces a nonstop flow of speech that is witty, cunning, and touching."

After witnessing the marital debris of her closest friends, Jane consoled herself over the loss of Payne, whom she continued to maintain as "the greatest sexual thrill of my life."

She told Blondell, "I still have the affection of Ronnie and Dennis Morgan, the two handsomest men at Warners. Not bad for a working gal like me. Who knows? In my next film, I may imitate Ronnie and develop Leadingman-itis."

"Jane, dear, there are those—not me, of course—who claim you came down with that disease back when we made all those silly pictures for Warners in the 30s."

The first picture Jane made in 1944 had the less-than-enticing title of Make Your Own Bed. She was teamed with the robust, 220-pound Jack Carson, who had first appeared on the stage in a college production playing Hercules. "I tripped," he told her, "and brought down half the set."

"That's one way to launch yourself into show business," Jane said.

Jack Carson sleuths and schemes around Jane Wyman in Make Your Own Bed.

In this, his latest film, Carson told her, “Here I go again, playing the clown, stooge, or whatever befuddled mess I am.”

Once again, her lover, Dennis Morgan, was a frequent visitor to the set, ostensibly to see Carson, his best friend. Secretly, Morgan continued to use Carson as his “beard” to meet with Jane. As Carson later confessed, years later, “I was with them only until we left the studio. Then I scrammed to leave them to tend to business. Maybe Jane was not getting enough from Reagan. How in the hell would I know?”

On the first day of shooting, she met a Londoner, her director, Peter Godfrey. She later concluded, “Peter was a bit too experimental and avant-garde for a pedestrian script like Make your Own Bed. He was very talented and was also at home with the classics, including both Molière and Strindberg.”

The rather weak screenplay of Make Your Own Bed was by Francis Swann and Edmund Joseph. The plot has Walter, a gunpowder manufacturer (Alan Hale, Sr.) and Vivian, his wife (Irene Manning), living in the country and finding it difficult to keep servants. Walter solves the problem by hiring a private detective, Jerry (Jack Carson) who had been fired for arresting the local District Attorney. Walter tells Carson that his life is in danger—“Nazi spies are everywhere.”

In Make Your Own Bed, Jerry, as portrayed by Carson, needs a cover, so he brings in his fiancée, Susan (Jane), to work for the household as a cook. The biggest problem involves the fact that she can’t cook. Consequently, as improbable as it sounds, Walter and Vivian solve their staff problem by agreeing to take turns preparing the meals themselves, all the while keeping Jane employed.

There is another problem, however: Jerry, as a sleuth, can’t even locate the Brooklyn Bridge. But by the final reel, as could be predicted, the Nazi spies are unmasked.

The most fascinating woman on the set was Irene Manning. Though born in Cincinnati, she could be made up to look like a continental femme fatale. She had played the diva, Fay Templeton, in Yankee Doodle Dandy (1942) opposite James Cagney. Jane was jealous of her, although she tried to conceal it. She’d co-starred with Morgan in Desert Song (1943), and Jane had heard rumors of an affair.

To make matters worse, director David Butler had cast Manning in another 1944 movie, Shine on Harvest Moon. It not only starred Morgan, but two of Jane’s best friends, Jack Carson and Ann Sheridan. Jane lobbied to join Carson, Morgan, and Sheridan as a player within that film, but she was rejected in favor of Manning, which infuriated her and increased her distaste for the singer-actress.

USO darling Irene Manning: Making her own bed, and competing with Jane for the attentions of Dennis Morgan.

Manning didn’t seem jealous of or threatened by Jane, and at one point, invited her to join her on an all-girl USO tour of war-torn England for morale-boosting performances with bandleader Glenn Miller, shortly before his death in 1944.

Although at the time, Jane claimed that she was needed “to take care of Ronnie and Maureen,” she regretted not having been part of that troupe.

She later said, “Had I gone, it would have made a fascinating chapter in my memoirs.”

[Incidentally, those memoirs—although contemplated—would never be written.]

After it was wrapped, Jane sat with Carson and Morgan, watching the final cut of Make Your Own Bed. At the end, and over drinks, she claimed, “This is the worst movie I’ve ever made.”

Perhaps it really wasn’t, but that’s what she said atthe time.

Jane didn't like her role in Crime by Night, but loved having her name in large letters above the title. She had a scene with Jerome Cowan (left) and with bit player Stuart Crawford.

When Cowan told her he was having sexual fantasies about her, she snapped, "Only in your dreams, pal!"

Bosley Crowther, writing in The New York Times, panned it. "For all the contortions it goes through, the movie is a limp dishrag, a labored but failed endeavor to fetch laughs with a lot of old gags, like kitchen disasters and wrong doors. The humor is feeble and unsustained."

Jerome Cowan, Jane's new leading man in Crime by Night, may not be a household name, but the appearance of this mustachioed character actor from New York had been immortalized in two film classics, which are forever being shown on TV. One was The Maltese Falcon (1941), in which Cowan was cast as the doomed private eye, the partner of Sam Spade, as played by Humphrey Bogart. The other famous film in which Cowan appeared was the perennial Christmas favorite, Miracle on 34th Street (1947). Jane would eventually see that film more than once, partly because it starred her former lover, John Payne, alongside Maureen O'Hara.

After serving in World War I, Cowan had become a vaudeville headliner until 1936 when Samuel Goldwyn brought him to Hollywood for a role in Beloved Enemy.

Amazingly, despite his late entry into films, Cowan became one of the most employed actors in Hollywood, appearing in some 120 movies. He was the suitor spurned by Bette Davis who consequently ended up onscreen with him as The Old Maid (1939). After completing his role with Jane, Cowan prepared for another face-off with Davis in her star role in Mr. Skeffington (1944).

During the filming of Crime By Night, Cowan downplayed not only his role, but that of Jane's. "It's just another Warner Brothers' private eye caper—nothing more, nothing less. The only thing it's got going for it is a trio of very beautiful actresses, beginning with you but also including Eleanor Parker and Faye Emerson."

"When I heard that you three beauties were in the movie, I had a wet dream," Cowan said. "Although I'm faithful to my wife, Helen Dodge, I dreamed that all three of you were the chief girls in my Harem."

"How flattering," Jane said, not quite disguising her sarcasm.

After dinner with Cowan, Jane shared her impression of him with Morgan. "My god, couldn't Jack Warner have come up with a younger actor to appear as my boyfriend? I looked it up. Cowan was born in the final year [1897] of Grover Cleveland's presidency. He's forty-seven right now and looks older. I'm twenty-seven and look like a girl out of college."

"How true," Morgan responded.

Jane also complained to the film's director, William Clemens, about his choice of her leading man, and her role. "Basically, it seems that all I have to do is feed Cowan his lines."

"But you get to kiss him in the final reel," Clemens said.

"Thanks a hell of a lot!" she snapped. "That would be like kissing my father if I had one. With Cowan as my boyfriend, he could get arrested for child molestation. Where is John Payne now that I need him in more ways than one?"

The plot of Crime by Night focuses on private eye Sam Campbell (Cowan) who is on vacation with his secretary-partner, Robbie Vance (as played by Jane). They become involved in a murder investigation. Harvey Carr, the father-in-law of Larry Borden (Stuart Crawford), is found dead from a blow by an ax. Borden's promising career as a concert pianist had ended in a fight with Carr, who had chopped off Borden's hand with an ax. Therefore, Borden was a prime suspect in Carr's murder, perhaps as an act of revenge for destroying his musical career.

Borden is Campbell's friend, and he and Robbie (that is, Jane), arrive to help. Eleanor Parker was cast as Irene Carr, the daughter of the murdered man and Borden's ex-wife. She arrives on the scene as another dead body, that of the gardener, turns up.

Irene shows up with Paul Goff (Charles Lang), a singer whom she intends to marry. He also arrives with his agent, Ann Marlow (Faye Emerson).

Complications ensue in the thickening plot, which spins around a Nazi spy ring. Carr, the murder victim, owned a chemical plant. At first, Goff is a suspect until he is also murdered.

SPOILER ALERT: Ann Marlow (Emerson) turns out to be the culprit, a Nazi spy. Ironically, at the time, after her marriage to Elliott Roosevelt, Emerson was set to move into the White House, the nerve center of the United States' War direction against the Nazis.

As a reviewer in The New York Times asserted, "The real crime in Crime by Night are the people who made it, forcing the audience to sit through 72 minutes of tedium. At my viewing, many patrons walked out after the first thirty minutes."

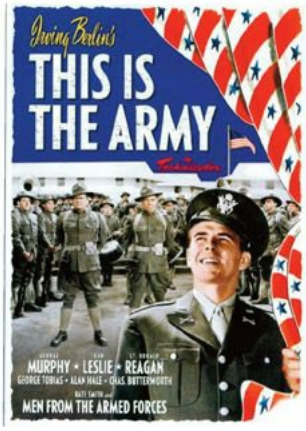
Leaving Fort Roach, based on wartime orders from his superiors, Reagan returned to Warner Brothers. He later wrote, "It was a thrill for me once again to be a part of the picture business." His assignment involved playing a key role in a feature film, This Is the Army (1943), a sometimes bizarre wartime musical produced by Hal B. Wallis and Jack Warner. The screenplay was by Claude Binyon and Casey Robinson. Robinson had written the script for Kings Row.

The movie was based on Irving Berlin's hit Broadway musical of 1942. He had produced a roughly equivalent show as a morale-booster during World War I called Yip, Yip, Yaphank. Money earned for the 1943 movie version, eventually totaling some $12 million, would be donated to the Army Emergency Relief Fund.



At the time, Reagan was drawing a monthly stipend from the Army of $250. He was told that even though he was starring in the film, he would get no additional salary from Warners. However, the non-enlisted civilian star of the movie, song-and-dance man George Murphy, would draw around $28,000.

In addition to Murphy, other major stars would be cast in the film, along with some 300 Army men and sailors from the U.S. Navy. Before the war, most of these had been singers or actors in civilian life.

For the most part, Reagan was impressed with the cast which the film's director, Michael Curtiz, had assembled. Although he considered Curtiz temperamental and difficult, he had gotten along with the Hungarian when he'd helmed Errol Flynn and him in Santa Fe Trail.

Jane claimed, "I was seriously pissed off when I didn't get to play Ronnie's girlfriend in This Is the Army." Instead, the part went to "sweet little Joan Leslie," depicted above.

If Jane had gotten the part, she could have worn her own uniform. In the summer of 1942, as a public relations statement partly based on her success in selling War Bonds, she was commissioned in the Army Air Corps as a 2nd lieutenant. Jane was proud of it, however, and insisted, "I deserved the part."

In addition to Murphy and Reagan, Curtiz had cast "sweetheart sweet" Joan Leslie, plus supporting players who included George Tobias (Reagan's co-star in Juke Girl) and Alan Hale, Sr. (Reagan's co-star in Tugboat Annie Sails Again).

Other veteran performers included Charles Butterworth, Rosemary DeCamp (the mother of the character portrayed by Reagan), Una Merkel, Stanley Ridges, Ruth Donnelly, and Dolores Costello, once hailed as "the goddess of the silent screen." Personalities who included Kate Smith, Frances Langford, Gertrude Niesen, Victor Moore, Joe E. Louis, and Berlin himself appeared as themselves.

On his first day back at Warners, Reagan was ushered into Curtiz' office, where he was concluding an acrimonious phone conversation with an irate Bette Davis. Curtiz slammed down the phone. "The patriotic bitch wants to be in my movie. She can't sing or dance. She's no soldier. When I cast bitch in Cabin in the Cotton (1932), I called her a 'goddamn nothing no good sexless son of a bitch.' But we made up when I lick pussy. She likes pussy licked. We made five more films after that, but not this one, god-damn it."

At some point, Reagan asked Curtiz, "Exactly what type of boy is Johnny Jones, the one I'm to play?"

"Who gives a fuck?" Curtiz exclaimed. "No one cares about character. I make it so fast nobody notices. Don't argue with me. I'm Best Director." He pointed to a table where his Oscar for Best Director rested. He'd won it for the 1942 Casablanca, with Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid Bergman. "Bogie's a shit. Bergman fuck him, she fuck me, she'll fuck any round object."

"Your role no special shit," Curtiz continued. "Any actor at Warners under thirty-five can play it. You run around calling people to stage and turning down offers of Joan Leslie who wants to marry you so she can get fucked. You want to wait until war's end. You claim you don't want to make her widow. She finally wins and you get fuck. You don't actually fuck her on screen, fool. You and Leslie can stage private exhibit for me. I like to watch. Usually, I hire a big black buck to fuck young blonde gal. That's my favorite."

Curtiz told Reagan their film meant a lot to him. "I escaped from the Nazis. Members of my family not so lucky. They die at Auschwitz."

"Right now at Warners I ride high. Tomorrow, I might fall off horse. You no make dough at box office, you are tossed into gutter with garbage."

Then Curtiz summoned Joan Leslie into his office and introduced her to Reagan. A latter-day film historian would write: "Sweet, perky young things were a dime a dozen in Hollywood's heyday, but Joan Leslie stood out as a highly appealing and engaging young actress with some flashes of genuine talent."

George Murphy, who had tap-danced his way to fame in 1930s and early 40s musicals, was cast as Reagan's father. "And I never let him forget it," Reagan said. Actually, he was only nine years older than Reagan, having been born a "Connecticut Yankee."

This Is the Army opens in 1917, with Murphy portraying a fast-talking vaudeville performer who gets drafted. In World War I, after a severe injury to his leg, he can't perform any more, although he can walk around with a cane. As Reagan admitted, "It took a lot of makeup and a gray dye job to make George look like my father."

Although the two men had known each other for years, Murphy became president of the Screen Actors Guild (SAG) in 1944. It was during this time that the two performers bonded.

[Reagan later referred to Murphy as "my own John the Baptist," whatever that meant. In time, Murphy became a politician, serving as a Republican in the U.S. Senate from 1965 to 1971, representing the State of California. He became the first notable U.S. actor to make the transition from the movies into politics, predating both Reagan and Arnold Schwarzenegger, each of whom served as governor of California.

Beginning with This Is the Army, Reagan and Murphy became lifelong friends. "When I met Ronnie, he was a nearly hopeless hemophiliac liberal. But I changed his mind, although it took a lot of talking. As a liberal, he backed all the wrong causes. It was a struggle, but I eventually turned him into a benighted Republican. I made him realize that our Republican philosophy of self-reliance, as opposed to the welfare state, was in keeping with his own ideals and not those of mad-dog Democrats who like to give away the store."]

Reagan experienced an embarrassing moment when he stood on a replica of a Broadway stage with Murphy and Curtiz. The director was stridently demanding the beginning of the movie's big number, which included the singing and dancing of dozens of soldiers.

[In those days, the military was segregated.]

"BRING ON THE WHITE SOLDIERS!" Curtiz bellowed.

After the men were in place, Curtiz yelled, "BRING ON THE NIGGER TROOPS!"

Murphy politely corrected him, telling him that N word was offensive, not only to blacks but to him.

"I'm sorry," Curtiz said. "BRING ON THE COLORED NIGGERS."

During the first week of filming, Reagan was introduced to Irving Berlin at least five times, in as many separate venues. "He never seemed to remember that we'd met before. One day, he sat through the rushes and greeted me with, 'Young fellow, I just saw some of your work. You've got a few things to correct—for example, the huskiness in your voice—but you really should give this business some serious consideration when the war is over."

Reliable, stalwart and solid: Reagan as the competent but unflashy announcer for the frequently bizarre military/theatrical revue This Is the Army.

Cast in a very minor role was Craig Stevens, who was seven years younger than Reagan. Like Jane, he was from Missouri. Since 1939, he'd been cast in minor parts, although he and Reagan would co-star in a film together after the war.

As Reagan privately confessed to Murphy, "I was starting to worry a bit about Craig. I invited him to share my dressing room, but he praises my body and my looks too much, whether I'm in or out of my clothes. He also brings me gifts as if he's courting me. I was going to confront him. How wrong I would have been."

"How so?" Murphy asked.

"One day, he introduced me to this beautiful actress, Alexis Smith," Reagan said. "He's going to marry her. I'm now so comfortable with Craig that I even piss with him at the urinal without suspecting him of checking out my dick. He's definitely not a homo."

"My boy, you can be rather naïve about some things," Murphy said. "Haven't you ever heard of a bisexual?"

"Frankly, I don't believe such a thing exists. You're either straight or you're a homo. Guys who pretend otherwise are just bullshitters."

For their appearances in This Is the Army, Curtiz asked many of the soldiers—"I selected only pretty boys"—to appear in drag. "Many guys seemed only too eager to dress up like gals," Curtiz told Reagan. "Do you think it's possible that the Army is infested with homos?"

"Definitely not," Reagan said. "It's against Army policy to enlist homos. They weed them out at induction centers."

"So you say," Curtiz said. "I think many of them slip in anyway."

Reagan never recovered from the day Hale appeared on the set of This Is the Army in a blue dress with long blonde curls inspired by something from a silent Mary Pickford movie. He was not too happy being in drag. "Alan, would you go out on a date with me after the show?" Reagan asked.

"Why don't you go fuck yourself?" Hale suggested.

"Wait till Ward Bond and John Wayne hear about this," Reagan said. "I want to be the first to tell them."

With some other soldiers in drag, Hale performed in a number called "Ladies of the Chorus."

When the Breen office saw the film, wherein U.S. soldiers danced merrily together in drag, they exploded in fury and violently objected. They demanded that such scenes be cut. Jack Warner refused.

Breen also interpreted many of Berlin's songs as "too suggestive." Again, Warner refused to eliminate them from the film, and contacted the War Department, which warned the Breen office "to take a hike."

"There's a war on, in case you bluenoses never heard that," General Hap Arnold told Joseph Breen during an angry phone call. "I'll decide what our boys can see or not see, and I want them to see this picture." Then he slammed down the phone on Breen.

Not politically correct in today's terms, the film also included an unfunny minstrel number entitled "Manny," in which dozens of white soldiers, about half of them in drag and all of them in blackface, performed a “coeducational” song and dance number that by today’s standards seems surreal.

Reagan found himself the butt of the song, “This is the Army, Mr. Jones.” He had not one memorable scene, but acquitted himself well, although outclassed by the massive array of stage talent surrounding him.

All the dancing white soldiers were shown up by the film’s showstopper, the black troupe of the James Cross Company performing a fast-moving and ultra-energetic number entitled “That’s What the Well-Dressed Man in Harlem Will Wear,” a reference to Army khaki.

At the revue’s end, the soldiers learn they are being immediately shipped, that very night, to Europe. They march through the theater with rifles and full military gear, hurriedly kissing their (weeping) mothers, wives, and girlfriends adios, and moving out and into a waiting convoy of trucks.

The film was a big hit, earning some $12 million for the Army Emergency Relief Fund.

In spite of his lackluster performance, Reagan fitted in perfectly with the patriotic mood of the country. For the first and only time in his life, Box Office Record, in reference to the 1942-43 season, gave him the highest ranking of any male star in Hollywood. With 195 points, he topped a list that included runners-up James Cagney at 186, Bing Crosby at 176, Clark Gable at 171, and Cary Grant at 169.

Although he would hardly have believed it at the time, that moment in his life represented his peak as a Hollywood movie star. In terms of what pertained to his career as an entertainer, everything after that would run downhill.

For her final film of 1944, Jane Wyman found herself reunited with her friends, Ann Sheridan and Jack Carson, in The Doughgirls, a wartime bedroom farce about the housing shortage in Washington. Also cast were the Reagans’ newly minted friends, Alexis Smith and her handsome boyfriend (soon to become her second husband), actor Craig Stevens

Carson, in the role of Arthur Halstead, has married his girlfriend, Vivian, and he books a honeymoon suite for them. But he soon learns that Jane has moved in her friends, Edna (Sheridan) and Nan (Smith), who can’t find lodgings elsewhere. Not only that, but they, too, have newly minted husbands, Sheridan having hooked up with John Ridgely and Smith with Stevens.

The young women—Jane, Smith, and Sheridan— soon face complications when, for somewhat contrived reasons, the marital status of each of them is unexpectedly defined as illegal by the authorities When Vivian learns that she is unmarried, she boots Carson out of their quarters. In his frustration, he refuses to pay the hotel bill unless Vivian moves out her girlfriends. Subsequently, she is forced to pawn her earrings to settle the bill.

Doughgirl: Eve Arden as a gun-toting Soviet socialist.

In the meantime, Arthur's boss, Stanley, played by Charles Ruggles, pursues Jane, although the mating of the pixie-like comic and Jane seems preposterous. He was fifty-eight at the time.

Eve Arden was cast as a Russian guerilla fighter, Natalia Moskarova, who is sent over from the Russian Embassy as yet another roommate. Although miscast, it was obvious to the other stars that Arden was a major threat as a scene stealer. She played the role in its broadest sense, lacking the subtlety of Greta Garbo's performance as a die-hard Soviet communist in Ninotchka (1939).

A play by Joseph Fields, The Doughgirls, had been a hit on Broadway in 1942, running for 688 performances. The brother of the famous lyricist, Dorothy Fields, Joseph was both a playwright and director, having scored two previous Broadway triumphs, My Sister Eileen (1940) and Junior Miss (1941).

Although Jack Warner was willing to bid only $40,000 for the screen rights to Gone With the Wind (1939), he put up an astonishing (for the time) $250,000 for the movie rights to The Doughgirls.

Of course, he knew that the Broadway script was "too spicy" for the movies, and that he'd have to remove any suggestion that the couples were living together and having pre-marital sex. Much of the racy dialogue of the play would also have to be rewritten into something much more bland.

James V. Kern was hired to write the screenplay with Sam Hellman. For some unknown reason, Warner also designated Kern as director of this prestigious project, even though he'd had no experience in that field.

Jane expressed at the time her disappointment with Kern both as a writer and as a director. [Later, however, she changed her mind about Kern, a New Yorker. "I met him when he was still green. He'd been a lawyer, ditching that career for show business. He really found himself when he became a director of TV series in the 1950s, doing hundreds of shows, including the I Love Lucy series with my friend, Lucille Ball, and in the early 60s, My Three Sons, with Fred MacMurray."

At the time of her involvement with Kern in The Doughgirls, however, Jane complained to him about the way he'd written her character of Vivian. "You've made me a little harebrained, witless figure. I mean, some of the lines I've been given make me squirm. When I hear that Alexis and Craig are going to have lunch at the White House with FDR, I make the ridiculous claim, 'I enjoyed the president in Princess O'Rourke.' As you well know, I was the co-star of that movie. The President didn't appear in the film. I read the script for the Broadway play. My character of Vivian had far more spice."

Jane also complained to Mark Hellinger, the producer. "I noticed you billed me in fourth position, under Alexis. I've been a star at Warners, and Alexis is the new girl on the block."

"Sorry, Jane, but my billing stays," Hellinger said. "Case closed."

That night, Jane complained to Reagan that she hated her role so much she was considering refusing to cooperate, and subsequently being placed on suspension. Up until then, he had hardly paid attention to her concerns, but suddenly, he came alive.

"You know that Maureen and I are depending on you to bring in a weekly paycheck," he said. "We can't live on Army pay!"

"All right, god damn it," she told him. "How does it feel to be a kept boy?"

He stormed out of the house and drove over to spend the night with Ann Sheridan, who surprised him with news that she'd almost gone on suspension herself. "I saw the play on Broadway, and I decided I didn't want to play any of the three girls."

He was very persuasive, and he invited her to come to dinner the following night and talk Jane into going forward with the role of Vivian.

Sheridan agreed to do that. After about an hour, she convinced Jane to continue struggling through the role, promising her, “We’ll have fun. Alexis is a great gal, and Carson is your pal.”

Sheridan later told Smith, “What tempted Jane was that once again, Carson can be her beard for any rendezvous she has with Dennis Morgan.”

On the set, Jane chatted briefly with Regis Toomey, with whom she had shared the longest screen kiss in history. He’d been given only a minor role in Doughgirls as “Agent Walsh.”

“Once was enough,” she quipped. “I’m still trying to catch my breath.”

Cast in a minor role was Irene Manning, with whom Jane had appeared in Make Your Own Bed. She continued to snub Manning, believing that she was conducting a clandestine affair with Dennis Morgan.

When Jane saw the ads for The Doughgirls, she complained once again to its producer, Mark Hellinger. Publicity included sexy pictures of Smith, Sheridan, and Jane, but what she objected to was the prominent display of Manning, even though her role was small. “My god, you’re showing her tits, a big bosom on display, and that lacy see-through lives up to its purpose.”

She said, “Ronnie was a baseball nut. The day before, he’d heard this game on the radio, and he gave us a play-by-play account, the way he used to do on the air in Des Moines. Jane begged him to stop, claiming that neither of them was interested in baseball. He politely listened to his wife’s complaints, but carried on with a detailed description for all nine innings.”

In the kitchen, Jane complained to Sheridan, “If it’s not baseball, it’s politics. Christ, he even makes speeches in his sleep.”

In 1944, Jane got a reprieve from her marriage when the Air Force sent Reagan, with John Garfield, on a bond-selling tour across America.

Garfield later recalled, “In any town we landed in, I went out and chased the dames. Because I was John Garfield, I always scored. Once, I took three gals back with me. I invited Reagan to share in my luck. But he stayed in his room reading scripts. I’d heard what a lady-killer he’d been at Warners. That was one serious man.”

Garfield played a large role in Jane’s life. They both spent three or four nights a week at the USO, entertaining and feeding U.S. servicemen. Bette Davis and others saw Jane leave every one of those nights with Garfield. There were plenty of rumors but no smoking gun. No one was absolutely sure they were having an affair.

John Garfield with Lana Turner in a defining moment from The Postman Always Rings Twice.

However, when Garfield, in 1946, made the classic The Postman Always Rings Twice, he gave his version to his co-star, Lana Turner, with whom he was having an affair at the time.

As related to Turner, Garfield said, “I fucked Jane over a period of six weeks. After traveling on the road with her ‘bookish’ husband, on that war bond tour, I figured the poor gal needed it from some man who knew how to deliver the goods, namely, me.”

Garfield, as even his friends would admit, was not known for his modesty.

[At the beginning of World War II, Bette Davis and John Garfield, with help from others, founded the Hollywood Canteen, a morale-booster for military men being shipped off to fight in the Pacific, or else returning after surviving military engagements on land and sea.

Garfield enlisted Jane’s support, and she appeared regularly at the canteen, entertaining the young men with song, dancing with them, and serving them coffee and doughnuts. “I got a lot of propositions, but the rule was, no dating the servicemen after the canteen closed.”

Of course that otherwise strict rule didn't seem to apply to either Garfield or Jane.

The entertainment center became so popular that Jack Warner ordered director Delmer Daves to make it the subject of a movie with an all-star cast. It was released in 1944 and entitled Hollywood Canteen. The plot was thin, the main stars being Robert Hutton, Dane Clark, and Joan Leslie. Hutton becomes the millionth G.I. to enter the canteen, and consequently, he wins a date with his dream girl, Leslie.

During the filming, Jane asked her director, Daves, to screen one of his earlier movies, the 1943 wartime adventure, Destination Tokyo, for servicemen. It starred Cary Grant in what had been Daves' directorial debut. Daves obliged and the men applauded wildly.

A few years later, Jane read a screenplay by Daves entitled Dark Passage, a movie Warners released in 1947. When she heard that Daves was also directing it, and that it would star Humphrey Bogart, she went to Daves and lobbied for the female lead. "Sorry," Jane," he said, "but Bogie's already spoken for his Baby to play Irene in our movie."

She knew, of course, that "Baby" meant Lauren Bacall.].

The tepid "romance" of Hutton and Leslie in Hollywood Canteen was merely a backdrop for the appearances of a star-studded cast that included both Joan Crawford and Bette Davis. Avowed enemies, they tried to stay in different parts of the canteen. Other stars ranged from film noir's Ida Lupino to Roy Rogers and Trigger. Sydney Greenstreet, Peter Lorre, and Paul Henreid represented the Casablanca coven. Jane convinced her friend, Barbara Stanwyck, to add her star name to the canteen, both in the movie and at the service counter.

One night, she whispered to Jane, "I see at least twenty hot guys here who would be Bob's type."

Jack Benny was in the movie and often appeared at the canteen to deliver a comedy routine, as did veteran performer Joe E. Brown. Jane still referred to Brown as "My least favorite leading man."

When Jane worked at the canteen, singing a song or two, she waited until closing time, when Garfield would volunteer to drive her home. On some nights, Garfield preferred to depart the premises with Joan Crawford on his arm. Their romance would grow hotter when they both co-starred in the 1946 Humoresque.

When Dennis Morgan made an appearance to entertain the troops, Jane always left the canteen with him.

Upon the release of Hollywood Canteen, audiences ignored the assault of the critics and flocked to see it. Jack Warner donated 40% of the ticket sales to the canteen itself.

Jane visited Van Johnson frequently during his recuperation from his automobile crash, and when he recovered, he asked her to go dancing with him. During the war, she'd kept a low profile and wasn't seen in clubs. But with victory almost assured, she went back to nightclubbing with Johnson.

Ironically, the movie magazines had run more pictures of Reagan and Johnson during the war than any other movie stars. Whereas Reagan represented the (married) man in uniform, Johnson had been dubbed "America's

"Jane seems to have captured both of these so-called gods," Sheridan said. "Of course, she and others knew her dates with Johnson were harmless and merely platonic outings."

Sometimes, Jane was seen out with both Johnson and a handsome young actor, Tom Drake, who had achieved fame as Judy Garland's "Boy Next Door" in Meet Me in St. Louis (1944). She was a "beard" to their burgeoning relationship, although Johnson also continued his affair with the married Keenan Wynn.

An idealized portrait of small-town American virtue: Tom Drake, "The Boy Next Door," with Judy Garland in Meet Me in St. Louis.

One night, Drake told Jane, "I don't rate the magazine coverage Van and your Ronnie get, but I'm also a favorite. I'm getting tons of mail, real gooey letters from young girls. Van gets even more mail like that."

"What would those little girls think if they could see you and Van, intimate and together?" Jane asked.

Released in the summer of 1944, The Doughgirls picked up mostly bad reviews, one of them defining it as "More mishmash than smash." James Kern was attacked for his lack of experience as a director.

Paper after paper decided to downplay the film's other female stars and feature Jane—despite the fact that she had been billed below both Smith and Sheridan. The press had continued to define her and Reagan as "The Constant Honeymooners," and they still graced the cover of magazines. Maureen was, throughout most of the war, the most widely publicized baby in America.

The New York Times asserted, "Jane Wyman plays a priceless nitwit. The pairing of Wyman with her sidekick, Jack Carson, is threadbare." Other New York critics attacked how Hollywood had "sanitized" the original stage play, blaming its censure on a "bunch of bluenoses."

Despite its reviews, it did a respectable business at the box office, and Jane continued to get roles.

That led to a bitter row one night when Reagan came home. "You complain that all I talk about is politics. Well, all you talk about is your damn career."

"As a star, I've caught up with you in the last two years. There are those who say I've surpassed you."

"What are you trying to do?" he angrily retorted. "Replicate the plot of A Star Is Born?"

He was referring to the Fredric March/Janet Gaynor film released in 1937. It was the story of a rising young actress who marries a Hollywood super star. As he becomes a has-been, her star rises.

The argument became so intense that Reagan packed a bag and went to spend the next ten nights in the apartment of William Holden. He kept a small hideaway with a double bed, mainly where he brought his women.

"Ronnie and I never got off together," Holden told his friend, Glenn Ford. "We slept together. He'd fall asleep and I'd jerk off if I didn't get anything that day. When I blast off, I always let out a war whoop. I'm sure he heard me, but pretended to be asleep."

During the final months of World War II, Jane's marriage to Reagan was in serious trouble. His growing interest in politics and her near-obsession with her own career formed a deep void between them.

When she got a good review, he'd say, "That's nice, Janie," and go back to reading his newspaper, or else he'd talk politics. "Did you hear that FDR might appoint Douglas MacArthur to rule over Japan?"

"Who gives a fuck?" she'd say.

One evening, he saw her emerging in an evening gown and a mink coat. "I was told not to wear mink during the war years. But the damn war is about over, and I'm back with my mink to show off in front of the photographers."

"Where are you heading?" he asked. "You know I have to get up at 4:30 tomorrow morning."

“I can sleep late,” she said. “We operate on different time clocks.”

“It’s good for my career,” she said. “I’ve got to circulate, go to parties, go dancing, meet directors and producers.”

Jack Warner told Reagan that throughout the war, his fan mail had continued unabated. Millions had seen him appear in or else narrate Army films. “In some weeks, your mail tops Flynn’s. His fans are still loyal to him, even though he was investigated on charges of statutory rape. Judging by the mail, however, thousands of young American gals want to get raped by Flynn, not to mention the hordes of homo mail he gets from guys who are 4-F.”

Day after day, Reagan viewed real combat footage sent by his crews in both Europe and the Pacific. “It was a horrible experience to sit through,” he said. “One can only imagine what it was like to be in the middle of it. Plane crashes, poor guys being burned alive, massacred by the Japs or the Nazis. All the horror of war.”

When at last, the Allies declared victory in Europe, Owen Crump became the first of FMPU’s camera combat units to move into western Germany. Crump even beat Eisenhower in inspections of Hitler’s notorious death camp at Buchenwald. Thousands had suffered and died in this camp. Newspapers made it famous as the former abode of one of her era’s most notorious women, Ilse Koch, the wife of Karl-Otto Koch, commandant of the camp. After the war, this psychotic woman (“The Bitch of Buchenwald”) was accused of having lamp shades crafted from the skins of murdered inmates with distinctive tattoos.

Crump sent footage of the atrocities back to Reagan and the officers of FMPU. Crump issued a warning. “The scenes depicted in these films are not fit for human viewing.”

After watching what he called “the most sickening scenes I was ever to witness in my life,” Reagan went outside the screening room and vomited.

He later said. “Those images are engraved on my brain forever. There will be no escaping them in my nightmares. What ghastly images to have to watch: Inmates so gaunt and emaciated you wondered how they could possibly be alive. I saw ditches being filled with their bodies and then bulldozed by the Nazis as if they could really bury their cruelty and depravity. I never knew how a country with Germany’s rich cultural background could revert to such savagery.”

Reagan recalled the final bitter battles of Americans fighting the Japanese as they prepared for an invasion of their homeland, where a million U.S. soldiers, it was estimated would lose their lives.

He was driving along a California highway when he heard on the radio that “a fantastic bomb has been dropped on Hiroshima.”

“Suddenly, I knew my days in the Army were drawing to a close and I could return to Warners a movie star. It was the end of one aspect of my career. It was also a beginning, but none of us knew that at the time.”

When he got to a phone, he called Jane.

“Your Johnny—in this case, Ronnie—will soon be marching home. Kick out all your other boyfriends and make room for Daddy.”

“You’re joking, of course,” she said, sharply.

“Of course I am,” he said.

To most of his fans, Reagan had shown “great courage under fire” during the war. Actually, he’d never heard one gun fired. His reputation had been based solely on his “daring exploits” as portrayed in some of his movies, especially the wartime propaganda flicks, Jap Zero and Rear Gunner.

Reagan had served at Fort Roach for more than three years. But on September 10, 1945, he was given his discharge, thereby terminating his active duty.

After he drove home and entered his house, he secretly anticipated a “Welcome home, Ronnie” surprise party. But even though she was not involved at the time in any film project, Jane was nowhere to be found. There was no note or explanation of any kind.

Maureen and her nanny, however, were waiting to greet him.

He immediately placed a telephone call to Jack Warner, perhaps expecting him to react with joy that he was free to resume his movie career at Warners.

As Reagan later told Bill Holden, “Jack was friendly enough, and he invited Jane and me over to dinner. He also congratulated me on all those wartime propaganda movies. But his mood changed when I asked him to start sending over scripts.”

“We don’t have anything for you now,” Warner said. “I’m sure something will turn up. We’ll stay in touch. I’ve got to go.”

As Reagan confessed to Holden, “So, this was to be my homecoming. I felt both my private life and my movie career had evaporated. I was desolate.”

In the summer of 1944, Jane had flown to New York at the request of Jack Warner to promote The Doughgirls. While there, she had received a phone call that changed her life.

The second day of her arrival, Walter Winchell, in his popular column, had announced her presence in New York. That morning, at around 10AM, a call came in from director Billy Wilder. Since the success of his Double Idemnity (1944), starring Fred MacMurray and Jane’s friend, Barbara Stanwyck, Wilder was the hottest director in Hollywood.

Throughout the war years, despite the harmonies produced on their piano, tensions were high in the “WyReaMan” household.

“What a delight to hear from you, Mr. Wilder,” she said.

“I’ll read it right away,” she promised.

“I’m going to make it into a film,” he announced. “I want you to play the girlfriend of the hero. Perhaps I should say ‘anti-hero.’ He’s an alcoholic.”

“What is this novel called?” she asked.

“Read it! It’s The Lost Weekend.”

Chapter Ten

Starlet Nancy Davis Joins MGM's "More Stars Than There Are in Heaven"

Nancy Gets a Reputation as "One of Those Girls Whose Phone Number Gets Handed Around a Lot."

At Manhattan's Stork Club, Clark Gable was seen dating Nancy Davis.

A columnist wrote: "Has something happened to Clark Gable, something in the form of starlet Nancy Davis, that is, changing the fitful pattern of his romantic life? Has he, in other words, finally found the Gable woman, for whom he is more than willing to give up the Gable women? The answer seems to be yes--even though, if it is love at all, it is, so far, love in hiding."

Ronald Reagan may have been Nancy's consolation prize after losing Clark Gable, but the B-picture star became the love of her life. She made up her mind long before he did.

The problem was: How to get this roving post-Wyman Romeo to quit dating every starlet in Hollywood and settle down to home and hearth with her?

During World War II, Ronald Reagan (always in uniform) and Jane Wyman arguably became the most publicized couple in Hollywood, representing a fantasy version of what the American male in uniform and his wife and baby daughter on the homefront should look like. What was going on in their private lives beyond the screen was not known at the time, nor even today.

Alert, aware, intelligent, and ambitious. Nancy Davis in 1950.

As for Nancy Davis of Chicago, she almost fell off the radar screen until after the war, when her biography could resume after a long and dormant slumber.

After Nancy's graduation from Smith College in 1943, she secured work in summer stock that was so minor it's hardly worth mentioning.

Nancy still pursued a theatrical career, beginning at the lowest rung on the ladder, appearing in New England as an apprentice in mostly summer stock theaters.

"An apprentice meant you had to do everything, even clean the toilet in the star's dressing room," Nancy recalled.

Diana Barrymore, called "The Barrymore Brat" because of her Hollywood excesses, was the star, Nancy Davis the apprentice, in summer stock.

"I appeared in rickety old summer stock playhouses along the Eastern Seaboard, including Bass Rocks, Massachusetts. "Sadly, most of them are gone today."

Nancy remembered her excitement when she actually had a line in one of these plays. "It wasn't much of a part. I wore a black uniform and a starched white apron. I came out and spoke my line: 'Madam, dinner is served.' Often an actress starts at the bottom, and I was following that age-old custom."

During that summer of 1943, Walter Hartwig, director of the Ogunquit Playhouse in Maine, cast Diana Barrymore in You Can't Take It With You, by George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart. Nancy had wanted the role for herself, but was hired as an apprentice.

Diana was the daughter of the legendary John Barrymore, an alcoholic Don Juan who had died the previous year (1942). Her mother was the poet, Blanche Oelrichs, who had been Barrymore's second wife.

In the year of her father's death, Universal had signed Diana to a contract and promoted her as "1942's Most Sensational New Screen Personality." But within months, she'd become known as "The Barrymore Brat," because of her intake of alcohol and drugs and her lack of self-discipline.

In response to the negativity building up against her in Hollywood, and as a means of fine-tuning her dramatic technique, Diana decided to take a respite and do summer stock in 1943, where she often showed up drunk at curtain time. She was also recovering from a disastrous affair with Errol Flynn, who had housed her dissipated father during his dying days. In her memoirs, Diana denied an affair with Flynn, but friends claimed otherwise.

Say it isn't so. When Nancy Davis worked in summer stock with Buddy Ebsen (upper photo), she developed a powerful crush on him. Her taste in men later improved.

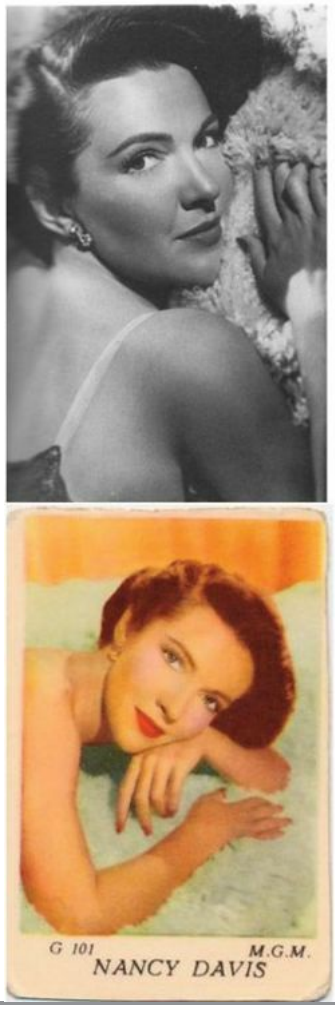
Ironically, when Diana's memoir, Too Much, Too Soon was adapted into a film, Flynn played her father, with Dorothy Malone appearing as Diana. Nancy noted the brouhahas surrounding Diana during her apprenticeship, discussing them later with Joshua Logan.

Nancy was later hired to work on Ogunquit's summer stock production of The Male Animal, in which Buddy Ebsen was one of the stars. He was known for his inimitable, eccentric dancing style, with his tall, lanky frame doing rubbery gyrations. Nancy had seen him perform on the screen with both Shirley Temple and Judy Garland. He told her that he had lost out on the role of "The Tin Man" in The Wizard of Oz (1939), because he was allergic to the silver makeup.



When Nancy Davis was signed by MGM, the studio at first tried to promote her (upper photo) as a femme fatale. But she had formidable competition from true femmes fatales like Lana Turner, Ava Gardner, and a rapidly maturing Elizabeth Taylor.

Nancy's image (lower photo) did end up in a stack of movie star postcards distributed before World War II in Sweden, each of them sized and formatted like baseball fan cards.

John Edenstone worked on the production that summer and later claimed that Nancy developed a powerful crush on Ebsen. She admitted to that in a memoir. Eden-stone recalled, "Perhaps Nancy should be forgiven for her taste in men. Ebsen was a jerk. Even though many members of the production staff were gay, he was always attacking what he called 'queers.' Heshouldn't have been alarmed. No self-respecting homo would be attracted to that hay-seed. In later years, he sure found his calling when he played the rube, Jed Clampett, in The Beverly Hillbillies on TV."

Nancy's job as a backstage apprentice involved switching on recorded music backstage when Ebsen, on stage, walked over to a Victrola. "I was so mesmerized by him that I ignored the cue, and he had to ad-lib while I got the stars out of my eyes, and played the music."

Since her crush on Ebsen was going nowhere, she headed back to Chicago at the end of the summer with men on her mind—one in particular.

Later, he became Reagan's White House doctor, and was with him at the time of an attempted assassination in 1981. Dr. Ruge may, in fact, have saved the life of the President.

Nancy was rumored to have begun a three-month affair with Dr. Daniel Ruge, the longtime partner of Loyal Davis, her stepfather. Ruge later denied it, claiming, "You reporters have gotten me mixed up with Clark Gable, whom Nancy did date. Not me, brother, although she was a nice, beautiful young lady."

Hollywood biographers such as Mart Martin have long included Dr. Daniel Ruge among Nancy's post-war lovers. "For twenty years," Ruge said, "I was loyal to Loyal, but I didn't share his racist attitudes. Neither did Nancy, She loved her stepfather and let him rant, never challenging him."

Born in Nebraska in 1917, he had earned his medical degree and a doctorate in pharmacology at Northwestern Medical School in Chicago. As a student, he had contracted tuberculosis, which had scarred his lungs. While training as a neurosurgeon in Chicago, he had worked for Loyal.

Ruge's assistant, Peter Winter, originally had wanted to be a doctor himself, but finally dropped out, having concluded that studying medical journals "was not my thing."

Winter had a front row seat to Ruge's growing interest in Nancy. "She was the one who chose to go after Daniel, in my view," Winter said. "He was an easy conquest. I think she'd lost her virginity long before they became secretly involved. I saw evidence that they were going at it hot and heavy. Very masculine, Daniel stood 6'2" and was appealing to a lot of the nurses. But Nancy got the prize."

"I don't think he was in love with her, but found her a reliable sex outlet. He was too much of a gentleman to go into clinical details, but he always came in with a smile on his face after a night out with Loyal's stepdaughter. I often saw them heading out at night, with theater tickets. Loyal knew about it and didn't object. He trusted Daniel not to get her pregnant, or, if he did, he knew how to take care of it."

"The affair ended," Winter said in an interview, "when Nancy settled in New York and found many other beaux, of that I'm certain. But she and Daniel would remain friends for years to come, even in the White House.

[Fast forward to March 30, 1981. The local time in Washington, D.C., is 2:25pm, and President Ronald Reagan is leaving the Hilton Hotel after a speech before the AFLCIO. Suddenly, six shots ring out from a .22 caliber

Rohm RG-14 revolver. The assassin was the deranged, Oklahoma-born John W. Hinckley, Jr., age 26.

Reagan was not hit directly. One bullet ricocheted off the President's armor-plated, black Lincoln limousine and penetrated his left side. The bullet hit his rib and punctured and collapsed a lung before lodging in the spongy tissue an inch from his heart. The President had come close to instant death.

Reagan's press secretary, Jim Brady, received a direct shot, the bullet entering his brain. Police officer Thomas Delahanty was shot in the neck. As he was trained to do, Secret Service Agent Timothy McCarthy stood his ground and turned to face the gunfire. He took a bullet aimed at Reagan. It hit him in the chest. All the men shot around Reagan survived, through Brady remained paralyzed on the left side of his body until his death in August of 2014.

In one of the ironies of history, Dr. Daniel Ruge, Nancy's former beau, was functioning at the time as chief physician at the White House. He stood close to Reagan during the attack on the President's life.

Rushed to George Washington University Hospital with Reagan, Ruge ordered that the President be stripped naked so he could locate the entry point of the bullet. Blood transfusions were ordered at once. The President was calling out, "I can't breathe." He was suffering a massive loss of blood. Emergency surgery was performed, and some members of the staff were on the verge of rushing to their phones to announce that Reagan was dead, and that George H.W. Bush had assumed the presidency.

There was great confusion at the time as to who was running the government. Secretary of State Alexander Haig proclaimed, "I am in control here." At the time, Bush was flying to Washington from Texas.

Ruge later admitted, "I made a grave error in not notifying the proper people that, according to the 25th Amendment, Bush should have been named Acting President. Reagan was completely drugged and out of it. He was in no shape to preside over World War III, should it have come."

Rushed to the hospital, Nancy was in a state of hysteria. That night she wrote in her diary, "Nothing can happen to my Ronnie. My life would be over." Her anguish and depression lasted for months.

Ruge, still friends with Nancy after all those years, later discussed his term as chief physician at the White House. He said, "I inspected every inch of Reagan's body, inside and out. He was seven years older than me, and he was in a hell of a lot better shape than I was. He didn't smoke cigarettes and took care of himself."

He also denied that Reagan, during his first term, showed signs of his oncoming Alzheimer's disease. "He had a good memory then. I don't know about his last years in office. I never saw any signs of mental deterioration."

Ruge claimed he didn't remain in his post for a second term, because, "I found the job vastly overrated. It's not one of the glamour jobs at the White House. For example, Nancy often could not fit me in for a seat at State dinners. Dressed in a tux, I had to sit in my office solving crossword puzzles, waiting for the President to have a stroke, which never happened."

Ever faithful, Nancy was always there for Reagan throughout his hospital ordeal. In her 1989 memoir, My Turn, she claimed she had the White House chef deliver her husband "two favorite soups: hamburger and split pea."

As Reagan recovered, the story grew more bizarre. At his trial on June 21, Hinckley was charged with thirteen offenses, but found not guilty by reason of insanity on June 21. After the trial, he wrote that the "shooting was the greatest love offering in the history of the world." In his deranged mind, he seemed to believe that his act would earn the love of actress Jodie Foster, with whom he had maintained an obsession ever since he'd seen her in the 1976 film, Taxi Driver. In it, she played a child prostitute.

Before heading off to kill Reagan, Hinckley considered tracking Foster down and committing suicide in front of her, but he soon rejected the idea. In his crazed mind, he figured that assassinating a President would elevate him to the level of a historical figure like Lee Harvey Oswald—and therefore, her equal. Oswald was his role model.]

George Batson's Ramshackle Inn opened on Broadway on January 5, 1944, marking the New York debut of ZaSu Pitts on the stage. The play got poor to occasionally tepid reviews. But because of Pitts' draw as a popular comedienne, it nonetheless ran for 216 performances. The newspaper PM reviewed it as "a dreary piece of hocus-pocus, with a soporific first act and a helter-skelter second and third. Batson seemed to tailor the role of "Belinda Pride" to Pitts' specific talents, with her "blinking eyes, fluttering hands, and quavering voice."

The plot concerns a retired librarian (Pitts) who buys a decaying colonial inn on the beach for only $3,000. As would be expected, it is falling apart and has a leaky roof. As one critic wrote, "Pitts is the imperturbable librarian who encounters ghosts and secret trunks, as she wanders through mysterious situations and thunderstorms, meeting both the living and the dead as innkeeper."

Most of the residents of the inn are bizarre—characters, viewers might have believed, from the twilight zone. There's a bootlegging operation going on in the basement.

Pitts liked her role so much that she persuaded the producers to take it on the road, first to Washington, then to Chicago. It was here that Nancy, along with her parents, Loyal and Edith Davis, took her to see the play, following the performance with a reunion with Pitts.

There was a small role in the play for "Alice Fisher," a gangster's moll who is kidnapped and sedated. Alice, dazed, drugged, and confused, makes only a brief appearance. The young actress interpreting that role dropped out in Chicago.

Subsequently, Pitts asked Nancy if she'd step in and take over the role as Ramshackle Inn headed for Detroit and points throughout the Middle West.

Nancy later wrote in one of her memoirs, "I suspect Edith had a hand in getting me the role. It was my first part in a professional production, and I grabbed my big chance. I played the role of the girl held captive upstairs. It wasn't much of a part, but it was a start, and I was on my own, with the best wishes of my parents."

In Detroit, Pitts took Nancy under her wing, even letting her share her dressing room. "It was a brand new world for me," Nancy said, "and having a friend like ZaSu was very comforting. She had been a great beauty in her youth, and at this point in her career looked ageless. We traveled with the play across country."

Nancy's mentor, inspiration, and unofficial guardian was a family friend and actress from the Silent era: ZaSu Pitts.

During the tour, the players stopped off at the Danforth Lodge on Lake Oconomowoc in Wisconsin. Nancy was seen going out with two different beaux, described as "farm-fed, red-blooded, all-American types."

John Sheldon, a stagehand, later said, "Even though she was under ZaSu's protective eye, Nancy seemed to have a few stage door Johnnies waiting to take her out. She was not an obvious showgal cutie, but men, some much older than Nancy, seemed to find her sexually alluring. I don't know if she were putting out for these guys or not. She never said anything. But there was a lot of gossip about her backstage."

Veteran actress ZaSu Pitts claimed, “Nancy is like a daughter to me.”

The play returned to New York, but not to a theater on Broadway. “We played the subway circuit,” Nancy said, referring to theaters in Brooklyn and the Bronx. At one point, they appeared on Long Island.

When the tour ended, Nancy decided to remain in New York, pounding the streets of Broadway, looking for a job in the theater. “I fancied myself the second coming of Helen Hayes,” she said, jokingly. “I’d grown up surrounded by such great artists as Spencer Tracy and Lillian Gish. Now, I wanted to become part of their exclusive fraternity, even if it meant getting attacked by a lecherous Tallulah Bankhead.”

Moving into the least expensive room at the Barbizon, an all-woman’s hotel known for housing acting hopefuls at the time, Nancy began her conquest of Broadway. To keep her from feeling alone and adrift, she lived close to family friends when she moved to a small apartment on East 51st Street, near the man she still called “Uncle Walter,” Walter Huston. He urged her to date and meet people in the theater. He even arranged escorts for her with people who might get her a part in a show.

Spencer Tracy lived in the Waldorf Suites, and sometimes, Katharine Hepburn stayed with him. Nancy grew closer and closer to him, and he would play an important role in her career as it advanced.

During the day, she walked the streets, going from one casting office to another. She later denounced a lot of these casting calls as “meat markets.” Horny producers often asked her to show them her legs—and many of them wanted her to lie on their casting couch or else perform fellatio on them as they sat at their desks. For the most part, she avoided such advances. “I want to be a serious actress,” she told family friend, Lillian Gish. “I don’t intend to become a Ziegfeld Girl.”

Spencer Tracy in an early photo with his son, John, who was deaf, living “in a world of silence,” as his father, with anguish, described.

In her first memoir, Nancy (1980), she admitted to having dated "a lot of actors, mostly writers, directors, assistant directors, and assistant producers." On occasion, she dated more influential producers and directors, some of whom took her to the Stork Club. "No serious romances," she recalled.

She was on a lean budget and had to "watch every penny, or at least every nickel" (her words). Visiting movie stars stopped at the Stork Club, then one of the most fashionable after-dark rendezvous spots in New York, and one night, she caught her first glimpse of the very glamorous Joan Crawford. Ethel Merman was a regular, and Nancy saw her showing up on the arm of J. Edgar Hoover. When Nancy mentioned her sighting to Tracy, he said, "It's all a cover. He's a homo, and she's really a dyke."

Waiters at the Stork Club always served platters of freshly baked rolls. When Nancy thought no one was looking, she slipped two or three rolls into her evening bag—one roll for breakfast, another as an ingredient for sandwiches at lunch, if she could afford a slice of baloney to go with it.

One night, the club's savvy owner—celebrity-hunting, eagle-eyed Sherman Billings-ley—sent over a pound of butter, with a note: "I thought you might enjoy some butter on my rolls."

One day at lunch, Tracy told her that his son, John, was coming to New York, and he wanted Nancy to go out with him, showing him the sights. Although Tracy maintained a suite at the Waldorf Towers, he asked Nancy if she'd invite his son to sleep on the sofa bed in the living room of her apartment. She agreed, finally deciphering why Tracy didn't want his son to stay with him. She realized that Katharine Hepburn was a frequent visitor, and he didn't' want John to report any news back to his mother, the former Louise Treadwell, who was still a loyal wife to Tracy despite his philandering.

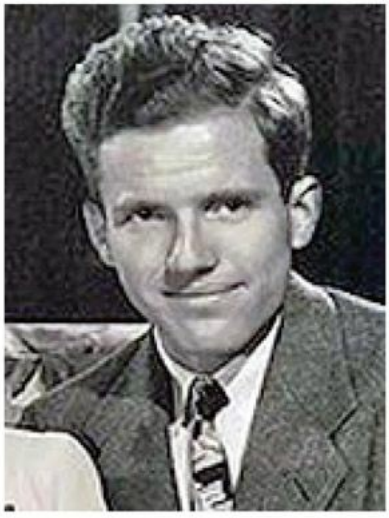
Before John's arrival, Tracy told her, "I'm proud of the boy. I don't like to talk about his deafness, but know that he leads a fairly normal life in spite of it. He went to college, and his classmates were very fond of him. He often went out on dates with the prettiest campus queens. He's a great dancer—no Fred Astaire—but he can whirl you around a dance floor. He's making a career as an artist. Walt Disney is my friend, and he's hired John at his studios."

"He has the makings of a great polo player and could have been a champ," Tracy said. "Too bad polo has gone more or less out of style in Hollywood."

He also vowed, "As for his deafness, I will never give up. Somewhere, some place, I'll find a doctor who can restore his hearing."

John had been a polio victim and in addition to his deafness, had poor eyesight.

Nancy followed Tracy's guidance and treated John like one of her regular boyfriends. Since they were living together in such close proximity, it was assumed by those who knew her that she was having an affair with Tracy's son, especially since they were seen out together every night. Huston certainly thought so, and suggested to his friends, "My dear little girl, or so I think, is going to marry Spence's son. He's a god damn nice boy, and I believe he'd make a suitable husband for Nancy. Spence always uses John's having been born deaf as an excuse for his drinking, which is pure bullshit, of course."



As Spencer Tracy said about his son, John Tracy, depicted above as a young adult: "But he bravely carried on in spite of his deafness, including dating my little friend, Nancy Davis."

"Did they go at it, living together in the same small apartment?" Spencer mused. "I don't know. Sometimes, the father is the last to find out such

John and Nancy did the rounds together, strolling along Fifth Avenue and through museums, and visiting the theater. At night, they went dancing, and Tracy didn't exaggerate the talent of his son on the dance floor. Every day, with Tracy, they took a walk in Central Park. Nancy noticed that he seemed to love his son very much, but seemed incapable of displaying his affection.

John preferred musicals instead of dramas, as it was hard for him to decipher the plot. As for musicals, he told Nancy he could sense the music through vibrations.

One night, John and Nancy went to see Tracy perform in a Broadway Play, The Rugged Path, written by Robert E. Sherwood, the dean of American dramatists. The play had opened to critical attacks, most of them directed at Sherwood. Even though Tracy's acting was praised in most reviews—"a good actor in a bad play," Hepburn still urged him to drop out.

Katharine ("La Divinissima") Hepburn.

Tracy had showed Nancy a review by John Chapman in the Daily News: "The sooner Spencer Tracy goes back to Hollywood, the better—and he should stay there!"

The Rugged Path opened on Broadway in November of 1945, closing in January after eighty-one performances. In brief, it was the story of a newspaper editor who becomes a liberal activist after time spent in London as the English were plunged into World War II. He clashes with the paper's conservative owners, including his brother-in-law, before leaving to fight in the Pacific.

One night, Hepburn entertained John, Nancy, and Tracy at her own small apartment. Fellow guests included writer/director Garson Kanin and actress Ruth Gordon. It turned out to be John's farewell dinner.

The next morning, a driver from MGM, as arranged by Tracy, arrived to take John to the airport. At her door, she reached down to pick up his suitcase. "No, let me do that," he said. "You are my princess and I am your slave."

After kissing him goodbye, she later claimed, "I closed the door and wept."

Huston was wrong about any lasting romantic link between John and Nancy, although he insisted they did have an affair. "A hot-to-trot young man and a hot-to-trot young lady living in such close quarters," he said. "The inevitable must have happened. At least I think it did."

In 1946, with World War II at an end, Broadway experienced its apogee in both drama and musicals. Ethel Merman had a smash hit in Annie Get Your Gun, and Oklahoma! was in its third season; Carousel in its fourth. I Remember Mama was a big hit at the Music Box, and The Magnificent Yankee was being staged at the Royale.

The year before, Tennessee Williams had premiered The Glass Menagerie. Later, it became a movie that starred Jane Wyman. On Broadway in 1946, The Voice of the Turtle, a play by John Van Druten, was in its third season. A year later, it would be made into a film starring Ronald Reagan.

In comedy, Judy Holliday scored a hit in Born Yesterday. When she repeated her performance on the screen, she would win an Oscar for it, beating Bette Davis' performance in All About Eve and Gloria Swanson's star role in Sunset Blvd.

Post-war Broadway audiences might have enjoyed Lute Song if they could accept Mary Martin as an abandoned Chinese wife and Nancy Davis as a Chinese flower maiden.

Into this firestorm of success arrived Mary Martin, opening Lute Song at the Plymouth, a lyrical musical based on a very old Chinese play, PiPa-Ji.

[Set during the Han Dynasty (206 b.c.–220 a.d.), PiPa-Ji (The Lute), by Gao Ming, tells the story of a loyal wife who is impoverished when her husband is forced to marry another woman. She spends the next 12 years searching for him, earning her living by playing the pipa (lute). In the Broadway adaptation of this ancient Chinese opera, the two are eventually reconciled and live out their lives happily.]

Martin had scored a big success three years earlier on Broadway in One Touch of Venus.

The director of Lute Song was John Houseman. Born in Romania, the British-American actor was known for his collaboration with director Orson Welles in projects that included both Citizen Kane and for their launch of New York's acclaimed Mercury Theatre in 1937.

Prior to landing a small role on Broadway in Lute Song, Nancy had been hired as an actress in a gig that lasted for only four days. She later wrote that she could not remember the name of the play or its director. "He called me out into the garbage-strewn alley," she recalled. "He told me that I was wrong for the role and did not understand the character."

"I've got to let you go," he said. "Good luck in your theatrical ambitions, but, frankly, your legs are too thick for the theater."

She was too embarrassed to go back inside, so she asked him to retrieve her coat and purse, which he did. Nancy later wrote, "It was the first and last time I was ever fired from anything. I found out how painful it is to be rejected."

Out of work again, she'd made extra money modeling for the Conover Agency. She was often asked to model hats, because the agency suggested that she didn't have the physique for a full-figure model, especially if she had to show off her legs.

For the Broadway stage, Lute Song was adapted by Sidney Howard and Will Irwin, with a score by Raymond Scott and lyrics by Bernard Hanighen. Accessorized with lavish sets and music, it was an avant-garde mood piece, the story of a young wife, Tchao-Ou-Niang (Martin), who is married to Tsai-Yong (Yul Brynner). He leaves his wife and goes away to become a highly visible magistrate. He marries Princess Nieou-Chi (Helen Craig) and loses contact with his original family.

His parents, played by Mildred Dunnock and Augustin Duncan, die of starvation, and Martin, as his wife, although abandoned, nonetheless has to sell her hair to pay for her in-laws' funeral expenses. Ultimately, Brynner's character is reunited with Martin's character, and the princess welcomes her into the royal palace as Tsai-Yong's No. 1 wife.

Before opening on Broadway, Martin had been a houseguest of Edith and Loyal Davis in Chicago. Edith no doubt gave the star a slight nudge, which led to the casting of Nancy in a minor role as a Chinese handmaiden, Si Tchun (spelled by Nancy in a memoir as Tsi Chun). It marked her first and last appearance on Broadway. She later said, "I looked about as Chinese as Betty Grable." Oddly enough, even though they remained lifelong friends, Martin didn't even mention Nancy in her memoir, My Heart Belongs (1976), a strange omission.

Houseman later claimed in a memoir, "I wanted to fire Nancy, but Martin intervened and prevented me from doing so."

His star confronted the director, "I have a very bad back, and Nancy's father is the greatest neurosurgeon in America. Nancy stays in the play! Or else I walk!"

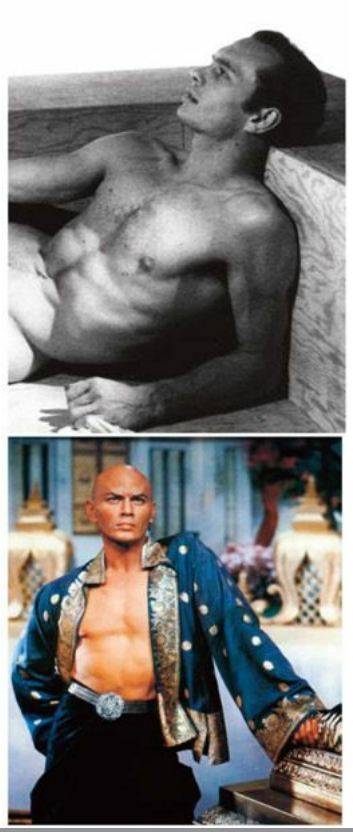
He later wrote: "At Mary's behest, to play the princess's flower maiden, we engaged a pink-cheeked, attractive but awkward and amateurish virgin by the name of Nancy Davis." He may have been off his mark with that virgin appraisal.

In preparation for her role, Nancy dyed her brown hair black and worked her makeup so that her eyebrows were set at an angle. "I hope this would make me look more like a Chinese Princess's flower maiden, really a lady-in-waiting. In spite of that, I still never won the favor of Houseman."

In contrast to his negative critique of Nancy, Houseman almost seemed to be in love with Brynner, describing him as "dynamic and strangely beautiful, and young man of Russian-Chinese origin. He was very sexy, an exotic leading man with an interesting speech and a vaguely Oriental look." Before the beginning of dress rehearsal, he invited Houseman to his dressing room, where he stood completely nude. "I am yours to do with as you wish. Dress me from my skin outward…or whatever you had in mind."

Before signing for Lute Song, Brynner did modeling work, having been photographed in the nude by George Platt Lynes. Nancy confessed in a memoir that "all the girls in the cast had a crush on Brynner," who had hair then and a magnificent physique. A photograph of him in all his uncut glory was circulated backstage. The original negative was later acquired by gay pop artist Andy Warhol.

Nancy never admitted that she was among those who had a crush on Brynner. She didn't have to: Too many others in the cast were already spreading that rumor.



Sexy, exotic Yul Brynner had hair when he appeared in Lute Song and discovered the charms of Nancy Davis. He'd posed for an infamous nude, half of which is shown above, taken by a photographer depicting Brynner in all his uncut glory.

In the lower photo, he is seen in his iconic role as the King of Siam in The King and I.

In later life, Brynner had only compliments for Nancy. "If she'd stuck it out, I think she would have become a first-rate star."

He later confided in Houseman, who was not always discreet. He'd told his director that he had not actually seduced Nancy, but that she'd "serviced" him. There is only his word for that. However, throughout his career, he was known for summoning the most beautiful young men and women to his dressing room, where they found him waiting in the nude to be serviced.

[Once, when he was asked about that custom of his during his star role in The King and I, Brynner said, "I'm the King of Siam, with unlimited power. I am merely taking monarch's privilege."

Regardless of what happened (or didn't happen) with Nancy, Brynner, as a major star, went on to world class seductions, an impressive array that included Deborah Kerr, who found him "very, very sexy," and even Tallulah Bankhead. The list is long: Anne Baxter, Ingrid Bergman, Claire Bloom, Joan Crawford, Yvonne De Carlo, Judy Garland, Gina Lollobrigida, Maria Schell, and ultimately, Marilyn Monroe. When he was dying of cancer, Marlene Dietrich said, "Goody, goody— serves him right." He had abruptly dropped her.

Brynner also had a number of homosexual affairs, especially with a very young Sal Mineo, when they appeared together in The King and I on Broadway. In France, the author, painter, and designer, Jean Cocteau, often fellated Brynner when they smoked opium together.]

Immediately adjacent to the theater presenting Lute Song was a competing theater showcasing Three to Make Ready, starring Gordon MacRae, Ray Bolger, and Arthur Godfrey. Nancy had befriended two future stars, Patricia Neal and Jean Hagen. Hagen would one day star in a movie with Nancy called Night Into Morning, and Neal would co-star with Reagan in The Hasty Heart. The three aspiring actresses often visited the theater next door.

Later, MacCrae boasted that "Nancy and I saw some action in my dressing room." Hagen said she doubted that, because she felt that MacCrae exaggerated his conquests. "He was always bragging about the women he had. One night, he even forced himself onto me. I resisted, but didn't put up all that much fight. I figured it was easier to give in. He was so god damn good looking. He later became an old drunk, singing in motel restaurants in Indiana."

Many of the cast members of Lute Song were heavy drinkers, but not Nancy. During the run, Richard Davis, her stepbrother, arrived in New York to stay with her. He was accompanied by three Princeton men into heavy boozing. After one all-night binge, Richard came into her apartment and was so sick he threw up in her bathtub. He later said, "It took two years before she would speak to me again."

The studly singer/actor Gordon MacCrae, who was appearing in a theater next door to Lute Song, later boasted to Patricia Neal and Jean Hagen that he'd seduced Nancy Davis.

Hagen wasn't sure if MacCrae ever accomplished that or not, "But he sure got around to me!"

Both Edith and Loyal Davis flew in from Chicago to attend the opening night of Lute Song.

The highlight of the show was Martin singing "Mountain High, Valley Low." Time magazine defined Lute Song as "The season's loveliest production and its most charming failure. There should have been either less spectacle or less story." The play opened on February 6, 1946 and closed on June 8 after 142 performances.

Lute Song was viewed as only moderately successful, surviving as long as it did because of the box office appeal of Mary Martin. For Brynner, it led to the career breakthrough of his life. Martin eventually recommended him to her friends, Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein, to play the Siamese despot in the classic musical, The King and I, a role that would be indelibly associated with him.

In spite of Lute Song's bad reviews, Brynner won the Donaldson Award as "the most promising new Broadway star of 1946."

Later, Nancy would be asked to go with it on tour, but she rejected the offer. An offer for another road tour with a play had come in from her dear friend, ZaSu Pitts.

Before Broadway, the cast of Lute Song tried out their musical in both New Haven and Boston. Nancy bonded with its lead dancer, Ron Fletcher, who was also a choreographer. She later described him as "effervescent, high strung, and very, very stylish."

As described in Fletcher's memoirs, "There was a quality Nancy had that drew her to me and I never was that interested in girls. I find her a curious mixture, on the one hand vulnerable yet I sensed a strength and a resolve in her that was iron willed. She seemed very determined."

"We went out every night because she made me laugh, and she had this amazing little chortle. Her voice had a touch of whimsy, rather adorable. I often took her ballroom dancing. We glided across the floor like Vernon and Irene Castle."

Fletcher said that during the Boston tryouts, they were virtually penniless. "Both of us were readers, and we pooled our money, five dollars in all, and joined a rental library. One night, we were determined to go ballroom dancing, but had no money to buy tickets. Since we hadn't rented any books yet, we went back to the rental library and withdrew our deposits. After that, we danced the night away."

Fletcher and Nancy were introduced to Dolly Haas, who was married to the famous newspaper caricaturist, Al Hirschfeld. She was a star of both German and American films, and was planning to take over Mary Martin's role for the road show tour of Lute Song.

Haas recalled Fletcher and Nancy showing up one night in her dressing room. "She was an enchantingly beautiful young girl, and I think they were very interested in getting married. They even asked my opinion about what they should do. They seemed so young, so very much in love. I told them to go for it."

Many years later, Fletcher admitted he had had a sexual relationship with Nancy. "She was one of only three women that I slept with in my entire life."

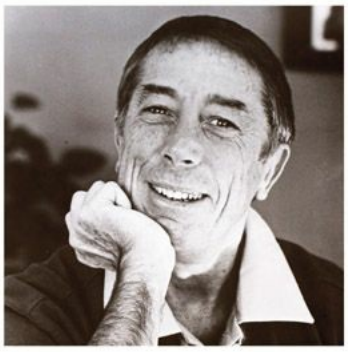
In later years, Fletcher referred to Nancy as "a delightful creature. She was bright and curious. However, she didn't seem worldly at all, and I liked that about her. I would tell her tacky, obscene stories, and that wonderful laugh of hers could be heard."

"Although we had a little romance on the road, I don't think she was in love with me, and I was not in love with her. After we came back to New York, we slowly drifted apart. However, when I opened an exercise studio in California, she was a frequent visitor, showing up with her socialite friend, Betsy Bloomingdale, for my special exercises."

[A former Martha Graham modern dancer, Fletcher was also a disciple of the health and exercise regimes of Joseph and Clara Pilates, the original developers of the Pilates exercise regime, a movement that later attracted millions of devotees. It combined calisthenics and yoga with orthopedically savvy exercise equipment that to one pupil resembled instruments from a medieval torture chamber.

In 1972, Fletcher opened his health and exercise studio in Los Angeles, and his first customer was the novelist, Judith Krantz, who wrote bestsellers that included Scruples. When he met her, he told her, "I am a gay man recovering from an addiction to alcohol." Krantz found him charming and soon spread the word among the Hollywood elite. Patrons who began showing up at his studio included Barbra Streisand, Candice Bergen, Ali MacGraw, and, as mentioned, "Nancy and Betsy," who were Fletcher's favorite customers.]



Ron Fletcher, the celebrated dancer and choreographer, was one of many intimate relationships "Broadway Nancy" formed with homosexual men.

In the lower photo, in Los Angeles, he is seen teaching one of his famous Pilates classes, lessons which attracted A-list stars from the movie community.

As author Kitty Kelley noted, "Most of Nancy's closest friends and relationship were with homosexual men, both as friends and lovers. Homosexuality seemed to envelop her world. For the rest of her life, she enjoyed platonic friendships with well-dressed gay men who became her mentors in the arts, fashion, cuisine, and interior design, shaping her tastes and pointing her toward sophistication."

When Fletcher drifted out of her life, Nancy took up with Roger Fryer, an aspiring young producer. She went out with him almost every night, accompanied by his lover, a young actor named James Carr. She referred to them as "Bobby and Jimmy." In summer, the three of them could be seen in her small back garden barbecuing hot dogs on a grill.

Fryer and Nancy would become lifelong friends, and he went on to achieve great success on both Broadway and in Hollywood. “I make movies to pay the rent,” he told her. “But the stage is my true love.”

“The theater world and the film world are both strange,” Fryer said, “in that you don’t keep your relationship usually beyond the run of the show or the making of a film. But Nancy was one of the people that kept her friends closely held.”

In time, Fryer would produce such Broadway hits as A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, Auntie Mame, and Sweeney Todd, his blockbuster films including Mame, The Boys from Brazil, and The Shining. He brought to the Los Angeles stage such luminaries as Katharine Hepburn, Elizabeth Taylor, Carol Channing, Angela Lansbury, and Mary Martin. He also presented plays by Arthur Miller, Eugene O’Neill, Tennessee Williams, and Lillian Hellman.

Biographer Bob Colacello also noted Nancy’s affinity for homosexual men. “If she had stayed in show business instead of marrying an actor who went into politics, it would hardly have been noteworthy. She was close to a number of lesbian and bisexual women over the years, starting with her godmother, Alla Nazimova, and her circle of friends. But this is not unusual in the world of entertainment. If gay men were attracted to the young Nancy Davis, it was probably for the same reason that straight men were: She was pretty, lively, well-dressed, a good dancer, a good listener, and, like her mother, a natural-born coquette. She knew how to flirt with a man in ways that were flattering and unthreatening, which may explain why gay men felt especially comfortable around her.”

Following the success of Ramshackle Inn, George Batson wrote another play, Cordelia, for ZaSu Pitts, who asked Nancy if she’d accept a small part in it and take it on the road with her. Nancy accepted without reading the script, because she trusted Pitts’ judgment completely. The aging actress not only wanted to star in the play, but she believed in it so much, she’d invested a lot of her own money in producing it. Cordelia went on tour in the summer of 1946, hoping for a premiere on Broadway that autumn.

As the plot unfolds, ZaSu is raising two sisters whose mother walked out on them. She also rents rooms in a shack at the end of a wharf in New England, one of which is occupied by a gambler. Cast as Millicent, Nancy plays an upper-class young woman who falls in love with the street-smart gambling man.

Once again, she was on tour with Pitts, sharing her hotel rooms and helping organize Pitts’ wardrobe, much of it designed by Edith Head. To the cast, they appeared extremely close, sleeping together, dining together, and going home with each other every night during tryouts in both Boston and New Haven.

Although it was wild speculation, with no real evidence, many cast members assumed that Pitts and Nancy were engaged in a lesbian affair. It was well known to them that Nancy’s godmother, Alla Nazimova, the Silent Screen goddess, was a lesbian. In reality, Pitts viewed Nancy almost like her own daughter and was very protective of her.

The reviews were lackluster, critics evaluating the play as “amateurish and hokedup.”

As a last resort, a play doctor was summoned. He immediately changed the name of the play from Cordelia to Dangerous Woman. Pitts stuck up her nose at that title. “Sounds like a Joan Crawford movie.”

Ironically, in 1952, Crawford would make a film, This Woman Is Dangerous.

Jack Kirkland was a “play doctor” and a man of many talents—playwright, producer, director, and screenwriter. At the time, he was best known for adapting Erskine Caldwell’s controversial play, Tobacco Road, to the screen. Nancy met him, remembering that he’d penned one of her favorite movies, Now and Forever (1934), with Gary Cooper, Carole Lombard, and Shirley Temple.

But even a talented writer such as Kirkland could not rescue Cordelia, and Batson’s play closed on the road, never making it to Broadway.

After the failure of Cordelia, Pitts wanted a “surefire guarantee of success,” and with that in mind, she selected a much-reprised comedy workhorse, The Late Christopher Bean, written by Sidney Howard from an original French farce. Many other actresses had already interpreted that play, including Lillian Gish, Edith Evans, and the formidable Marie Dressler.

ZaSu Pitts in Erich von Stroheim's silent classic, Greed (1924), her most controversial performance.

In the summer of 1947, Pitts, along with Nancy, still sharing her hotel room, toured with the play on the summer stock circuit. That autumn, Pitts took the play to major cities that included Philadelphia, Boston, Milwaukee, and Cleveland. At the opening at Chicago's Civic Theater on October 20, 1947, Nancy received more congratulatory telegrams than Pitts, with acknowledgments from such established stars as Spencer Tracy, Walter Huston, Mary Martin, and Lillian Gish.

On opening night, Edith Davis appeared, wearing a mink coat with an orchid pinned to it. On her arm was Loyal Davis, who was now the president of the Society of Neurological Surgeons.

After the show, Edith threw a gala opening night party, inviting the elite of Chicago, including Dwight Green, the Governor of Illinois.

The next day, reviews of Nancy's role were not as enthusiastic as those of her parents. In her role as an ingénue, Nancy was called "a sweet, decorous girl." Another critic found her "unusually attractive and talented." She carried a copy of that review in her purse for months, although later admitting, "I wasn't exactly setting show business on fire, yet I was doing work I really liked."

Ingénue Nancy Davis onstage with ZaSu, in a performance of The Late Christopher Bean.

The producer, Michael Myerberg, had signed screen actor Guy Kibbee as the star of the play. Bald, pot-bellied, and rosy-cheeked, Kibbee was familiar to film-goers of the 1930s, as he'd starred with almost every major performer from Errol Flynn to Shirley Temple. He was cast as a country doctor who takes in roomers, one of whom is Christopher Bean, an artist. During the course of the play, Bean dies, bequeathing the household a number of paintings. Although at first they're thought to be worthless, as the plot develops, it's revealed that they're masterpieces. Nancy was cast asthe country doctor's older daughter, who is in love with a local paperhanger who turns out to be an artist himself. By Act Three, we learn that Pitts, the doctor's housekeeper, had been secretly married to Bean, and that in her capacity as his widow, all those masterpieces belong to her.

On the road, Kibbee and Pitts got all the critical attention, and Nancy was virtually ignored. One critic, however, called her performance "nicely sweetened without saccharine."

When the play opened at the Olney Theater in Olney, Maryland, outside Washington, Nancy received a note backstage, requesting a visit with her after the show. It was from General and Mrs. Omar Bradley, who had recently been entertained at home in Chicago by Edith. Bradley, of course, had commanded the American Army in Normandy, and was slated to become President Harry Truman's chairman of the Joint Chiefs. Nancy welcomed them warmly, realizing that her mother still had the kind of allure that attracted famous people.

The next day, the local paper asserted, "Nancy Davis took the role of a sappy, cloying girl and turned it into a real person."

During the play's run in Olney, James Karen, a young actor, part of the Olney Theater Company, congratulated Pitts on her star role in the con troversial four-hour long Greed (1925), a pet project of the temperamental director, Erich von Stroheim. "That god damn picture," Pitts muttered to Karen. "Don't mention that film to me. As far as I'm concerned, Stroheim can shove every single reel of it where the sun don't shine." Then she turned and walked away.

Nancy was shocked, as she'd never heard her mentor use such strong language. "To provoke her like that, Greed must have brought back a lot of painful memories."

Two views of the man who at the time was the most dashing romantic lead on Broadway—Alfred Drake, known for "draking" women.

After her return New York, Nancy attended a party given by Mary Martin. For a starlet, an invitation to one of Martin's parties was a great honor, as she knew all the luminaries on Broadway, including Alfred Lunt, Lynn Fontanne, Helen Hayes, and playwrights such as George Kaufman.

At the party, she was introduced to actor/singer Alfred Drake, who, with his rich baritone voice, had become the King of Broadway musicals, particularly after his spectacular performance as Curly, male lead in the 1943 production of Oklahoma!. With macho pizzazz, he'd opened each performance with a rousing rendition of "Oh What a Beautiful Mornin'."

Nancy had first seen him playing Marshall Blackstone in the original production of Babes in Arms (1937), in which he'd sung the title song. She found him very handsome in a virile, masculine way, and it was obvious that he was attracted to her, too. Despite his marriage in 1944 to Esther Harvey Brown, he was still known for his seductions of "songbirds and starlets." Boastfully, he relayed to his friends the names of the stars or starlets who had been "draked," and which of them remained for him to "drake."

Nancy had heard that in spite of his name, he was actually Italian, having been born Alfred Capurro of parents who had emigrated to New York from Genoa. Somewhere along the way, according to those who knew Drake, he began seeing Nancy on the side. "It had to be a back alley affair," said Cole Porter, who himself had a crush on Drake, "because Alfred was married, and he didn't want word to get back to his Esther."

From unverified reports, including from Porter, the affair lasted for only a season. "I think the Davis girl objected to the fact that she couldn't be seen in public with him and especially couldn't go to A-list parties, where he had to show up with his wife. I also think that she wasn't convinced that he'd get her a part on Broadway."

Allentuck was way down the line when it came to Broadway luminaries, but he nevertheless had the power to get an aspiring actress cast in a play. His career had begun in vaudeville. After that, he worked for major producers such as Kermit Bloomgarden, who was currently presenting Lillian Hellman's Another Part of the Forest (1946), and who would later produce The Diary of Anne Frank (1955), and The Music Man (1957).

Years later, Helen Tiers, the former secretary to Allentuck, was interviewed by reporter Joan Evert. The secretary remembered Nancy's arrival in Allentuck's office. "She didn't look like a young actress seeking a job in the theater," Tiers claimed. "She was dressed like a movie star. She owned a fur coat and always wore tasteful, well-tailored clothes. She was also beautifully groomed, not a hair out of place. Unlike most show-girls of that day, Davis believed in 'The Fashion House Style,' which promoted 'good lines and quiet, subdued colors.' Even though very busy, Max always made time for Davis, most often slipping out the back door with her to do whatever they did together. Frankly, I think Nancy Davis was hotter for Max than he was for her…His first marriage to Peggy Phillips had crashed. By 1949, he would wed the actress Maureen Stapleton, no great beauty, but one of the most talented stage actresses on Broadway. She had made her debut in the 1946 Playboy of the Western World."

In her column, Dorothy Kilgallen wrote, "Max Allentuck, general manager for producer Kermit Bloomgarden, is often seen after the curtain goes down with rising brunette starlet, Norma (sic) Davis. Do I hear wedding bells?"

"Nancy Davis was screwing around with my husband, Max Allentuck, before I got to him."

Wedding bells did not toll. Soon, Nancy, in the opinion of Allentuck, was "pursuing bigger game in the Hollywood jungle."

In the reception line, Nancy Davis Reagan, now First Lady, greeted the actress.

"Hello, Maureen," Nancy said. After she had passed on down the line, Tennessee whispered to Stapleton, "I didn't know you knew Nancy Reagan. Not enough to call her by her first name."

"I never met her before. But, like me, she's an actress, and we always call each other by our first names. Besides, we have something in common: She used to fuck my former husband, Max Allentuck.]

In July of 1948, Nancy's gay friend, Roger Fryer, turned producer, asked her to play the daughter in a stage revival of The Little Foxes by Lillian Hellman. The role of the formidable, evil Regina Giddens had originated as a Broadway hit in 1939, starring Tallulah Bankhead. In 1941, producer Samuel Goldwyn and director William Wyler had cast Bette Davis in the movie version. That film had starred Teresa Wright as Regina's daughter. In the Chicago stage revival of 1948, Nancy was given that role.

She accepted the role from her friend, Fryer, although there is evidence that there was tension between them during rehearsals. At one point, an exasperated Nancy said, "Teresa Wright is a hard act to follow."

Ruth Chatterton, the former wife of George Brent, was asked to take on an even more daunting challenge and interpret the role of Regina Giddens in the footsteps of Bankhead and Davis, each of whom had stamped powerful images into one of the genuine "bitch roles" of the stage and screen.

A star during the early Talkies, Chatterton's career had already peaked by the time she accepted the role of Regina. Her last American movie, William Wyler's Dodsworth, had been released in 1936.

Nancy Davis was virtually ignored by reviewers. However, John Davidson wrote: "The role of Regina Giddens, a soulless and sadistic vixen, an unmitigated murderess, is so overpowering that it seems to devour poor little Nancy Davis, who struggled to hold her own in this Southern nest of cottonmouths and rattlers."

In September of 1948, back in New York, pounding the dirty sidewalks of Broadway, Nancy was once again looking for work and finding none, although Roger Fryer told her she might gain experience working in television, then in its pioneering stage. He told her he'd see if he could line up something for her. Spencer Tracy was also looking for a role for her. When he called her apartment, she thought it was to report on a possible role. But it involved something else. He told her that his friend, Clark Gable, was coming into town later that month, and he wondered if she'd be free to date him. "I highly recommended you."

Three distinguished actresses, Tallulah Bankhead (left); Bette Davis (center); and Ruth Chatterton appeared either on stage or the screen as the Southern hellion, Regina Giddens, in The Little Foxes.

Nancy Davis was cast as Chatterton's daughter.

Living in a shadowy existential hell with an evil dragon for a mother. Above, left: Teresa Wright and Bette Davis in The Little Foxes.

In Chicago, Nancy (right) dreaded stepping into Teresa Wright's shoes in this gothic tale of family anguish and female duplicity. She got tired of hearing, "Teresa Wright did it better." Her performance went virtually unnoticed.

"It would be the greatest honor of my life, but I can't imagine the King of Hollywood walking up three flights of steps to date an unknown starlet. I mean, he could have his pick of any woman in New York."

"Great!" he said. "You'll do it. I'll give Clark your phone number."

After putting down the phone, Nancy immediately called Edith in Chicago. "I'm going to date Clark Gable! The Clark Gable!"

"Oh, my dear, you're delusional," Edith said.

Nancy often turned to astrology as her guiding light, and subsequently, she consulted an astrologer. The stars were right in the heavens, or so it seemed, for her date with "The King."

Three days later, Gable called and invited her for dinner and dancing at The Stork Club. She later said, "I was in a state of shock when I put down the phone. My heart was palpitating. I had worshipped him on the screen. I could not believe that I had actually spoken to him."

From reading fan magazines, Nancy was awed by the glamorous women Gable had conquered, including his late, doomed wife, Carole Lombard. The list included some of the most glamorous stars of the Golden Age—Lana Turner, Mary Astor, Joan Crawford, Jean Harlow, Hedy Lamarr, Merle Oberon, Norma Shearer, Lupe Velez. "What would a man who'd had all those queens want with a mere handmaiden?" [Her reference was inspired by the role she'd played in Lute Song.]

The slim, brown-eyed beauty from the Windy City paraded into the Stork Club on the arm of Gable himself. Photographers at the entrance snapped their pictures. In a memoir, Nancy would later rave about how "sexy, handsome, and affectionate," he was. In the club, he held her hand, and she found him "romantic and fun-loving."

Nancy Davis, as a postwar Broadway ingénue, looked, acted, and dressed like a major-league star before she became one.

"A flood of women walked by our table on the way to the powder room," she wrote.

She claimed that she didn't know how many friends she had until Gable invited her to dance. "Oh, Nancy, darling, how wonderful to see you!" many of the women said, wanting to be introduced to Gable.

The evening presumably ended with a kiss on the mouth. On many an occasion, his dates had complained about his bad breath, because of the false teeth he wore. Nancy had no complaints, and accepted his offer to be booked during every night of this stay in Manhattan.

The World Series was being played at the time, and he invited her to Yankee Stadium following lunch the following day. At ten o'clock, a lovely bouquet of red roses arrived at her apartment before he picked her up. Actually, Gable did not cut as dashing a figure as he had when he'd played Rhett Butler back in 1939. Gore Vidal, whose mother, Nina Vidal, had once had an affair with him, wrote, "At this point in his life, Gable had put on weight, and he drank heavily. After a few drinks, he would loosen his false teeth, which were on some sort of peg, and then shake his head until they rattled like dice. His post-war movies had flopped at the box office, but he was still a big name to his public."

When Clark Gable made The Hucksters (1947) with Ava Gardner (see above), he told her "I'm not feisty Mickey Rooney, but there's still fire in the engine."

To Sydney Greenstreet, he recalled dating Nancy Davis. "Something might have happened if I'd stayed in New York. But I went back to Hollywood, where I already had an over-full card of women—and Ava can't be beat."

At Yankee Stadium, Nancy and Gable were mobbed. Four policemen had to escort Gable and Nancy to their box seats. Earlier, they had been seen lunching at the exclusive "21."

Walter Winchell, in his popular column, wrote: "At long last, Clark Gable had found a replacement for his beautiful doomed wife, who went down in that plane crash in 1942. He went into mourning, but now seems to have emerged. If anyone can bring him out of his depressive shell, it is a cute little brunette starlet whom he's taking to all the hot spots of Manhattan."

Other reporters heard the sound of wedding bells, which had rung, at least in print, for Nancy before, but which had always stopped ringing before she was able to march up the aisle to an altar.

Gable and Nancy continued their high-profile dating, attending a hot ticket Broadway musical, High Button Shoes. The musical starred Phil Silvers and Nanette Fabray, with music by Jules Styne and lyrics by Sammy Cahn. Its director was George Abbott. As Gable walked in with Nancy, the audience stood up and gave him an ovation.

Joan Crawford in a publicity still for Mildred Pierce, a role coveted and lost by Jane Wyman.

Crawford was Clark Gable's part-time lover. He confessed to her that in New York, he had "strayed with Nancy Davis."

"Nancy, who?" Crawford asked.

Word of an affair reached Chicago. Edith telephoned one morning. "What in hell is going on between Gable and you?"

"We're just good friends," Nancy said.

"Like hell. I've talked to Spencer Tracy. As you know, he's Gable's confidant. Gable told Spence that he's fucking you."

Tracy seemed to fancy himself a matchmaker. He told Katharine Hepburn, George Cukor, Garson Kanin, and Ruth Gordon, “Clark is banging Nancy. She’s seen late at night leaving his suite at the Waldorf. He’s not much of a lay, as he freely admits himself, but she couldn’t do any better than wed the King of Hollywood. Actually, that title belongs to me, but I forgive Clark for using it.”

Nancy more or less denied the affair, without actually saying so. Back in Hollywood, Joan Crawford, Gable’s steadfast friend and lover over the years, claimed that he had admitted to an affair with Nancy—“Whoever in hell she is.”

In a memoir, Nancy hinted that Gable may have indirectly proposed to her. One night he asked her, “How would you feel about living on a ranch?” He was obviously referring to his ranch in Encino, California.

She later claimed that she fumbled her response. She said, “Gee, I don’t know. I never have.” On looking back at that moment, she wondered, “Was Clark sounding me about a possible future together? And, if so, how should I have responded? I wasn’t in love with him, but if we had seen more of each other, I might have been.”

And then, suddenly, it was over.

Gable flew back to Hollywood and to the arms of Ava Gardner, with Grace Kelly and Marilyn Monroe looming in his future. A year later, he entered into an unsuccessful marriage (1949-1952) to Sylvia, Lady Ashley, a socialite.

Tracy told his gossipy friend, the director George Cukor, that “Clark was Nancy’s first choice for a husband. Ronald Reagan was just the consolation prize.”

Long before Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman became big stars on television, Nancy broke into the medium during its infancy. As she recalled, “I had to wear green makeup and black lipstick! TV was very new, and you had to wear some strange colors if you wanted to look good on those early, primitive black-and-white TV sets.”

An offer came through for her to appear in a telecast called Broken Dishes, set to air on May 12, 1948, on Kraft Television Theatre. Some biographers have suggested that this was a new script. Actually, it had been around for years. Broken Dishes had premiered as a Broadway play in 1929 when it had introduced another newcomer to the theater, also named Davis—Bette in this case. The screen diva defined November 5 of that year as “the greatest triumph of my professional career, the night I first saw my name on a Broadway marquee.”

Far from being an unknown property, Broken Dishes had already been adapted into three separate Hollywood movies, each with a different title: Too Young to Marry, with Loretta Young (1931); Love Begins at Twenty with Patricia Ellis (1936); and Calling All Husbands with Lucile Fairbanks (1940). When Nancy starred in the teleplay, the property was viewed in Hollywood as “a tired old workhorse.”

It was a comedy focusing on a henpecked husband in the Middle West, with a nagging wife always talking about “the man I should have married.” The daughter, as played by Nancy, seeks independence from her domineering mother by marrying a man her mother finds objectionable. At the finale, that man the mother idealized turns up. Ironically, he has become a penniless fugitive, desperately fleeing from the police.

Benny Thau, head of casting at MGM, had flown to New York to confer with Tracy at his temporary home at the Waldorf Towers. Nancy had alerted Tracy to watch her debut on TV. He invited Thau for drinks with him and to view the telecast as well. Thau detested television and feared future competition from the new medium, so he sat, visibly suffering, through the telecast. Apparently, however, the fifty-one-year-old man, unmarried at the time, became quite fascinated with the twenty-eight year-old actress, Nancy herself.

Star Maker Benny Thau: When the MGM Lion roared, starlet Nancy Davis answered the call.

At the end of the broadcast, Thau expressed his interest in dating Nancy. Tracy agreed to call her, finding her excited when she heard he was in charge of casting at MGM, “The Tiffany of Studios.”

After his first date with Nancy, Thau discussed with Tracy that he might arrange a screen test for her. “We need another clean cut, girl-next-door type at Metro,” Thau said. “We’ve already got enough sultry types—take Lana Turner and Ava Gardner, for example. Of course, for class, we already have your beloved Katharine Hepburn.”

In her memoirs, Nancy doesn’t even mention Thau, although he became one of the most influential men in her screen career. According to unconfirmed reports, Thau’s long affair with Nancy actually began in New York.

She wanted to believe Thau when he told her he would arrange a screen test for her at MGM. If the studio bosses liked it, a seven-year contract would follow. “I could hope and dream,” she recalled.

In the meantime, while awaiting that contract, she did more live television. ZaSu Pitts cajoled once again and asked Nancy to repeat their roles in Ramshackle Inn as part of a telecast for Philco Television Playhouse. It aired on January 2, 1949.

Nancy’s performance went over so well with the Philco producers that she was invited to repeat her role in The Late Christopher Bean, the play in which she had toured with Pitts. However, she was not available for the telecast, and the Davis’ family friend, Lillian Gish, took the star role. That telecast was premiered on February 6, 1949.

By that time, Nancy’s screen test at MGM had been scheduled. She often had long talks on the phone with Thau.

When her air tickets arrived, she organized the details of her departure and packed her luggage.

She told her friends, perhaps in exaggerated jest, “Greer Garson replaced Norma Shearer as Queen of MGM. Now I’m on my way to dethrone Garson.” Nancy never actually “dethroned” her, but she did replace Garson in one of her roles: The British actress had been Thau’s mistress.

Although Nancy arrived on the scene at the end of Hollywood’s Golden Age, she still managed to win a seven-year contract at a time when more established MGM contract players were being let go. As she set foot on California soil, many stars were desperately free-lancing in search of acting jobs.

Although Edith encouraged her daughter’s film career, Loyal did not, claiming, perhaps correctly, that Hollywood was “an unsavory place.”

Spencer Tracy had contacted his gay friend, director George Cukor, known as the best women’s director in Hollywood, and asked him to direct Nancy’s screen test. That was unheard of; Cukor didn’t do screen tests. But for Tracy, he agreed to supervise Nancy’s try-out.

Tracy also placed a call to Dore Schary, a former screenwriter now in charge of production at MGM. He would soon replace Louis B. Mayer. Schary had written the script for Boys Town (1938), which brought Tracy an Oscar. “Nancy knows how to look like she’s thinking when she’s on stage,” Tracy said. “I’m told you want to make message pictures. Nancy would be ideal for those.”

When Nancy heard that Schary suffered back pains, she put him in touch with her stepfather, Loyal Davis, a high-profile neurosurgeon. The doctor relieved the executive’s pains, which made him grateful to Nancy.

Before her screen test, Nancy spent three weeks with Lillian Burns, MGM’s drama coach, who rehearsed the starlet in voice, dancing, acting, deportment, and appearance.

For the test, Thau arranged for Nancy to have as her cameraman George Folsey, who was said to photograph women more beautifully than anyone in his field. “I can turn a snaggle-toothed hag into a sultry, classical dame,” he proclaimed.

Sent to makeup, Nancy found herself sitting between June Allyson and Elizabeth Taylor. Both of them would eventually become her friends.

The top hair stylist in Hollywood, Sydney Guilaroff, was assigned to tangle with her hair. William Tuttle, acclaimed as the leading makeup artist in Hollywood, rivaled only by Perc Westmore, did her face. He told her, “We’ll have to do something about your eyes: They are too big for pictures.”

She walked onto the set with her eyes half closed until the cameraman, Folsey, asked, “Did you get enough sleep last night?”

Macho, magnetic, and charismatic: Howard Keel “wiving it wealthily” in Kiss Me Kate.

She explained what Tuttle had said.

“It was a fucking joke. You can’t have eyes too big for the movies. Ever see a Joan Crawford picture?”

As her leading man, Howard Keel was selected to appear opposite her. The handsome, strapping, macho baritone from Illinois would become the movie equivalent of Alfred Drake on Broadway, eventually appearing in such upcoming musicals as Annie Get Your Gun (1950) and Show Boat (1951). He was known for his big, booming voice. Nor was he modest, claiming, "I'm big in all departments."

Keel and Nancy were given a script for an upcoming MGM film, East Side, West Side (1949). Ironically, when shooting began for that film, Nancy would be assigned a role in it.

During the filming of her screen test, Nancy admitted, "I was terribly nervous, but Howard talked to me and made me calm down." During a break, he told her of his background, asserting that he'd come from a coal-mining town where his father had committed suicide when he was a young boy.

As he grew in stature in the coming years, he would become a sex symbol at MGM, and he boasted of having scored with his leading ladies. They had included Kathryn Grayson, Ava Gardner, and Esther Williams. He said that before that, he'd seduced Norma Jeane Baker (Marilyn Monroe) when she was only thirteen and he was twenty-one. He referred to Monroe as "San Quentin jail bait."

Four years after his screen test with Nancy, Hedda Hopper asked Keel, "You appeared on camera with both of Reagan's wives, Nancy and Jane Wyman. You are known in Hollywood as quite a ladies' man Did you get lucky with Nancy or Jane?...Maybe both?"

"I can answer your question with a question," Keel said. "Does a bear shit in the woods?"

After the screen test, Nancy had to fill out a questionnaire about herself. She shaved two years off her age, defining it as twenty-six. Among her phobias, she listed that she hated "vulgarity, untidiness of mind, and cigars."

When she signed with MGM, Nancy stood 5'4" and weighed 116 pounds. She named her favorite actors as Walter Huston and Spencer Tracy, her favorite female star as Laurette Taylor, the older, Irish-American actress. In 1944, on Broadway, she had been the first to interpret the key matriarchal role of Amanda in Tennessee Williams' The Glass Menagerie.

George Cukor: Very outspoken in his negative impression of Nancy.

Nancy also asserted that her greatest ambition was "to have a successful marriage."

Although he masked it, Cukor took an instant dislike to Nancy. Privately, he told Tracy, "She has absolutely no talent."

[Throughout the rest of his life, Cukor made nasty remarks about her. In his most notorious comment, he claimed, "If I had a nickel for every Jew Nancy was under, I'd be rich."]

Cukor showed her screen test to producer Pandro S. Berman, who had dealt, frequently, with such über-luminaries as Katharine Hepburn. He told Cukor, "Nancy Davis just doesn't have star material."

Nancy later recalled, "I escaped the usual star buildup, having to pose in bathing suits and the like. From the beginning, I was cast either as a young girl with children, or I was padded to appear as pregnant more times than I can recall. From 1949 to 1956, I would make eleven films, but, except for a few of them, I hardly remember what happened during the shoot."

Unlike Reagan's first wife, Jane Wyman, Nancy didn't seem to be particularly susceptible to "Leadingman-itis." Male stars who failed to light her fire included Van Heflin, James Mason, Zachory Scott, James Whitmore, Ray Milland, Ralph Meeker, and George Murphy, Reagan's best friend. "Glenn Ford was attractive enough, but he was involved," she said. In one of her final films, however, her leading man really turned her on—Reagan himself. By then, she'd already married him.

During her first interview with Louella Parsons, the aging gossip maven asked her, "Is there one man in your life?"

"Not yet," Nancy said. "I don't want to sound trite, but I'm married to my career, and that's pretty much the truth."

Actually, the first journalist to interview Nancy after she signed her contract was columnist Ines Wallace. What she wrote was rather bland. Privately, she had a sharper opinion: "My impression of her was dismal. She was more like a character actress than a leading lady. She looked a bit long in the tooth. Mayer liked to sign young girls—take Elizabeth Taylor, Judy Garland, or Lana Turner, for example. I was told that MGM planned to build Nancy up. Up for what? Oblivion? The fans won't go for this one. Trust me!"

Nancy also realized that within MGM, she couldn't compete with those "child-woman" stars, the rosy-cheeked "girl next door" type. June Allyson and Jane Powell were already under contract for those parts, with Debbie Reynolds looming on the horizon.

"I had to be something in between," Nancy said. Thau told wardrobe and makeup that he wanted them to create "that respectable lady look, an image of manicured prettiness."

"Nancy was not glamorous," Thau said, "and she knew that."

"After I put my "Jane Henry" on that contract, I started receiving a weekly paycheck," Nancy said. "No longer would I have to depend on Edith and Loyal for support."

[In later years, Nancy, in her real-life role as a mother, would have to provide money for her son, Ron Reagan, Jr., during the early stages of his career as a ballet dancer.]

Although her starting salary was low, Nancy seemed pleased with it. "Of course, "she remarked, "Lassie, that beautiful collie, was pulling in $1,000 a week at the time."

Thau had previously informed Nancy that Lassie, in the dog's capacity as a star, was equivalent to "Greer Garson with fur."

Berlin-born Gottfried Reinhardt was the son of the fabled Austrian theater director, Max Reinhardt. The son had produced Two-Faced Woman (1941), the final film of Greta Garbo.

When Nancy first encountered Reinhardt as part of a chance meeting, he was in preparation for his classic 1951 film, The Red Badge of Courage, the epic Civil Wardrama starring war hero Audie Murphy.

Dore Schary represented a new breed of mogul, making decisions and sponsoring movies that would have driven his domineering predecessor (Louis B. Mayer) crazy.

According to Reinhardt "Benny Thau always made his directors cast the girl he was sleeping with at the time. Nancy was a horrible actress, and I knew she got her contract by devious means. Benny called me into his office and asked me to cast her in my next picture. Sidney Franklin had already rejected her. I said I would get back to him, but I never did. Of course, Benny could have insisted, but he didn't. Even with no talent, Nancy had a lot going for her, giving Benny blow jobs and having Loyal Davis take care of Dore Schary's back."

Taffeta Fashion Glam: In this haute fashion shot arranged by MGM, the hope was that Nancy would evoke an allure as pronounced as that of Lana or Ava. But as her resumé was scrutinized, she seemed less and less suited for sultry.

Reinhardt said, “Even without a screen test, she had that contract in the bag. As long as she showed up, wasn’t drunk, and didn’t up-chuck on camera, she was in like Flynn. A lot of guys were rooting for her, including Clark Gable, Spencer Tracy, Dore Schary, and my friend, Benny Thau. Louis B. Mayer didn’t like her screen test, but he finally gave in and allowed her contract to go through. Mayer was beginning to lose a lot of his power in the late 1940s. Back in the 1930, he would have ordered Davis off the Metro lot.”

Lucille Ryman Carroll, head of MGM’s talent department, cynically remarked, “Benny knew the Davis girl would never be a star. He just wanted his morning blow job. If he gives her a role, I predict it’ll be in a B picture. Of course, Schary goes for that demure look. What in hell does he know? He even turned down Marilyn Monroe, and she went over to Fox.”

Once her contract was signed, Nancy evacuated her apartment in New York, finding a similar one in Santa Monica. After a few weeks, she rented a modest house in Beverly Glen. Her neighbors were Van Johnson and his wife, the former Evie Wynn. Like Jane Wyman before her, Nancy became close friends with Johnson, going swimming with him or else playing tennis. Evie went along for the outings.

[Johnson’s boss, Louis B. Mayer, had ordered him to get married as a means of putting a stop to rumors that he was a homosexual. “I became ‘It,’ meaning the only safe choice woman for Van to marry,” Evie later said. “I was told to divorce Keenan, Van’s best friend, and then marry Van. To save his career at MGM, Keenan also agreed to Mayer’s harsh terms. Boy, did we make a lot of sacrifices to hold onto an MGM contract.”]

Not the big stars, but the minor ones, resented Nancy at MGM and spread rumors about her. When Nancy arrived in Hollywood, she perhaps thought that Clark Gable would continue dating her, as he had in New York. But except for a lunch or two in the MGM commissary, he did not.

Ernst Lubitsch (left), a brilliant director of savvy and wit, is seen with Gottfried Reinhardt, the talented son of the celebrated theater impresario, Max Reinhardt.

When Benny Thau asked him to cast Nancy in his next picture, he was horrified.

She'd heard that he was seeing an MGM blonde, Audrey Totter, who had signed with the studio in 1944, playing a floozy who makes her dough by rolling drunken soldiers and sailors in Main Street After Dark. Totter took up with Gable when they were cast together in Any Number Can Play (1949). She and Nancy would later come into jealous conflict over actor Robert Walker.

Totter referred to Nancy as "Benny's little protégée from New York." She had taken an instant dislike to Nancy on first sight. She spread the story around the studio that one morning, she had an appointment with Thau, claiming she had entered his office and found his secretary out. She opened the door to Thau's office without knocking, and discovered someone going down on him as he sat behind his desk. She claimed that quickly and quietly, she shut the door and left his office's anteroom. "I waited in the hall to see who had been performing fellatio. After twenty minutes, Nancy Davis, looking prim and proper, emerged."

MGM's casting director had an enormous influence on her brief film career. As vice president of MGM, he had been in charge of casting since 1928. He was one of MGM's "College of Cardinals," who reported directly to the boss of bosses, Louis B. Mayer. The other so-called cardinals included Eddie Mannix, Lawrence Weingarten, and Hunt Stromberg.

Nancy-Hater: Audrey Totter

"Nancy is in good hands with Benny," Tracy told Gable and others. "Mayer is bombastic, but Benny is more the quiet type—in fact, his voice is so soft, you have to strain to hear the fucker. If two stars are waging war on the set, Benny is called in as the peacemaker."

In his early fifties, Benny had a tendency to early baldness and was developing a paunch. He always ate a large piece of cake for dessert at lunch, and repeated that order for dinner, always à la mode.

As he said himself, "I was constantly surrounded by the most beautiful men and women in the world. I never pretended to be a looker myself."

Elizabeth Taylor claimed that "Benny was like a surrogate father. I turned to him for advice...and perhaps a little more." The final phrase within that statement was deliberately enigmatic.

Nancy Davis in 1949: A new starlet outside her home on Beverly Glen, rushing to get ready for a hot date.

Actually, Thau could have been a second father to Nancy, too, as he was four years older than her birth father, Kenneth Robbins.

Thau was very popular among the male stars at MGM, often lining up prostitutes for them. He was especially known for his Christmas Eve orgies.

In spite of his unprepossessing looks and personality, Thau was rumored to have "the busiest casting couch at MGM," rivaling that of Harry Cohn at Columbia and Darryl F. Zanuck at Fox. Greta Garbo adored him and trusted him so much that she worked without a formal contract. "Benny's handshake was enough for me," she said.

His list of conquests was long—often starlets like Nancy, but sometimes, big name actresses such as Jean Harlow, Rosalind Russell, Jeanette MacDonald, Mary Astor, Joan Crawford, Loretta Young, and Norma Shearer.

He willingly abandoned all of these ladies when a red-haired Londoner arrived at MGM. She was Greer Garson, born in 1903 and, consequently, far closer to Thau's own age—he was born in 1898—than Nancy.

Garson became Thau's mistress. He closely supervised her career. In 1941, she was nominated for an Oscar for Blossoms in the Dust, that soggy Technicolor soap opera.

Usually, MGM did not sign actresses as old as Garson for their star roles, only for character parts. But Garson's style, manners, and ageless beauty seemed to overcome that prejudice. In 1942, she appeared in her biggest box office hit, Mrs. Miniver, which earned an Oscar for her. When she received it, she delivered the longest acceptance speech (5 ½ minutes) in Hollywood history, a liberty that would not be tolerated during Academy Award ceremonies today.

An MGM publicity photo: Tennis anyone?
Nancy, anyone?

During the filming of Mrs. Miniver, a young (age 26) and very handsome actor, Richard Ney, played her son. "When I saw Richard in uniform, I fell madly in love with him," Garson said. "So I married the boy." She was 39.

No longer with Garson as his mistress, Thau was a free agent when he encountered Nancy. "She was sweet and appealing," he recalled. "Except for some jealous actresses, she was very popular at MGM."

During her first weeks in Hollywood, Thau was Nancy's constant escort, although eventually, both of them expanded their date calendars.

[Thirty years after his affair with Nancy and long after his retirement from MGM, Thau was an invalid, confined to a wheelchair, a permanent resident of the Motion Picture and Television Hospital outside Los Angeles. He would die there in 1983 when Nancy was First Lady, presiding over the White House.

Several members of the Hollywood elite came to visit the dying man. Reporters were shocked to find him so outspoken. "I don't have to protect any star's reputation at this point," he claimed. "Even my own." He admitted that at one point, there had been talk of marriage with Nancy. "But I didn't pursue it. First, I was a much older man. I was also aware that Edith and Loyal were anti-Semites, and I was a Jew. So marriage was something to think about, but it just wasn't realistic."

Among those interviewing Thau was the well-known biographer, Anne Edwards, author of Early Reagan (1987). She visited Thau during the closing months of his life. As reported by Kitty Kelley, Thau confided to Edwards that Nancy was renowned in Hollywood for giving oral sex. "She not only slept around, she performed that act and she performed it not only in the evening, but in offices. That was one of the reasons she got her contract, and one of the reasons she was popular at MGM." Edwards said she did not print Thau's claim because it was "too scandalous, too taste less," and because her book was about Reagan, not Nancy.

Peter Lawford, one of Nancy's lovers, also claimed, "She was known for giving the best head in Hollywood."

Another biographer, Laurence Leamer, who wrote Make Believe: The Story of Nancy and Ronald Reagan (1987), also claimed that Benny Thau's receptionist alleged that she found used condoms in Thau's wastepaper basket after every one of Nancy's visits. That suggested that their sex acts may have extended beyond fellatio, since in the late 1940s, few women used condoms when giving oral sex back in those halcyon days before AIDS.

Other books—not just Kitty Kelley's—have suggested that Nancy became known as "the fellatio queen of Hollywood" long before the release of Linda Lovelace's Deep Throat in 1972.

A free-lance reporter, Daniel Burns, visited Thau at his retirement home and later claimed that he made a "deathbed confession." Perhaps unknown to Burns, that confession had already been expressed to others.

Thau told Burns, "Nancy was the undisputed Queen of Fellatio in Hollywood. The champion had been Faye Emerson before her marriage to Elliott Roosevelt. In the 1950s, after Nancy got married to what's his name, Marilyn Monroe was, more or less, the undisputed queen, even though she didn't hold the title. Of course, all critics agree that by the early 70s, Linda Lovelace was the oral expert. During her brief fling with William Holden, she tried to get Reagan's pal to fix her up with the man himself."

In Linda's view, only Reagan could determine "which of us is better, Nancy or me."

So far as it is known, Holden never complied with Lovelace's request.

Later, when asked about the role of Thau in her life, Nancy claimed, "I liked him as a friend, but that is as far as it went. I was not his girlfriend."]

In heavily sanitized latter-day evaluations," Nancy proclaimed, "Joining the studio was like walking into a dream world." But because of her understated manner and her somewhat distant approach to acting, MGM often found her hard to cast. In the early 1950s, roles that might have gone to Nancy went instead to Janet Leigh, Leslie Caron, Jane Powell, and, most definitely, Debbie Reynolds.

Almost as a foreshadowing of her future as Ronald Reagan's wife, if a role called for "a gentle, plain, and understanding spouse," it went to Nancy, in Thau's opinion.

The legacy of Nancy's movies appear minor, indeed, when compared to the distinguished list of those of Oscar-winning Jane Wyman, and to the many (less stellar) films made by Reagan. One of the few positive things that a film critic might say about Nancy's film repertoire is, "They're not as bad as rumor has it."

Reflections in a Mirror? Or just a Shadow on the Wall? Nancy Davis gets noir-ish in her film debut.

The first film Nancy made was a mystery thriller, Shadow on the Wall, co-starring Ann Sothern and Zachory Scott. Many movie-goers thought it was her third picture, because, although it was shot early in 1949, it was not released until more than a year later, after she'd appeared in two other films, The Doctor and the Girl and East Side, West Side. The reason for the delayed release of Shadow on the Wall is not known. Perhaps MGM had made a similar B picture and wanted to hold back the premiere of Shadow on the Wall as a means of reducing the competition.

Although George Cukor had directed her screen test, for her first film, Nancy was assigned a relatively untried Englishman, Patrick Jackson, to helm her. He'd made documentaries in the 1930s and had directed Western Approaches, a fictional account of 22 sailors marooned in a lifeboat, in 1944. Much of that film had been shot in the Irish Sea. Real sailors rather than professional actors were used.

"Pat was patient with me, knowing how scared I was," Nancy said. "He told me the movie was based on a novel, Death in a Doll's House, and he gave me a copy which I read in one night. I think I got more understanding from the book than from the director."

Sothern usually played sassy but sympathetic characters, but in Shadow on the Wall, she was cast as the villain, Dell Faring, who, in a jealous rage, shoots her sister, Celia (Kristine Miller), when she learns she's involved in an affair with her boyfriend. Suspicion for the murder falls on Celia's husband (Zachory Scott), who—if he's found guilty—may be sent to the electric chair.

The only witness to the murder is a nine-year-old child, the stepdaughter of the victim, played by Gigi Perreau. She saw only the shadow of the killer, projected on a wall, and she was so traumatized by what she witnessed that her memory is blocked.

Who was the real killer? Sothern or Scott? Psychiatrist Nancy held the clue, which was locked inside the traumatized brain of little Gigi.

The girl is sent for consultations with a psychiatrist (as played by Nancy), who races to unblock the child's memory before the wrong man dies.

In a chat with Nancy, Sothern told her, "Studios sell stars on their good looks and personality buildups. It will happen to you. You'll be asked questions like, 'Do you sleep in the nude?' A star is just a big name to a studio, nothing more. Publicity will give you a fake bio. If you don't deliver at the box office, you're out the door."

One of Sothern's most visible hits had been Fox's A Letter to Three Wives (1949), wherein she played an ambitious writer married to a younger man (Kirk Douglas).

Years later, Sothern expressed a dim view of Nancy to tell-all biographer Kitty Kelley. "I remember her as quite soft and pudgy, looking like she'd had a nose job. Although she was pleasant enough, she seemed rather devious to me. I can't tell you exactly why—it was just a feeling I had. Maybe it was because she was so ambitious. She was a tough lady who definitely knew where she wanted to go. She didn't impress me much."

"She was well connected with Benny Thau, if you get my drift. He sometimes appeared on the set to see how things were coming along for his Nancy."

Sothern viewed all female newcomers to the screen with a certain disdain, seeing them as "tomorrow's competition." Also, at the time she expressed her negative opinions of Nancy, she was in the process of divorcing her actor husband, Robert Sterling, and she had recently been dropped from MGM after her final appearance in a series of Maisie movies in which she had starred as a wisecracking secretary, Maisie Ravier, since 1939. [Sothern's last exposure to the role was in Undercover Maisie (1947).] She was worried about her future in movies—and rightly so. In the months ahead, she would turn to television.

Gigi Perreau, screaming and traumatized, by Shadow on the Wall.

As a type, Scott, in real life, reminded Nancy too much of the sleazy character (Monty) he had played opposite Joan Crawford in Mildred Pierce (1945). She later thanked him in a memoir for being supportive of her as she struggled through her first movie role.

Off screen, she noticed that Scott wore a gold earring. He claimed he'd worn one ever since 1938, when the captain of a fishing boat he'd hired off the coast of Mexico had worn one.

Scott wore it in spite of an attack by Walter Seltzer, a publicist at Warners, who claimed, "Scott has a quality of effeteness about him, a slight effeminacy. There is talk that he is a homosexual, and that he really doesn't fit into Hollywood."

Nancy could not help but notice an enormous tension between Sothern and Scott. Jackson had told her, "It's good that they don't have to play any love scenes. I've known directors who had to helm love scenes between bitter enemies. Imagine having to passionately kiss one of your worst enemies?"

At one point, Jackson explained why Scott was feuding with Sothern: He blamed her for interfering in his marriage to the former Elaine Anderson. In November of that year, Elaine would file for divorce from Scott, citing mental cruelty.

While Scott was away from Hollywood, on location, Sothern had introduced Elaine to the novelist, John Steinbeck, asking him to escort her to dinners and parties. As their courtship continued, Steinbeck fell in love with Elaine and continued their off-the-record affair even after Scott returned. Alienating Scott further, Sothern often served as a "beard" to mask their adulterous relationship.

During the shooting of Shadow on the Wall, the homosexual Latino, César Romero, was a frequent visitor to the set. After he'd been locked away with Scott in his dressing room for more than an hour, Sothern loudly remarked, "César is helping Scott mend a broken heart by offering his own special physical comfort. The use of his expert mouth."

On the set, Nancy befriended Perreau. A few years before, as a four-year-old, she had played the daughter of Claude Rains and Bette Davis in Mr. Skeffington (1944).

Nancy seemed aware that Perreau's career as a child actress was suffering from comparisons to a far more talented juvenile, Natalie Wood, who was three years her senior.

Jackson predicted that Nancy and one of the movie's supporting players, Barbara Billingsley, could usually be interchanged "as the same housewifey types."

[Barbara later hit it big when she was cast as June Cleaver in the long-running (1957-1963) sitcom, Leave It to Beaver. Nancy, who would probably have been adept at portraying an American mom from the 1950s, might also have been ideal as Beaver's mother.]

The New York Times praised Nancy's performance in Shadow on the Wall, finding it "beautiful and convincing." It could not, however, accept Sothern's radical change of screen image, suggesting that she was better suited for musicals or light comedies. Newsweek claimed that both Sothern and Scott handled their "high-voltage roles with effective restraint."

Carmen Miranda, friends to both men, said, "These two guys committed what the public might call acts of unspeakable perversion, but what I might view as just having a wild party."

Nancy got her best review from Variety, which defined her performance as a standout, claiming "This actress is definitely a comer."

MGM brass, however, interpreted Shadow on the Wall as "just another cheap B-picture thriller."

Thau would later tell Nancy that it was just as well that the release of Shadow on the Wall had been delayed, because he believed that her two other films, The Doctor and the Girl (1949) and East Side, West Side (also 1949), were, in the long run, better showcases for her talent.

"The Doctor" (Glenn Ford) and "The Girl" (Janet Leigh). Nancy, to her regret, was NOT the romantic lead. "Off screen, Janet got Glenn—not me," Nancy said.

As evidence of how small a town Hollywood was in the late 1940s, MGM designated, as director for Nancy's next film (The Doctor and the Girl), Curtis Bernhardt.

[Coincidentally, in 1940, he had helmed Jane Wyman in My Love Came Back. A year later, he had directed Reagan in Million Dollar Baby. Now, it was his turn to work with Nancy in a minor role.]

The stars included Glenn Ford and Janet Leigh, with Gloria DeHaven appearing in a supporting role. At the time, she was married to John Payne, Wyman's "true love" from earlier in the decade.

But as the daughter of a real-life doctor, she knew how to play it. Here, with a sense of gritty realism, is Nancy with Glenn Ford, "The Man Who Got Away" from her.

Originally entitled Bodies and Soul, the movie had an array of talented supporting players, most notably Charles Coburn, cast as a famous doctor and the father of the screen characters played by Ford, DeHaven, and Nancy. Other players included Bruce Bennett, Warner Anderson, and Arthur Franz. Nancy was typecast, playing the daughter of a famous neurosurgeon (Coburn), which—as the daughter of Loyal Davis—she was in real life.

Like Nancy, Leigh would also write an autobiography. Entitled There Really Was a Hollywood, it was published by Doubleday in 1984 when Nancy was one of the most famous and powerful women in the world. Many fans wondered why, within its pages, Leigh deliberately eliminated any mention of Nancy, with whom she'd played pivotal scenes.

"The choice was deliberate," Leigh in later years revealed to reporter George Hills. "I detested Nancy Davis. Not only did she make a play for my then beau, Glenn (Ford), but she went after most of my roles at MGM."

"Alfred Hitchcock claimed that Nancy's name was submitted for my landmark role in Psycho (1960)," Leigh continued. “After all, I received an Oscar nod—and should have won instead of Shirley Jones—for that terrifying scream, the most famous in film history. Demure little Nancy would have fucked up that scene for sure. Hitch told me, ‘I turned Miss Davis down, of course. The idea of casting her was absurd.’”

“She went after my roles, regardless of what they were—everything from an ingénue to a tragic heroine. Perhaps a widow romanced by Robert Mitchum, a Russian spy opposite John Wayne, a naïve Southern girl, Gene Kelly’s girlfriend, Carleton Carpenter’s love interest (can you imagine such a thing?) or even Robert Ryan’s gun moll,” Leigh claimed.

In her own memoirs, Nancy wasn’t as petty as Leigh. She did at least mention her as a member of the cast, but it wasn’t even a case of damning by faint praise. All that she wrote was, “Janet played Glenn’s wife.” Privately, she was said to have thought that Leigh’s role would have been better suited for her.

Actually, Bernhardt cast their respective roles correctly. Leigh was seven years younger than Nancy, and as such was physically better suited for the role of “The Girl” in the film.

Ford was cast as a young doctor who suffers from a difficult relationship with his father (Coburn), and pursues a romance with a young female patient (Leigh) in all her dewy freshness, [Leigh had been “discovered” by Norma Shearer, the former Queen of MGM.]

Dore Schary wanted gritty realism and consequently, he ordered Bernhardt to shoot the scenes “on the fly” in New York City. That involved setting up cameras on the actual streets and sidewalks “to film the natives,” as Bernhardt defined them.

Years later, although Ford hardly remembered being in the movie with Nancy, he had nothing but praise for Leigh. “She had ability, brains, and ambition. I got to know her.”

Bernhardt described their relationship in more cynical terms. “Ford got to know her all right, like David knew Bathsheba. Janet Leigh ingratiated herself with Ford by launching their romance one afternoon when she pissed all over him.”

He was referring to a scene where Ford and Leigh played a newly married couple. On their wedding night, he has to carry her up two flights of stairs. As he does, he whispers to her, “I don’t think I can make it.”

“The more he struggled, the more I laughed,” Leigh wrote, “until finally, I passed the threshold of restraint and wet my pants, which only made me laugh harder—and it kept coming (I swear). I could see a spot on my skirt in the actual film.”

Ford, at the time, was married to singer-dancer Eleanor Powell, who had retired from the screen to marry an unfaithful husband. Like Reagan, Ford came down with “Leadinglady-itis," as provoked by Rita Hayworth. Along the way, he managed to seduce Eva Gabor, Joan Crawford, Judy Garland, Margaret Sullavan, and Barbara Stanwyck. He even had a one-night stand (surprise!) with Marilyn Monroe, as he confessed to his son, Peter Ford. The question is still out as to whether Bette Davis seduced him when they co-starred together in A Stolen Life (1946).

After meeting Ford, playwright Clifford Odets, the lover of Cary Grant, issued a strange pronouncement. “It is an easily won bet that in a few years, Ford will get just like the other movie people: Bored, sprawling, careless, an overly relaxed fallen angel— They are all affable boys out here, almost tramps.”

In The Doctor and the Girl, DeHaven was cast as the most rebellious of Coburn’s three daughters, running off to live in Greenwich Village. Her character was described as “flouncy and indiscreet.” After falling ill from an illegal, back alley abortion, she arrives, near death, on her brother’s doorstep. She has lost much blood and dies shortly afterward, in spite of what one critic called “the desperate ding-dong struggle on the table to save her.”

[In another of the ironies of Hollywood, Nancy found herself working closely with DeHaven, who was the ‘blood enemy” of Jane Wyman, having stolen John Payne from her.]

It has been said that Nancy Davis, as a lonely young girl, learned the power of fantasy and self-creation from her actress mother and theatrical godmother, each of them larger-than-life actresses who ate up the scenery.

In somewhat nerdy contrast, Nancy played Coburn's dutiful daughter, who marries a successful pediatrician (Warner Anderson). Bernhardt ordered that one of her scenes be reshot: After Nancy greeted Ford, cast as her brother, with unseemly emotion, the director admonished her with, "Please remember that you're playing Glenn's sister, not his lover."

In another memorable scene, Nancy, clad in mink, arrives one wintry day at her brother's dingy third-floor walkup. Before leaving, she gives Leigh (playing her sister-in-law) her mink coat. After she's gone, Ford tells his wife, "She has plenty more mink coats at home."

Also cast as a doctor, Arthur Franz was introduced to Nancy. He would co-star with her again in Hellcats of the Navy (1957), the only movie she ever made with Reagan.

Bernhardt claimed, "Janet had Glenn tied up, so Nancy went after Bruce [Bennett], or so it seemed to me. I think she struck out, but who knows? I know that Virginia Mayo fell for Bruce big time when they made Smart Girls Don't Talk in '48."

Although the film contained "two male beauties," Bennett and Ford, neither of them gave Nancy a tumble, so it was alleged. Off screen, she was pursued by Coburn, then in his seventies, perhaps rehearsing for his role in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes (1953), when, as a millionaire, he lecherously chased after Marilyn Monroe.

Nancy later claimed, "Charles invited me to dinner, and I spent the rest of the evening fighting him off."

The 98-minute film made a profit of $184,000 on a budget of slightly more than a million dollars. It opened on September 29, 1949 in theaters around the country. Nearly all critics ignored Nancy's performance, the focus being on Ford, Leigh, and Coburn. Variety was an exception, faintly praising it with the evaluation: "Nancy Davis is to be favorably noted."

The New York Times critiqued The Doctor and the Girl as "a nice little bedside tear-jerker—slightly gruesome, of course, but full of hope. In the role of the noble young doctor, who shuns a Park Avenue practice to help the working poor, Ford does a satisfactory job of solemnly carrying the torch flung by Dr. Kildare in that film series. Suture! Suture tie! Sponge!"

Director Gottfried Reinhardt later claimed, "With all the talent on tap, I didn't want to cast Nancy Davis in a picture, so I palmed her off on Dore Schary."

Consequently, it was Schary who ordered the producer, Voldemar Vetluguin, to cast Nancy in East Side, West Side, an A-list picture top heavy with stars—Barbara Stan-wyck, James Mason, Ava Gardner, Van Heflin, and Cyd Charisse.

The MGM film was set for a Christmas (1949) release and came in on schedule.

East Side, West Side: Nancy Davis in a "one-take" scene with Barbara Stanwyck, who, according to director Curtis Bernhardt, "had the hots for little Miss Nancy."

Nancy joined an array of very talented supporting players, including the communist sympathizer Gale Sondergaard, William Conrad, Douglas Kennedy, and William Frawley. Cast as a supporting figure was Beverly Michaels, the sexpot of sexpots. "If it has blonde floozy written on it, I got the part," Michaels said. She also captured the producer, Vetluguin, who married her that year.

Mervyn LeRoy, the film's director, always claimed that he had "discovered" Jane Wyman when he'd cast her in a very minor role in Elmer the Great (1933). "Ironically, I was the same director who helmed Reagan's other wife, Nancy, in her first A-list picture," as he bragged in later years.

East Side, West Side was a melodramatic mystery thriller about a high society couple, the Bournes, (as portrayed by Stanwyck and Mason) on the verge of breaking up their marriage. The interloping mistress in the film is Ava Gardner, cast as Isabel Lorrison, who is eventually murdered.

Van Heflin and Barbara Stanwyck appeared together in East Side, West Side. He told her, "If you'd like to know me better and get acquainted with all my body parts, and I yours, all you have to do is invite me over tonight. I take loving a woman as seriously as I do sailing the high seas, and I view love-making as an art form. I like to make a woman feel as if she'd been loved from the tip of her brow to her big toe."

"An enchanting offer," Stanwyck said. "You should pitch those lines to Ava Gardner."

As a femme fatale, Gardner undulates across the screen, claiming that with the crook of a finger, she can lure Mason away from Stanwyck. Gardner later said that her performance was inspired by Joan Crawford's attempt to steal Norma Shearer's husband in The Women (1939).

[In a touch of irony, whereas in 1949 Gardner played a home wrecker on the screen, she was defined as a home wrecker offscreen because of her well-publicized affair with Frank Sinatra. At the time, he was still famously married to his high school sweetheart, Nancy Sinatra.

During the film's conception, Gardner had been slated to play the lead role of Mason's wife. But when Stanwyck became available, Gardner was demoted to the role of Mason's mistress. Later, Gardner said, "At the time, I was seriously pissed off. But it turned out to be the better role, and certainly the more flamboyant one."]

Mason is the primary murder suspect. After many complications and mixed alliances, Heflin finds a woman's broken fingernail, a clue that eventually sets Mason free.

Nancy was cast in the film as Hazel Lee, the best friend of the character played by Stanwyck, who remains elegantly attired throughout the film, evoking a model for Christian Dior's 1949 "New Look."

Her portrayal as a meddlesome tattle-tale wasn't designed to populate any Nancy Davis fan clubs. Fully aware of Mason's philandering, she deviously asks Stanwyck, "Is everything all right between you and Brandon?" She then reveals a string of details associated with her husband's infidelities.

In another scene, Nancy hosts a party for the character played by Heflin, a foreign correspondent launching his first book. It is he who will eventually crack the mystery of who murdered the character played by Gardner.

LeRoy remembered Nancy as having two things on her mind, "Snaring a famous husband and having a big career. Gable had eluded her and she could only let her mouth water when Sinatra came after work to pick up Ava. Nancy told me she wanted to be bigger than both Stanwyck and Gardner. She didn't have the talent of Stanwyck or the beauty of Gardner, so I suggested she'd set her goalpost too high."

Nancy and other cast members could not help but notice that Sinatra showed up most evenings to haul Gardner away for the night. It is not known for sure, but this may have been Nancy's first encounter with Ol' Blue Eyes. She developed a crush on him that would endure for decades. When she was First Lady, she frequently invited the singer to gala affairs at the White House.

Nancy admired Mason from afar, especially his "languid but impassioned" speech patterns. The Yorkshire-born actor was married at the time to actress Pamela Mason, who sometimes visited the set with her friend, Zsa Zsa Gabor.

During a chat with Mason, Nancy learned that he was a devoted cat lover. The year he made the film with Nancy, he and Pamela had published a book, The Cats in Our Lives.

Nancy had heard rumors that Mason had a gay streak in him. During the shoot, two of the handsomest and most well-built young men on the film crew made extended visits to his dressing room. The DO NOT DISTURB sign was exhibited during each of their visits.

In her memoirs, Nancy recalled that her one big scene was with Stanwyck. "I was nervous working with a star of her reputation and especially because I had to give a long speech. But when I got it right on the first take, she applauded and congratulated me, which, of course, made me feel marvelous."

One day, Stanwyck's husband, Robert Taylor, was scheduled for an arrival on the set. Stanwyck told Nancy that she and Taylor had been invited to dinner at the home of Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman. "They are our close friends," Stanwyck asserted.

When Taylor appeared, Gardner, notified in advance of his arrival, retreated to her dressing room. "Watch the bitch go," Stanwyck muttered to Nancy. "In this film, I'm playing the cuckolded wife. It happened to me in real life. Bob was fucking Gardner when they made The Bribe (1949) together. Now Gardner is getting murdered in our movie. It couldn't happen to a more deserving person."

Two closeted bisexuals, Barbara Stanwyck and James Mason, cozy up to each other in East Side, West Side. But it was just make-believe.

When Gardner heard that Stanwyck was badmouthing her on the set, she told LeRoy, "I notice that Bloody Babs is being nice to that Davis girl. She'll be lucky if Stanwyck doesn't seduce her. The little thing is Stanwyck's type, just like Nancy Sinatra. Stanwyck adores Frankie's wife, and he suspects something…"

"Maybe Stanwyck just likes gals named Nancy?" LeRoy said.

Ava, beautiful Ava Gardner, with James Mason in East Side, West Side.

Faced with such female pulchritude, and the acting talent of Stanwyck, Nancy (cheesecake photo, below) simply faded into the background.

In a memoir, Nancy described Gardner as "…so beautiful, she took my breath away." She met her at the MGM newsstand when Gardner wore no makeup. The actress complimented Nancy on her performance in The Doctor and the Girl. Those were the last kind words Gardner would ever say about Nancy. Soon after that, someone told Gardner that Nancy was lusting after her man, Sinatra.

Ironically, Nancy eventually found herself emotionally involved with two of Gardner's boyfriends, actors Robert Walker and Peter Lawford. Gardner had co-starred with Walker in One Touch of Venus (1948). That had led to Gardner's involvement with Walker's best friend, Lawford. As he explained it, "Bob and I like to share."

Eventually, as her relationship with Sinatra deepened, Gardner dumped both Lawford and Walker. Following in her footsteps, Nancy began to date both young men herself, which turned Gardner against her, even though she'd discarded the men.

"Of course, Ava got pissed off at Nancy," LeRoy said. "Nancy was greedy, wanting Peter, Bob, and Frank.

What a coincidence that each of them was or had been involved with Gardner. I don't think it just a coincidence."

Gardner, by then engaged to Sinatra, became friends with Mason and his wife, Pamela, and frequently went out as a foursome. It was at table with the Masons at the Sugar Hill Club in Harlem that Gardner got into a terrible fight with Sinatra over his liaison with a New York prostitute. During one of the argument's most memorable moments, she removed her diamond engagement ring and tossed it across the club.

Of the cast, it seemed that the beautiful, talented dancer, Cyd Charisse, was the only member who, like Caesar's wife, was above reproach.

As a child, she suffered from polio, but went on to become a dancer with Fred Astaire and Gene Kelly. At the time that Nancy met her, she was married to the singer, Tony Martin. As she'd tell anyone interested, "With Tony in your bed, a girl has no need of any other man." They remained married until her death in 2008.

As was her custom on a film set, Nancy made a point of ingratiating herself with the supporting players of East Side, West Side. She often appeared even when she wasn't needed. "She was learning, learning, learning, watching the pros go at it," LeRoy recalled.

Devoted actress, Neo-Pinko and Reagan Hater: Gale Sondergaard.

One of the first persons she met and chatted with was Gale Sondergaard, who had won an Oscar for her film debut in Anthony Adverse (1936). She was later nominated for an Academy Award for her role as "the first wife" in Anna and the King of Siam (1946). She told Nancy that originally, she had been slated to play the evil witch in The Wizard of Oz (1939). "The first script called for the witch to be glamorous," she told Nancy. "But then the script was changed to make the witch hideous. I bowed out. I thought that my wearing such disfiguring makeup would damage my career. Margaret Hamilton had none of my reservations."

During the months ahead, the actress would view Reagan with "total disgust." She later accused Reagan of turning in a report to the FBI about her and her husband, producer Herbert J. Biberman, alleging that both of them were card-carrying communists. Biberman became one of the notorious "Hollywood Ten" of the early 1950s. This led to Sondergaard being blacklisted in Hollywood. When screen roles dried up, she fled to New York to find work in the theater.

Cyd Charisse in a dance routine ("Sombrero") that was a lot less demure than her role in East Side, West Side. Faced with the choreographic brilliance of this dance icon, it became increasingly clear that Nancy could not compete.

Nancy noticed that another actor, Douglas Kennedy, a New Yorker, was paying a lot of attention to Stanwyck. His adulation must have paid off because she was instrumental in getting him cast as the Sheriff in her hit TV series for ABC, The Big Valley (1965-69).

Also cast in the movie was veteran actor William Frawley, who had made more than a hundred movies. He told Nancy he was finding it harder and harder to find character roles. She was pleased to read that in 1951, Desi Arnaz and Lucille Ball had cast him as the cantankerous, miserly landlord, Fred Mertz, in their hit TV series, I Love Lucy.

When East Side, West Side opened across the country, Nancy gave it a good review, praising it as "outstanding." The rest of the country did not. The attack was led by Bosley Crowther of The New York Times. "It's a picture that just about hits the low water mark of interest, intelligence, and urgency."

Marica Davensport had co-written the screenplay, which was based on her novel. But even she said she was not going to see the picture because she'd heard that it was horrible.

Stanwyck's biographer, Dan Callahan, summed up the film in his book, The Miracle Worker. "Mason and Heflin are stuck in dull roles, and Stanwyck herself is saddled with the worst role of the kind of sniveling, stoic wifey who does nothing but worry about her husband's infidelities. She's up against young Amazons like Cyd Charisse and the ultimate big blonde, Beverly Michaels, who acts as a deus ex machina in the last third. Sitting beside Charisse in a car at one point, Stanwyck is photographed like a grizzled old frontierswoman. The resplendent Ava Gardner, playing the hellcat trying to break up her marriage, dominates the whole stultifying enterprise through sheer physical splendor."

Postwar Bad Girls: What's an ambitious starlette to do? Go "Goody-Good" or "Baddy-Bad" on screen?

MGM records revealed that East Side, West Side garnered $1,518,000 in North America and slightly more than one million in overseas rentals. But because of the expenses and the all-star talent, the profits generated were only $31,000.

LeRoy later summed up the cast of East Side, West Side, claiming, "They were a bunch of whores, faggots, cocksuckers, dykes, tramps, commies, pederasts, dopers, panty sniffers, rimmers, pillheads, floozies, and male hustlers selling it by the inch." He told this at a party given for columnist Hedda Hopper, who, in her picture hat, laughed loudly. Of course, he knew she could not print such a provocative comment.

[Fast forward to late 1963 in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico, where Gardner was co-starring with Richard Burton and Deborah Kerr in Tennessee Williams' The Night of the Iguana, directed by John Huston.

Elizabeth Taylor, who had accompanied her husband, often joined Burton, as well as Tennessee, Gardner, and Huston, for a tequila-soaked night. At the time, Gardner had turned on Nancy, because of her interest in Sinatra.

Gardner surprised her fellow drunks one night by claiming, "I got to Ronnie's uncut inches before Nancy." She then related an incident that took place at William Holden's private home when his wife, Brenda Marshall, was away. At the time, Holden had been Reagan's best friend.

"I was jaybird naked in the pool with my companions, the black model, Maddy Comfort, and the artist, Paul Clemens," Gardner said. "Reagan came out wearing a polo shirt and slacks to see what all the raucous laughter was about. We grabbed him and tossed him in the pool with us. He put up a struggle, but we stripped him. Maddy and Paul later wandered off, and I lured Ronnie into Bill's cabana. He wouldn't fuck me, but I went down on him and he rose to the occasion."

Later, after Gardner went back to her villa, Tennessee asked Huston, "Do you think Ava is telling the truth, or is she just getting back at Miss Nancy?"

"Hell, how would I know?" Huston asked. "Whether it's true or not, the story makes a good yarn."]

Nancy's stepson, Michael Reagan, reportedly once said, "If Nancy knew that one day she'd be First Lady, she would have cleaned up her act in the late 1940s.:"

He was obviously referring to her notorious sex life. To read her two memoirs, you get the impression she was a demure virgin when she married Reagan.

It is not known how many men Nancy dated during the starlet years at MGM that preceded her first and only marriage. Only the "marquee names" of Nancy's dating lists have emerged, and that is because some of them lived to see Nancy become famous. Men, being men, like to brag, particularly about their sexual conquests. There are even web sites today devoted to Nancy's list of suitors, many of whom have privately praised her alleged "oral talents."

It is not entirely certain if Marlon Brando ever had an affair with starlet Nancy Davis. If he did, it was of short duration and occurred shortly before she nabbed Reagan as her husband. Nancy omitted any mention of Marlon within her autobiographies, as she did each of her other lovers.

Marlon, however, told two producers— Charles Feldman and Elia Kazan—that he'd made love to Nancy, whom he found "kinda cute with her brown eyes and hair just the color I like it."

In the early 1950s, Nancy was known to have composed a list of unattached marriageable males. At the top of her list was Ronald Reagan. Other men on the list included actors, producers, and directors. Surely Nancy knew enough about Marlon to realize that he was "not marriage material." She allegedly told Ava Gardner that "Marlon is just too wild and bohemian for me."

"But not for me, honey child," Ava was supposed to have countered. "Been there, done that."

Nancy had first met Marlon in Manhattan when she was dating Clark Gable, a short-term romance that never got off the launch pad. When she reunited with Marlon in Hollywood, Nancy was in the throes of a torrid affair with Benny Thau, head of casting at MGM. Thau was said to be deeply in love with Nancy during a period when she was dating other men.

One of Thau's assistants reportedly saw Nancy and Marlon dining at Chasen's, a restaurant that Marlon had never visited before, as he hated formal dining rooms. She was elegantly attired in a black Chanel dress, a large white hat, and a corsage of small orchids. Having (temporarily) abandoned his blue jeans, Marlon wore a sports jacket and slacks but no tie.

Brando, the quintessential Postwar Bad Boy. His dining with Nancy at Chasen's supposedly drove MGM's casting director, Benny Thau, into a jealous rage.

His relationship with Nancy, if one developed at all, fizzled quickly.

When Thau heard that the woman he loved had been seen out with Brando, he was furious, threatening that Marlon would never make a picture for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. "By trying to move in on Nancy, the cocksucking queer has ruined himself in this town—I'll see to that."

Whatever relationship existed between Marlon and Nancy fizzled quickly, because she was soon seen dating others.

Marlon told Kazan that Nancy would never appear opposite him in one of his films—"That is, if I ever make another film. But if you know of any roles calling for 'the perfect wife,' then Nancy's your gal. She's the exception to every other actress in Hollywood. Instead of some big-time career, she wants to settle down in a rose-covered cottage, raise three kids, and greet hubbie with a Scotch and soda every night at six o'clock, as the smell of fried chicken wafts through the house."

Marlon may have accurately interpreted Nancy's feelings at the time. She later confessed to just such a dream, hardly knowing that the "cottage" would turn out to be the White House. There, in 1981, she would suffer the highest disapproval rating of any First Lady in modern times.

When Marlon was informed of Nancy's marriage to Reagan, he sarcastically told Feldman, "It's a perfect match. I hear Reagan brushes his teeth every time he kisses a woman. I can even suggest a theme song for their marriage. Make it George Gershwin's 'Our Love Is Here to Stay.'"

In the years to come, Marlon would always speak kindly of Nancy, "even when she was single-handedly running the Free World." On the other hand, he consistently deplored Reagan for what he claimed was "His witch hunting of so-called Communists."

Since Nancy had been a teenage girl, Spencer Tracy had always defined her as "my favorite daughter." He was her mentor, someone she loved and respected. But Tracy got drunk a lot and became very indiscreet, lacking in judgment. His friend, director George Cukor, later claimed that at some point in the late 1940s, Tracy's platonic relationship with Katharine Hepburn hit rocks in the road. "In a way, Nancy Davis was blamed."

Tracy rented a cottage on Cukor's estate, with Hepburn a frequent visitor. To his intimates, the gossipy director later described the Tracy-Hepburn conflicts about Nancy.

Hepburn had originally befriended Nancy, but whereas Tracy had encouraged her to become an actress, Hepburn did not.

She wrote Nancy a letter, warning her "How damn awful the acting profession is: Perhaps you think it's all too glamorous, and it's all about socializing with rich and famous stars. Most young girls who dream of being an actress end up waiting tables or else are found at the switchboard."

HOLLYWOOD QUIZ: What (or who?) was one of the wedges (discounting their respective bi-sexuality) that tested the widely publicized loyalty of Spencer Tracy to Katharine Hepburn? ANSWER: Nancy Davis!

One night, according to Cukor, Tracy became "Fed up with Kate bossing me around." He turned on her and ordered her out of his cottage. At one point during their argument, Tracy is reported to have said, "If you don't get out, I'll give you a boot in your bony butt."

Tracy had become hostile at the end of the filming of Adam's Rib (1949), in which bisexual Hepburn had taken an "undue interest" in her co-star, Judy Holliday, another bisexual actress.

As Tracy relayed to Cukor about Hepburn, "Sometimes when I hear the sound of that out-of-control voice, my whole body cringes. I encourage her to smoke more, since that lowers her voice register."

Before kicking her out, and perhaps as a means of making her jealous, and to infuriate her, Tracy confessed, "I've found an adoring woman, one who understands me, respects me, and gives in to me on any issue. How unlike you! She's the woman I've been looking for all my life and never found. Believe it or not, it's someone I've known for years, but have never thought of in that special way before—that is, until now. Hell, I'm even a friend of her mother's."

"Who might this Goddess of Virtue be?" Hepburn had asked, sarcastically.

"Nancy Davis."

A week later, Hepburn called Cukor, claiming, "Spence has all but given up. He'll end up one day all alone except for the bottle. I won't be there for him."

At the time of her dismal assessment, she seemed unaware that Tracy was experiencing renewed vigor with Nancy.

Cukor told his close gay friend, Anderson Lawler, an early lover of a young Gary Cooper, "Spence is enjoying the comforts of the damned—a bottle of whiskey. He's not in good health. He's no longer a champ at the box office. He looks like shit. He's a walking tub of suet. He sucks off hustlers but won't admit he's a homo. Yet he's still a big enough name he can get a date on a Saturday night, even if it's Nancy Davis. I directed her in her screen test. I know how limited she is."

Even though she'd headed East in 1950 to rehearse her Broadway performance of Rosalind in As You Like It, Hepburn still called Cukor for news of the Nancy Davis/Spencer Tracy liaison.

Cukor later said, "Kate has always been aware of Tracy's affairs with other women, and even of his affairs with a number of men. The ratio was about ten women to every one male. But the mere mention of Nancy Davis' name made her explode."

"Spence is a big name in Hollywood, and Nancy will date anybody with a big name," Hepburn charged. "She likes to associate with important people. She is not the only actress in Hollywood who thinks she can sleep her way to the top. There are some actresses, myself included, who get there on talent alone."

Nancy dated Tracy, although not exclusively, for at least three months. He seemed to know she was trying to advance her career. As he admitted to Cukor, "I encourage her in a film career, although I secretly know she doesn't have what it takes to be a star like Kate and me. Her biggest hope in life is to hook up with a producer, director, or perhaps a rich actor. The thing with Gable didn't work out, but there are others."

Eventually, after she started dating Reagan, Tracy and Nancy drifted apart. Tracy loathed Reagan, calling him a "Red baiter always looking for a pinko in the haystack."

"Miss Nancy is laying a trap for this Reagan guy," Tracy told Cukor. "I think the two of them deserve each other. I just hope Ronnie goes in for oral sex like I do. If he does, he'll be happy as a pig in shit."

Years later in a memoir, Nancy wrote: "Spence was the most charming man I've ever known."

As for Hepburn, Nancy claimed that her friendship with the aging actress just (inexplicably) ended. "To this day, I don't understand why. I made several attempts to revive our relationship, but got nowhere."

Nancy's brief fling with Norman Krasna hardly rates a blip on the radar screen, even though it led to a proposal of marriage. He was a talented screenwriter, playwright, producer, and director, who had garnered an Oscar for writing the screenplay of Princess O'Rourke, in which Jane Wyman had a co-starring role. At the time Nancy met him, he was writing a play, John Loves Mary, which would later be released as a movie (in 1949) with Reagan.

Marriages that might have been: Producer/mogul Norman Krasna, with fresh and dewy Nancy Davis, as shown in a publicity shot from way back in 1943 from a drama production at Smith College.

Krasna was only three years older than Nancy, and, like her, he too had worked in a department store, Macy's, in Manhattan. Dropping out of law school, he'd turned to writing. When she dated him, he was in the throes of divorcing the former Ruth Frazee.

If Nancy had a selfish motive in going after him, it was to advance her career. Krasna, in collaboration with producer Jerry Wald, had signed a $50 million deal with Howard Hughes, the owner of RKO, to produce a dozen movies. Krasna promised Nancy that if she'd marry him, he'd make her the "Queen of RKO," and offer that Hughes had previously made to Ingrid Bergman, who had turned him down.

On October 13, 1949, the Hollywood columnist, Edith Gwynn, wrote: "Nancy Davis and her whole family are thinking over a proposal of marriage from Norman Krasna. He is so currazy about her that he's already popped the all-important question."

When Reagan showed up on Nancy's doorstep, two days before Christmas, she had already rejected Krasna's proposal. Reagan, as head of SAG, congratulated her on having being assigned her own dressing room at MGM, and delivered to her a gold key, compliments of the studio, that had been commissioned as a symbolic honor from Ruser Jewelers in Beverly Hills.

After being dumped by Nancy, Krasna fell into the arms of Erle Chennault Galbraith, the former wife of Al Jolson, marrying her in 1951, the union lasting until his death in 1984. When he met Nancy years later at a party, he told her, with modesty and humor, "Any man would look great in my wife's eyes after having been married to Al Jolson!"

Rumor has it that when actor comedian Milton Berle, once known as "Uncle Miltie," or "Mr. Television," first submitted his memoirs, Milton Berle, An Autobiography in 1974 to Delacorte Press, it contained a lengthy section devoted to Nancy Davis.

At that time, there was talk that Reagan might have a good chance of winning the presidency in 1976, and that Nancy might become First Lady. Either Berle's agent or his editor apparently asked him to remove the section on Nancy, which was labeled "tasteless and vulgar."

When Nancy dated Berle, he was just emerging from two marriages to actress Joyce Compton (1941-1948 and, after a divorce and remarriage, 1949-1950).

He may have dated Nancy three times. “Any more than that, and my mother figured out some way to put a stop to it,” Berle said. “She didn’t want me to get serious over just one woman. She wanted me to play the field.”

“Here I am, dancing with Marilyn Monroe, butt to butt,” Milton Berle said.

He also claimed, “I seduced a future First Lady (an obvious reference to Nancy) and a First Lady wannabee. Marilyn told me that JFK had promised to divorce Jackie and marry her, thereby making MM First Lady. God, what a story that would have been!”

On his first date with Nancy, he told her, “I am both a Jew and a Christian Scientist.”

Long before meeting Nancy, he had generated a notorious past loaded with sexual exploits. He even claimed to have seduced evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson. If true, he would be following in the footsteps of Reagan.

In addition to encounters with anonymous starlets and chorines, he often dated from the A-list. His partners had included Reagan’s girlfriend, Ann Sheridan, Lucille Ball, Linda Darnell, and Betty Hutton.

In Miami, during conversations with Darwin Porter, Veronica Lake was very graphic about her seduction by Berle: “It was at least a foot long and became at least two inches more when erect. I’d never seen anything like it, and I had once been seduced by Porfirio Rubirosa.”

Berle often boasted about it, even in public settings: “I’ve got the biggest schlong in Hollywood. I’ve got Forrest Tucker and John Ireland beat by two or three inches, maybe more.”

Standing beside him at a urinal, fellow comedian Phil Silvers quipped, “You’d better feed that thing or it’s liable to turn on you.”

The comedian’s adopted son, Bill Berle, once shopped a Mommie Dearest type memoir about his father, a tell-all inspired by Christina Crawford’s exposé of her mother, Joan Crawford. Entitled Near You, it relayed tales about his notoriously well-endowed father, calling him a “domestic tyrant, a habitual gambler, and a physically gifted ladies’ man with an aberrant sex life.” In it, he claimed that Berle, invited to a function at the White House, was overheard telling a group of men, “I fucked Nancy Davis back in the Stone Age.”

Merv Griffin in 1945, just after he began working as an announcer at KFRC Radio in San Francisco.

Merv later became one of Nancy Reagan’s best friends and a defender of her reputation “against the vile, tasteless attacks of Uncle Miltie.”

Overhearing him, Merv Griffin, one of Nancy's closest friends, approached Berle and cautioned him to "Cool it —Nancy might hear you."

Berle turned on him in fury: "Shut your cocksucking mouth, faggot." Then he grabbed his crotch, as he did so often, "or else I'll choke you with this club of mine."

Griffin turned and walked away.

Bill Berle also wrote, "I wasn't there to see my father put his 14-inch thing of his to use on Rita Hay-worth, Marilyn Monroe, even Nancy Davis, but I hoped they had a good time."

He also wrote, "In time, my father went from being the biggest celebrity in the world to a 'couldn't-get-arrested' has been."

Although a Jew who knew about prejudice, legendary broadcaster Mike Wallace, who dated Nancy, was accused at one time of being "a homophobe, a racist, and anti-Mexican."

One of Nancy's suitors was Mike Wallace, the journalist, game show host, actor, and media personality remembered chiefly today for appearing as the host of CBS's 60 Minutes, which had its debut on television in 1968. In the years that followed, he interviewed some of the most prominent people in the world.

His origins with the Davis family go back to when he was a freelance radio announcer in Chicago in the early 1940s before he enlisted in the U.S. Navy in 1943.

It is not clear when Nancy dated Wallace, perhaps after his divorce from his first wife, Norma Kaplan in 1948 and before his marriage to his second wife, Buff Cobb, in 1949.

Wallace first encountered Edith Davis in Chicago in 1941 when he was broadcasting the evening news on Chicago's WBBM, and she was performing live, on radio, as an actress. After their broadcasts, they often went to the Wrigley Building for drinks.

He became a guest at the Davis home, where he met both Loyal and Nancy. "I got to know Edith and her child," he later said. He was interviewed by author Bob Colacello. "Her child was very ladylike, a Smith girl with a Peter Pan collar and the black patent leather shoes and the white gloves and pearls. Nancy was her father's darling. Utterly unlike her mother, who could drink and be very bawdy in a funny way."

When Nancy matured into an attractive young starlet during her MGM days, Wallace recalled, "She wanted to be rich and famous, but things weren't happening fast enough for her."

Nancy reportedly found Wallace one of the most informed and intelligent men she'd ever dated. They didn't always agree, although their friendship lasted until he died, as did his loyalty to Edith and Loyal. "I'm the son of Russian Jews," Wallace said. "Loyal and Edith were called anti-Semitic, but I never saw any sign of that."

Wallace had his own prejudices, as revealed in 1967 during his documentary, CBS Reports; The Homosexuals. During the now notorious broadcast, he asserted, "The average homosexual, if there be such, is promiscuous. He is not interested or capable of a lasting relationship like that of a heterosexual marriage. His sex life, his love life, consists of a series of chance encounters at the clubs and bars he inhabits. And even on the streets of the city—the pick-up, one-night stand, and these are the characteristics of the homosexual relationship."

Reportedly, Nancy saw the broadcast, watching in horror. There were some subjects on which she was more informed and sophisticated.

By 1992, Wallace said, "Of all my broadcasts, I have come to regret that one most of all. I'm far better informed today. I was just parroting what I heard from doctors and psychiatrists. They were wrong, and I was wrong to fall for their shit. I know differently today. Gay people by the millions have long-lasting relationships and even raise loving families."

Although she continued to maintain respect for Wallace, as she did for her anti-Semitic, racist parents, he did cause her more embarrassment. During the first year of the Reagan presidency in 1981, he had to apologize for a racial slur he made against blacks and Hispanics. At a break in 60 Minutes, he was caught on tape during his delivery of a broadcast about how a bank duped low-income workers in California. He said, “You bet your ass their contracts are hard for them to read over watermelon or tacos.”

He later apologized, saying, “We Jews felt a kind of kinship with blacks, but, Lord knows, we weren’t riding the same slave ship.”

Wallace went to visit Edith and Loyal at Scottdale’s Biltmore Estates. Loyal was 84 at the time, Edith 92. A CBS-TV co-worker who was with Wallace at the time reported on how their reunion went. Loyal and Edith were standing in their doorway.

Edith called out, “Mike, how in the fuck are you?”

After exchanging greetings, she is alleged to have pulled her dress up over her head to show him her recent surgical scars. “Look what those fucking cocksuckers did to me.”

Later, she revealed that whenever a doctor was examining her, “I always grab his crotch to see what kind of man he is.”

When Nancy became First Lady, Wallace interviewed her. He ungallantly asked her to confirm her birth year—either 1921 or 1923. “Your son, Ron Junior, said it was 1921.”

“He wasn’t there,” she snapped.

“Well, which year was it?” Wallace asked again.

“I haven’t made up my mind yet,” she said.

Months later, Wallace attended a gala dinner on Martha’s Vineyard thrown by Katharine Graham of The Washington Post. He was seated between a former First Lady (Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis) and Nancy, the current First Lady. He recalled Nancy inviting her to revisit the White House.

“Jackie was very polite,” Wallace later said, “but it was obvious to me that she didn’t want to go back again.”

“I’ll think about it and get back to you,” Jackie said.

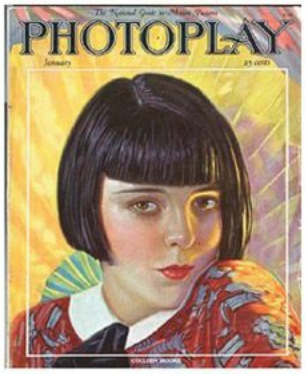
Late in 1948, before Nancy arrived in Hollywood, her actress friend, Colleen Moore, gave her a letter of introduction to a handsome young actor, Robert Stack. She’d seen him in his screen debut in 1939 when he gave Deanna Durbin, the teenage singing sensation, her first smooch on camera in First Love, a charming, Cinderella-like tale. The cinematic event made frontpage news and heralded Stack into stardom.



Millionairess Colleen Moore: Robert Stack’s matchmaker and a flapper-star from the Silent Era.

In a phone call to Stack, Nancy heard a warm, inviting voice: “Colleen is a great friend of my family. If she says you’re adorable, that’s good enough for me. Let’s go out on a date and test the waters.”

Reportedly, Nancy was “awed by Robert’s male beauty.” In 1980, when Reagan was running for President, Stack published his autobiography, Straight Shooting. He was more subdued about Nancy, calling her “attractive and well-mannered. She had this little laugh that was quite enchanting. She even had a sense of humor about herself…and everybody else. My family invited some of the Hollywood elite to their parties. Because of Nancy’s background and social graces, she glided through the parties like the most graceful swan in the room, with her hair in place and always tastefully dressed, even one night when a drunken Veronica Lake almost threw up on her.”

In 1940, Robert Stack, once known for having “the most perfect male physique in Hollywood,” shared the same bed with a future President, JFK. They were rarely alone in this bed.

Reportedly, he also got a future First Lady under the sheets, too.

Although they weren’t offensive to Nancy in any way, Stack’s editor at Macmillan reportedly chose to remove all references to Nancy. In a curt note, he (or she) wrote: “In the Davis revelations, let’s remove Nancy and stick with two other Davis names—Bette and Sammy.”

Because Nancy was viewed as such hot copy at the time, with Reagan running for President, the editor made Xerox copies of Stack’s comments, and circulated them through the Macmillan offices.

Stack’s mother had been a dazzling Hollywood socialite who had attended the 1923 wedding of Rudolph Valentino to Natasha Rambova. His father was an advertising executive who created the slogan, “The beer that made Milwaukee famous.” The family regularly entertained such celebrities as Frank Sinatra, Enzio Pinza, Edward G. Robinson, Nelson Eddy, Clark Gable, and Robert Taylor.

In the late 1930s, the seventeen-year-old Stack, with his golden blonde hair, was called an Adonis. He captivated the attention of Howard Hughes, the billionaire bisexual, studio mogul, and aviator.

Stack was always awed by power and money, but he really preferred women, and the list of his conquests is long: Elizabeth Taylor, Betty Grable, Diana Barrymore, Yvonne De Carlo, and Lana Turner, plus a treasure trove of starlets. After World War II, when Anne Frank’s attic [where she’d hidden from the Nazis] was searched, Allied soldiers found a romantic photograph of Stack among her treasured possessions.

During the summer of 1940 in his bachelor apartment in the Hollywood Hills, Stack and John F. Kennedy, newly arrived in town and seeking sexual adventures, entertained a bevy of starlets but also big name stars on occasion. “I’ve known many of the great male stars of Hollywood, including Clark Gable,” Stack said. “But none of them compared to Jack. He literally could charm the pants off a gal.”

It was through Stack that Nancy first heard of JFK. “He was the only man in Hollywood better looking than me,” he immodestly proclaimed. “All the hot tamales on the West Coast took notice. He really needed a date book. I’ve known him to have sex in the afternoon, sex at cocktail time, sex after dinner, and even a sleepover after midnight—all with a different woman.”

Stack and his socially connected parents once took over the former home of Colleen Moore, a Mediterranean style house, vintage 1928, at 345 St. Pierre Road in Bel Air. It had been built with money earned when Moore was number one at the box office during the peak of the Jazz Age in the 1920s. At one point, when he was dating Nancy, he took her there. There were pictures in the hall of the star with her Dutchboy haircut and shapeless dresses, taken when she was the personification of the flapper.

Stack told Nancy, “This is a lovely house with terrible memories—attempted murder, rape, and just about every sexual deviation in the book."

He showed her the blue-painted room which had been his bedroom. "This is the bedroom where Errol Flynn was accused of the rape of Betty Hansen. For a time," Stack told Nancy, "the police sealed off the room to ensure that no one disturbed the evidence, which they hoped would incriminate Flynn." [With the help of fabled attorney, Jerry Giesler, Flynn was eventually judged not guilty.]

Two horny bachelors, Robert Stack and a young John F. Kennedy, on the prowl in postwar Hollywood. JFK told his pal, Stack, "I've come to Hollywood on a poontang hunt."

As a couple, Stack and Nancy soon drifted apart, in spite of finding each other "congenial company."

When a group of fan clubs voted Stack as "The Sexiest Man in the World," he moved on to virtually dozens of beautiful women who were throwing themselves in his pathway.

As for Nancy, she became involved in the tormented life of actor Robert Walker and, by extension, his best friend, Peter Lawford.

One of Nancy's favorite wartime movies was Since You Went Away (1944), starring Claudette Colbert, Jennifer Jones, Joseph Cotten, and Shirley Temple. Nancy had been moved by the brief performance of Robert Walker in the film. His heartbreaking smile signaled "to all those little people sitting out there in the dark" that the character he was playing, that of a very young soldier, was inescapably doomed.

In the movie, he was earnest, lean, and likable as the boyfriend of the character played by Jennifer Jones. Ironically, although the scenes between this married-in-real-life couple were effective, their relationship was collapsing. Producer David O. Selznick had already begun his affair with Jones, and, after her divorce from Walker, he would marry her. There are those who say that Walker never recovered from his loss of his wife.

Love Lost: Then-newlyweds Jennifer Jones with Robert Walker.

While he was mourning the loss of Jennifer to Hollywood kingpin David O. Selznick, Nancy caught Walker on the rebound.

Complicating Walker's life, even though he claimed that he hated himself for doing so, he often indulged in homosexual affairs. Perhaps in a misguided attempt to wreak revenge on Jones during the filming of Since You Went Away, he had sexual liaisons with two of the handsomest young men, each in a minor role, who ever graced the movie screens of the 1940s. They were Guy Madison (making his film debut) and John Derek.

During the closing months of World War II, Walker used his quiet charm, good looks, and sincere voice to convince audiences that he really was the boy next door. He was most endearing in pictures as a young soldier at war. His main competitor for that title was another handsome actor, Tom Drake, who became Judy Garland's "boy next door" in the 1944 Meet Me in St. Louis, a role originally cast with Walker in the part.

In another instance that illustrates the extreme complications of Hollywood relationships, Walker became involved with Peter Lawford. In the throes of his affair with Lana Turner, he had taken up with Walker when not dating Drake and Reagan's estranged wife, Jane Wyman.

After filming One Touch of Venus (1948) with Ava Gardner, Walker and the Tarheel beauty had a brief fling. Lawford also had a fling with Gardner. The plot thickens. At the same time, both Walker and Lawford also began to date Nancy.

After the collapse of his marriage to Jones ("the love of my life"), Walker had entered into a disastrous marriage to Barbara Ford, the daughter of the well-known director, John Ford. Its annulment after only five weeks intensified his depression and heavy drinking.

On October 22, 1948, Walker was arrested in Los Angeles on a charge of drunken driving. A candid snapshot of him at the time of his arrest was flashed around the world, even appearing in Life magazine. In the photograph, the actor is obviously intoxicated, his suit rumpled, his right hand balled into a threatening fist, his face contorted with rage.

"I feel Bob is crying out to the world to save him," his friend, Katharine Hepburn, told Irene Mayer Selznick when she saw the photograph.

According to Irene, "Kate had a protective feeling whenever she encountered a lost soul"—Spencer Tracy was an example of that. She'd befriended Walker during the filming of The Sea of Grass (1947) when he'd played the nasty offspring of Tracy and herself. Their friendship had deepened in their next picture together, Song of Love (also 1947) when, as Johannes Brahms, Walker had pined for her.

After Walker's arrest on the drunk and disorderly charge, Dore Schary at MGM warned the actor that he had two choices—either quit films or else undergo psychiatric treatment at the Menninger Clinic in Kansas, where stars often went to "dry out."

Robert Walker (left) and Peter Lawford were each cynical, opportunistic, gossipy, and, as the years advanced, spectacularly unstable.

Both of them enjoyed the alluring charms of Ava Gardner and each got to enjoy Nancy Davis' "specialty."

Walker opted for the clinic, where he spent seven months in rehabilitation. Eager to see how he was responding to treatment, Hepburn remained in constant touch. After his return from Kansas, beginning the moment he stepped off the plane, the press mobbed him. Walker announced. "I'm able to work again—eager to live."

After his return to Hollywood, Walker began dating Nancy. Hepburn was very upset with Nancy—"First, she moves in on Spence, and now on Bob, as if he didn't have enough trouble."

Soon after his return to Los Angeles, he renewed and repeated his self-destructive habits, including the consumption of inordinate amounts of alcohol. His love life grew even more complicated, especially with men. As for women, he concentrated on Nancy.

At one point, Walker confided to his friend and sometimes lover, Merv Griffin (when he was still young trim, and handsome) that he had proposed marriage to Nancy. He later became one of Griffin's closest friends.

"Obviously, she didn't accept," Griffin said to Walker.

"She told me that over the course of a lifetime, she thought Reagan would be the better provider," Walker said.

Lawford, who by now had his own key to Walker's home, came over late one afternoon with their mutual friend, producer Joe Naar. Walker was not supposed to be there, having told Lawford he'd arrive in time for dinner.

As later relayed to Cukor, Lawford claimed that when they came into the living room, he first encountered Nancy in the nude and Walker half dressed on his sofa. "It appeared to me that they were engaged in some sort of sex act—guess what?" Lawford said. "Nancy rushed to the bathroom to get dressed. At the time, she seemed terribly embarrassed, but she recovered quickly. It wasn't long after that she began to date both Bob and me. As you know, I was already deep into my affair with Bob."

"The whole town's talking," Cukor said, "about a ménage à trois."

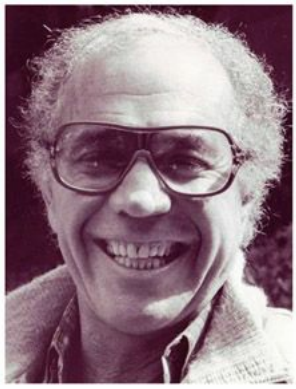
[Naar later became the best and most reliable source for information about the sexual trysts among Walker, Nancy, and Lawford. A former William Morris agent, he later produced the hit (1975-1979) TV series, Starsky and Hutch. As an agent, his clients included not only Lawford, but Steve McQueen, Ali MacGraw, Raquel Welch, and Marilyn Monroe.

At one point, Naar double-dated with Lawford and Monroe. He remembered their first date, but didn't recall the young starlet he was with at the time. "At one point, Peter urged me to switch dates, and I ended up taking Marilyn home. She became not only my temporary lover, but my lifelong friend, confidante, and client."

Naar's friendship with Lawford led to his becoming a member of Camelot's inner circles. The Kennedys accepted him, and he became known for jetting around the country with them and the likes of Frank Sinatra and Sammy Davis, Jr.

Ironically, one of Naar's most successful ventures was as a producer for the General Electric Hour, which was hosted by none other than Ronald Reagan.]

Nancy was added to the marquee names of Lawford's seductions, which included a lot of A-listers, notably June Allyson, who also seduced Reagan, as well as Lucille Ball, Anne Baxter, Noël Coward, director George Cukor ("Peter was such a lousy lay— strictly oral"), Ava Gardner, Judy Garland, Rita Hayworth ("she had bad breath"), Sal Mineo ("my all-time best"), Marilyn Monroe ("there was a problem with hygiene")' Lee Remick, Clifton Webb ("I let him do all the work"), Van Johnson and his lover, Keenan Wynn, whose divorced wife, Evie, Johnson had married, on orders from Louis B. Mayer.



Emmy Winner Joe Naar

The dean of Hollywood biographers, Lawrence J. Quirk, who knew Lawford "from way back when" asserted that he went out with women "to help dispel rumors about his relationships with men—and there were several of them. These relationships worried him; they were often a sexual release rather than a romance. When he fell in love with or entertained romantic feelings toward a man, Peter grew inescapably depressed. This side of his erotic life he found ominous, threatening, baleful, yet he needed it, too."

Author Mart Martin claimed that from his investigation, Lawford often patronized "young male extras and studio messengers."

Supposedly, Nancy was aware of Lawford's journeys into the gay world, but for her it didn't seem a problem. She had dated and even had affairs with gay men during her New York days.

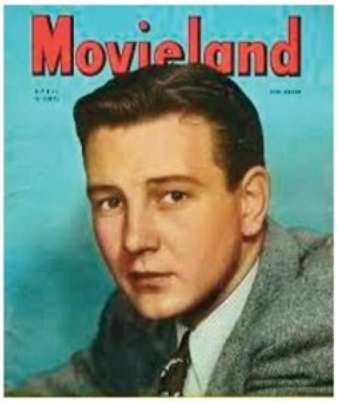
Young lovers Peter Lawford and Nancy Davis.

Whereas he married into a First Family (the Kennedys), she became the iron-gloved matriarch of a First Family of her own.

When Lawford married Patricia Kennedy, and became part of the Kennedy clan, his wife did not seem unduly concerned with his trysts in the gay world. While he was away, she was having her own flings, including one with Porfirio Rubirosa, the Dominican playboy known for his international charm; his links to the brutal Dominican dictator, Trujillo; his failed marriages to Doris Duke and Barbara Hutton; and for his stupendous sexual endowment.

Apparently, Walker had many soul-searching talks with Nancy. As he told her and so many other friends, "Even as a kid, I knew I was not meant to be born into this world. It was an accident. I've spent my life trying to escape the world, wanting to go back to the peace I knew before I entered it."

After the collapse of his Hollywood career, Drake, no longer the pretty boy at MGM, worked selling used cars in Los Angeles. In the late 1940s and early 50s, he and Lawford often slipped away to wherever Lawford had access to privacy.



Handsome Tom Drake, "the boy next door" to Judy Garland in Meet Me in St. Louis," had a lament about his years-long affair with Peter Lawford: "Imagine, I had to fight off Robert Walker, Lana Turner, Ava Gardner, and ultimately, Nancy Davis for squatter's rights to this elusive Brit."

"I'd heard stories that Peter was having a fling with both Walker and this starlet, Nancy Davis," Drake said. "I found that out during my final weekend with Peter. He showed up in Palm Springs with Walker and Nancy. Privately, he told me that she had taken turns fellating them during their transit from Los Angeles to Palm Springs.

"She worked on one of us in the back seat," Lawford said. "The other had to drive. We took turns."

"I was heartbroken that weekend," Drake said. "Peter had dumped me, and I was still madly in love with him."

In another biography appeared an account that Lawford and Walker drove all the way to Arizona with Nancy so that she could visit her parents, then living in their retirement residence. Lawford may have relayed the incident to one of his wives, but that appears not to be true. Those who knew Nancy doubted very seriously if she would show up in Arizona with not one, but two lovers.

Drake's account seems far more plausible. Of course, Lawford could have fabricated the Arizona tale as a means of masking his sexual tryst with Drake.

Alfred Hitchcock may have been type casting when he starred Walker as the smiling psychopath and repressed homosexual in Strangers on a Train (1951). It became Walker's most memorable role and one of the British director's grandest creations.

The year the picture was released, Nancy was saddened by Walker's sudden death.

On the night of August 28, 1951, Walker's housekeeper found the actor ranting, raging, and threatening violence. She summoned his psychiatrist, who examined him, then sedated him with amobarbital. The sedative, combined with the alcohol in Walker's bloodstream, caused immediate respiratory failure. He was dead at the age of thirty-two.

During the years that followed, Nancy followed Lawford's saga, especially the episodes associated with his role as brother-in-law of John F. Kennedy, based on his marriage to Patricia Kennedy. Lawford would marry three more times as he drifted into alcoholism and hired call girls, who viewed him as a "quick $50 oral sex trick," plus a series of male hustlers upon whom he performed fellatio and quickly dismissed them.

By then, Nancy was far, far away, her world orbiting around Ronald Reagan.

Her relationship with Reagan began when Mervyn LeRoy was directing Nancy in The Doctor and the Girl. She had a matter she wanted to take up personally with Reagan, who at the time was the President of the Screen Actors Guild. Nancy knew that LeRoy and Reagan were friends.

Although she had to wait for days, the call from Reagan finally came through.

The films of Nancy Davis, if they are remembered at all today, are highlighted by The Next Voice You Hear, released by MGM in 1950. Her co-star was James Whitmore, with whom she'd make another movie in 1951. Child actor Gary Gray was cast as their son. Based on a preposterous script by Charles Schnee, the movie was produced by Dore Schary and directed by William A. Wellman, popularly known in Hollywood as "Wild Bill." The plot could easily have dipped into camp were it not for the screen sincerity of Nancy and Whitmore.

The film's unlikely premise focused on the voice of a man claiming to be God. His declarations would pre-empt every radio program, worldwide, for six broadcasts over the same number of days. On Sunday, as an anxious world awaited his words, he was silent, presumably resting on the Sabbath.

Whitmore and Nancy portrayed a typical American couple with the clichéd names of Joe (played by Whitmore) and his pregnant wife Mary (Nancy). They hover beside their radio, listening to "God" broadcasting from "Heaven."

Nancy's ultimate "Mom" role: Left to right, James Whit-more, Gary Gray, and the future First Lady of the United States.

A New Englander, Wellman was the most talented of the directors who ever helmed Nancy. His 1927 silent film, Wings, was the first movie to win an Academy Award as Best Picture. He'd go on to direct A Star Is Born (1937), with Janet Gaynor and Fredric March; Nothing Sacred (also 1937) with Carole Lombard; and Beau Geste (1939) with Gary Cooper.

Before directing Nancy, he had just scored a big hit with his World War II drama, Battleground (1949). Coincidentally, that film had also starred Nancy's friend, Van Johnson, and featured Whitmore in a supporting role.

Nancy dreaded reporting to the set to face Wellman, as his reputation had preceded him. He was known as brusque and aggressive. Louise Brooks had described him as "sadistic."

He did not immediately endear himself to Nancy. "I hate all actresses," he told her. "I detest their narcissism. I prefer to direct men. Women take up so much time worrying about their hair, their makeup, their wardrobe."

"He knew I just wasn't the big-bosom, sweater girl type like Lana Turner," Nancy said. "So we got that out of the way. I couldn't have looked more drab than I did in my $12.95 maternity smock."

She was one of the first actresses to appear on screen as openly pregnant. Before that, actresses tried to conceal their pregnancy, as if it were something vulgar, an embarrassing condition not to be flaunted before audiences. But Wellman wanted realism in Nancy's character, insisting that she wear no makeup and not to benefit from the ministrations of a hairdresser. When MGM commissioned Hollywood's leading hairdresser, Sydney Guilaroff, to style Nancy's hair, Wellman chased him off the set.

An affable, plain-looking actor from New York, Whitmore, with Nancy, closely resembled a typical middle-class American couple. He had recently appeared with Marilyn Monroe in The Asphalt Jungle (1950). Monroe was just emerging as a screen siren. Whitmore would later appear with Reagan's first wife, Jane Wyman, in one of the episodes on her Jane Wyman Presents the Fireside Theatre.

Whitmore had been a dedicated student at the Actors Studio in New York, and when he moved to Los Angeles, he opened his own acting workshop. One of his new pupils was James Dean. One hot afternoon, the young actor, sloppily dressed, showed up on the set of The Next Voice You Hear. When later queried, Nancy reportedly claimed she did not remember meeting Dean, who would later threaten a character portrayed by Reagan with a gun in one of the episodes on his General Electric Theater.

In front of Nancy and Wellman, Dean said, in reference to Whitmore, "I owe a lot to Jimmy here. He has much to teach an actor. So far, he's the only person I've met in Hollywood who hasn't demanded to suck my cock in return for a favor."

Working with Wellman did not turn out to be the ordeal for Nancy that she had feared—in fact, they became friends. She recalled, "The tiger turned out to be a pussycat."

When it was completed, MGM sent Nancy to New York to promote The Next Voice You Hear. She recalled "my greatest thrill" involved standing in front of the Radio City Music Hall's grand marquee, where for the first time, she saw her name, NANCY DAVIS, posted in big letters. She remembered standing for an entire hour looking up at the marquee.

At the film's premiere on September 12, 1950, she was escorted by her new beau, Ronald Reagan, whom she had already begun to date. [More about that later…] The occasion marked the first time the couple had ever been photographed together.

Regrettably, Radio City Music Hall was not the proper venue for a message picture from Dore Schary. Movie fans were used to coming to the grand showcase for spectacles and later, to see the Rockettes performing their stunning precision dance numbers.

The New Yorker pounced on the film, attacking it as a "meandering, maudlin affair." The New York Times, however, cited Nancy's role as "a cheerful and considerate pregnant wife."

In Los Angeles, her friend, Spencer Tracy, went to see the movie. To Katharine Hepburn, George Cukor, and others, he said, "Nancy projected the passion of Good Humor ice cream—frozen, on a stick, and vanilla."

In spite of its controversial subject and nation-wide reviews, the film failed at the box office, losing $65,000 for MGM.

But what did Nancy's newest boyfriend think of The Next Voice You Hear? After its premiere, Reagan invited Nancy to dinner and gave her some advice. "Send that wardrobe you wore in the picture to the cleaners and then lose the claim check."

What for Nancy began as a romantic evening ended on a sour note. He told her, "I'm still in love with Jane, even though she's divorced me. I still think we'll get back together one day. I plan to grow old with her."

Before being cast in The Next Voice You Hear, Nancy had made two screen tests, hoping to play the female leads in two films, each scheduled for release in 1950.

She first wanted to appear as the wife of Cary Grant in Crisis. In it, he played a renowned brain surgeon vacationing in South America with his wife, a role Nancy coveted. The surgeon becomes inadvertently embroiled in a revolution when the country's dictator, played by Oscar-winning José Ferrer, urgently needs life-saving brain surgery. The dictator demands that it be performed, by the American doctor, with utmost secrecy.

Dore Schary screened Nancy's test, later defining it as "The worst screen test in the history of motion pictures." He told aides, "Nancy will be perfect playing the simple plain housewife to a bloke like James Whitmore. But for Cary Grant's wife, let's cast Paula Raymond. She's a hell of a lot sexier than Nancy."

[Since Grant took no part in denying the role to Nancy, she did not hold a grudge against him. In fact, in 1981, as First Lady, five weeks after the attempted assassination of Reagan, she invited Grant to a gala event at the White House in honor of the U.K.'s Prince Charles.

For that event, she selected what she called "a fun group," consisting not only of Grant, but Audrey Hepburn, right-winger William F. Buckley, her close friends Alfred and Betsy Bloomingdale, and fashion doyenne Diana Vreeland.

The evening erupted into a media controversy when Nancy was photographed curtseying before Prince Charles. It set off a firestorm, one newspaper claiming, "No First Lady should be caught bowing her knees in front of royalty. Actually, in her current role, Nancy Reagan has far more power than Prince Charles."]

The next role Nancy sought and appeared in a screen test for was the part of the wife of Chief Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. A friend of the Davis family, Louis Calhern, had already been cast as the justice in The Magnificent Yankee (1950). He would win an Oscar nomination for his role, which required him to age from 61 to 90 during the course of the film.

"I knew the part was a difficult one for me, too," Nancy said. "I, too, had to age considerably for the role."

Once again, studio personnel evaluated her as "totally unsuited to play the wife," the part going to Ann Harding, who had both the talent and the presence to pull off the demanding role.

Nancy learned later that this time around, Schary had endorsed her for the role, as had Ardie Deutsch, the film's producer. However, when John Sturges was assigned to direct The Magnificent Yankee, he sat through Nancy's test, which seemed to infuriate him. He wrote a memo to Schary, claiming that Nancy was "WRONG! WRONG! WRONG!" for the part.

At one point, in Chicago, he had performed surgery on the ailing actor. In the middle of the procedure, as he lay on the operating table, Calhern's heart stopped. Desperately, Davis massaged his heart and resuscitated his breathing. Although he revealed details of the incident to both Edith and Nancy, the doctor chose never to tell his most famous patient.]

After the failure of The Next Voice You Hear, and her "bombing" in two separate screen tests, Nancy's future as a movie star looked dim. A whole roster of new stars was on the horizon, dozens of whom were far more talented and beautiful than she was. She would limp through only a few more pictures before fading into oblivion, only to evolve decades later into one of the most powerful behind-the-scenes women of the 20th Century.

She claimed that her next movie, Night Into Morning (1951), was her favorite film, in spite of the similarity of its title to Night Unto Night, a film made in 1949 by Reagan. She was hoping that her latest film would salvage her dimly flickering career. Her fantasy was that by starring with Ray Milland, it would lead to a breakthrough equivalent to that of Jane Wyman when she co-starred with him in The Lost Weekend (1945). That film had propelled Wyman into an A-list career and had brought Milland an Oscar for his portrayal of a tormented alcoholic.

Milland expressed his hope that with his appearance once again as an alcoholic, he would score another triumph, this time as a college professor who becomes a drunk and a possible suicide after his wife and ten-year-old son are burned to death in a freak fire.

A Canadian, Fletcher Markle (the director), would praise Nancy's performance. "If only the critics had taken notice," he said. "She is a gifted actress, although typecast as a nice, steadfast war widow. In her one big scene, where she tries to prevent Milland from committing suicide by jumping out of a hotel window, she was superb. She had one page of dialogue, and she pulled off this difficult scene in just one shot. After that, I called her 'One Take Nancy.'"

Lightning did not strike twice. Ray Milland (left), shown above with Nancy and John Hodiak, had immortalized himself opposite Jane Wyman by playing an alcoholic in The Lost Weekend.

Six years later, now cast with Nancy Davis as his leading lady, he hoped for his second Oscar. Alas, his performance, and the picture, failed.

In the film, John Hodiak played an academic, a junior colleague of Milland's at his college. Engaged to be married to the widowed character played by Nancy, he becomes jealous of the attention she pays to Mil-land.

Nancy would recall, "This was one of the few times I played a fiancée and not a wife."

Markle had emigrated to the land of sunshine and palm trees from the cold winds of Winnipeg, Manitoba. He was multi-talented: Actor, screenwriter, TV producer, and director. He had contributed to the screenplay of Orson Welles' The Lady from Shanghai (1947), starring Rita Hayworth as a blonde.

McCambridge on the verge of shooting Joan Crawford in Johnny Guitar.

One day Markle's lover, Mercedes McCambridge, appeared on the set. Having divorced his first wife, the former Helen Blanche Willis, in 1949, Markle was rushing into a marriage to McCambridge. She met Nancy, later asking Markle, "Where did you find that little mouse?"

In November of 1950, McCambridge triumphed over Nancy when she was designated as number four in Photoplay's Choose Your Stars contest. In spite of her sagging career, Nancy came in fifth. McCambridge seemed delighted that fans favored her over Nancy. Topping both of them was starlet Piper Laurie, who had just had a fling with Reagan, as she later confessed in her autobiography.

Nancy, emoting with John Hodiak in Night Into Morning.

Born in Wales, Milland, to Nancy, at least, seemed rather cynical, having appeared on the screen since 1929. She suspected that he might have interpreted a co-performance with her as a comedown. During his long career, he would star opposite Gene Tierney, Lana Turner, Marlene Dietrich, Ginger Rogers, Loretta Young, and Veronica Lake, sometimes seducing his leading ladies, as he did with Jane Wyman in The Lost Weekend and later as the murder-plotting husband in Dial M for Murder (1954), co-starring Grace Kelly, with whom he fell in love. That threatened one of the most enduring marriages in Hollywood, that of Milland to the former Muriel Weber.

He told Nancy, "From now on, acting to me is just taking home a paycheck. I think it's downhill for me from now on."

Nancy with John Hodiak: Is he barring her entrance? Or signaling that it's OK to enter?

John Hodiak, involved at the time in a disintegrating marriage to Anne Baxter, laughed as rarely as Greta Garbo. In one scene within Night Into Morning, Nancy was called upon to make this stoic Ukrainian laugh. In take after take, his laugh—to the director, at least— sounded fake. The scene took place when they were mounting a flight of stairs. During Nancy's final take, she spontaneously whispered, "belly button," in response to which Hodiak laughed uproariously. His cackles met with the director's approval.

Nancy's friend, Jean Hagen, was also in the picture. She and Nancy bonded more than ever and had lunch together. Hagen had seduced Ralph Meeker during the filming of their previous picture, and now she turned her seductive charms onto Hodiak. She later told Nancy, "Getting fucked by Johnny is like getting plowed with a beer bottle."

While making the film, Hodiak seemed very depressed. Not only was his marriage failing, but the year before, he had been voted "box office poison" by movie exhibitors across the country.

[At the age of 41, Hodiak would suffer a fatal heart attack in his bathroom and die.]

That curmudgeon of The New York Times, Bosley Crowther, attacked Night Into Morning, appraising it as "a morbid swirl of sentiment and self-pity" Variety, however, cited Nancy's performance as showing "warmth and understanding."

Nancy made only a brief appearance with Fredric March in the 1952 It's a Big Country, Dore Schary's flag-waving salute to America. An all-star cast, a glittering roster, was assembled by MGM, including personalities already familiar to Nancy—Ethel Barrymore, Gary Cooper, Van Johnson, Gene Kelly, Janet Leigh, Marjorie Main, George Murphy, Lewis Stone, and James Whitmore. An anthology of vignettes, it depicted scenes from American lives. It was directed by a committee whose members included Richard Thorpe, Charles Vidor, Don Weiss, Clarence Brown, John Sturges, and William A. Wellman.

In Nancy's segment, "Four Eyes," she plays a schoolteacher who becomes aware that one of her pupils cannot see very well. She tries to persuade his father (March), improbably cast as an Italian immigrant, to purchase of pair of eyeglasses for the boy— hence the title, "Four Eyes." She meets passionate resistance from a father who thinks it's unmanly for his son to wear glasses. She triumphs in the end. She later said, "I wish my segment with March could have been a whole picture. I'm sure I could have learned a lot from him."

At first, Nancy had been leery of working with March because of the reputation that had preceded him. He had already seduced many of his costars, including Tallulah Bankhead, Clara Bow, Olivia de Havilland, Ann Harding, and Miriam Hopkins. He was notorious as "the most lecherous fanny-grabber in Hollywood."

Back when she was still speaking to Nancy, Katharine Hepburn told of her experience with March when he'd been cast opposite her as her tartan-wearing lover, the Earl of Bothwell, in Mary of Scotland (1936). Knowing that he was going to glide his hand up her 16th-century costume, she was prepared for him. "When he came to my dressing room, I had taken the largest banana in my fruit bowl and put it into my bloomers. When his hand went up my dress, he discovered a very large phallic object and retreated. Case closed."

A much older and not-so-horny March encountered Nancy when they worked together in 1952. “He treated me like a lady and was a perfect gentleman in every way.”

In spite of Schary’s high expectations for It’s a Big Country, audiences stayed away in droves. Ultimately, it lost $677,000 for MGM.

Despite Nancy’s praise for March, most critics found his performance as a Papa Italiano hammy, a caricature. Bosley Crowther of The New York Times thought it a role that J. Carroll Naish might have pulled off. In his autobiography, Schary never even mentioned his once pet project. Nancy also cut mention of it when she penned her second memoir.

It seemed that both MGM and its stars wanted to forget the film as a fiscally disastrous embarrassment.

For some strange reason, Nancy, in her memoirs, remembered appearing in The Frogmen, co-starring Gary Merrill.

Although Merrill had indeed been in the movie, Nancy had not. The film’s two major stars were Richard Widmark (left) and Dana Andrews.

In neither the script nor the final footage, not a single female was waiting for them after their succesful demolition of underwater obstacles for the U.S. Navy in the Sea of Japan during World War II.

In her first memoir, Nancy, she made an astonishing claim: “I also did Rescue at Sea, which may have appeared as The Frogmen in 1955, if it came out at all. I played opposite Gary Merrill, and it’s another picture I’d just as soon forget. Every performer has a few of these in the closet.”

Everybody is entitled to a lapse of memory, but it’s surprising that Nancy didn’t compose her memoirs with a scrapbook of newspaper clippings and memorabilia about her movies on her desk. It’s true that she appeared in a movie originally entitled Rescue at Sea, but its title was later changed—that particular film was never called The Frog-men.

There was a movie released n 1951 called The Frogmen, and it did star Gary Merrill (at the time, Mr. Bette Davis) in third billing. The two big-name stars involved with the project were Richard Widmark and Dana Andrews, but no women ever appeared in The Frogmen. It was the story of the U.S. Navy’s Underwater Demolition teams battling the Japanese Army and Naval forces in the Sea of Japan during World War II.

Why would Nancy connect herself with this all-male underwater adventure film? The mystery may have been solved when director Henry Hathaway was tracked down. He had been the original director of The Frogmen, and a major director in Golden Age Hollywood, helming such stars as Clara Bow, Gary Cooper, Marlene Dietrich, and Nancy’s friend, Walter Huston. Its original script had called for some women’s roles, the type who waited on the shore for their lovers to return from the dangers of The Deep.

“I vaguely remember—and I could be wrong about this—but I think I called Nancy in for a reading for one of the female roles,” Hathaway said. “Instead of Merrill, Richard Conte was to have been her leading man. Later, both Conte and I dropped out, and the script was rewritten with no roles for women at all.”

Lloyd Bacon was called in to direct The Frogmen. He had helmed Reagan in Knute Rockne—All American (1940).

Even though she wasn’t in it, Nancy said she was ashamed of The Frogmen. She need not have been. It was the first A-list movie to depict SCUBA diving and clandestine underwater demolition activities during wartime, and it became a big cultural hit. Many young men cited this movie as their inspiration for becoming Navy SEALS.

Often missing from the list of Nancy’s movies was the 1952 release of Shadow in the Sky, a financial disaster that cost MGM $644,000, in spite of its relatively low production costs. Her co-stars were James Whitmore, her close friend Jean Hagen, and a self-styled “sex bomb” and bad boy, Ralph Meeker.

A decision was made by the studio to sell Shadow in the Sky as a sexy movie. Publicity did not think Nancy, or even Jean Hagen, should be the focus of the ad. Instead, it was decided that Ralph Meeker, clad in skinny bathing attire, would attract a wider audience.

The film was directed by Fred M. Wilcox, a Virginian better known for his two dog movies, Lassie Come Home (1943), and Courage of Lassie (1946). He’d also had a hit directing Margaret O’Brien in The Secret Garden (1949).

Nancy’s work with him went smoothly for both of them.

Its plot centers around Burt (Meeker), who is in a mental institution after having undergone traumatic experiences while serving as a Marine in the South Pacific during World War II. His girlfriend, Stella, is played by Hagen. Wilcox couldn’t help but see that Hagen was Meeker’s girlfriend offscreen as well. “She was seen coming and going from Meeker’s dressing room” he recalled.

Nancy was cast as Betty, Burt’s sister, married to Lou (Whitmore). The suspense of the movie, if it could be called that, derives from whether Burt, as a mentally wounded warrior, can be stabilized enough to return to a normal life outside the asylum.

Ralph Meeker might have added Nancy to his impressive roster of A-list seductions.

Actually, he spent more time applying his “magnificent woman-killing weapon” (as he immodestly described it) to Jean Hagen.

Whitmore often lunched with Nancy and she came to consider him “a good family man.” Before he divorced his wife, the former Nancy Mygatt, in 1971, the couple had three sons. After that, he married three more times. His final marriage, launched when he was a senior citizen, lasted until his death in 2009.

Nancy seemed to have no memory of making that movie, devoting only sixteen lines to it in her memoirs, Nancy. Maybe she blanked it out because while working on the film, she received very distressing news.

She learned that Reagan had proposed marriage to actress Christine Larson, and he was said to be deeply in love with the beautiful starlet.

“Lightning struck twice for Nancy,” Wilcox later said. “While filming our movie, she learned that Metro didn’t plan to renew her contract.”

Although Meeker was unmarried at the time, he was out of the running because of his affair with Hagen,” Wilcox said. “At any rate, he’d soon be off to Broadway to star in William Inge’s Picnic, where he was said to have taught his understudy, Paul Newman, ‘Who’s the Man,’ if you get my drift.”

Talk About a Stranger (1952) was Nancy's last film for MGM, which, as she had predicted, soon after dropped her from its roster of contract players. That was hardly surprising. Faced with the loss of revenue as audiences stayed home to watch TV, the once-fabled studio was releasing hordes of its stars and staff. The Golden Age of Hollywood had come to a whimpering end. Once big name stars like Bette Davis were advertising for jobs.

After George Murphy (right), one of Reagan's closest friends, co-starred with Nancy in Talk About a Stranger, he gave Reagan some advice: "Dump Nancy, and marry Doris Day."

The star of Talk About a Stranger was George Murphy, who called himself Reagan's best friend, an honor also claimed by both Robert Taylor and William Holden.

Playing the son of Nancy and Murphy was the rumor-spreading child actor, Billy Gray. The Vienna-born actor, Kurt Kasznar, one of Hollywood's closeted gays, was cast as the mysterious stranger.

Directed by David Bradley, Talk About a Stranger tells the story of Bud Fontaine, Jr. (as interpreted by Gray), who suspects a strange new neighbor (Kasznar) of poisoning his dog. The boy launches a smear campaign and spreads vicious rumors about the man, which turn out to be based on false impressions. In time, Bud comes to realize that people are not always what they appear to be, learning one of life's lessons, but not before he endangers crops in the valley by his vandalism of the neighbor's oil tank. Murphy and Nancy cope as best they can with their irrepressible son.

Bradley seemed an odd choice as a director. He was an actor, a collector of vintage films, and a university lecturer. At the Art Institute of Chicago, he'd cast a 17-year-old wannabee actor, Charlton Heston, in his feature length 16mm version of Peer Gynt.

In 1963, he would direct Madmen of Mandoras, a short feature film that was expanded, in 1969, into the notorious made-for-television movie, They Saved Hitler's Brain, a scifi romp that some critics define as one of the most absurdly campy (but un-funny) films ever made.

Evil neighbors who turn out to be benign and innocent: gay actor Kurt Kasznar.

Producer Richard Goldstone shared his memories of working with Nancy: "At MGM, she was on her way out the door, yet at the commissary she was table-hopping, talking to all the big names, sitting at one point with Clark Gable before hopping over to share a drink with Spencer Tracy and to give him a big kiss. I had never seen a starlet dare do that before."

All that Nancy remembered about Gray was that he had a fascination with motorcycles. The year she'd met him, he had appeared as the boy version of the Native American athlete and protagonist of Jim Thorpe—All American. Burt Lancaster had been cast as the adult version of Jim Thorpe. Later that year (1951), Gray would make a science fiction film, The Day the Earth Stood Still, starring Michael Rennie and Patricia Neal, a future girlfriend of Reagan's.

Talk About a Stranger: George Murphy, Billy Gray (center) and again, another "worried mother" role for Nancy.

Gray went on to achieve fame in the long-running (1954-1960) TV series, Father Knows Best. He later denounced the plots and characters of this sitcom as "totally false," blaming the series for "a lot of problems between men and women today."

Talk About a Stranger was advertised as a film that would send "chills down your spine." It did not. Nancy was later reported to have said, "George and I both agreed: Talk About a Stranger was MGM's way of giving us the pink slip."

Murphy himself later quipped: "Every year since then, around Christmastime, I have promised Nancy that I would get a print and run it—but thus far, she has been spared that pleasure. I do hope that the Democrats don't get hold of the film and run it on The Late, Late Show during my 1970 campaign for the Senate. It might be more than I could overcome."

Murphy also wrote, "Nancy met Ronnie about the time we were making Talk About a Stranger. He had succeeded me as President of the Screen Actors Guild and in that capacity, Nancy paid him a visit. She was repeatedly being embarrassed by the fact that the name 'Nancy Davis' kept popping up on Communist Front lists, and she was receiving invitations to attend radical meetings. That was difficult to bear, since Nancy was decidedly anti-communist. At director Mervyn LeRoy's suggestion, she sought out Reagan for his counsel. He not only straightened out the matter, but a year later, he married the girl."

What Murphy did not put into his memoir was a final line, "against my wishes."

After her sagas at MGM, Nancy wanted to bow out of films, particularly after her marriage to Reagan in 1952, but "I had some bills to pay, so I hung in there a little longer. I made Donovan's Brain (1953), a low-budget sci-fi picture, but it was not a class act."

Based on a novel by Curt Siodmak, it was released by United Artists in 1953. The screenplay was both written and directed by Felix E. Feist, an MGM executive who had directed both Deanna Durbin and her younger rival, Judy Garland, in Every Sunday (1936).

Nancy recalled that Donovan's Brain "was silly but popular, and must have been particularly amusing to my father." [She was referring to her stepfather, Dr. Loyal Davis.]

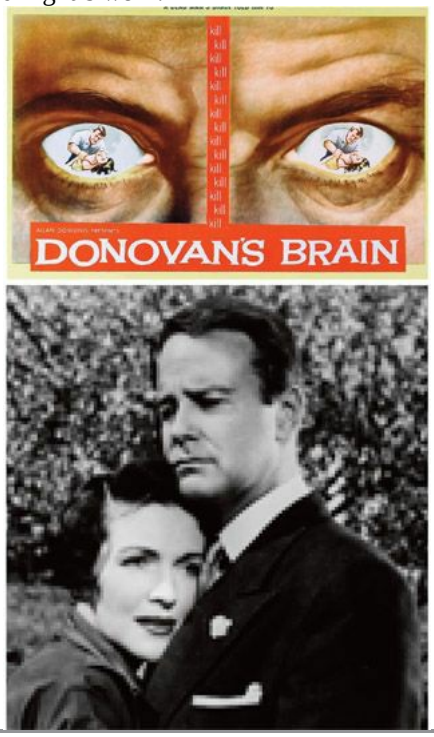
She recalled the first morning she reported to work, driving at 4:30am through the deserted streets of Beverly Hills one wintry, pre-dawn day. Suddenly, the flashing dome lights of a police squad car signaled for her to pull over. Two officers were suddenly flanking her car. One of them demanded her license, the other searched the back seat with his flashlight. They demanded answers: "Where are you going? Where have you come from? How much money do you have in your purse?"

That night, after she returned home from the studio, she told Reagan what had happened to her. He laughed at her encounter. "Honey, the cops saw a good-looking woman driving a convertible at that time of the morning. They thought you were returning from a hard night's work."



For Ayres, it was a humiliating come-down. For Nancy, it was a final (doomed) opportunity for stardom:

"What kind of work?" she asked.

"Those cops thought you were a prostitute."

Nancy's co-star in Donovan's Brain was Lew Ayres, who by now had descended to the nadir of his career. He was no longer the beautiful young German soldier depicted in the classic All Quiet on the Western Front (1930).

Ironically, he had starred with Jane Wyman in her Oscar-winning portrayal in Johnny Belinda (1948). When she had divorced Reagan, it was with the belief that Ayres would marry her. He had dumped her instead.

Donovan's Brain, like The Next Voice You Hear, is regarded today as high camp. When Nancy was First Lady, it was sometimes shown at midnight. Audiences, nearly always composed of young people, would "hoot and holler" at the screen.

Its plot spins around an attempt by Dr. Patrick Cory (as played by Ayres) to keep alive the brain of a multi-millionaire megalomaniac, "the man you love to hate," W.H. Donovan. He had gone down in a fatal plane crash, and his body had been removed temporarily for safekeeping to the nearby home of Dr. Cory. Cory, surgically and illegally, removes his brain and attempts to keep it alive. His long-suffering wife, Janice, is played by Nancy. The brain eventually takes possession of Cory and transforms him into an evil blackmailer.

In her memoirs, Nancy recalled her upcoming film, Hellcats of the Navy (1956), as her final film and the only one in which she ever co-starred with Reagan. By the time of its production, they had been married for four years.

She was wrong. She made one more film after Hellcats of the Navy.

Her last film, Crash Landing (1958), was made for Columbia. It was the one that Nancy had confused with The Frogmen. Originally, Crash Landing was entitled Rescue at Sea. [Nancy had recalled it as the original title of The Frogmen.]

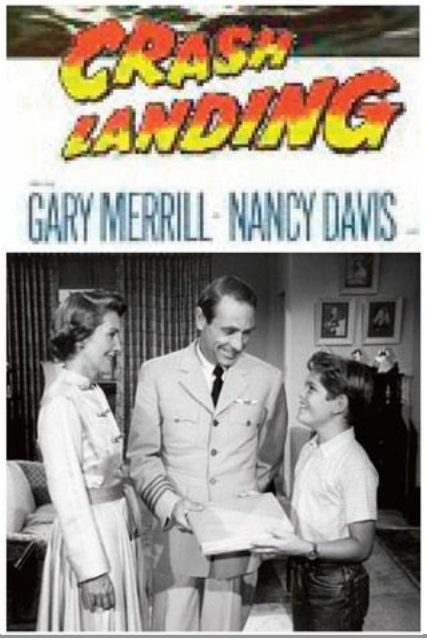
She had remembered Gary Merrill as her co-star in The Frogmen. Actually, he became her co-star in Rescue at Sea, whose title was eventually altered to the more dramatic Crash Landing.

The 76-minute film was one of the first major aerial disaster films. Nancy was cast as Merrill's devoted wife. He plays a pilot crossing the Atlantic with a plane full of passengers. Midway across the ocean, he is forced to make an emergency landing. Fortunately, a U.S. Navy vessel is nearby to rescue the crash victims.



For Nancy, it was another "Home and Hearth, Postwar U.S. Mom" role, an image that would serve her well during her husband's later campaigns. She's shown here in Crash Landing with her man in uniform (Gary Merrill) and their onscreen son, Kim Charney.

The film was a forerunner of Airport (1970), the hit movie that starred Burt Lancaster and Dean Martin, bringing a Best Supporting Actress Oscar to Nancy's friend, veteran Helen Hayes, cast as a stowaway.

As in all subsequent aerial disaster films, Crash Landing focused on a diverse group of passengers making true confessions as they prepare to die. The film was created by Fred Freiberger (aka Charles Woodgrove), the future producer of the third season (1968-69) of Star Trek.

Merrill spent most of his time complaining about his marriage to Bette Davis, which at the time was on the rocks.

Nancy met the second female lead, Irene Harvey, sizing her up as competition, as she frequently did. Harvey had made her screen debut in The Stanger's Return in 1933, starring Lionel Barrymore. After divorcing her first husband, William Fenderson, she had fallen in love with matinée heartthrob Robert Taylor, who had broken from Thelma Ryan after taking her virginity. Thelma later became First Lady, Patricia Nixon.

Taylor moved on to the bisexual aviator, Howard Hughes, and Errol Flynn, even Greta Garbo, before settling in to marry Barbara Stanwyck. ("Her balls are bigger than mine," he'd told Reagan).

The fourth lead was played by Roger Smith, a handsome, debonair leading man from California. His greatest film exposure was yet to come, when he'd play Patrick Dennis, the nephew of Auntie Mame (1958), starring Rosalind Russell in her classic, lighthearted hit.

He would go on "to do what a million other men only dreamed about," and that was marrying sexpot Ann-Margret in 1967. He became not only her husband, but her manager.

Fred F. Sears, a Bostonian, directed Nancy's final film. He was about the same age as Reagan and had made the Durango Kid series of westerns, starring Charles Starrett. At the time he helmed Nancy, he was known as a quickie director, always bringing a picture in way before deadline. He was also called "the fast buck director," turning out juvenile crime films, action thrillers, rock musicals, and sci-fi "epics."

He would later become notorious for making one of the worst movies of all time, The Giant Claw (1957), "a clunky mishmash of hideous special effects. The giant claw turns out to be a spectacularly inept marionette that looks like a mutant turkey and sounds like a crow choking to death," in the words of one critic.

Merrill, boorish and frequently drunk, was a man with a personal and onscreen past. Here he is with Bette Davis, in mink, during filming of All About Eve.

Nancy, whose screen image was to an increasing degree that of the kind of girl an American ex-GI would want to marry, simply didn't project an onscreen image with as much fun or drama.

Most movies seem to have some kind of sexual relations going on between and among the cast and crew. But, from all reports, Crash Landing was rather pristine. There was an attempt at sex on the part of a drunken Merrill. He sent a messenger to Nancy's dressing room, requesting her to come to his trailer to go over some scenes with her.

He later said, "I'd heard from my buddies that she gave great head. That was her reputation in Hollywood. I knew she was married, but I hoped she still played around. I was married to Bette, but I let the bitch know she didn't own my dick. Bette used to go down on Howard Hughes, and I wanted to see how my wife, as a cock-sucker, stacked up against Reagan's wife. I stood jaybird naked in my trailer waiting about twenty minutes for Nancy. She didn't show up."

When it came to sex talk, the gutsy New Englander, with his dour demeanor and dark brow, wasn't known for his subtlety.

During her involvement in those many B-pictures, Nancy had had only one role in mind, and that was to become the wife of a successful and presentable man. At the time, it was inconceivable that such a role would morph her one of the world's most famous women.

She once said, "I was following in some big, big footsteps—Martha Washington, Dolley Madison. For great humanitarian achievement, there was no lady who ever came close to Eleanor Roosevelt. For style, Jackie Kennedy won all honors. But in movie terms, my role of First Lady would be like remaking Gone With the Wind and casting me in the Vivien Leigh role of Scarlett O'Hara."

Chapter Eleven

Jane Wins an Oscar—At Last, Big-time Stardom for the Hey-Hey Girl

"Jane Deserves a Fling...and I Intend to Let Her Have It." —Ronald Reagan

"I'm In Love with Lew Ayres—and He Wants to Marry Me."

The Weekend Wasn't Entirely Lost.

Her road to stardom began with scenes like this from Lost Weekend, where glam Jane, accessorized with (now endangered) Somalian leopardskin, emotes with an alcohol-blocked novelist, as played by Ray Milland.

Can a Girl Really Have It All?

With Johnny Belinda came stardom and a wrenching emotional resonance with a former army chaplain bruised from the horrors of active duty on the blood-soaked Pacific front. Here, plain Jane as the reclusive deaf-mute, Belinda, with one of her true loves, Lew Ayres.

Throughout the war years, Joan Blondell and Paulette Goddard had remained Jane's steadfast confidantes. Alexis Smith was a newer friend, and also devoted to Jane, just as her new husband, Craig Stevens, seemed to hang on Reagan's every utterance.

One morning, Jane, in tears, called Goddard. "Ronnie and I had a big fight last night, and he stormed out of the house. The fan magazines still call us ‘The Constant Honeymooners,’ but nothing could be farther from the truth. We’re at odds over something all the time.”

Like many couples trying to pick up their threads of marital bliss in the aftermath of the many changes brought on by WW2, Reagan and his then-wife present an illusion of compatibility at the California State Military Guard Ball of 1945.

Their latest conflict involved Reagan’s desire to have another child. A very precocious four-year-old Maureen was virtually demanding a little brother as a playmate.

“Unless Billy Wilder has misled me, The Lost Weekend will be my breakthrough role,” Jane said. “As you know, I’ve waited fifteen years for something like this. I don’t want to fuck it up now, get pregnant, and let my career fade away.”

“Tell that fucker of yours that if he wants a baby, adopt one,” Goddard advised.

“I might do just that,” Jane said. “Maybe tonight, if he ever stops talking about politics and the menace of communism, and reverts to his demand that we have a child, I’ll bring up the adoption idea. As for dirty diapers, the nanny can change them.”

Expensive Accessories for an A-list Celebrity: Satin and very good mink...What else would a movie star wear?

Jane arrives at the premiere of Johnny Belinda, the film that would eventually win her an Oscar.

“You’re in luck working with Ray as your leading man,” Goddard said. “I seduced him on the set of Reap the Wild Wind (1942). He was ten times better than our co-star, Johnny boy [a reference to John Wayne]. Ray and I have just filmed Kitty (1945). It’s a sort of Eliza Doolittle costume drama set in the 1780s. I’m this guttersnipe walking the sidewalks of London. Ray discovers me, coaches me, and turns me into a duchess.”

"Sounds like fun," Jane said.

"On the set, we resumed our affair, and he's hotter and better looking than ever," Goddard said. "He's the best kisser in Hollywood. Ever notice those luscious lips of his? His Welsh dick is in good working order, and he never pulls out until a woman is completely satisfied."

"What about his wife?" Jane asked. She was referring to the former Muriel Weber, whom Milland had wed back in 1932.

"Every girl deserves the chance to spend one night of her life with Gregory Peck." —Jane Wyman

Ray Milland was filled with emotional intensity when he filmed this scene with Jane Wyman in The Lost Weekend.

"It wasn't the script," he later said. "It was my anger at that bitch, Hedda Hopper. When I refused to go on her Hedda Hopper Show, she called me 'a limey son-of-a-bitch, the worst kind of ingrate.' She also threatened to spread the word about what she called 'My true sexual proclivities.'"

"Oh, her!" Goddard said, contemptuously. "She's that long-suffering dishrag who knows Milland seduces his leading ladies like your Ronnie used to. But Ray told me he long ago became bored pumping the same old piece night after night."

"How you talk, gal," Jane said. "I wish Ronnie wasn't such a gentleman, and could get lowdown and dirty once in a while. Put some steam into our sex life. Are you through with Ray for the moment? Can I move in?"

"Full speed ahead," Goddard said. "That fucking husband of mine [Burgess Meredith] is so horny, he demands it once or twice a day. I've got plenty of action on the side, even with Clark Gable, now that he's no longer in the service. I think you told me you've had him, too. He's nothing to write home to mother about. But I'll soon be making another 18th-century costume drama, this time with that divine Gary Cooper. [Her reference was to The Unconquered (1947).] Coop and I shacked up together when we made Northwest Mounted Police (1940). Yes, he indeed deserves his nickname, 'The Montana Mule.'"

"I'm still young and life has got to offer more than Ronnie and babies," Jane said. I've still got Dennis [Morgan] and thank God for that. I call him always reliable and dependable. My nickname for him is EverReady."

"Say no more, doll," Goddard said.

"I still long for John Payne," Jane said.

"Honey, a sexual thrill like him comes to a girl only once in a lifetime, if that. But get over it. Ever onward. Maybe one day you'll make a movie with David Niven. I've had him. Ever had a dick that's six inches thick? Try it. You'll like it."

"Before I ring off," Jane said, "I've been dying to ask you a question. Why in hell did you ever marry a guy like Burgess Meredith?"

"Darling, I've always wanted to ask you a big question," Goddard said. "What in fuck were you thinking when you married Ronald Reagan?"

Jane received a phone call from Billy Wilder. “The Breen office is fighting every aspect of The Lost Weekend project. Fucking bluenoses. But Warner, the son of a bitch, said we’ll make the film anyway. Report Monday morning to wardrobe.”

That Monday, Jane stopped at Warners to retrieve some possessions from her dressing room before driving over to Paramount.

By coincidence, she encountered Jack Warner, who still called her “Little Janie.” He had given the OK to lend her to Paramount. “So, you’re off to make that drunk movie. Don’t get your hopes up, gal. I’m an old showman. I always believed that drunks on film should be for comic relief. Depicting an alcoholic as a serious character will mean a big bomb at the box office. But it will be Paramount’s loss, not mine. By the way, give my luck to Ronnie. When he gets back, come over and dine with us like you guys used to do.”

To effectively portray these scenes of progressive drunkenness, Mil-land said, “I knew that when the camera came close, nothing could be hidden or faked.”

He praised Wilder for his help, citing his “prying, probing, intuitive touch of genius,” and Brackett for his “kindly calm and sociological insight.”

When Jane reported to Paramount to co-star in The Lost Weekend (1945) with Ray Milland, its director, the Austria-born and deeply respected Billy Wilder, came out to greet her. That represented “star treatment” that he usually bequeathed to the more established actresses he’d directed, such as Barbara Stanwyck during her collaboration with him on Double Idemnity (1944).

She’d heard a lot about Wilder and was anxious to be directed by him. She knew that he was Jewish and had fled the Nazis in 1933, emigrating to Hollywood, where he’d had a successful career. He’d coauthored the script for the screwball comedy, Ninotchka (1939) with Great Garbo, as directed by Ernst Lubitsch. It had been widely advertised as GARBO LAUGHS.

Over coffee in the Paramount commissary with Wilder and his co-writer (Charles Brackett), while discussing their Lost Weekend, Jane learned from Wilder that “You were not our first choice. We offered the part to Stanwyck, but she turned it down, thinking it was Milland’s movie. Then we decided to ask another friend of yours, Paulette Goddard, but we decided she was too sexy.”

“I didn’t know any of this,” a distressed Jane said. “Neither of them said anything to me about it.”

“Actually, Milland was not our first choice either,” Brackett said. “To play the stressed-out and alcoholic writer, Don Birnam, we went first to José Ferrer. But he was just too ugly, and we became convinced that to win the sympathy of movie audiences, we had to go for someone handsome. Then, at first, Milland didn’t want to appear in a movie of such human degradation.”

Wilder and Brackett informed Jane that the location scenes on the streets of post-war New York had already been filmed. “Even scenes of an unshaven Milland rattling the doors of a pawn shop to get a loan,” Brackett said. “We even captured the grit and grime of Bellevue Hospital.” She was told this with the understanding that her scenes in the movie would be filmed in a studio.

Brackett assured her that she would get co-star billing, her name appearing in the same size letters as Milland's.

"It took Billy and me two months to write the screenplay," Brackett said. "We wrote it with our blood. Enormous changes had to be made from the novel."

He was referring to Charles R. Jackson's bestseller with the same title. In distinct contrast to what had been portrayed in the novel, Don Birnam's repressed homosexuality was trivialized into a case of writer's block. To provide more of a love interest than what had appeared within the novel, Jane's character of Helen St. James was virtually invented for the film.

During their second cup of coffee, Jane learned that MGM, Fox, and Columbia had each rejected the script, defining it as "too downbeat, too grim."

She quickly summed up both Brackett and Wilder as being widely different personalities. She later said, "Charles was the classy façade, Billy the guts."

[In Hollywood, the frequent and usually inspired collaborators, Wilder and Brackett, were known as "the Gold Dust Twins," "the Katzenjammer Kids," or "Hansel and Gretel."]

"It's good working with Billy, although we fight a lot," Brackett said. "We're from completely different backgrounds. My roots go back to 1629 and the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Billy was conceived one night when his prostitute mother was raped behind a sleazy beerhall in some back alley. I appeal to the better side of human nature. He prefers the dark side of man."

Finally, perhaps with a sense that its noir theme of repressed anguish and alcoholism was very avant garde for a nation recovering, often with the assistance of alcohol, from the ravages of war, Wilder handed her the latest revisions to the script. Then he suggested that she spend the rest of the morning reading them, since she wouldn't be called onto the set until after lunch.

Before noon, a leopardskin coat was delivered to her dressing room, with instructions to wear it when called for, as it configured into the plot. [It was the prop that brought Helen and Don together at the beginning of the movie. Toward the end, Don pawns it in a pawn shop in exchange for a gun, with which he plans to commit suicide.]

Talking him out of his death wish would be the focal point of Jane's big scene. Her character would succeed in that awesome task. She would convince him to give up liquor and return to writing his novel, The Bottle. At the end of the film, Milland drops a lit cigarette into a glass of whiskey, as a means of making it undrinkable and as proof that he is cured.

Wilder had arranged for her to have lunch in the commissary with Milland, presumably to discuss the nuances of their respective roles. In person, the Welshman was far handsomer and more charming than he was on the screen in any of his light comedies. "Paulette has told me wonderful things about you," Jane gushed.

"Why take her word for it?" Milland answered. Then he raised an eyebrow. "Why not investigate for yourself?"

Almost from the beginning, he established the tone of their relationship by openly flirting with her. She no doubt had heard the many rumors associated with his prowess at seducing his leading ladies.

He confessed to her, "My character is unsettling—so unlike me—and personally, I find the subject of alcoholism distasteful. I'm afraid that as a drunk, I'll dip into caricature and be laughed off the screen."

"Fortunately, my character stays sober throughout the run of the film. I think I can pull it off unless Billy starts screaming and cursing me," she said.

"Filming on the streets of New York was a nightmare," he said. "I spent a night in the ward at Bellevue where patients were delirious during their withdrawal from alcohol. Many of them were having these hideous hallucinations like the one I have to have in this damn movie. I fled at three o'clock that morning. I couldn't stay there all night. At times like now, I feel I was not psychologically cut out to be an actor," he confessed.

"Neither was I," she said. "But I had no choices—either be a showgirl or a prostitute."

"But my dear, they're the same profession," he said.

He amused her with stories of his life, beginning when he was in the Household Cavalry of the British Army and became an expert marksman, horse rider, and airplane pilot. "I'd like to go riding with you one Sunday afternoon."

"Maybe Ronnie could join us," she said. "He's an expert rider."

"How nice, but that's not exactly what I had in mind," he said. "I prefer to go riding with just you."

"Oh, I see," she said.

"I have nothing but fond memories of the horse stables," he said. "When I was fifteen, I lost my virginity one evening in an empty stable stall. I surrendered it to a very determined blonde two years older than me."

Before luncheon was over, he reached over, took her hand, and kissed it. "I have always believed that an actor and an actress, playing lovers on the screen, should rehearse that love in private. What do you think?"

"I completely agree," she said. "I've always become intimate with and demonstrated my affection for my leading men. That's except for Joe E. Brown and Phil Silvers."

Milland looked mildly surprised until he realized that she might be joking. But in the days ahead, he came to know that she had been serious. In a call to Goddard, after about four days of working with Milland, she confessed, "We did the dirty deed. You were right about him. What a contrast to Ronnie, who comes to bed smelling like a bar of soap. Ray gives off a real he-man scent. A true male aroma, and that's a turn-on."

As Milland admitted in his memoirs, Wide-Eyed in Babylon, "There had been a few previous peccadilloes, nothing serious, just the normal male revolt against his convenient chains. It was very easy to succumb to in those days."

He also said that whenever his homelife was deteriorating, he would pack a suitcase and check into the Sunset Towers. "My wife thought my depression was a dramatically staged excuse to shack up with some blonde Hollywood dame, and not without reason." While making The Lost Weekend, that statement perhaps reflected his involvement with Jane.

During the filming of The Lost Weekend, Jane had a sad experience during her brief reunion with Craig Reynolds. He had been "my dream man, my Adonis" when they had appeared together in movies in the 1930s. Both of them were dreaming of stardom, and at the time, there was talk of marriage.

She learned that he was appearing in an un-credited role in her film. "I'm afraid that the stardom I dreamed about isn't going to happen for me," he told her. He'd joined the Army during the war and had won a Purple Heart. "But now that I'm back in Hollywood, the phone isn't ringing."

She seemed rather embarrassed to have run into Reynolds in such reduced circumstances. His star had flickered out, and hers was just beginning to shine brightly. She kissed him on the cheek and moved on after wishing him good luck. She was deeply saddened to learn of his death in 1949 in a motorcycle accident.

Right before Christmas in 1944, Jane received a call from Wilder, who had obviously been drinking. "The shitheads over at Paramount have decided not to release The Lost Weekend. 'It's too god-damned depressing,' the assholes said. But I know the real reason. The liquor industry is willing to part with $5 million for the negative of this film. They want to destroy it, claiming that showing it will cut into their profits."

But in the weeks ahead, the president of Paramount, Barney Balaban, overruled his executives. "I don't make pictures to flush them down the toilet," he said. "Open the god damn film across the country, and to hell with the liquor industry. Bogie's baby [Lauren Bacall] is called 'The Look.' After The Lost Weekend, Milland will be known as 'The Kidney.'"

The Lost Weekend was eventually nominated for seven Academy Awards, winning four of them: Best Picture, Best Director (Wilder), Best Actor (Milland), and Best Writing of an Adapted Screenplay (won jointly by Brackett and Wilder).

After his win, Milland reached the pinnacle of his career, becoming the highest paid star at Paramount.

When shooting was finished on The Lost Weekend, Milland told Jane goodbye. He headed north for a two-week vacation with his wife, Muriel. As a farewell to Jane, he told her, "Maybe we'll meet again."

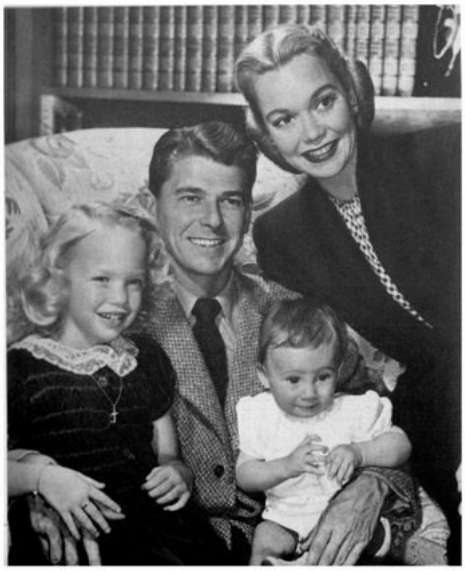
As World War II was coming to an end, Reagan faced an uncertain future in films. In contrast, based on the acclaim heaped on her performance in The Lost Weekend, Jane's career had skyrocketed.

To her friends, Joan Blondell, June Allyson, and Paulette Goddard, Jane complained constantly. She had always wanted a father figure to compensate for the dad she never had. For a time in the early 1940s, Reagan was that to her, plus also a lover. “Now I’m the breadwinner,” she proclaimed. “Do you gals know what an Army captain’s pay is?”

The general public remained under the impression that Reagan and Jane were the happiest married couple in Hollywood, although “Ray and Muriel” were also cited as an equivalent example of marital bliss. Ironically, all of this publicity was happening at the time Jane and Milland were conducting an illicit affair.

But occasionally, a reporter was more realistic, as was a wartime writer for Modern Screen. “If things at the studio upset Jane Wyman, she gripes about them at home. And she is upset a lot. She flies off the handle. When Ronald Reagan is around, he tries to calm her down. But she doesn’t want to be calm, she wants to storm. ‘You don’t know what things are like,’ she tells her husband. ‘You’ve been away too long.’ When she cools off, she realizes that Reagan has his own problems and that it can’t be fun to come home on a weekend pass and listen to her beef.”

Months later, Modern Screen filed another report, suggesting that there was trouble in paradise and hinting that Jane may have a secret lover. Rumors were rampant at the time in Hollywood, many believing that Jane and Van Johnson were having an affair, as had been hinted before in the past. At the time, the world did not know that the handsome, freckle-faced, blonde-haired actor was a homosexual. And only the most deeply entrenched insiders knew that Jane’s secret lover was actually Dennis Morgan.



As the Reagan/Wyman marriage crumbled, a beaming Reagan, with a smiling Jane, posed for this “happy home” shot with blonde-haired Maureen and a new member of the family, an adopted son they named Michael Edward Reagan.

Reagan was infuriated when he read Modern Screen. He threatened to hunt down the reporter who had written the article, and “throttle” him if he didn’t retract the statements printed about Jane. As it happened, the accusations were never retracted, and Reagan did not attack the reporter.

Jane did not want another baby, but Reagan and Baby Maureen did. On a shopping trip with her mother at Saks Fifth Avenue, Maureen placed an order for a baby brother with the store clerk.

Within a few days, the issue was finally resolved: Jane and Reagan would adopt a baby boy.

In his arguments for adoption, Reagan issued a statement to the press, citing that because of the disruption of World War II, thousands of unwanted children were homeless and desperately in need of loving parents.

On March 21, 1945, shortly after he was born, Michael Edward Reagan was brought to the Reagans’ home. At last, Maureen had a baby brother. Reagan welcomed the newcomer to the household, calling him “our real child.”

Jane later said, “I never thought of Michael as an adopted child, and as he grew up, I never thought of myself as an adoptive mother, but as his own mother. The way I see it, we’re blood. I have no more to say, except that he is my baby boy.”

A few fan magazines ran pictures of Reagan, Jane, and Michael, but many devoted photos to just Reagan and the baby.

Despite the presence of two small, demanding children within their home, Reagan and Jane, after the war, became fixtures on the Hollywood party circuit. As columnist Hedda Hopper wrote, “At parties, Ronnie talks politics while Jane perches atop the piano and makes like Helen Morgan.”

Her role as a fixture, with her husband, on the party circuit lasted no more than a few months before Jane grew bored. She wanted her old life back, but with newer escorts. By this time, Reagan had given up partying and was devoting his nights instead to the politics associated with the Screen Actors Guild. In 1947, he was elected as the organization’s President.

June Allyson, married to Dick Powell at the time, was a close observer of the Reagan marriage. She hid her own attraction to him from Jane, but she told other friends, “One day, I’ll get my man, Ronnie. Probably when he leaves Janie. I want him. And Lola gets what Lola wants.”

An older, more mature man, Powell had begun overlooking his errant wife’s many indiscretions, including her love affair with Alan Ladd and, later, her off-the-record weekends in Las Vegas with Dean Martin.

Allyson predicted that the Wyman/Reagan marriage would end in the divorce courts. “Her career is on the rise. His is going to hell.”

After completing One More Tomorrow, Jane said, “It’s a picture I’m ashamed of—and I don’t shame easily.”

Jack Warner agreed. He delayed its release until it could benefit from all the favorable publicity Jane received for The Lost Weekend.

Although it wasn’t her fault, Dennis Morgan, her co-star, became angered when marquees across the country took down his name and displayed hers instead. “Oh, my god,” she told Joan Blondell. “I’m experiencing with Dennis what I’m going through with Ronnie. Dennis was the hottest male star on the lot, and now he’s falling. His star is dimming. Ronnie’s star is also dimming. I’m shining brighter than ever, and I think they resent me.”

“Of course they do, darling,” Blondell said. “How like a man. They’re all no good!”

Jane was delighted to learn from the British director, Peter Godfrey, that she’d be starring once again in the 1946 release of One More Tomorrow. Her passion for Dennis Morgan had continued unabated, although here were long periods of separation. As she and Reagan had grown farther and farther apart, she welcomed the tenderness and love that Morgan provided, though he was still married and kept telling her he did not plan to divorce his wife.

Godfrey would soon be directing Reagan in two of his movies, That Hagen Girl (1947) and The Girl from Jones Beach (1949).

Jane was pleased to hear that she’d also be co-starring with two of her girlfriends, Alexis Smith and Ann Sheridan. Morgan would also be working once again with “my best pal,” Jack Carson. Ironically, Carson’s character in the movie was named “Regan.”

It was a romantic liaison that began long before Reagan's marriage to Wyman.

One More Tomorrow was a reincarnation of Philip Barry's socially conscious play, The Animal Kingdom, which had been filmed in 1932 with three A-list stars, Ann Harding, Leslie Howard, and Myrna Loy.

In this latest version, Sheridan was cast in the star role as Christie Sage, a photographer for The Bantam, a publication going bankrupt. Once again, Jane played Sheridan's 'sidekick.

Morgan played Tom Collier, a rich playboy pursuing Sheridan. When she turns him down, he is ensnared by Cecilia Henry (Smith), a scheming gold-digger who eventually marries him. Still pining for Christie (Sheridan), it's clear that he doesn't really love Cecilia.

On the set, reunited with Morgan, Jane discovered a more mature actor, one more self-assured. He had become the leading man at Warner Brothers, a position Reagan coveted but never achieved. Morgan's peak years were from 1943 to 1949. Later, he fell out of favor with 1950s audiences.

During the shoot of One More Tomorrow, she got to know him better than ever, learning more about his background. Unlike her, he'd had a normal childhood as the son of a baker. His mother had studied music before her marriage and had transmitted her love of singing to her son. They often sang duets together. As a teenager, he took singing lessons, and he often sang at solo recitals and church socials. In high school, he'd played the trombone in the school band.

At Carroll College in Waukesha, Wisconsin, he'd fallen in love with Lillian Vedder, later marrying her, but not abandoning his pursuit of some of his leading ladies.

When One More Tomorrow was released, the critics, if they noticed Jane at all, claimed she was "sadly wasted in another sidekick role." One reviewer wrote, "The original version of The Animal Kingdom with Leslie Howard was oversexed and heavy handed, while the one with Dennis Morgan is simply flat. Although the cast is likable, they couldn't save a dull script."

Ginger Rogers, who would appear in movies starring both Reagan and Morgan, later commented on these two being afflicted with "Leadinglady-it is."

"In most cases, Ronnie and Dennis moved on once the picture was over," Rogers said. "From the grapevine, I heard that the one exception to their fickle wars is their continuing fascination with Jane Wyman. Her particular appeal has always eluded me. But she must send out some siren call, because both Dennis and Ronnie keep coming back to her charms."

"As for Jane herself, I was fairly neutral about the dame," Rogers said. "That is, until she decided to dig her greedy claws into Lew Ayres. He was my ex, but I still resented the bitch for moving in on him."

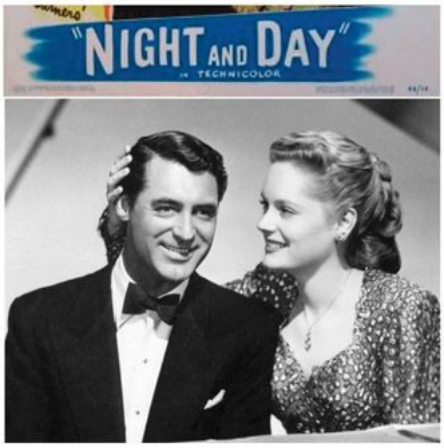
During the months after the war, Alexis Smith and her husband, Craig Stevens, were spending a lot of their free time with Jane and Reagan, now that he was no longer in the Army.



A vanilla, and unconvincing, portrayal of a "marriage of convenience" inspired by the life of Cole Porter. Despite the film's shortcomings, the casting department at least got something right: Like Porter himself, both of the film's stars, Cary Grant and Alexis Smith, were bisexuals.

Alexis' career at Warners seemed on a quick rise to stardom. "I'm no longer window dressing," the actress from British Columbia told the Reagans. She had made Gentleman Jim (1942) with Errol Flynn; The Constant Nymph (1943), with Joan Fontaine and Charles Boyer; and she'd played an unsympathetic part in Humphrey Bogart misfire, Conflict (1945). She was set to make yet another film with Bogart, The Two Mrs. Carrolls (1947). She had previously appeared with Jane in The Doughgirls (1944) and now, in the buoyant aftermath of the Allied victories in Europe and the Pacific, she was on the screen with Jane once again in One More Tomorrow (1946).

One night during one of their communal dinners, Alexis announced, "I'm going to play Cole Porter's wife, Linda, in my latest film, Night and Day (1946)," Alexis told the Reagans. "My leading man is Cary Grant. Of course, he's not as handsome as Craig is."

Was the real Cole Porter as good-looking as Cary Grant? Actors up and down Broadway responded with a resounding NO!

In Night and Day, Jane played a good hearted turn-of-the Gilded Age cutie, but resented having such a small role while Alexis Smith got the star part.

As a means of maintaining her friendship with Alexis, Jane tried to conceal her jealousy.

The Lost Weekend had not been released yet, and Jane's career appeared to be going nowhere. She had left word with Jack Warner. "Please notify me of any roles that Joan Crawford or Bette Davis turn down. I'm your gal."

So far, he had not heeded her desperate call.

Two days after the dinner with Alexis and Stevens, a call came in for Jane from Michael Curtiz, the director of Night and Day. [He had only recently directed Joan Crawford in Mildred Pierce, a role Jane had coveted.] To Jane, Curtiz said, "Girlie, I promise you role. I deliver role to you. Cole Porter story. Well, not the faggot's real story.

Movie is Night and Day. Part for you."

"But I was told you'd already cast Alexis Smith as Porter's wife," she said.

"Not the female lead, dummy," Curtiz said. "That of song-and-dance cutie. You get to work with Grant. A big shit. Best of all, you get me. Greatest director west of Budapest."

"Send over the script," she said. Within two hours, a studio messenger from Warners arrived on her doorstep with the script for Night and Day. She studied it for a few hours, and was greatly disappointed with her role of showgirl Gracie Harris. At the time, she appeared only briefly at the beginning of the film, although her role was later expanded.

The ultimate curmudgeon: Monty Woolley.

She was pleased that her part as a showgirl gave her a chance to show off her talent as a singer and dancer. Her big number in Night and Day was "Let's Do It," with all its risqué suggestions. The role called for her impersonation of a gold-digging hooker, pursuing millionaires, each of whom she called "Peaches," so she wouldn't have to remember their names.

Under contract, and needing money for her recently expanded family, she accepted the role and showed up the next day at the studio. By then, the complete cast had been assembled, including Eve Arden, her friend from The Doughgirls, who relayed scandalous stories about having co-starred with Crawford in Mildred Pierce.

Also cast was a friend of both Cary Grant and Cole Porter, character actor, Monty Woolley, known as "The Beard" for obvious reasons.

"I had given up being blonde," Jane recalled. "But the role called for a blonde. I headed to my hairdresser and a bottle of bleach. I was back to being a blonde cutie like I was in the 30s. Although I was a ripe old thirty-two years old, I was once again a chorus girl."

Even though her appearance in Night and Day was brief, Jane's bubbly personality came out. Grant defined her performance as "vivid," as opposed to the more demure Alexis, cast in the role of Porter's long-neglected wife, as indeed the real Linda had been during the course of marriage to her gay husband.

Jane was shocked to learn that Warner had paid Porter $300,000 for what turned out not as an accurate overview of his life story, but a fictionalized, sanitized overview. Porter had specifically requested that Grant play himself onscreen, even though physically, the two men did not resemble one another at all.

Porter also demanded that his longtime friend, character actor Monty Woolley, be cast as himself in the film. The white-bearded actor had achieved his own measure of screen stardom when he had appeared with Bette Davis and Ann Sheridan in The Man Who Came to Dinner (1941).

On the set, Jane met Woolley, who greeted her with a kiss on the cheek. "I hope you're here to welcome me to Hollywood, he said. "It's rather like living on the moon, wouldn't you say?"

Publicly, Jane expressed admiration for Grant's talent. Privately, she asserted that she "loathed" him. To Reagan and her girlfriends, she called him "a queenie prima donna." Her troubles with him began on June 14, 1945, during the early filming of Night and Day on a back lot at Warners, where a simulation of the New Haven railway station had been crafted.

"In stifling heat, I was dressed in this period costume fit for a winter in Alaska," Jane recalled. "Grant demanded that our scene be reshot, reshot, reshot, and then reshot again. He didn't like his dialogue, although he'd previously approved it. He objected to our costumes, claiming they were not authentic to the period. He objected to what he called 'my fucking rotten characterization in this stinker.' Since he was facing Technicolor cameras for the first time, he objected to his makeup, claiming that it was giving him skin rash. By quitting time, all of us were in a piss poor mood—and hating Grant. He was one leading man who didn't capture my heart—and a homo to boot."

After the release of The Lost Weekend and its subsequent acclaim, Warner ordered Jane back into the studio. Her role in Night and Day had been expanded, and as such, her character was needed for additional sequences which would appear near the ending of the film.

She acquiesced, but regrettably for her, she had already been cast as Ma Barker in The Yearling. "Sometimes, on the same day, I had to be a chorus girl in the morning and then in the afternoon appear as a drab frontierswoman. I nearly had a nervous breakdown."

She confessed to Paulette Goddard and others, "I've ordered Ronnie out of my room at night. I can't be his sex slave and make two movies at once."

In the final weeks of shooting Night and Day, Curtiz finally lost his patience with Grant, with a screaming denunciation in front of cast and crew. The director called his star "a limey faggot," and then walked off the picture. Warner persuaded him to return the following day.

At long last, filming ended. On the final day of the shoot, Grant confronted Curtiz: "If I'm ever stupid enough to work with you again, you'll know I'm either broke or I've lost my mind." Then he stormed off the set.

When the film was released, Porter praised it. But privately, he said, "It was a plot of absurdities concocted by a string of Hollywood hacks. But I wouldn't want the truth depicted anyway."

Said to be the toughest woman in Florida, hard-drinking, hard-scrabble Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings became a literary legend in the Southeast.

Film historian Lawrence J. Quirk later wrote: "Of course, the real Cole Porter, bitchy, tormented, wildly homosexual, compulsive promiscuous, never got to the screen—to his own secret amusement."

Screenland accurately summed it up: "Movie audiences who elect to see this Technicolor extravaganza will have a delicious feast of Cole Porter songs, as well as notable personalities."

homosexuality.]

In 1939, Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings had won the Pulitzer Prize for Fiction, based on her coming-of-age novel, The Yearling, the tender story of a young boy in the late 19th century wilds of north-central Florida. He adopts an orphaned fawn with disastrous consequences. It was also the story of a family's struggle against the elements of nature.

MGM acquired the novel's film rights, with Sidney Franklin set to produce it. His attempt, begun in 1941, failed. He had cast Spencer Tracy in the lead role, opposite Anne Revere, who was later blacklisted during the Joseph McCarthy witch hunt era. Cast as the young boy, Gene Eckman was thirteen years old and from Georgia.

Although MGM invested half a million dollars in location shooting near Ocala, Florida, the production eventually shut down. Tracy feuded with director Victor Fleming of Gone With the Wind fame. He complained, "The god damn insects devoured our flesh and then ate our bones."

Eckman was deemed wrong for the role.

The Yearling remained shelved throughout most of the war until Franklin revived it in 1945. This time, he demanded an all-new cast. Penny Baxter, the story's patriarch, had been originally conceived as a smalltime farmer and game hunter, warm-hearted and loving. In contrast, the novel was very clear that the boy's mother, Ora, is deeply embittered by the death of her three previous children, and profoundly resents the harsh frontier conditions in which they live.

The boy, Jody, raised in the bug-infested scrub country of north central Florida, is desperate for love, which he is not getting from his mother. He showers affection on the fawn, nicknamed "Flag." Penny had to kill the fawn's mother as part of a folk-medicine ploy that involved using her internal organs to draw the poison out of his bloodstream after he was bitten by a rattlesnake. Jody takes the fawn home with him, but as it matures, the deer become destructive, damaging the family's meager crops. Flag has to be put down, which catalyzes tragic consequences for Jody.

Child star Claude Jarman, a Tennessee hillbilly boy, snuggles up to his movie father, Gregory Peck. Jarman had to beat out 12,000 other Southern boys for the coveted role.

After he'd seen The Lost Weekend, Benny Thau thought Jane might be possible, as part of a remarkable change-of-pace role for her, as Ma Baxter.

One Friday afternoon, Jane was summoned to Thau's office, receiving instructions that she was to read The Yearling over the weekend. Thau wanted her to audition, the following Monday, for the role of Ma Baxter.

She bought two copies of the novel, one for herself, the other for Reagan to read. This time, he showed an interest in one of her roles. He thought it could mean a breakthrough for her, telling her, "You might even win an Oscar like Luise Rainer did for The Good Earth, another film about survival against powerful odds."

Jane mentioned that Thau was known for his infamous "casting couch."

"Go over there and say you'll do the part. But let me know if the bastard gets fresh with you. I'll storm over there and kick some ass."

That Monday, with trepidation, she arrived at 10AM at Thau's office. Although she desperately wanted the part, the idea of doing it terrified her. At this point in her life, she felt very insecure.

Jane, glamour queen of the 30s and early 40s, went plain, "care-worn, and embittered" on this testiment to the survival instincts and grit of the impoverished American Frontier.

In this case, the "Frontier" was the insect-and-alligator-infested scrublands and swamps of north-central Florida.

Introduced to Thau, she found him "a perfect gentleman speaking in a soft voice." He spent about half an hour discussing the role with her before summoning the producer, Sidney Franklin, and the film's director, Clarence Brown, into his office.

When Brown shook Jane's hand, he appeared shocked. "I thought you were a brunette."

She explained that she had to have her hair dyed blonde for her role as a showgirl in Night and Day.

"If you get the role in Yearling, you've got to dye it back," Brown told her.

"Not so fast here," Thau said. "If we cast Gregory Peck in the lead, he's already very dark. The boy we're considering, Claude Jarman, Jr., is very blonde. If Jane is a blonde, it would explain how Jarman came along."

Peck was summoned back to Thau's office the next day. He was currently making David O. Selznick's Duel in the Sun, a Technicolor Western. He had complained, "It's difficult making love to Selznick's woman [a reference to Jennifer Jones] while your boss is looking on."

In Thau's office, Peck was told that MGM wanted him for the role of Penny Baxter opposite Jane Wyman.

"Surely, you don't mean Wyman!" Peck asked in astonishment. "Wouldn't she be better in light comedy?" He had not seen The Lost Weekend.

"The gal has untapped possibilities," Thau assured him.

At first, Thau had considered the young British actor, Roddy McDowall, to play the boy, Jody. But Thau eventually rejected him as "too prissy," deciding to launch a nationwide talent search. That led to the discovery of Claude Jarman, Jr., who at the time was a fifth grader in Nashville. He was tested and signed for the role.

Brown might have seemed an odd choice to direct The Yearling. After all, he was famous for having helmed Greta Garbo in seven movies and Joan Crawford in six. Although born in Massachusetts, he had grown up in Tennessee and was familiar with rural America. That had been amply demonstrated in such films as Of Human Hearts (1938), a saga of pioneer life.

Once again, an MGM crew journeyed to Ocala, where filming on The Yearling began on March 15, 1945. There, they faced the same problems as before: Rainstorms, oppressive heat, humidity that drenched clothing and caused makeup to run, and endless attacks by swarms of insects.

Casting the fawn proved especially difficult. The deer grows during the course of the film, changing his body shape. Before shooting ended in January of 1946, a total of 72 different deer had been used, and since none of them could act on cue, endless re-takes were necessary. Peck recalled that for one scene, Brown had to shoot the scene in 72 takes, which was the same number of deer used in the depiction of Flag.

As Ora, Jane had never looked so drab on film. Although still in her early 30s, she appeared to be at least forty, maybe more. But she didn't object. "I wanted to be taken seriously as an actress. I knew that would only happen if I showed Hollywood I could take on a major dramatic role."

One day, Jane received an unexpected visitor to the set, Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings herself. After asking Jane if she had any rotgut liquor, she settled onto Jane's sofa, where she endlessly chain-smoked unfiltered Lucky Strikes. Very outspoken, she candidly said, "Back home, I pound my typewriter day and night while in my bathroom, I make bathtub gin and float red roses in my toilet. The problem is that every time I take a crap, I have to replenish them."

"I've got to tell you!" Rawlings continued. "You and Peck don't look like the characters in my novel. Penny is a runty little frontiersman, a farmer and game hunter, and Ma Baxter is as big as a barn. I figured the only way you got the part was because Brown is fucking you."

A ballsy, über-extroverted hurricane of male flash: Forrest Tucker. Jane said "no."

"I hope Greg and I will surprise you," a flustered Jane stammered, diplomatically.

A rather drunk Rawlings departed three hours later, but only after demanding a kiss on the lips from Peck. He and Jane were then introduced to Jarman, their "son."

"The Kid [a reference to Jarman] worked increasingly well with both Greg and me," Jane said. "He even got a Juvenile Oscar for his performance. But I feared that after The Yearling, there would be no more great roles for him."

Their romance (and their affair) continued beyond the filming of The Yearling.

Here, Peck and Plain Jane appear in deliberately soiled—and historically accurate—scrub-farmer garb.

The Yearling's third male lead was played by the rugged Forrest Tucker, cast in the film as a member of the redneck Forrester family, distant neighbors of the Baxters. In the early 40s, Jane had seen Tucker in two movies, The Westerner (1940) with Gary Cooper, and Keeper of the Flame (1942) with Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn.

"He seemed perfect for the role of backwoods Lem," Jane said. "He stood 6'4", weighing 200 pounds. He was famous for his endowment, said to be one of the largest in Hollywood. Although married to the former Sandra Jolley, he had plenty of girlfriends coming and going. Word about his big attraction traveled fast in Hollywood. With Tucker, the line of beauties formed on the left and right."

Tucker kept inviting Jane to go out drinking with him, but she refused, claiming, “I fear I’ll lose my virginity.”

“How could that be?” he asked. “Aren’t you married to that Reagan fellow?”

“I am,” she said, “but he hasn’t gotten around to deflowering me yet.”

“You’re such a bullshitter, Janie, but I like you, a gal with spirit.”

The supporting players didn’t mean much to Jane during the shoot. Her interest involved bonding with Peck. “He looked absolutely gorgeous in spite of his frontier rags. After meeting this tall, sturdy, and urbane young actor, she told her girlfriends, “He is the handsomest man in Hollywood—the new Gary Cooper.”

In 1942, Peck had married Greta Kukkonen, a Finnish hairdresser. They would have three sons. As a means of learning more, Jane put through a call to Paulette Goddard, the world’s expert on the bedtime habits of stars, both male and female, who played around.

“He cheats on his wife only on that rare occasion,” Goddard told her. “Of course, that nympho, Ingrid Bergman, got him on the set of Spellbound. Hitch [Alfred Hitchcock] told me that the Swede would fuck a doorknob if nothing else were available.”

Jane told Goddard “If Bergman can seduce Greg, so can I.”

As always, Goddard urged her on. “Go, Girl, Go.”

At first, Peck was too busy to spend any time with Jane. Like her, during her early involvement in filming The Yearling, he’d have to race between the sets of two separate pictures, Duel in the Sun and The Yearling. He later defined that period of his career as “a kind of cinematic schizophrenia. The film sets were a mile apart. I’d get out of my Florida cracker overalls and put on my sexy cowboy stud clothes and practice my Texas drawl on the way to make love to Jennifer Jones. What a contrast in characters! Jane faced the same dilemma in Night and Day, doing her final scenes as a showgirl before getting all drab for Ma Baxter in The Yearling.”

On a professional level, Jane had nothing but praise for Peck. “He was my alltime favorite leading man, very easy to work with, a real gentleman, very serious about his acting, always wanting to get his every scene right.”

Near the end of the shoot, the cast and crew traveled to Lake Arrowhead, east of San Bernardino and about 100 miles from Los Angeles. Jane rented a cabin on one side of the lake, the Pecks rented one on the other.

Whenever he was not involved with the Screen Actors Guild, Reagan came to stay with Jane, Maureen, and Baby Michael. The Pecks and the Reagans often dined together, with Reagan at the barbecue, grilling steaks in the backyard.

When their respective spouses, Greta and Reagan, returned to Los Angeles, both Jane and Peck decided to stay on in their respective rented cabins for solitude and brief vacations. It was during this period that Peck got into his speedboat at night and crossed Lake Arrowhead for dinner at Jane’s. “I loved her cooking. I put on twenty pounds, ending up weighing 184 pounds on a 6’3” frame.”

On quiet evenings, he told her about his early struggles trying to break into acting. “I was often homeless in New York, sleeping in Central Park on a bench. I got a lot of offers from guys wanting me for a sleepover, sometimes just in exchange for a good meal. I turned them down except once or twice when I’d do anything for a big juicy steak.”

He told her he’d been exempt from military service because of a back injury he suffered while receiving dance instruction from Martha Graham.

“Fox didn’t think it was macho to promote the idea that I’d been in a dance class, so Publicity claimed that I injured myself while rowing when I was at my university,” he said.

“The Welsh playwright, Emlyn Williams, got me my big break as the lead in his play, The Morning Star, in 1942. He believed in the casting couch,” Peck remembered.

It was in the Reagans’ cabin that Jane and Peck became intimately involved. “Those moonlit nights on the lake under a full moon were very romantic,” director Brown said. “I knew what was going on behind the backs of Greta and Reagan. The whole crew knew.”

Jane told her girlfriends, Goddard and Blondell, “I followed in Ingrid Bergman’s footsteps. Greg is hypnotic. A gal can fall for him. That deep, well-modulated voice of his is pure seduction. He told me that he’d been a male model before going to Hollywood. He posed for underwear ads, but, as he told her, “the underwear ads were rejected.”

“Tell me why!” she asked.

“I’m too embarrassed,” Peck said. “The advertiser instructed the ad agency to find another model. He didn’t want me giving men a case of penis envy.”

“Men exaggerate so,” Goddard said.

“But in Greg’s case,” Jane said, “he told the truth. He’s a great lover, a woman’s dream. He’s going to have a big career in Hollywood. He’s getting fan mail from women and homos all over America. He has to give in to temptation once in a while. He’s only human—and all man!”

In the only statement Peck made in an interview about Jane, he said, “She’s a great woman. Very talented and a hell of a lot of fun to be with.”

The Yearling was released in Los Angeles very late in 1946, in December, as a means of making it eligible for Oscar consideration in that year. Its official premiere was celebrated during January of 1947 at Manhattan’s Radio City Music Hall, where it was a big hit.

Most reviewers and columnists lauded Jane’s performance. Photoplay claimed that “The Yearling’s chief acting honors belonged to Jane Wyman as Ma Baxter. Devoid of glamorizing makeup, she is a care-worn, embittered woman with one goal in life: Food and shelter, and maybe a well outside her door so she need not trek a mile for every precious drop.”

Parents Magazine stated, “It is Jane Wyman as Ma Baxter who does the most creative acting, for she suggests a whole lifetime of denial in the mother’s fear of losing Jody if she loves him too openly. Her intense pride in rising above poverty and being beholden to no one is true of pioneer dignity. And she makes understandable the bitterness of backwoods women.”

Columnist Dorothy Kilgallen wrote: “Jane Wyman, demonstrating an amazing versatility, is the surprise of the picture. She plays the drab, nagging, miserable farm wife with such authority and definition as to make it almost impossible to believe that this weary creature and the glamorous little cookie of Night and Day came from the repertoire of the same actress.”

Peck himself pronounced The Yearling as “a bit too saccharine for me, too many Walt Disney elements.” Despite his reservations, he was nominated for Best Actor, although he lost to Fredric March for his performance in the box office hit, The Best Years of Our Lives. Jane was nominated for an Oscar as Best Actress of the Year, only to lose to her longtime rival, Olivia de Havilland, cast as the long-suffering mother in To Each His Own.

The Yearling was also nominated as Best Picture and Best Director (Brown) of 1946 and Harold F. Kress was nominated for Best Film Editing.

In addition to its many nominations, the film went on to win a pair of Oscars, one for Best Art Direction and Interior Decoration; another for Best Color Cinematography.

Based on the acclaim accorded to Jane after the release of two of her recent films, The Lost Weekend and The Yearling, she had self-confidence for the first time in her life. “I found I had a new self. I was no longer afraid, no longer shy. If people didn’t understand the new me, the hell with them. Regrettably, I don’t think Ronnie understood that I was going to the top rung on the Hollywood ladder, in spite of what happened to his career. From that moment on, my turned-up button nose became something that nature had placed in the center of my face. Period.”

“What a comedown,” Jane said, when she learned that she’d been cast in a Western named Cheyenne (1947), [It was retitled The Wyoming Kid for TV.] “A god damn Western,” she railed.

Jane, Bruce Bennett, & Janis Paige in Cheyenne.

Reagan tried to console her, reminding her that most of the big female stars at Warners had also appeared in Westerns. “Did you forget that you were in Bad Men of Missouri with Dennis Morgan?”

“I didn’t forget,” she said. “In fact, he’s my co-star in Cheyenne.”

She tried to conceal her delight at being with Morgan again, since, during her filming of The Yearling,she'd almost lost touch with him.

On the first day of shooting on the set of Cheyenne, Morgan lunched with her, each of them trying to console the other for the failure of One More Tomorrow. Later, he visited her in her dressing room, perhaps proving that her allure for him was still as strong as ever.

She found him "as sweet as ever." She told Joan Blondell, "He reminds me of a naughty little boy who's caught sticking his hand in the cookie jar. Critics call his acting wooden, but I find he's versatile and not appreciated by Jack Warner."

Other than Michael Curtiz, Jane had never worked with a director as powerful as Raoul Walsh. Before leaving one morning for work, Reagan told her, "Errol [Flynn] and I survived Raoul in Desperate Journey. So can you."

Morgan said, "Walsh has directed John Wayne, Errol Flynn, James Cagney, Edward G. Robinson, Humphrey Bogart, and Marlene Dietrich. Now us. He'll make mincemeat of us."

Actually, he didn't. Walsh seemed to realize that Cheyenne would be one of his minor efforts, and he didn't overly extend himself. One afternoon, he flatly told Jane and Morgan, "Direct yourselves today. I'm going to get drunk. If you don't want to do that, go fuck each other, which sounds like a hell of a lot more fun than starring in this picture."

In Cheyenne, Morgan played a card shark in trouble with the law. A Wells Fargo agent approaches him and offers him a deal. "Find a stagecoach robber known as "The Poet," and all charges against you will be dropped.

Morgan sets out on his mission, where he encounters Jane, cast as Ann Kincaid. She is secretly married to "The Poet," a swaggering folk hero played by Bruce Bennett, a former Tarzan. Arthur Kennedy, her boyfriend in Bad Men of Missouri, played his stagecoach-robbing sidekick, the Sundance Kid. Singer Janis Paige plays a saloon singer, and did so badly.

Jane later said, "I have only a distant memory of that movie. I know that moviegoers stayed away in droves."

Throughout most of the film, Jane and Morgan are at odds on the screen. At one point, they are forced to sleep together in a small cabin. He says, "Put your foot where it belongs."

In response, she quips, "Don't tempt me!"

In their reviews of the Western, most critics were cruel, although some thought Jane was cool and Morgan jaunty as an amateur sleuth trying to unmask a quixotic stagecoach bandit. The heavies in the film, Bennett and Kennedy, were labeled as "dour," and Bosley Crowther of The New York Times found Paige "ridiculous as the dance hall girl."

Variety claimed that Jane's role sweetened toward the end when she falls for Morgan.

In Jane's summation, "Just when I got the ball rolling on my career, I fumbled the pass."

In 1947, Jane assessed herself as being, "On top of the world." She said that in spite of her continuing marital conflicts with Reagan. Her marriage was deteriorating rapidly, even though, as she told her confidantes, "Ronnie doesn't seem to realize that. After years of pursuing every dame at Warners, he seems to be settling down to a comfortable, middle-class family life. He even wants a third child."

Of course, he has SAG," she told both Dick Powell and June Allyson. "At times, I think he's more married to the Guild than to me."

Powell tried to apologize for him. "With all the union troubles, with everything coming down on his head, it's no wonder."

Later that evening, when Powell was outside talking to Reagan, Allyson joined Jane in the kitchen. "Darling, do what I do," Allyson said. "Have an affair on the side. Right now, I'm making Good News with Peter Lawford. We had an affair, but it's over now."

"He's very handsome," Jane said.

"I'll introduce you."

Jane was excited by her next picture, Magic Town (1947), mainly because her co-star was James Stewart, with whom she had had a fling back in the 1930s. William Wellman, its director, told her that he was hoping for the kind of critical success that "Jimmy enjoyed after It's a Wonderful Life. That picture flopped at the box office, but it got great reviews. I know you want to continue your winning steak after The Lost Weekend and The Yearling. If you and Jimmy perform like I think you can, both of you might carry off Oscars for Magic Town."

“You certainly have high hopes for us,” she said. “I hope Jimmy and I can live up to your expectations.”

Once, when she failed to deliver a certain scene, Wellman yelled at her, “You stinking deer killer! Do it again!” Throughout the filming, he kept calling her “Deer Killer,” a reference to her role in The Yearling. It was an ongoing joke with him, one she didn’t appreciate.

RKO, it turned out, was only the distributor. Magic Town was an independent production created by the Oscar-winning screenwriter, Robert Riskin, who had married Fay Wray. He had been a frequent collaborator of Frank Capra, having worked with him on It Happened One Night (1934) which had brought Oscars to Claudette Colbert and Clark Gable.

In Magic Town, Stewart was cast as Rip Smith, a failed pollster who hoped to jump-start his career by finding the “public opinion capital of America,” where he could test views that reflected the American mindset at the moment.

He settled on the small town of Grandview, where everybody was typical. Everyone that is, except Mary Peterman (as played by Jane), a crusading newspaper editor who wants the town to evolve, expand and grow. Stewart prefers it to remain in a time capsule.

Naturally, they fall in love. Before shooting began, Stewart told Wellman, “I want to generate as much heat with Jane as Katharine Hepburn and I did in The Philadelphia Story (1940).”

James Stewart and Jane Wyman in Magic Town: Sexy but coyly romantic icons of small-town virtue.

Generally known as “Wild Bill,” the director had assembled an impressive supporting cast. Jane had a reunion with Regis Toomey. Together, they still held the record for the longest screen kiss. This time, he got only a peck on the cheek.

Meeting Jane again after a long absence, her co-star, Stewart, warmly embraced and kissed her. Over lunch in the commissary, they had time for an update of their lives. “I’m amazed you haven’t gotten married yet,” she said. “You know what happens to an unmarried actor in Hollywood who turns forty. Hedda and Louella will spread rumors that you’re queer.”

“How wrong they’d be,” he answered. “I keep a little book. In it, I record my every conquest. To date, I’ve reached 201.”

“Please tell me just the marquee names,” she said. “If you don’t, I’ll call Paulette Goddard, and she’ll keep me up to date.”

“I’m not a Kiss-and-Tell guy, but if you insist: “Jane Wyman, first and foremost. Wendy Barry, Diana Barrymore, Olivia de Havilland, Jean Harlow, Rita Hayworth, Katharine Hepburn. Must I go on?”

“Don’t stop now,” she said.

“Okay. Jeanette MacDonald, Ginger Rogers, Rosalind Russell, Norma Shearer, Lana Turner, Loretta Young, Margaret Sullavan, and Marlene Dietrich. When Marlene and I made Destry Rides Again in ’39, I knocked her up. She had an abortion.”

“How unfortunate,” she said. “I’d have loved to see what a kid by you and Marlene looked like.”

Stewart may have been off in his math. Before he entered the Air Corps during World War II, a Hollywood columnist estimated the number of his conquests to be “263 different glamour girls of Hollywood.”

He still had the stammering delivery and gangly physique she remembered, and although he’d matured, he remained boyishly attractive. She told Lucille Ball, “Jimmy has a somewhat eagle-beaked appearance, but he’s handsome in an offbeat way.”

“I may soon get married, but I’ve loved my bachelor days,” he said. “Let me tell you, they were wonderful… just wonderful. Boy, did I have some hot times. It would be hard to give it up and settle down.”

Over dessert, he asked her, “Do I have to apologize for that night when Hank [Henry Fonda] and I took advantage of your innocence? You were so young, so pretty."

"Don't kid yourself, big boy," she said. "I wasn't all that innocent. I was fucking Errol Flynn, Robert Taylor, and Clark Gable, for openers: You're not the only one who can drop marquee names. And let me add the great James Stewart and Henry Fonda to that impressive roster. Speaking of that, do you go in for repeats?"

"We'd better not," he said. "Let's just confine it to flirting with each other and kissing on camera. You see, I'm close friends with your Ronnie. I'd feel guilty about it."

"It's your loss," she said with a sigh.

When it was released, Magic Town didn't find its audience, although later generations usually tended to appreciate it.

As for her performance in it, Photoplay gave Jane a plug, writing, "It's unusual enough to rate a cheer. It's unrealistic enough to rate a brush-off. Wyman is a good actress; her quiet handling of the role of the small town newspaperwoman is apt enough to sometimes put the mannered Stewart at a disadvantage."

Faced with a lackluster reception, RKO publicity agents went to work and devised a series of provocative new ads. Within a context and using a pose having nothing to do with the movie, Stewart was depicted holding Jane in a sexy embrace with her shapely legs on ample display. The headline blared "THEIR LOVE JEOPARDIZED THE HAPPINESS OF THOUSANDS."

Reagan went to see the film, later critiquing it to Jane with the comment, "Where was Frank Capra when you and Jimmy needed him?"

Jane also got her share of negative reviews, one critic writing, "I was never sure who Jane Wyman was impersonating. Surely it wasn't Irene Dunne. No, Jean Arthur. No, I've got it. Claudette Colbert."

Peter Lawford is seen on a night club outing to Slapsie Maxies, with Jane Wyman as his date.

Reagan heard of this, but didn't seem to be threatened. "Everybody knows this limey bastard is a pansy. You'll be safe with him. He's so effete. Not just the way he talks, but the way he walks and acts..."

Jane accepted June Allyson's invitation and visited her on the set of Good News (1947), a movie she was co-starring in with Peter Lawford. Six years younger than Jane, the good-looking British star was a known bisexual in Hollywood.

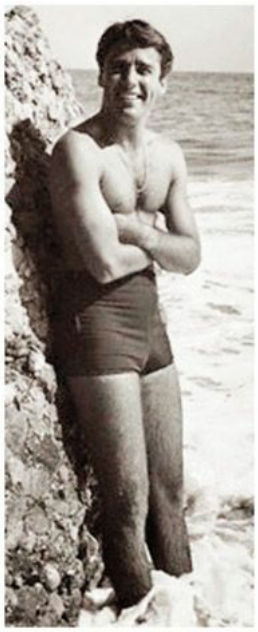
At the time, he was no longer dating Allyson, but was juggling affairs with another MGM starlet, Nancy Davis, as well as with Van Johnson and Tom Drake. He was also managing an affair with Robert Walker, and had broken up with Lana Turner. Before that, he'd had a fling with Rita Hayworth.

When Allyson and Jane got together, they discussed one favorite topic—and that was men. Jane revealed "a cute story" about when she'd first called Reagan for a date. "I invited him to drop by my place for cocktails. He asked me, 'What for?'"

After meeting her, Lawford asked Jane out one Friday night. He met her at the studio and drove her up to Malibu, asking, "You made some excuse to your husband?"

"I don't remember if I did or not, but he's used to my going out."

"You and June must spend a lot of time making excuses to your husbands," he said.



Lawford, cruising.

Jane chose not to view that as an insult and threw herself into the fun of the evening. He admitted, during their drive up the coast, that he had been surprised when Allyson had responded to his advances during their work co-starring together in Two Sisters from Boston (1946).

"I guess I believed all that fan magazine pulp that depicted Dick Powell and her as the perfect couple. I was crazy about her. She was like a little china doll, so sweet, so nice, so intelligent. She even invited me to her home for parties. She insisted I bring a date to throw Dick off her trail."

"He's only a good detective in the movies, not in real life."

"June and I finally had to cool it because Louis B. Mayer found out about us and threatened our careers," Peter said.

Allyson later recalled, "I sort of presented Peter as a present to Jane when we broke off. She was so frustrated in her marriage to Ronnie. I had been fond of Peter in a very romantic way. I loved his devil-may-care attitude, and his British accent fascinated me."

According to Allyson, "Jane and Peter became intimate on their first date."

In Malibu, Lawford invited her to a little tavern that on Friday nights featured an open mike. "I'm having to sing and dance in Good News," Lawford said. "I'm neither a singer or dancer. Tonight, I'd like to sing a few songs with you to get over my shyness about singing in public. I know you're a singer. We can do the familiar favorites that both of us know, like 'Bye, Bye Blackbird.' If I can sing before strangers, I'll be better prepared to do so on camera."

He and Jane sang five songs, and the crowd in the tavern cheered, demanding more. Jane called out to the audience, "We have so many requests, we'll stay here all night and sing them all!" That brought even more cheers.

Later, she told Allyson that after midnight that evening, Lawford brought her back to his living quarters. "I think Lady May Lawford lived in another part of the house. He calls his mother 'The Bitch.' Peter is very oral."

After only five dates, as Jane was about to start filming Johnny Belinda with Lew Ayres, both Lawford and Jane were ready to move on to other conquests. She told Allyson the real reason she broke from Lawford: "I heard that he goes to whorehouses since his regular dates won't do all the oral stuff he demands. He's also said to patronize male hustlers that he pick up in toilets. I'm afraid that if I keep dating him, I'll catch something."

About a month after they broke off from one another, Jane received a call from Lawford. Apparently, he'd given a blow-by-blow description of their affair to his newly minted and very gossipy friend, Frank Sinatra. "Frank wants a date with you," Lawford said. "Are you game?"

"Let me get back to you on that," she told him. Then she hung up the phone, never to use it again to call Lawford.

June of 1947 represented one of the darkest moments in Reagan and Jane's troubled marriage. During the course of that month, Reagan was stricken with pneumonia. When he began gasping, "I can't breathe," he was rushed to the emergency ward of Los Angeles' Cedars of Lebanon Hospital. There, he was diagnosed with a fever of 104°. When Jane was allowed to visit him the following morning, his doctors told her that he had a rare strain of pneumonia that resisted so-called miracle drugs. They suggested that he might die.

Coming as it did on top of her mounting woes, she worked herself into a state of hysteria. Months before, her own doctor had told her that she was pregnant again. That was about the last news she wanted to hear, as she'd been cast as the star of Johnny Belinda, her most important role to date.

During a talk with Joan Blondell, she accused Reagan of tricking her and getting her pregnant. "He thinks that by knocking me up, he can save our marriage," Jane said. "All he's done is make me hate him." Before ringing off, she told Blondell that she'd had sex with Reagan for the last time. "We're going to separate."

Early on the morning of June 26, Maureen's nanny summoned an ambulance to rush Jane to the Queen of Angels Hospital. There, at 11:26AM, she gave premature birth to a pathetically frail and undersized wraith, a baby girl, whom she'd already named Christine Reagan. Days later, when Reagan recovered from his pneumonia, he incorrectly informed the press that Jane had had a miscarriage. She had not. The girl was born, but had died of cardiac arrest at 8:45PM on the evening of her birth.

Reagan did not console Jane on their loss. Neither did she offer him any comfort.

On her orders, the authorities cremated the body six days after Christine's death.

When Reagan, after a prolonged fight for his life, was released from the hospital, he was seventeen pounds lighter. And whereas he resumed work on the filming of That Hagen Girl with Shirley Temple, Jane began to train for the role of the deaf mute in Johnny Belinda.

To master sign language, Jane hired Elizabeth Gessner, an expert, who spent weeks teaching her how. She had a hard time mastering it, but finally, she realized what her problem was. The fact that she could hear was reflected in her reactive timing and in the expression on her face. She solved that problem by stuffing wax into her ear canals during rehearsals, a technique she'd continue during the actual shooting of the film. Using that device, and by remaining silent for hours at a time, she gave the illusion of being lost within a context of total deafness.

Reagan was still occupying the same home with her, Maureen, and Michael. At first, he didn't know that her ears were plugged, thinking she was refusing to speak to him.

As she remembered, "We often passed each other in the hallway. He came and went, usually involved in SAG business at night. He had moved out of our bedroom and slept in the guest room. Under the same roof, we lived in separate worlds."

During pre-production, before Jane's casting as Belinda, there had been many intense debates, all of them stressful, with various stars considered for the role. Joan Crawford called producer Jerry Wald, who was responsible for the green-lighting of Johnny Belinda. "I need another Oscar to match the one I won for Mildred Pierce," she asserted.

Wald was impressed with the way Jean Negulesco had helmed Crawford in Humoresque (1946). Of course, Wald knew she was too old for the role, as was Bette Davis, who was also in the running.

"The new girl on the block," Eleanor Parker, was deemed most suitable, but she had already signed to appear in other pictures, Escape Me Never with Errol Flynn, and The Voice of the Turtle with Reagan, both in 1947.

Finally, after all the Warner executives had seen a screening of The Yearling, Jane emerged as the final selection. Somewhere along the way, two of Jane's closest friends, Alexis Smith and Ann Sheridan, had also been discussed as possible candidates.

A sensitive movie brilliantly acted, and marketed with lurid overlays from MGM's publicity department.

Despite condemnations from censors, audiences were drawn to it.

Yet even after Jane signed for the role, the casting debates continued. Samuel Goldwyn, presumably meddling in the affairs of a competing studio, called Wald, telling him, "You know in your heart that there's only one actress who'd be the ideal choice for Be-linda—and that's my little Teresa Wright. Even though you've already cast Wyman, you know I'm right. With her, it might be a stretch. With Wright, it's a natural."

An abused deaf-mute, as portrayed by Jane, emerging—with the help of Lew Ayres, seen here from behind—from her prison and shell.

Wright had already won an Oscar for Best Supporting Actress in Mrs. Miniver (1942), and had delivered a brilliant performance in The Best Years of Our Lives (1946). For a very brief time, Wald considered removing Jane from the project and signing Wright instead, but Goldwyn demanded too much money for a loan-out.

Bringing Johnny Belinda to the screen had required a long period of gestation. In 1940, it had opened on Broadway as a play starring Helen Craig, the wife of actor John Beal, who had been Katharine Hepburn's co-star in the film, The Little Minister (1934).

At the time, Jane had attended a performance of the play with Reagan and Louella Parsons during one of their cross-country promotional tours. Parsons predicted "This play will never be made into a film because the plot centers on a rape. That is forbidden for display on screen."

Parsons opinion reflected a conservative application of the values and standards of her era, but Johnny Belinda would defy the Code and become the first A-list picture of its kind to feature rape since 1934, when the Production Code had begun strict enforcement of its self-defined moral imperatives.

World War came and went before Wald unearthed the property and told Warner, "It'll make a hell of a movie." It took a lot of persuading before Warner purchased the rights for $50,000. Even then, the studio faced the major task of rewriting and reconfiguring it. To that effect, Warner hired two screenwriters of minor importance. One of them was Irma von Cube, a German-American who, after an early career working on films in Berlin, had penned the script for Song of Love (1947), starring Katharine Hepburn, Paul Henreid, and Robert Walker. Her partner in the scriptwriting of Johnny Belinda was a writer/actor, Allen Vincent, who had starred in minor films in the 1930s. As a scriptwriting team, they went through eight versions before one of them was finally deemed acceptable.

Johnny Belinda had originated as a play by Elmer Blaney Harris, who based it on an incident that had occurred at his summer home on Prince Edward Island off the eastern coast of Canada. Lydia Dingwell (1852-1931), a deaf mute, had been brutally raped and impregnated, with dire consequences, including murder. The story not only dramatized the horror of rape, but the consequences of spreading rumors and lies in a small town of fishermen and their families.

Jane was cast as Belinda McDonald, the victim of the rape, who is befriended by a new doctor, Robert Richardson. He realizes that Belinda, though treated like a dummy by the townspeople, is very intelligent. Her father is Black McDonald, and she lives with him and her Aunt Aggie. Belinda rarely ventures into town, where she is likely to be mocked.

The doctor's secretary is in love with him, but when he spurns her advances, she marries a local lout, Locky McCormick, the villain of the piece. He gets drunk at a dance, goes to the farm where Belinda is alone, and rapes her, which causes her to become pregnant.

As a 1930s "Pretty Boy on Celluloid," Lew Ayres had a certain androgynous appeal, attracting the hearts of such diverse personalities as Spencer Tracy or Ginger Rogers, and ultimately, Jane Wyman herself.

When news of her pregnancy spreads through the town, the doctor is suspected as the father. The baby boy is named Johnny.

When Locky, now married to Richardson's secretary, decides he wants to claim (and kidnap) the baby, he is shot (and killed) by Belinda after a struggle. Subsequently, she's put on trial for murder, but eventually, news of who actually committed the rape is aired in the open light of day. Richardson saves the day, taking Belinda and Johnny to their new home and a new life.

As director of this controversial screenplay, Jean Negulesco became available when Errol Flynn refused to accept him as director on the set of The Adventures of Don Juan (1948).

Negulesco proposed to Wald that Brian Aherne should be shoehorned into the role of the doctor. "If not Brian, how about Robert Donat or Ronald Colman?"

Wald, however, had a different vision: He had seen Marlon Brando interpret the brutish role of Stanley Kowalski in Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire, and as the doctor, he wanted the handsome, talented young actor. Warner, however, adamantly disagreed. He, too, had seen Streetcar. "I understand Brando is a secret faggot. Besides that, he mumbles. I didn't understand a god damn word he said except 'STELLA! STELLA! STELLA!'"

Finally, the name of Lew Ayres was put forth, based on his having played a doctor in a series that included nine Dr. Kildare movies from 1938 to 1942.

Although his fame had derived from roles he had played before the war, Ayre's career was far from over. He had already made a successful post-war comeback playing an empathetic doctor in The Dark Mirror (1946).

When Ayres was first contacted about the role, he said. "Although I hear you signed Jane Wyman, who is all wrong for the part, I hope you cast Teresa Wright as my leading lady."

Wald responded, "You leave the casting to us, okay?"

At the time Ayres made that statement, he had seen neither The Yearling nor The Lost Weekend. He remembered Jane, if at all, as the wisecracking "Hey-Hey Girl" of the 1930s. He didn't learn until later that she didn't want him for her leading man either, preferring Joseph Cotten.

The studio's first choice for the rapist was sexy, stoically handsome Rory Calhoun, who had served a three-year jail term for several incidences of armed robbery before he was twenty-one. His gay agent, Henry Willson, was heavily promoting him and taking sexual advantage of his new discovery. Calhoun would go on to become a star, making two pictures with Marilyn Monroe, How To Marry a Millionaire in 1953, and River of No Return in 1954, which also co-starred Robert Mitchum.

Warner ruled against Calhoun. A newly emerging, malevolent-looking "menace" on the screen, Stephen McNally, was selected instead. [Ironically, when the actor was billed as "Horace McNally," he had played the kindly doctor, Robert Richardson, on Broadway in the stage version. He kept the name of Horace until he was cast in Johnny Belinda. Henceforth, he would be billed as Stephen McNally.] Wald had been impressed when he'd played the villain in Judy Garland's The Harvey Girls (1946).

When McNally first met Jane on the set, he asked her, "Can we go somewhere private and rehearse the rape scene?"

She denied his request.

A New Yorker, like McNally, Jan Sterling would become one of the best known of the cinematic blondes of the 1950s. She'd be nominated for an Academy Award as Best Supporting Actress for her performance in The High and the Mighty (1954).

At the time Jane met her, she was married to the British actor, John Merivale, who would later become famously associated with Vivien Leigh, becoming her lover after her divorce in 1960 from Lord Laurence Olivier. Sterling herself would become married to the likable lug, the "character leading man," Paul Douglas.

Originally, Janis Paige, a singer/actress, was selected for the role of the doctor's jealous secretary, Locky's wife, but Wald interpreted her screen test as unacceptable.

Agnes Moorehead was cast in the role of Belinda's aunt and flinty guardian. Moorehead had made her debut in Citizen Kane (1941), one of the greatest films ever made. Before that, she'd worked in The Mercury Theatre with Orson Welles. Moorehead's performance in Johnny Belinda was eventually nominated for an Academy Award as Best Supporting Actress.

Charles Bickford was offered the role of Belinda's father. Wald later said, "He held me up. It was highway robbery. But we finally hired him for $5,000 a week." At the time, Bickford was among the hottest character actors in Hollywood, and there was talk that he might win the Oscar for his recent appearance in The Farmer's Daughter (1947), co-starring Loretta Young and Ethel Barrymore.

Cast and crew of Johnny Belinda were moved to the village of Mendocino, some 42 miles north of San Francisco, along the 42-mile-long Big River. This rustic setting had been selected by Wald with the understanding that more than any other village in California, it matched the terrain of a fishing hamlet in the Maritime Provinces of Canada.

On the set, Jane came face to face with her leading man, Lew Ayres.

She had first seen him on the screen in 1929 when he'd starred opposite Greta Garbo in The Kiss and she'd "thrilled at his male beauty" when he played the young soldier on All Quiet on the Western Front (1930).

Ever since, he'd been a media event, and she followed his life and career in the fan magazines. They had reviewed his marriages, first to Lola Lane and later to Ginger Rogers.

From the first night, Jane and Ayres became almost inseparable. "I'm not saying that Lew drove the nails into the coffin of my marriage to Ronnie," she later told June Allyson. "Lew was not to blame. But he moved into my heart. I would probably have divorced Ronnie anyway. There is no way I wanted to become the wife of a politician."

In record time, both Ayres and Jane became confidants. Reagan had offered her no comfort following the cremation of their infant daughter, but Ayres did. At first, he came on to her like a priest, which he had wanted to be at one time in his life. But by the third night, her "father confessor" had become her lover.

As she later claimed, "he became almost overnight the love of my life."

Jane had to tell someone, and she chose Agnes Moorehead, who, based on their work on the same movie set every day, became an eyewitness to Jane's fast-developing love affair. Jane told her, "John Payne thrilled me sexually, Dennis Morgan is a darling. But Lew is something else. I have an actual glow when I'm around him. I know I sound like a silly schoolgirl, but he touches my heart in a way no man has ever done before."

During their time off, they would wander off together. Sometimes, they shared a picnic along the banks of the Big River, finding a secluded spot. She took up painting, with a preference for landscapes. He drove her around in a battered pickup truck rented from a local farmer with funds provided by the studio.

They found an escapist retreat in the fern-banked canyons of Russian Gulch, amid copses of redwood trees. Sometimes, they explored the rocky coastline around Fort Bragg, finding a hidden cove where he made love to her. She painted scenes of the Noyo River, with its small fishing craft, while he read the theology-based existentialism of Søren Kierkegaard.

"Often, we would sit for hours at a time, when we weren't needed for a scene," she told Moorehead. "Like Belinda in our picture, I could communicate silently with Lew."

He told her of his much-publicized experiences during World War II. In March of 1942, following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, he had refused to bear arms and consequently, registered as a conscientious objector. In reaction, many theaters boycotted his films, especially films in his Dr. Kildare series. Along with other conscientious objectors, he was sent to Cascade Locks, an internment center in Oregon. "I believe in praising the Lord, but not passing the ammunition," he said at the time.

He left the internment camp by volunteering as a medical corpsman and chaplain's assistant serving on the front lines in the South Pacific. Once there, he earned the respect of his fellow servicemen, exposing himself to danger, aiding the wounded, and comforting the dying.

He told Jane, "The horrors of war were worse than I'd imagined. I held little children in my arms as they were bleeding to death, with only a minute or so to live. I saw other children standing by to watch their parents be buried in a mass grave. I held soldiers whose intestines had been ripped out by a bomb. I listened to their dying word. Often it was, 'Tell my mother that I will always love her from Heaven.'"

Ayres showed her a column written by right winger Hedda Hopper shortly after his return to Hollywood. She commended him for his service during the war, the terms of which had originally inspired frontpage ridicule. "Ayres faced professional suicide, but to crucify a man who stands up to his own convictions is un-Christian and un-American," Hopper wrote.

He kept his body in good shape at the age of thirty-eight, two years older than Reagan. Often, Jane and Ayres swam nude together in the waters of Big River. He told her he liked the role he was playing. "I stand up against a bigoted, self-righteous town. The role was made for me."

"Ronnie is pragmatic," Jane told Moorehead. "Lew is idealistic. Ronnie reads about politics, Lew devours books on religion and philosophy."

On Sunday afternoons, on a riverbank, Ayres would play his jazz banjo for Jane. She didn't know that he'd been trained as a musician in his native Minnesota. His father had played the cello.

Jane also said, "He doesn't indulge in Hollywood gossip like I love to do. In addition to being a brilliant actor, he can also whittle, sculpt, write anti-war plays, and compose a symphony—he's a true Renaissance man. I find him a wonderful companion and a great and most satisfying lover. When he seduces a woman, he makes her feel like a goddess. He also has a good sense of humor, very much like my own."

"His eyes convey a sadness," she told Moorehead. "He's very quiet. When he does speak, it's with a warm, caring voice that I find very soothing. He's a vegetarian. I haven't had a steak since I met him. At night, he holds me in his arms."

"Girl, you sound like you're in love," Moorehead answered.

When Jack Warner saw the first rushes of Johnny Belinda, he exploded in fury. "What is this? Some fucking mood piece about fog and seagulls from Sweden?" He had just returned from a vacation in France. When Jane came on the screen, he was even more horrified. "I can't stand the sight of her. She's ugly. People don't buy tickets to see an ugly woman on the screen. Put some makeup on her. You've got too much of this deaf-and-dumb shit. Have a voice over to narrate and let us know what she's thinking. Silent pictures went out, already. In fact, Warners invented the talking picture."

Negulesco did not listen to the demands of his boss and went on shooting the picture as he'd conceived it.

Late one afternoon, Reagan arrived unexpectedly in Mendocino. He hadn't informed Jane that he was coming. Was he on the scene because he'd heard rumors that she was having an affair with Ayres? Moorehead and Negulesco noticed that Reagan got a chilly reception from Jane. She did not allow him to sleep in her cabin, claiming that it would break her concentration for the role. Ironically, he ended up bedding down in Ayres' cabin, because it was the only place with an available bed.

As Negulesco later said, "I would love to have been a fly on the wall to hear what those two guys had to say about each other."

Reagan left early the next morning, but the director noticed that Jane did not kiss him goodbye. However, Reagan shook Ayres' hand and thanked him for putting him up for the night.

Within two days, another unexpected visitor arrived on the scene to confront Ayres. It was his girlfriend, the blonde-haired actress, Audrey Totter. Unknown to Jane, she and Ayres had been engaged in an affair.

Unlike Reagan, who had been discreet and had caused no trouble, Totter was "itching for a fight," as she told Negulesco.

Their confrontation took place in Jane's cabin in the presence of Ayres. "The screams between the two jealous women could be heard across the river," Negulesco said.

In a rage, Totter left Mendocino, vowing never to speak to Ayres again.

"Totter got kicked out on her ass," Negulesco recalled. "I had a member of my crew drive her to San Francisco and put her on a plane back to Los Angeles. Her fling with Lew was over. Obviously, he'd found a new gal, a married one at that. I figured that if Totter knew that, then the word had already spread across Hollywood. America's ideal couple of World War II was that no more. The title had passed."

After their completion of Johnny Belinda, Jane told the cast and crew goodbye, hugging and kissing Moorehead. She told her newly made friend that she was going for a short vacation in New York. After telling Negulesco farewell, Ayres drove Jane to San Francisco, where they boarded a plane together to New York.

Once in Manhattan, they booked a suite together at The Plaza, but for the most part avoided the usual celebrity haunts, such as the Stork Club. However, Harrison Carroll, the Hollywood reporter for the Herald-Express, caught up with the romantic couple one night.

Perhaps he came upon Jane in an unguarded moment. She almost never made comments about Reagan to the press. But on this afternoon in December of 1947, she did. "There is no use lying. I am not the happiest girl in the world. It's nothing that happened recently. It's an accumulation of things that have been coming down for a long time. When I return to Los Angeles, I will talk things over with Ronnie. I hope and believe that we will solve our problems and avoid a separation."

Later, when columnist Gladys Hall cornered her, she had been drinking and was even more indiscreet, delivering a far more candid appraisal of her marriage. "Ronnie and I are through. We're finished! It's all my fault."

When she read these statements, Louella Parsons called Reagan at once. These two former residents of Dixon, Illinois, had long been allies and friends. He told her, "I love Jane and I know she loves me. I don't know what this is all about, and I don't know why Jane has done it. For my part, I hope to live with her for the rest of my life."

Then he uttered a shocker, "Jane very much needs to have a fling, and I intend to let her have it."

Hedda Hopper managed to reach Reagan for brief statement. He said, "If it comes to divorce, I'll name Johnny Belinda as my co-respondent."

Back in Hollywood, Jane asked Reagan to move out, and he took his luggage to a hotel. Even so, she seemed to realize how indiscreet her comments in New York had been.

She wrote an "open letter" to him, which was sent to and then published in a movie magazine.

"Dear Ronnie,
You and I have been married for seven years. During this period, at least once a week, you've reminded me (kiddingly), how lucky I am to have you for a husband. I thing I am lucky. All kidding aside, there isn't a single thing about you I'd want to change. You've been wonderful to me in many ways."

Apparently, she didn't mean a word of what she'd written.

To squelch rumors about an affair with Ayres, Jane called Reagan and invited him to be her escort at the premiere of Johnny Belinda. He told George Murphy, "I think this means a reconciliation. I'll be sleeping in my own bed tonight."

It was a glittering affair. In contrast to her drab appearance in the film, Jane showed up in a satin gown and a mink coat, looking almost as glamorous as she'd ever appeared.

Although the lavish event went smoothly, and she was smothered in congratulations, the evening ended in disaster. After he'd taken her to dinner at Chasen's, a fight erupted between Reagan and her on the sidewalk when the valet was retrieving Reagan's car.

Jane was heard shouting at Reagan, "I got along without you, and I damn well can get along without you now, you fucking has-been."

Also waiting for her car, actress Jane Greer overheard the altercation.

Wyman asked the doorman to hail a taxi for her. As she was getting into the cab, Greer also heard Reagan call after her, "Who are you fucking tonight?"

Johnny Belinda opened across the country to rave reviews. Warners, however, decided to take out full page ads emphasizing the rape. A drawing pictured a menacing man moving toward a frightened young woman. Headlines blared "SHAME CAME OUT OF THE SHADOWS AND CHANGED A YOUNG GIRL'S LIFE" Some of the ads suggested that Ayres, as the doctor, was the culprit who raped her. "HER DOCTOR WAS THE FIRST TO SHARE

HER SHAME."

In spite of Jack Warner delaying the film for months, he relished its success when it became the studio's biggest money-maker of the year. "Sometimes, it's great to be wrong. I'm laughing all the way to the bank."

Seen together at the Oscar Ceremony, waiting for an announcement about Johnny Belinda: Lew Ayres and "no longer plain" Jane Wyman. Reagan was noticeably absent.

In Hollywood, Parsons reviewed Johnny Belinda for Cosmopolitan, "If stardom is what Jane Wyman wants most, Johnny Belinda will guarantee her this eminence. Jane as the deaf mute is real and very touching. She rises to every demand of tenderness and warmth."

Jane expected to be on the list of Best Actress Academy Award nominations, although she didn't expect to win. On Oscar night, Ayres, not Reagan, was her escort. Irene Dunne was nominated for I Remember Mama; Olivia de Havilland for The Snake Pit; Ingrid Bergman for Joan of Arc; and Jane's friend, Barbara Stanwyck, for Sorry, Wrong Number.

Lovemaking on Oscar Night.

With Ayres in the seat beside her, she listened as Ronald Colman came forward to read off their names. "I slumped in my seat," Jane later said. "Two rows in front of me, I could see the neck of Dunne. She was preening, probably already mouthing her acceptance speech. Then I heard the name of JANE WYMAN ring out in the hall. I was speechless. I nearly fainted. I couldn't believe it. Lew gave me a big kiss and hug in front of the world, and urged me to get up on my feet and go forward. I dropped my handbag, and everything, including my lipstick, went rolling out on the floor. On the way to the stage, I thought of the damnest things, like 'did I remember to wear my girdle?'"

Accepting the Oscar, she gave one of the shortest speeches in the history of the Academy. "I accept this award very gracefully for keeping my mouth shut. I think I'll do that again."

Backstage, she was congratulated by Ayres, who hugged and kissed her again. She consoled him for his own loss. He had been nominated as Best Actor of the Year, but lost to Laurence Olivier for Hamlet.

An hour later, Jane showed up for a gala celebration honoring her in the Champagne Room of the Mocambo. On one of her arms was Jack Warner himself; on the other, Lew Ayres.

Warner took the occasion to announce that Jane was being considered for two upcoming pictures. The first was the film version of Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire that at the time, on Broadway with Marlon Brando, was eliciting raves throughout the theatrical world.

[The film role ultimately went to Vivien Leigh, bringing her her second Oscar.]

The second movie Warner announced at Jane's Oscar Night party was the filming of Ethan Frome, the 1911 novel by Edith Wharton, a story about tragedy, irony, and repression set in rural New England.

[Bette Davis for years had urged Warners to film the Wharton novel. But she'd left the studio. Warner briefly considered co-starring Joan Crawford with Humphrey Bogart, but the project was eventually shelved.

In 1922, it would finally reach the screen with Liam Neeson and Patricia Arquette as co-stars.

Reagan got his own silent revenge for being left out of the festivities surrounding Johnny Belinda. When he published, in 1964, his autobiography of his years in Hollywood, he didn't even mention the film or his estranged wife's Oscar win.]

That night, with her Oscar beside her bed, Ayres made love to her "until the cock crowed," as she remembered it to June Allyson.

She received yet another prize before morning. Somewhere in the middle of the night, in the pre-dawn hours, he proposed marriage. "I can't think of living apart from you."

She remembered his exact words, as she later relayed them to Allyson. Holding her close, Ayres told her, "I want you to be my bride for the next fifty years. And then we'll talk about it."

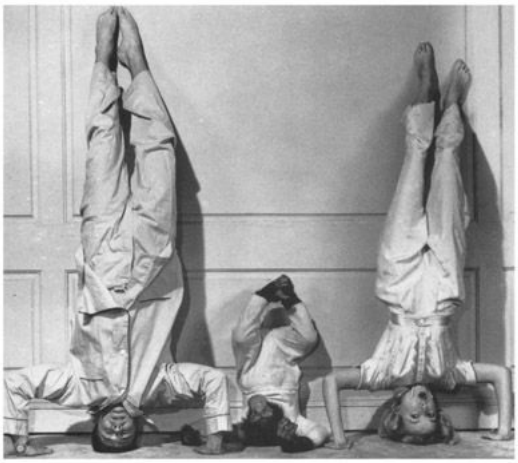
Pleasuring Marilyn and Doris Day, a Liberated Bachelor Goes on the Prowl



Ronald Reagan and Diana Lynn stand on their heads as part of a training exercise for their pet chimp in the notorious Bedtime for Bonzo.

"Katharine Hepburn and Cary Grant raised a feisty leopard in Bringing Up Baby; James Stewart had an invisible six-foot rabbit named Harvey, and Donald O'Connor had Francis, the Talking Mule. I thought I could get away with raising Bonzo. But my enemies used my performance against me politically in the years ahead, and I was forever ridiculed and haunted by the memory of appearing in that farce. Bonzo sure made a monkey out of me."

In 1947, when he testified before HUAC about communists in the film industry, Reagan wore his glasses so he'd "look more academic."
"I will defend the right of any American to openly practice and preach any political philosophy from monarchy to anarchy. But this is not the case with regard to the communist. He is bound by subversion and stealthy to impose on an unwilling people the rule of the International Communist Party, which is, in fact, the government of Soviet Russia."

Reagan had spent nearly four years in the U.S. Army Air Force making war propaganda films. No longer drawing a captain's pay, he was finally back on the payroll at Warner Brothers, with a salary of $3,500 a week, an large amount in 1945 currency. There was no immediate role for him, so he spent most of his days working on the construction of an unfinished ranch house surrounded by eight acres in North-bridge in the San Fernando Valley, which he and Jane had recently purchased.

Postwar Reagan: He's no longer the newest, hottest, or youngest actor in town.

"In my absence from the screen, a lot of new faces had emerged," he said. "Roles were going to Peter Lawford, Tom Drake, Robert Walker, Cornel Wilde, and there was talk that my friend, William Holden, and Burt Lancaster were going to become super stars."

According to George Murphy and Dick Powell, Reagan viewed Gregory Peck "as the hottest new kid on the block." Ironically, Peck was co-starring with his wife, Jane Wyman, in what would become a classic, The Yearling.

Although he had not yet found "the proper comeback picture for Ronnie," Jack Warner invited him to dinner. He later said at a dinner party, "A very different looking Ronald Reagan arrived at my door. He'd lost that pretty boy look he had when all the hot little starlets at my studio were chasing him. He'd become a man, with broader shoulders. He was also heavier. That boyish air he'd had was completely gone. After the war, Robert Taylor, Errol Flynn, Clark Gable, and Tyrone Power just weren't the pretty boys that caused women and teenage girls to swoon in the 1930s. Ronnie now numbered in that old group. The word handsome could still be used to describe these men, however."

Actually, in the ensuing years, Reagan became more interested in politics than he did in filmmaking, since the great roles he'd anticipated had eluded him, the ones he had expected after his appearance in Kings Row. He told actor Robert Montgomery, "The super stardom I'd dreamed about is not going to happen—and I know that."

"I can say the same thing about myself," Montgomery answered.

Despite his falling popularity, he could still point to a hefty paycheck. In 1946, he earned $150,000 a year as opposed to Humphrey Bogart who brought home "to my Betty" (Bacall) $432,000. Also at Warners, Errol Flynn earned just one dollar under $200,000, with Bette Davis, still queen of the lot, hauling away $328,000.

Hollywood "Commies" to the FBI.

"I set about joining "every organization I could find that would guarantee to save the world, although later, to my great regret and shame, I learned that many of these were nothing but communist front groups." Reagan wrote in a memoir.

"At the time, my aim was to save the world from Neo-Fascists. I overlooked the on-coming world nightmare of communist takeovers. Actually, in the beginning, I viewed many communists as liberals like myself. Some communists I considered misguided; others, of course, were far more dangerous. At the time, I was trying to separate a good communist from a bad communist, but I soon learned there was no good communist."

On the homefront, Reagan had a lot to overcome. He'd later write, "I was a bit introverted. I've been inclined to hold back a little of myself. In some ways, I think this reluctance to get close to people never left me completely."

Jane Wyman would certainly agree with that assessment, as would his children, Maureen and Michael, and later, even his future children with Nancy Davis: Patti Davis (who didn't want to use his last name as her own) and Ron Reagan, Jr. His son would eventually become a liberal like his father had been in the 1930s and 40s.

Reagan still defined himself as a "hemophiliac liberal," but the blood flow of his "bleeding heart" had been slowed down somewhat by the waste and greed he'd witnessed firsthand in government spending in World War II.

In the immediate post-war years, as he saw how corrupt Hollywood was, Reagan lost many of his idealistic beliefs. To an increasing degree, he began to express his fear that Communists were trying to take over the film industry for use as a propaganda vehicle, worldwide. At the time, 95% of the movies shown worldwide were conceived, scripted, and produced the United States. American films were drawing a weekly audience, worldwide, of 500,000,000, a staggering figure that's especially impressive, considering the population at the time.

Years later, Reagan recalled his own political shift to the right, "The light went on in some obscure region of my head. It took me a long time, but reality dawned. I came to condemn liberals, [one of which I had been], as lost in their own ideological myopia."

Reagan received a mysterious midnight visit at his home from three agents of the FBI. He'd been an informant to the FBI on a very casual basis since 1941, reporting on wartime conditions in Hollywood when he was making propaganda films for the government.

Until that late night meeting, Reagan's role had been only casual. But since the end of the war, J. Edgar Hoover had noticed the actor's increased political power and wanted him to become a weekly informant for information about—in the director's words—"Who's Red in Hollywood, and who's taking his marching orders from old Joe Stalin."

Reagan later asserted that his four-hour early dawn meeting with the FBI "opened my eyes about Moscow's attempt to take over the film industry and to use it for their own propaganda purposes."

In the months to come, during the "witch hunt" of communists in the film industry, Reagan—now identified internally, within the F.B.I. as "Agent T-10"— filed weekly reports with Hoover.

Under the Freedom of Information Act, his role was eventually made public, although not a lot was ever learned. Many pages, perhaps vital for understanding exactly what he did, were missing from the mass of documents As for those people in the industry whom Reagan had cited as communists, their names were blacked out.

As regards his role as a domestic spy for the FBI, he told Powell and Murphy, "I felt like I was acting out my Brass Bancroft Secret Service roles in the movies."

Before the war, Reagan had served on the Board of Directors of the Screen Actors Guild. After his discharge from the Army, Jane Wyman was influential in getting him reinstated. He would devote much of his time and energy during the next few years to the political activities of SAG, putting more energy into them than he did into his film career.

More drama as SAG's administration grows increasingly hostile to anything associated with socialism: (Left to right) George Murphy, Gene Kelly, Ronald Reagan, and William Holden.

Reagan became its third vice president in 1946. In 1947, Robert Montgomery resigned as president, because subsequent to becoming a film producer hiring actors, he viewed his duties at SAG as a conflict of interest. A special election awarded Reagan with the organization's presidency. Later, he was formally elected as SAG's full-time president, serving terms from 1947 to 1952, and again in 1959 to 1960, eventually serving an unprecedented six terms.

Director John Huston delivered a harsh appraisal of Reagan's presidency of SAG. "I think he hooked up with SAG for purely selfish reasons. He used it as a road to power and political influence. He only went into politics because he was washed up as an actor, appearing in horrible B pictures."

Reagan later confessed, "Although Jane was helpful in getting me back on the board, I didn't pay much attention to her suggestions. Perhaps I also ignored Anne Revere ("too radical"); Louise Beavers ("a champion of civil rights"); and Agnes Moorehead ("I never took to lesbians very much").

He paid more attention to the men, "even Frankenstein" (i.e., Boris Karloff), Edward Arnold, Walter Pidgeon, Pat O'Brien, and Dick Powell. "They made a lot of sense, but James Cagney, Henry Fonda, and John Garfield were leaning too far to the left," Reagan said.

"Of course, I listened to old friends, Robert Taylor and George Murphy, who were very conservative Republicans, as was Dick Powell."

A series of crippling strikes loomed in the film industry. In an emergency meeting, the SAG board, and later the membership, voted by a vast majority to adopt a no-strike policy, which Reagan endorsed. But the issues that would later divide Hollywood into warring camps were just beginning.

Since Reagan appeared to be anti-union, and had enormous influence within SAG, he developed powerful enemies, placing himself at risk of bodily harm.

When his positions became known, he was viewed as "anti-labor." This led to a series of threats against him, He received anonymous calls late at night, pressuring him to publicize the riots as a working class protest about wages, benefits, and hours, and not just an intra-mural battle between two competing unions, the CSU (Conference of Studio Unions) and IATSE (International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees). One caller shouted at him, "If you don't play ball, we'll throw acid in your face, and unless it's a remake of Frankenstein, you won't be able to make any more of your rotten movies."

The morning after receiving what he viewed as a very serious threat, Reagan drove to the security office at Warner Brothers. There, the staff issued him a .32 Smith & Wesson handgun. He mounted it in a holster strapped to his chest, inside his jacket.

From then on, during a period of seven months, he never went anywhere without it. Every night, a Burbank police officer stood outside his house until dawn. "If approached and threatened by a would-be assassin, I was prepared to shoot to kill," Reagan said.

He was later credited as one of the major forces that ended the labor strife. Jack Warner said, "Ronnie turned out to be a tower of strength, not only for the actors, but for the whole industry. He is to be praised by anyone working in the film industry."

"Ronnie was a worthy successor to Bob Montgomery and me as president of SAG," Murphy said. "He was well aware of the strange creatures crawling out from under make-believe rocks in our make-believe town. He was on the front line in exposing those in the industry who are as Red as a May Day Parade in Moscow."

The strikes slowly came to an end in 1947. "The communist-dominated unions dissolved, in Reagan's words, "like sugar in a hot cup of coffee."

Jack Warner loudly proclaimed, "I will fire anyone suspected of being a communist."

In all, Reagan calculated that the post-war strikes had cost the studios $150,000,000, with a loss of wages set at $28,000,000.

A week after reporting for work again at Warner Brothers, Reagan was summoned to the office of Jack Warner to discuss his future career.

"I've been mulling over what kind of movies you should make. Movie audiences have changed since your Brass Bancroft days."

"What do you think I'm best at?" Reagan asked. "I've got my own ideas, but you're the bossman."

"You're not romantic enough to step into Errol Flynn's shoes," Warner said. "I see you as Warners' answer to Cary Grant, in film scripts of parlor, bedroom, and bath."

"Personally, I like Westerns and outdoor pictures like what you've assigned for me in Stallion Road," Reagan said. "I'd like to appear in historical Civil War dramas. I'm a U.S. Cavalry/Indian buff, that kind of stuff. John Wayne will be rattling his saber as a Yankee soldier, I'm sure. I hear Ray Milland is getting in on the act, and you can bet your ass that Gregory Peck will do adventure stories, riding off into the setting sun, the wind blowing the cavalry guidons."

"Well, I'm not one to talk to so much about Civil War dramas," Warner said. "I turned down Gone With the

“What about putting me in baseball or football pictures?” Reagan asked. “I like films about sportsmanship, America’s pioneering spirit, courage under fire. I’m for depicting the violence needed to settle the West with all those redskins wanting our scalps. I’m sure your boy, Errol Flynn, will be making those kind of adventure films.”

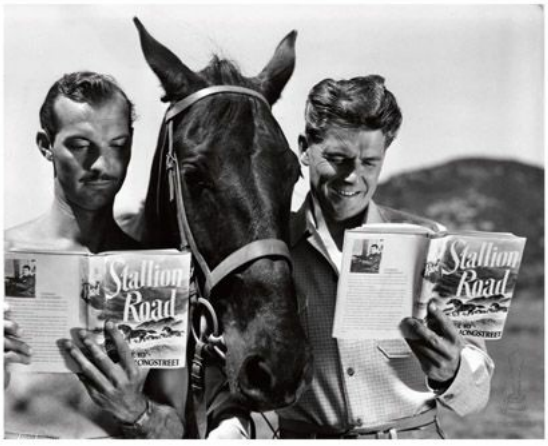
“Speaking of Flynn, he was set to star in Stallion Road, but I heard that he was drunk that day and the following night of his first appearance on the set. Some boys from the studio are trying to sober him up so I can bring him back to work on some other picture. I decided to drop Flynn when I heard that Bogart and Bacall each wanted to star in Stallion Road. They’re almost guaranteed box office these days. With them in the movie, you can make a comeback in a hit.”

To his chagrin, Reagan left Warner’s office with no clear guidance or insight into what his film future held. That afternoon, he met the director of Stallion Road. A New Yorker, James V. Kern seemed “an odd choice to direct a hoss opera” (Reagan’s words). He was known as a singer, songwriter, screenwriter, and actor. He’d previously helmed Jane Wyman, Ann Sheridan, and Alexis Smith in The Doughgirls (1944). He’d later achieve far greater success as one of the resident directors of the hit TV series of the 1950s, I Love Lucy.

Right before he left the studio, Kern introduced Reagan to the acclaimed Southern novelist, William Faulkner, who had been hired to write the script for Stallion Road.

Later, when Reagan was alone with Faulkner, the novelist told him, “I hate this god damn script based on that Stephen Longstreet novel. I’m working on this piece of shit for only one reason. I’m dead broke. I’m always dead broke. Why not lend me two-hundred dollars? But I’m warning you: I’ll forget to pay you back.”

Ten days before shooting began, Reagan received an emergency call from Kern. “Bogie and Bacall have dropped out of the picture.”



In this publicity photo, the film’s male leads Zachory Scott (left) and Reagan, are standing on either side of “Baby,” Reagan’s own horse. The men are each reading the original novel from which the movie script had derived.

“Any reason given?” Reagan asked.

“Bogie told Jack Warner he doesn’t like Westerns, and also that he didn’t want to work with you. He said he doesn’t like your witch hunt politics. I’ve replaced them with Zachory Scott and your friend, Alexis Smith. I worked smoothly with Jane and her in The Doughgirls.”

Within the week, Warner bluntly rejected Faulkner’s script and brought in Longstreet to try to write the screenplay from his own novel.

“It seemed that Longstreet had a lot of pokers in the fire,” Reagan said. “Before he left Warners that day, he gave me a copy of an unpublished novel of his. He told me it would make a great movie with me in the lead. I promised to read it over the weekend.”

Reagan with Alexis Smith, with whom he used to socialize as part of a double-dating ritual with his then-wife, Jane. After a misunderstanding with just the four of them together in Palm Springs, their friendship ended.

During his first week of work, Reagan was disappointed that Warner had cut the budget in half and would shoot Stallion Road not in Technicolor, as originally announced, but in black and white. “The loss of color was a pain in the ass,” Reagan told Kern. “Color would have given the crew a chance to shoot the beautiful scenery of the Sierra Madre Range, north of Los Angeles, with its lush setting of alpine meadows sweeping down to the waters of the Pacific.”

Reagan talked privately with Kern about the loss of Bogie and the subsequent casting of Scott. “I was hoping to ride Bogie’s shirttails to a big box office success to tell the world—REAGAN IS BACK!”

“At least you’re getting star billing,” Kern said. “With Bogie and Bacall, you’d have been reduced to the third lead.”

“Don’t get me wrong,” Reagan said. “Zach is a fine actor and, I’m sure, a pleasure to work with, even though he’s a homo.”

In the latest conception for Stallion Road, Reagan was cast as Larry Hanrahan, a horse breeder and a veterinarian, with Alexis interpreting the role of a rancher, Rory Teller, who visits Larry hoping that he can cure her ailing prize mare. He falls for her. So does his arriving friend, Stephen (as played by Scott), who is visiting the ranch as a setting for his next novel.

Along the way, Stephen and Rory have a falling out. Subsequently, Stephen steps in to form the third leg of a love triangle.

Stephen comes down with life-threatening anthrax. Rory to the rescue. She injects him with an untested serum, and he miraculously recovers. So does her love for him.

Nelle Reagan visited the set for three days in a row. She later told her son, “From what I’ve seen, Stallion Road will be a bigger picture than Gone With the Wind.”

“Ronnie and I both decided that the horrible old Production Code would work against luring people into movie theaters after the war,” Alexis said. “The reality of war increased the sophistication of audiences who wanted more realism in the movies. All over America, women were having children out of wedlock, for example. Also, segregation was breaking down.”

One scene Reagan remembered called for Alexis and him to get down from their horses, lie down under a tree, and kiss. She was lying beside him on the grass as his lips came down over hers.

Suddenly, Kern called out, “CUT! You look like you’re fucking her! Raise yourself up a bit and rest yourself on one elbow!”

“We reshot the scene,” Reagan said. “I had to make love to Alexis on one elbow.”

During the filming of Stallion Road, Reagan was introduced to Count Nino Pepitone by Dan Dailey, the singer/actor. Pepitone had been an officer and expert equestrian in the very stylish Italian Cavalry during World War II. The two men bonded. Reagan eventually hired Pepitone as his riding coach and later as manager of his eight-acre ranch in the San Fernando Valley. He'd named the place "Yearling Row" after Jane's successful movie with Gregory Peck.

He and Pepitone constructed paddock fences and a quarter-mile racetrack. "Every post hole for the inner rail posts was dug by me," Reagan said.

In the future, Pepitone would also manage Reagan's second ranch, which lay in the more distant Malibu Hills.

Pepitone sold Reagan his alltime favorite horse, a black thoroughbred which Reagan named Baby. "I fell in love with that horse," Reagan said. "It was that horse I used in Stallion Road." At the ranch, he and Pepitone began to breed thoroughbreds, selling them at yearling sales.

Stallion Road took only 109 days to shoot, a record for Reagan. It was wrapped in March of 1947.

The box office was poor. In Mississippi, Faulkner went to see the movie, and later wrote Reagan a note: "The horses stole the picture from you guys."

In a direct confrontational style usually associated with Bette Davis in her dealings with Warner Brothers, Reagan, instead of passively waiting for his next role, entered a meeting with Jack Warner armed with two script proposals of his own. He had never been this bold before.

Still hoping to make him a big star, Warner listened patiently. Reagan had read the script of Bogie's next movie, The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (1948), a Warner project slated for direction by John Huston, who had also written its screenplay. It wasn't the lead, but Reagan wanted to play a character named Cody, who tries—with an evil coven—to find gold in the mountains. In the film, he dies during his efforts to do so.

One morning over coffee at his breakfast table, Reagan read that the role had gone to Bruce Bennett, who, billing himself as Herman Brix, had played Tarzan. Reagan had last seen him on screen as Joan Crawford's discarded husband in her Oscar-winning Mildred Pierce.

At a glittering Hollywood gala, Jane Wyman presented a united front, disguising her alienation from her then-husband, Ronald Reagan.

[Years later, during their co-starring gigs as competitive brothers in The Last Outpost (1951), Reagan and Bennett would laugh about their having competed for the role.]

Reagan also had read Stephen Longstreet's latest script and pitched it to Warner, claiming that it would be ideal as a Western for him. It was the Civil War drama that Reagan had mentioned he'd like to film one day. Warner had promised to review the script.

Once again, to his disappointment, Reagan read in Variety that the picture, based on the Longstreet project, was scheduled for filming and direction by two men well known to him, Raoul Walsh and his wartime Army boss, Owen Crump. Warner had decided that the role, with its exciting Civil War scenes, would go to none other than Errol Flynn, the star he'd previously rejected for Stallion Road.

Had Reagan succeeded in getting the role, he would have co-starred with Ann Sheridan, with whom he'd had a long-enduring affair and with whom he was still on friendly terms.

Reagan would never get cast in a Western at Warners. After he was dumped by his boss, he starred in Westerns made by other studios during his declining years in the movies.

During the filming of Stallion Road, Reagan had many long talks with Alexis Smith. She was not only his friend, but Jane's confidante, and one of the few people in Hollywood who knew about his disintegrating marriage to Jane.

At one point, he pleaded with her, asking her for some guidance, with the purpose of "getting Jane to come back to me. As you know, we're secretly separated, although she comes around to see our kids."

Alexis warned him not to pressure Jane. "She and Lew Ayres have this thing going, and you've got to let it play out, for better or worse. Her affair with him may lead to your divorce, but, again, it may not. It may peter out—forgive the pun—and she'll come back to you."

"You mean, I've got to wait and see, since it seems our future is entirely in her hands."

Jane did not want the press to learn about her marital difficulties. While Reagan was filming Stallion Road, she was queried about a dual-career marriage. When America's young men were returning from the war, the questions most often being asked was, "Will women become wives and mothers, leaving business to the male breadwinners?"

Jane defended working women: "Thousands of nice young couples all over the country have two jobs in one family, and they do all right. They adjust to it and to one another because they want to get along. There's no reason why two actors can't do the same thing if they're in love and don't start thinking themselves big. Our marriage is working for us."

Obviously, she didn't believe in being truthful. She also claimed, "Having children is not a reason for a woman to give up work."

Reagan faced a lonely time in his life, although he had support from his friends, Robert Taylor, William Holden, George Murphy, and Dick Powell, all of whom found him depressed and defeated. "He was a builder-upper, not a tearer-downer," Murphy said. "He'd put his heart into his marriage to Jane. She was the bedrock of his family, which had included Michael and Maureen growing up. Both of them still mourned the loss of Christine, the infant who died."

At one of the lowest points in his life, "an English Rose," actress Patricia Roc, entered Reagan's life. Beautiful and alluring, she was hailed by producer J. Arthur Rank as "the archetypal British Beauty, the Goddess of the Odeons, a blue-eyed brunette with porcelain skin."

Some of her fans defined Patricia Roc as “the most beautiful woman in England, our answer to Hedy Lamarr.” Her notorious affairs earned her the nickname “Bed Roc.”

Reagan was among her conquests. She later claimed that she prevented him from committing suicide.

Before meeting Reagan, Roc, in London, was referred to as “Bed Roc,” because of her numerous affairs. One of them was with actor Michael Wilding, with whom she’d filmed The Farmer’s Wife in 1941. As Roc recalled, “I had him long before Elizabeth Taylor.”

Roc later said, “I was surprised that a man of Ronnie’s dignity would stoop so low as to marry such a little, loud, brassy blonde like Jane Wyman. He deserved a woman of more finesse and dignity, with more sophistication. He found me warm, earthy, and sexually inviting.”

On her second day in Hollywood, Roc dined with Walter Wanger, producer of Canyon Passage (1946), at the celebrity-haunted Brown Derby. Two tables away she spotted Reagan talking with Adolphe Menjou. Throughout the meal, Reagan kept looking at her. When Wanger noticed, he warned her, “Don’t bother. He’s a bore. I’m sure he and that Right Winger Menjou are talking about Reds under the bed.”

Finally, Menjou left and so did Wanger, but Roc chose to remain behind. So did Reagan. After their respective dining companions left, he got up and came over to her table, asking if he could join her.

He told her that during the war, when he’d worked in propaganda films, his staff had been sent some of the patriotic movies she’d made in Britain, including Let the People Sing (1941) and We’ll Meet Again (1943), co-starring Vera Lynn, the title based on her biggest World War II hit when she was “the most beloved songbird in Britain.” He congratulated her for her contribution to the war effort.

He asked for her phone number. She told him, “I’ll give that to you and a lot more. But why don’t we drop by your place, and you may get more than my phone number.”

She later admitted, “He seemed shy, and I made it easy for him. He didn’t seem happy cheating on his wife, but a man’s desire won out. I left the next morning.”

Roc was not only beautiful, but a femme fatale who specialized in seducing married men. She was always the epitome of elegance, style, and fashion.

In 1945, the year Reagan met her, she’d scored hits in two English-made studio melodramas about Thomas Gainsborough, the 18th-century English portrait and landscape painter. They included Madonna of the Seven Moons, and the aptly named The Wicked Lady.

After that, she came to Hollywood to film Canyon Passage (1946), the only movie she’d make there. The stars of that picture were Dana Andrews, Susan Hayward (Reagan’s former girlfriend), Ward Bond, Andy Devine, and Lloyd Bridges.

“I found Ronnie very personable, good looking, but depressed,” Roc later said in an interview. “He was still very much in love with his wife, yet became fascinated with me. We went to bed on our first date together, and after that, he wanted to monopolize me. But I was dating others.”

“If I went to dinner with another man, Ronnie would tip the waiter to get a table next to mine, where he would sit alone and just stare at me.”

“I became deeply fond of him, but rather as one becomes fond of a lost child. We became lovers because, quite frankly, I was scared and lonely on my arrival in Hollywood, and sex seemed the only thing to alleviate his utter misery. I was seriously concerned that he might do something to himself if I didn’t make him feel that somebody wanted him, because his wife sure as hell didn't."

"Of course, we had to be extremely careful how and where we met, especially as he was still locked into one of the highest profile marriages in Hollywood. We could both have lost our contracts had we been caught. He really fell in love with me, even though expressing his deep love for Wyman. He even followed me on location where I was making Canyon Passage. I couldn't turn around without falling all over him."

While waiting for Roc to finish her scene for the day, Reagan accidentally came face to face with the film's star, Susan Hayward, whom he had not seen since their torrid affair of the late 1930s. According to the film's director, Jacques Tourneur, "Susan walked right past Reagan and didn't speak to him. Later, I found out why. He'd dumped her for Jane Wyman back in 1940."

Unknown to Reagan on the afternoon of his visit, Roc had just spent two hours in the dressing room of the male star of the picture, Dana Andrews.

A "fair damsel" as "sex crazed" as Roc did not want to confine her amorous pursuits just to Reagan. She was also seen dating Lloyd Bridges, Cary Grant, Errol Flynn, and Brian Donlevy. Character actor Ward Bond developed a powerful crush on her, but she tried, perhaps unsuccessfully, to keep "Uncle Ward" at bay.

As her biographer, Michael Hodgson, noted, "In real life, Patricia's effect on men was to prove devastating. Had things gone differently, Nancy Davis might never have become Reagan's wife, and he might not have survived to enter the White House."

Reagan told Dick Powell, "Patricia Roc has instant sex appeal, I don't know what it is. This stunning, blue-eyed brunette has put a spell over me. At least she can make me forget about Jane for a while."

It was during his affair with Roc that Reagan suffered a nervous breakdown, which led to thoughts of suicide. He conveyed to Roc that at times in the middle of the night, he thought about killing himself, leaving Nelle and Jane to take care of Maureen and Michael.

"I found him just wretched and miserable," she said. "He adored Wyman and his family, and just couldn't understand why or how she had completely lost interest in him. She was bored with his political interests and his intense involvement in the Screen Actors Guild. She resented what she called 'his obsession with the threat of communism.'"

"If I had been older and more experienced, I would have realized how deeply he was suffering and would have urged him to seek psychiatric help. He told me, 'Life just isn't worth living anymore. I don't see the point of going on.' Night after night, I tried to talk him out of suicide. His depression affected our love life. On many a night, he was unable to perform like a man should."

"I hate to say this, but when Ronnie is in love, he looks like a sick parrot," Roc later told her biographer, Michael Hodgson.

"Sometimes, after he left my place, Ronnie told me he would drive over to Lew Ayres' home, park his car across the street from his doorway, and just sit there until three or four o'clock in the morning. Just waiting and looking, either watching the lights go on or off in the house or Wyman and Ayres returning home late from some nightclub."

"When I left him in Hollywood, he seemed heartbroken," Roc claimed. "He begged me to stay. He had taken up heavy drinking, often in the company of his friend, William Holden. I don't know how good a friend Bill was. He was very charming, very sexy. Once, when Ronnie was called away for a night shoot, he asked Bill to pick me up and escort me to a premiere. Behind Ronnie's back, he propositioned me after taking me to dinner and the show. Did I go to bed with Bill Holden? I'll never tell!"

For the premiere of the British film, Scott of the Antarctic, Reagan had a reunion with Roc at the film's Royal Command Film Performance at the Odeon on London's Leicester Square in November of 1948. Both he and Roc appeared on the stage. [Reagan was in London at the time filming The Hasty Heart with Patricia Neal, whom he was also dating.]

Britannia Rules!

Ultimately Reagan lost the battle for the affections of Patricia Roc to Anthony Steel, England's "Mr. Beefcake," depicted above.

That night, he presented Roc with a beautiful ruby ring. Backstage at the Royal Film Performance with her, Christine Norden, the British sex symbol, overheard Roc claim, "I love rubies. They are so hot. Just like sex!"

"Reagan came back to live with me at my London flat on Hallam Street, where he repeatedly asked me—begged me, really—to marry him." Roc said. "He told me that before leaving America, Wyman had denounced him. 'She called me a bore and told me she wanted a divorce.' Ronnie looked utterly damaged. I had to have a lot of sex, and, as was the case with him in Hollywood, he often could not perform."

"We said our goodbyes and it was obvious that he was suffering during his departure from London. I felt sorry for him, but I didn't love him. A new man had entered my life."

He turned out to be André Thomas, a French cameraman, who became her second husband in 1949.

Despite the bonds of her recent marriage, Roc soon fell under the spell of Anthony Steel, England's "Mr. Beefcake," during their making of the film, Something Money Can't Buy (1952). "Tony had this animal magnetism that Ronnie didn't possess, and he was very, very very good in bed, unlike Ronnie. We didn't always use protection, which led to the birth of my son. André forgave me for my indiscretion, but I suspect that he always believed that Ronald Reagan was the father of my son."

When Roc was interviewed shortly before her death, a reporter noted a "wicked twinkle in her eye" at the mention of Reagan's name. "I think I saved his life. And you know, had I accepted his proposal, I would have made a rather good First Lady, would-n't I? But the thought of living the rest of my life in America was more than I could bear."

At her home in Minusio, overlooking Lake Maggiore in Switzerland, Roc always kept a photograph of Reagan and herself, each of them gazing deeply into the other's eyes. It was still resting on her piano right after Christmas in 2003, when she died at the age of 88.

Today, Patricia Roc is defined by British film historians as "The Fairest of the Fair, the most beautiful girl ever to appear in British cinema."

"I was ashamed of my next picture," Reagan told Dick Powell. "I could not bear to sit through it."

He was referring to That Hagen Girl (1947), whose co-star had been Shirley Temple, the most famous child star of the 1930s.

"From the moment I first read the script, I did not like my role of Tom Bates, a man in love with a girl half his age. Jack Warner insisted I do it. So did the director Peter Godfrey. I didn't want to lose that weekly paycheck, which was keeping me going, so I went for it."

"The picture didn't help Shirley either," Reagan said. "She was transitioning from a beloved child actress to a teenager in love, and the public didn't quite accept her. To them, she was still sailing on The Good Ship Lollipop."

David O. Selznick, who held Temple's contract, later met Reagan at a party. "I lent her to Jack Warner because, quite frankly, I didn't know what in hell to do with her anymore now that she'd filled out."

Warner was hoping to achieve the success of Irving Reis' The Bachelor and the Bobby Soxer (1947), which had teamed Temple with Cary Grant. But in that movie, Temple merely had a puppy crush on Grant. His real romantic interest centered on (the fully adult) Myrna Loy.

Charles Hoffman had to draft three separate scripts before Godfrey agreed to green-light the movie.

In the film, Mary Hagen was rumored to be the illegitimate offspring of a union between a demented heiress and a local war hero. She finds friendship in a teacher (Lois Maxwell) and with a young would-be suitor (Rory Calhoun). Mostly, she is shunned by the judgmental, gossipy townspeople.

As released in Holland, the film was retitled "Scandale!" a prophetically apt name.

After the war, lawyer Tom Bates (Reagan) returns to town a decorated war hero. Slowly he falls in love with the very young Mary in spite of the circulating rumors that he was her father. Predictably, a scandal ensues.

The first day he met Temple, Reagan joked with her: "I hope you're no longer a communist." He was referring to a ridiculous report back in 1938 when at the age of ten she was called to testify before HUAC. It was all a mistake, and she was exonerated and later became a friend of J. Edgar Hoover, at one time sitting on his knee within F.B.I. headquarters.

Temple's opinion of Reagan? "If only he looked younger, or I older."

At one point near the end of the film, Reagan had to jump into cold water eight different times to rescue the character being played by Temple from a suicide attempt. By the time the scene finally pleased the British director, Reagan had caught viral pneumonia and was hospitalized. He nearly died. It was at this same time that Jane gave birth to Christine, their daughter who died a few hours later.

An unlikely, and ultimately disastrous, screen duo: A post-adolescent Shirley Temple, shown here with her middle-aged romantic interest, Ronald Reagan.

Reagan's hospitalization caused serious delays in the film's production. Matters became more complicated when Shirley announced that she was pregnant, her condition growing more obvious by the day. [She had recently, and impetuously, married a philandering heartthrob, John Agar.] As a means of viewers looking too closely at her thickening frame, her scenes and the delivery of her lines had to be rushed, often ruining the shreds of dramatic flair they might have conveyed. In faraway shots, her (non-pregnant) double was used.

When he was finally able to return to work, Reagan strenuously objected to the ending, in which he leaves town, with Temple, aboard a train, presumably with the intention of marrying her. Reagan would have preferred that his character board the train alone, with the understanding that she'd then be free to marry her young lover, as played by Calhoun.

Ex-con and serial seducer, Rory Calhoun, with "that horny eternal virgin," Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm.

"At least," censors noted, "he was closer to her age than that lecherous character played by Reagan."

Godfrey, however, saw nothing wrong with the original script's ending. "After all," Reagan said, "he was married to jail bait himself. His wife was young enough to be his daughter."

An audience's reaction at a sneak preview proved that Reagan was right. When he appeared in a scene with Temple near the end of the film and said, "I love you," some viewers walked out; others booed. "I sank down in my seat and waited for the audience to file out before I dared show my face outside," he recalled.

Based on that informal survey, Godfrey ordered that the offending scene be deleted from the film's final version. Its deletion re duced an already confusing movie into something almost incomprehensible.

"Of all my leading ladies, I had the least chemistry with Shirley than I ever had with any actress in the past." Reagan claimed. "Elizabeth Taylor might have pulled it off. In spite of all those years in front of a camera, Shirley could not act."

Temple ultimately had the last word about That Hagen Girl: "As movie kissers go, Reagan is not bad at all. In fact, he was very, very good."

The reviews generated by the film were so devastating that they hastened the end of Temple's screen career. That Hagen Girl was defined as "a foamy dud" and "an uninspired soap opera." Temple's acting was dismissed as "wooden," and Reagan was cited as "hopelessly miscast."

Time magazine, in its November 10, 1947 issue, lacerated the picture. "Moviegoers with very strong stomachs may be able to view an appearance of rebated incest as a romantic situation."

In Moscow, The Daily Worker wrote: "Shirley is just Shirley. But Reagan! A philosophic father and sweetheart to the same girl. Odd."

One critic wrote: "In one scene, Shirley Temple attempts suicide. Too bad she did not succeed."

The New York Times wrote, "Poor, put-upon Shirley looks most ridiculous through it all. She acts with the mopish dejection of a school child who has just been robbed of a two-scoop ice cream cone."

That Hagen Girl was featured in the 1978 anthology The Fifty Worst Films of All Time. When Reagan ran for political office, all prints of the film mysteriously disappeared, but a few of them re-emerged in 1990 and were subsequently shown on Turner Classic Movies. Its resurrection vastly amused Reagan's political enemies, who subsequently mocked him as a "child molester."

As a footnote, during the filming of That Hagen Girl, Reagan had dated Lois Maxwell, who was cast in the movie as a sympathetic teacher, Julia Kane, a figure who might have made a more suitable romantic choice for Reagan, as Tom Bates, to romance.

Instead, Reagan dated her off screen, going out with her on about four dates during the course of the filming. On their first date, she told him that her original name had been Lois Ruth Hooker.

"No wonder you changed it," he said.

During one of their outings, he escorted her to a Life magazine photo shoot in which she posed with an up-and-coming actress. Reagan found himself shaking the hand of a striking blonde. He held her hand for an extended time, and seemed mesmerized by her allure.

He would remember her long after the photo shoot. He and Marilyn Monroe would meet again many times in his future.

The outdoor adventure film that Reagan had been promised never happened. Jack Warner called him and told him that his attempt to hire Cary Grant had failed, and that Reagan was needed at once to report to London-born director Irving Rapper for a role as an army sergeant on leave during World War II in New York.

The script was based on one of the most successful of Broadway plays in the 1940s, The Voice of the Turtle. "It was written by that British fag, John Van Druten," Warner told Reagan.

As the play's star on Broadway, Margaret Sullavan, who had been married to Henry Fonda, had generated rave reviews. "I've tried to negotiate with the bitch, but to no avail," Warner lamented. "What a whore! She never met a highway pickup she didn't go for. You wouldn't want to work with a dame like that."

"Then who are you going to cast as my leading lady?" Reagan asked. "I think June Allyson would be ideal if you can get Louis B. Mayer to release her."

Because of the wide variety of roles she played, Eleanor Parker was called “the woman of a thousand faces.” Here, depicted romantically with Reagan in The Voice of the Turtle, her makeup and hairdo evoke Margaret Sullavan.

“I’m casting Eleanor Parker,” Warner answered.

At the time, Parker was one of the stars at Warners who had emerged during the war. Reagan had not seen her performance in the remake of Of Human Bondage (1946), in which she played W. Somerset Maugham’s mean-spirited waitress-prostitute.

Reagan protested, wanting to co-star with a bigger name. “Listen, Ronnie, my boy,” Warner said. “You used to be very cooperative. Now you’re protesting everything like some grand diva. You don’t have box office clout, not that you ever did. If you want that paycheck to continue coming in, you’ll let me direct your career. Also, to put it mildly, I’m god damn pissed off at your union activities.”

That Monday morning, Reagan reported to work and was greeted by Rapper, who had previously scored a hit helming Bette Davis in Now, Voyager (1942).

During their talk together, Rapper told him that he’d recently talked with Davis. “I told her I was directing you in your new movie. She said. “Watch out for little Ronnie Reagan.’”

Playing a wannabee actress, Eleanor Parker (center) tries to separate man-eating Eve Arden from her soldier boyfriend (Reagan).

“What in hell did she mean?” Reagan asked.

“Only Bette knows what Bette means,” Rapper said. “We have this love-hate relationship.”

“What I have with Bette I would-n’t call love,” Reagan said.

Rapper gave him the finished script from Van Druten, who had also written the screen version. Rapper said that within a few days, Reagan would meet the co-stars. They included Eve Arden, Wayne Morris, Kent Smith, John Emery, and Nino Pepitone, Reagan’s horse-breeding friend from the Italian cavalry. Pepitone needed a job, and Reagan had used his influence to get him cast in the movie as a headwaiter.

The Voice of the Turtle revolves around an aspiring actress, Sally Middleton (Parker), who has come to New York to conquer Broadway. Her friend is Olive Lashbrooke (Arden), a promiscuous man-chaser who doesn't believe in chastity.

Because Olive's weekend date, Bill Page (Reagan), can't find any hotel space in wartime New York, Olive maneuvers Sally into housing him in her new apartment. Despite their mutual reserve, love wins in the end, and Bill and Sally become romantic.

When he first met Parker, Reagan thought she was Margaret Sullavan. [In a nod to Sullavan's success in the Broadway version, Warner had ordered that Parker's hair and makeup be inspired by that of her predecessor.]

"What in hell does 'Voice of the Turtle' mean?" he asked Parker.

"Rapper told me it comes from the Old Testament's Song of Solomon," she said, and that it's a reference, like many other of the passages within that book, to erotic love."

> For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.

"Oh, I see…Turtle as in turtle dove," he said. "Well, here I am, back in my military clothes again. But in the army, we didn't have such well-tailored uniforms."

He later recalled, "After I played my first scene with Parker, I had no more reservations about her. The question became, could I hold my own with such a talented actress?"

Over lunches and between takes, they got to know each other. Although he admitted to Rapper that he found her "extremely attractive," there would be no Leadinglady-itis. She had recently married film producer Bert E. Friedlob, and "she seemed very involved on the home front," Reagan said. "And, of course, I had my ongoing woes with Jane. The air was not made for a romantic attachment, although it might have been diverting…for me, at least."

On his last day on the set, Reagan wished her luck in her future. "Perhaps we'll work together again."

"Perhaps," she said. "Things have a way of working out for me. I maintain that if you work, believe in yourself, and do what is right for you without stepping all over others, the way somehow opens up."

"That is the most un-Hollywood philosophy I have ever heard in my life, especially in dog-eat-dog Hollywood," he said.

On the set of The Voice of the Turtle, he was reunited with Wayne Morris, with whom he'd made those Brother Rat movies. The former Golden Boy of Warners never regained his footing in films after the war. He told Reagan, "If you hadn't come along, I would have won Jane for myself."

For Reagan, The Voice of the Turtle was a modest success. His reviews were tepid. "At least I wasn't attacked." A typical overview appeared in Newsweek. "Ronald Reagan turns in a pleasantly sensitive performance as the sergeant."

J. Edgar Hoover, with a lot of right-wing help, launched the most sweeping and penetrating witch hunts in American history. He saw Red everywhere, a river of conspiratorial corruption whose tentacles, he claimed, incorporated the highest offices in Washington, as well as most of the movie studios and film stars in Hollywood. The hunt was on to ferret out communists in all walks of life, but mostly in politics and the film colony. In the "Red Scare" that J. Edgar spearheaded in the aftermath of World War II, lives, friendships, reputations, and careers would be destroyed.

The very conservative J. Parnell Thomas, a former stockbroker, had been elected seven times as New Jersey's representative in Congress before being sent to prison for nine months on charges of corruption. Prior to his downfall, he was an avowed anti-communist. He claimed that the Federal Theatre Project presented nothing but "sheer communism propaganda."

He seemed to have a special aversion to Hollywood. When Thomas became chairman of the House Un-American Activities Committee, J. Edgar supported him totally. The FBI fed Thomas a constant stream of accusations as to who was a communist and who might make a friendly witness before HUAC.

In May of 1947, Thomas and his chief aides visited Hollywood on a "fact-finding" mission. He held several secret meetings with Reagan, who promised his full support in "weeding out the Hollywood garden of Red weeds."

Thomas returned to Washington to launch his investigations of HUAC, with America's radios and early televisions tuned in. At first only friendly witnesses were called. Many of the spectators wanted not only to hear who was a communist, but to view the testimonial performances of movie heartthrobs who included Gary Cooper and Robert Taylor.

Reagan arrived days before the hearings for secret meetings with Hoover and his lover, Clyde Tolson, Hoover's chief aide at the FBI. Reagan promised his full cooperation. Because of his connections with SAG, he claimed "I'm in the ideal post to go after the commies polluting our industry."

Accompanied by the sound of popping flashbulbs, Reagan's appearance before HUAC hardly prompted the heartthrob hysteria brought on by the testimonies of sexpots Taylor and Cooper.

Having already promised to combat the movie industry's "domination by communists, radicals, and crackpots," Reagan had volunteered to appear before HUAC.

He looked rather studious in a white gabardine suit complete with thick glasses. As president of SAG, he claimed he had always opposed communist propaganda. "I do not believe that the communists have ever at any time been able to use the motion picture screen as a sounding board for their ideology." He contradicted testimony by Robert Taylor in that regard.

Before the committee, he seemed to be undergoing a major political change, drifting uncomfortably from an FDR New Deal liberal into a conservative Republican. On some weeks he would take one position, appealing to his liberal friends, and at another time he would be turning them in as suspected communists.

Earlier, he'd told Hoover that "I am firmly convinced that the Congress should declare the Communist Party illegal."

After his testimonies, he hurriedly left Washington for a return to Hollywood and his marital woes.

After Reagan's return to Hollywood, Alexis Smith tried to bring about a reconciliation between Jane and her distraught husband. Along with Smith's husband, Craig Stevens, she invited the estranged couple to drive east with them into the desert for a long weekend of rest in Palm Springs. Friends had made their vacation home available to Alexis and Stevens.

"I had to do a lot of persuading, but Jane has agreed to come with us," Alexis said. "I used the argument, 'You must do it for the children if not for Ronnie.' She was very hesitant, but finally agreed. Actually, to tell the truth, I think she wants to make Lew Ayres jealous."

Reagan had won the sympathy of Alexis when they had co-starred together in Stallion Road, his first picture after the war. As for Stevens, he was up for a major role in one of Reagan's upcoming pictures, Night Unto Night.

At the time of the ill-fated trip to Palm Springs, Alexis and Stevens had become Jane and Reagan's closest friends, and both of them were saddened at Jane's separation from her husband.

In Hollywood, Good Friends Should Swing Together. (aka "Going Too Far with Ronnie and Jane."

As Jane once told Ann Sheridan, "Alexis and I often drift off somewhere to indulge in girl talk, but Craig hangs out with Ronnie. He seems to worship him."

Stevens had told Jane, "Everything I ever knew about politics I learned from Ronnie."

Reagan seemed pleased to have such a devoted person listening to his political views. But Jane was suspicious. "Craig and Ronnie sometimes went for an occasional weekend together, like a sailing trip to Catalina," Jane told Sheridan. "When he gets back, I always ask Ronnie what happened."

"If you're implying anything, don't," Reagan warned her. "I had initial suspicions about Craig, but not now. He's had plenty of chances if he wanted to move in on me, and he's been a perfect gentleman. When we've been in a small cabin and had to share the same bed, nothing happened. Forget your fears. He's married to one of the most beautiful women in Hollywood. What makes you think he wants a man?"

"I didn't have the heart to tell you, but Joan Crawford told me that Alexis is a lesbian," Jane said. "Crawford thinks Craig and Alexis have a lavender marriage."

"I only learned what that meant a few weeks ago," he said. "You know the same is said about our friends, Bob Taylor and Babs Stanwyck. I don't believe it's true. I've also gone away with Bob. He's all man, with an eye for the ladies."

"Crawford told me more," Jane said. "She suspects that Craig had an affair with her husband, Phillip Terry. As for Terry himself, Crawford told me he had an affair with Bob Taylor."

"You're nothing but a little Hedda Hopper today," Reagan said. "Okay, since you're spreading rumors, let me reveal a few about you. It was rumored that when you made Magic Town, you had an affair with Jimmy Stewart. That's not all. You were said to also have had an affair with Wild Bill Wellman" [i.e., director William Wellman].

"Well, maybe I did, smart ass," Jane said, walking out of the room.

"Now that you've become a big star, you'll be hearing a lot more rumors spread about yourself, and you'll get bad press."

[Reagan's prophecy came true.]

Jane still managed to enchant both Louella Parsons and Hedda Hopper, but columnist Hy Gardner in the months ahead began making digs at her. He had been hired as an entertainment reporter and syndicated columnist for The New York Herald-Tribune.

He once wrote: "Jane Wyman, that woman unlike the genuine cream of the cinema crop, whose names are box office magic, seems to consider the approach of a reporter as an irksome intrusion upon the privacy of a high-priced public goldfish."

Jane retreated to Palm Springs that weekend with Reagan, Alexis, and Stevens. But she returned alone. Reagan later left the villa where Stevens and Alexis were staying and checked into a hotel, as he needed a few days' rest after the pressure he'd faced in Washington delivering his testimony before HUAC.

When word of this reached gossipy Hollywood, it was assumed that Reagan's attempted reconciliation with his estranged wife had failed. But Joan Blondell later reported a very different version of what happened that weekend. Blondell claimed that she heard only a very sketchy version from Jane.

"Ronnie and I did not get back together," Jane told her. "We also ended our friendship with Craig and Alexis."

"After buttering us up for months, making us think they were friends who liked our company, it turned out that they liked more than that," Jane said. "Friday night went beautifully. The house had two bedrooms. The four of us talked openly. It was suggested, and Ronnie and I agreed, that we would not share a bed our first night back together. We'd wait and see how things went that Saturday."

"But by midnight, we found out that wasn't the real reason Craig slept with Ronnie and Alexis bedded with me. As I was drifting off, she started feeling my breasts, wanting to make love to me. Ronnie experienced much the same assault. He was half asleep when he felt Craig's lips come down on his, and his hand feeling the family jewels. We both packed our bags, and I headed back to Lew Ayres. Ronnie rented a hotel room and stayed on."

Blondell responded, "The war brought a lot of changes in sexual attitudes, and in post-war Hollywood, there's a lot of that shit going on. I know there is. Wife-swapping's been around for a long time. But now there's a new game out here. It's about sexual bonding, husband to husband, and lovemaking among wives."

"Count me out!" Jane responded.

Although both Hedda Hopper and Louella Parsons had publicly forecast that the marriage of Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan might be "everlasting," each of them was eager to rush into print with headlines. "RONALD REAGAN SCOUTS MARITAL BREAK," wrote Hopper. In even bigger headlines, Parsons announced, WYMAN, MATE IN RIFT. Jane got the focus in the headline because by then, she was by far the bigger star.

After the appearances of those "scoops," Reagan called each of the columnists directly, telling them "It's only a 'tift.' All married couples have them. I'm confident that we'll solve our problems and have a long and happy life."

When Louella Parsons heard that Jane was making indiscreet remarks about Reagan's sexual performance, she lectured her severely. In her column in a 1948 issue of Photoplay, the columnist wrote: “It is unfortunate but true that Hollywood can shrug off most marriage crack-ups. But when they are Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan—well — we just can’t take that. For eight years, they have shared a beautiful life that has earned them the respect and admiration even of people who did not know them personally. To those of us who are close friends, they were an ideal Mr. and Mrs. That’s why this hurts so much!”

Rosemary DeCamp, the actress, had been one of the first to recognize an animosity coming from Jane, whose impatience with Reagan was clearly evident during the course of a SAG meeting. In the middle of a verbose speech by Reagan that went on and on, Jane stood up. “Oh, for god’s sake, Ronnie, shut up and go shit in your hat.”

Months before the actual filing of the divorce, Hollywood gossips and the town’s press corps were speculating about a warring twosome who had, throughout World War II and the years leading up to it, been defined as Tinseltown’s “Most Ideal Couple.”

For the most part, the press took Reagan’s side, concluding that he was the wronged party. In the spring of 1948, Fredda Dudley in Silver Screen magazine wrote: “Hollywood sympathy in this case is one hundred percent behind Ronnie, who is a prince. Jane is a moody person, temperamental, ambitious, restless, and seeking; furthermore, she is not now and hasn’t been well for some time. It is to be hoped, that as her health improves, her other problems will vanish, and that two of the town’s favorite people will resume their marriage.”

Parsons warned Jane, “You’re losing a good, decent family man. They are hard to find in Tinseltown. Most of the men out here are looking for a good man themselves.”

For Reagan’s birthday on February 6, 1948, Jane presented him with a turquoise-colored Cadillac, but signed the card, “Love, Michael and Maureen.” Then she flew to Las Vegas for a quickie divorce.

Once in Las Vegas, she checked into the Flamingo Hotel. According to the Los Angeles Examiner, on February 27, 1948, “She was seen in the casinos and out dancing every night with a different man, her various beaux having one thing in common: Youth and beauty.”

But within a week, she flew back to Los Angeles, telling a reporter, “I couldn’t stand the wind blowing in from the desert.”

Later, she told Reagan, “There is no chance for us. I’m filing for divorce and charging extreme mental cruelty.”

Years later, during recollections of her years with Reagan to her Catholic priest, Robert Perrella, as well as to her girlfriends, June Allyson and Paulette Goddard, Jane claimed, “It was exasperating to awake in the middle of the night, prepare for work, and have someone at the breakfast table, newspaper in hand, expound on the far right, the far left, the conservative right, the conservative left, the middle-of-the-roader.”

When Reagan was told that his leading lady would be Patricia Neal, he didn’t know who she was.

Producer Jerry Wald told him, “Jack Warner has the hots for her. She’s only twenty-two. He wants to configure this Southern belle from Tennessee as Warner’s answer to Greta Garbo.”

Reagan didn’t think it was believable that “a hick from Tennessee would be hailed as a new Garbo.”

On June 28, 1948, the inevitable happened: Jane filed a petition for divorce. Reagan did not show up in court, but was represented by an attorney, William Berger. Jane’s lawyer was Lloyd Wright, who had represented some of the biggest names in Hollywood at the time of their divorces, ranging from Mary Pickford to Charlie Chaplin, even Mae West. (Yes, the diva had once been married.)

Child support, alimony, and a property settlement were determined. Reagan was ordered to pay $500 a month in child support for Maureen and Michael, for whom Jane retained custody. As long as Jane continued to work in films, she would get no alimony. However, should she not be able to work, he was to pay her an additional $500 a month in support. The value of their communal property, totaling $75,000, was to be divided half and half, following the sale of their house on Cordell Drive. She later moved into a house in Malibu.

As a side note, she was given all the furniture, and he kept the horses, including his favorite, "Baby."

Her only comment, upon leaving the courthouse was to a reporter, "There is nothing between us anymore. Case closed."

When he came by to visit the kids, Jane said, "You're welcome at any time. But call first and warn me. I might not be here. Thanks for the memory. We had some good times."

"And two children," he reminded her. "Don't forget them."

At the time of their parents' separation, Maureen was seven years old, Michael only three. "Daddy told me the sad news, but promised to always be around for me when I needed him," Maureen later wrote in a memoir.

Although Jane had been such an important part of Reagan's life, in his autobiography, An American Life, he mentioned her as only a terse abbreviation: "I married Jane Wyman but it didn't work out, and in 1948, we were divorced."

One of his old friends recalled, "There had been warning signs, but I think the divorce horrified and shocked him. He didn't think he'd ever be divorced. His mother had put up with an awful lot from her husband, but they had remained married even though he repeatedly came home drunk."

"Small town boys grow up thinking only other people get divorced," Reagan later wrote. "The plain truth was that such a thing was so far from even being imagined by me that I had no resources to call upon."

"As soon as news of his divorce was published, Reagan's phone began to ring, the way it had when his picture was first published in the Hollywood press as Warners' new young star.

He later said, "I was still mourning Jane, but to compensate, some of the world's most beautiful women were calling me for dates."

Still proclaiming grief over the loss of Jane, Reagan entered what Dick Powell defined as his "second horndog period," the first having occurred in the late 1930s when he'd arrived at the gates of Warner Brothers. "I think he set out to fuck everything in sight."

Producer Jerry Wald called Reagan to inform him that Jack Warner had approved the casting of Jane Wyman and him in John Loves Mary, based on the hit Broadway play of the same name written by Norman Krasna. "I'll have the scriptwriters, Phoebe and Henry Ephron, write in love scenes between Jane and you. Your kissing—and I hear from the gals that you're good at that—will win Jane's heart all over again."

Reagan was stunned at the news and expressed his concern: "What will Jane think of working with me?"

He had other concerns as well. He'd already seen the Broadway stage version of John Loves Mary, starring William Prince as John, with the elegant Nina Foch as Mary.

"From what I saw in New York, the play is too much like The Voice of the Turtle. I'll be in my Army uniform again. But this time, instead of an Army sergeant on leave, I'll be a returning veteran. Don't you think, as a plot device, that this 'Returning Soldier from the War' schtick is wearing a bit thin as a plot device? Dana Andrews already delivered, in The Best Years of Our Lives (1946), the best take ever about a veteran's return to the homefront."

"Jack Warner insists that you do it," Wald answered. "And, as everybody on the lot knows, Jack knows best. David Butler will be your director. He did all right with Hope, Crosby, and Lamour in Road to Morocco (1942)."

Reagan learned that his supporting cast would include names familiar to him: Jack Carson, Wayne Morris, Edward Arnold, Virginia Field, Katherine Alexander, and Irving Bacon.

Two weeks later, near the time he was to report to work, Wald called him with a sense of last-minute panic. "I've just got the news from Jack. I don't know what happened. Wyman's out, Patricia Neal is in."

"Who in hell is Patricia Neal?" Reagan asked.

"You'll meet her soon," Wald answered.

That night, Reagan found an article in Variety, reporting that Neal had achieved success on Broadway in the Lillian Hellman play from 1946, Another Part of the Forest.

The play had been Hellman's prequel to The Little Foxes that had, in 1939, been such a successful Broadway play, with Tallulah Bankhead playing the mature Regina. The Broadway play had evolved into a 1941 movie with Bette Davis starring as Regina.

When the film script of John Loves Mary arrived, Reagan read it avidly in moments when he wasn't worrying about his marriage to Jane and coping with the union wars among the movie guilds.

Its farcical plot was based on the premise that the character played by Reagan would marry, “in name only,” a Cockney war bride so that he could bring her to America and get her U.S. citizenship. Then, according to the plot, she would divorce Reagan and marry his war buddy (Jack Carson). Virginia Field had already been cast in the role of Reagan’s English bride who arrives in New York to discover that her love interest, Carson, is already married, with a child on the way.

Reagan, as the returning veteran, comes back to the girl he left behind, Neal. She’s been expecting him to marry her until she learns he’s already wed. Edward Arnold, cast as Senator McKinley, her father, has plenty to say about his daughter’s dilemma. The supposed setting is the senator’s apartment at the St. Regis Hotel in Manhattan.

Patricia Neal recalled this scene with Ronald Reagan: “It was a trouser-challenged moment for him. He was kidded by the cameramen, who wondered how he could possibly wear such shorty-short panties without something hanging out. Ronnie defended his masculinity by claiming he wore a heavy-duty jockstrap to protect his modesty.”

Before the beginning of shooting, Reagan was introduced to Neal at Jack Warner’s New Year’s Eve party. “Reagan walked over to me across a crowded room and shook my hand, telling me what wonderful things he’d heard about me. Then he went away. Shortly before midnight, I spotted him on the terrace weeping uncontrollably with some older woman. I’d heard he was all broken up over his marital difficulties with Jane Wyman.”

Butler gathered the entire cast of players together for a read-through. Reagan renewed his acquaintance with this Brother Rat co-star, Wayne Morris. He and Morris had always viewed themselves as rivals. “I called Jane Wyman, my old girlfriend, and asked her out the other night,” Morris said.

“Did she accept?”

“Hell, no!” Morris said, “But you can’t put a guy down for trying.”

Arnold, the burly and engaging actor “with the big gut,” the intimidating stare, and the deep voice, had been president of SAG from 1940 to 1942. During this tense period with the unions, Reagan spoke to him two or three times a week, viewing him as an experienced and politically seasoned “comrade-in-arms.”

After the first day’s shoot, Neal told Reagan, “You knew exactly what to do. Everybody seems to. I was too excited to be afraid on my first day in front of a camera.”

Three days later, he attended the first rushes with her. After they had sat through them, she said, “It was purgatory. I thought I looked bad. I didn’t realize that the camera adds twenty pounds. I was a caricature in those false eyelashes and that overly painted mouth. As for my voice, it was pure molasses.”

Neal’s sexy, seductive voice, however, recorded beautifully, Reagan comparing it to “an organ concert.” Less diplomatically, Carson likened it to “a musically inclined dripping rain pipe playing the scales.”

In one of his scenes with Neal, Reagan was ordered to appear in a pair of underwear assigned by the wardrobe department.

During his enactment of the scene, as the cameras rolled, and Arnold, as an irate father, walked in on a romantic interlude between Reagan and Neal, Reagan was hurriedly zipping up his pants—without a jockstrap. He yelped in pain before yelling out, “I’ve got my dick caught in the zipper.”

The cameras kept rolling.

In his first memoir, Where's the Rest of Me?, published in 1965, Reagan reported on this incident, but edited out most of the graphic details. Nonetheless, that film clip entered the Warner files as "one of the most hilarious behind-the-scenes bloopers in film history."

Back in his dressing room, a pantless Reagan complained to Butler. "Look at me! These underpants are cut so short my dick hangs out. Just look!"

"I see!" Butler said. "You're uncut just like me. For God's sake, man, this is not a blue movie we're making. All actors appearing in underwear scenes should wear a jock strap. I thought you knew that."

As the new girl on the block, Neal was swamped with invitations to parties, perhaps with the assumption that many of Hollywood's more established actresses wanted to check out the latest competition. She told Reagan, "Even Bette Davis has invited me for tea. Do you know Miss Davis?"

"I've had the pleasure," Reagan said, sarcastically.

In the beginning, Wayne Morris, the fading blonde screen Adonis of the 30s, was Neal's frequent escort to these parties. There, he reportedly drank too much and fretted, publicly, about his falling star.

Eventually, Neal found Carson a lot more fun, and she began to go out with him. The press seized on this dating, and practically had the two of them walking down the aisle. In her memoirs, Neal admitted that one night, she and Carson went to bed together, but she claimed, "We were too wasted to have sex."

She also went out on three dates with Reagan, but, according to her, "I drew a blank, like I did with Carson. He spent most of our evening lamenting the loss of Jane. When it came time to go to bed, I couldn't get a rise out of him. That would have to wait until we co-starred together in The Hasty Heart (1949) in London."

One morning on the set, over coffee, Neal confided to Reagan that she'd met Cooper the night before. For some reason, he was accompanied by Errol Flynn. "Gary shook my hand, said he'd be glad to work with me, and walked away. Flynn—no longer the sexy Robin Hood in green tights—pursued me. Being a helpless girl, I was forced to give in to his demands. But I was still dreaming of Gary."

When Wald saw the rushes of John Loves Mary, he sent a memo, dated January 19, 1948, to Reagan. "The idea that you get paid for all those kissing scenes with Pat Neal is beyond my comprehension. In the new contract between producers and actors, I'm planning to have a clause inserted regarding kissing scenes, that a refund be made by the actors to the studio. You certainly put everything into your so-called 'work.'"

Unlike its Broadway predecessor, the film version of John Loves Mary quietly slipped in and out of movie theaters across the country without any stampedes at the box office. It did nothing for Reagan's career. Any good reviews went to "that emerging new star, the ravishing Patricia Neal."

Of course, she also came in for her share of negative reviews. Bosley Crowther of The New York Times, wrote, "There is little to recommend her for future comedy jobs. Her way with a gag line is painful."

In June of 1949, Jack Warner ordered the release of Night Unto Night, a film that Reagan had made in 1946, but whose exposure had been delayed. "I don't expect to make a profit with this turkey," the studio mogul said, "but I'm hoping to at least get back my production costs."

Night Unto Night was the second movie Reagan shot after his discharge from the Army. It was promoted as the American debut of the Swedish-born Viveca Lindfors. Warners hoped that she would be the studio's answer to Greta Garbo or Ingrid Bergman. As it turned out, more Americans saw Lindfors' debut in To the Victor (1948), wherein she was cast as a woman with a past who falls in love with Dennis Morgan; or in the same year, in The Adventures of Don Juan, in which—in period costumes opposite Errol Flynn, she looked ravishing. Finally, with the much-delayed release of Night Unto Night, movie-goers could see her co-starring with Reagan. The only problem was, no one seemed to actually want to see the movie.

Right after his release from the Army, Reagan managed to look rather boyish in a swimsuit on a beach with his co-star, Swedish-born Viveca Lindfors, another Scandinavian femme fatale with hopes of becoming "the next Greta Garbo."

Night Unto Night was made during one of the most troubled periods in Reagan's life, with Jane threatening to end their marriage. Reagan found a "lot of comfort" (his words) in the friendship of his co-star Craig Stevens, back when he and Jane, along with Stevens and Alexis Smith, often comprised a quartet for dinner and dancing.

But by the time the movie was released, Reagan had broken off his friendship with the bisexual actor after Stevens had revealed the depth of his romantic attraction.

As a director, Chicago-born Don Siegel had been unknown to Reagan. So was his leading lady.

When Siegel introduced Reagan to Lindfors, she said, "Forgive me, but I've never heard of you."

"Miss Lindfors," he answered, "I can return the compliment. I have never heard of you, either."

"I was a film star in Sweden," she said.

"Well, I've heard of Greta Garbo and Ingrid Bergman, two other film stars from Sweden. But I've missed your movies."

She walked away, no doubt insulted.

Lindfors was detested by the film's second female lead, Osa Massen. She had been born in Denmark, as opposed to Lindfors' Sweden. Reagan referred to their conflicts as "The Battle of the Vikings." Massen complained to him that Siegel was favoring Lindfors in all their scenes and giving her extra close-ups. "I think he's in love with her."

"I wish he'd fall in love with me and give me preferential treatment," Reagan said. "God knows I need it to get through this stinker."

Once alerted by Massen, Reagan came to notice that Siegel and Lindfors were indeed having an affair. They disappeared every day at around noon into her dressing room. The director married his star in 1948.

Drawn from the pages of the Philip Wylie novel, the plot of Night Unto Night casts Reagan as John Gaylord, a biochemist who retreats to a rented beachfront home on the Gulf Coast of Florida. [The movie was actually shot in California, a lot of the action (suchas it was) taking place in the beachfront house that had been used in the production of Joan Crawford's Mildred Pierce*.]*

When this movie was shot, Reagan was still very close friends with Craig Stevens (left), one of the co-stars, along with Osa Massen (center) in Night Unto Night.

It turns out that the house he's rented from Ann (Lindfors) is haunted. When he asks her about strange noises in the building, Ann admits that she sometimes heard the voice of her dead husband, killed during World War II, echoing through the house. As a scientist [he's a biochemist], he tries to convince her that the dead do not return to Earth.

He has a dark secret: He has epilepsy. The film seems to treat epilepsy as if it's contagious. Complications arise when Ann's sister, Lisa (Massen), arrives and shows a romantic interest in Reagan. At this point, Lindfors, as Ann, has already fallen in love with him.

Secondary roles were played by Rosemary DeCamp and Broderick Crawford, a married couple who live nearby.

Although Reagan and Lindfors did not particularly like each other, they maintained a surface politeness and even had a few conversations together. Once, when the topic of sex came up, he told her, "It's always best in the afternoon, when you've emerged fresh from the shower."

She told him, "I'm glad I met Don [i.e., Siegel]. Before coming here, I had not had sex with a man for several months. I was hot and hungry."

During the filming of Night Unto Night, Reagan, along with most of the other cast members, had to ride a bus through the gates at Warners in Burbank, where picket lines had formed. Rocks and bottles were thrown at the windows of their bus.

Both Stevens and DeCamp were sympathetic to the strains Reagan endured at the time. "He was dealing with the ugly strike through his position at SAG," DeCamp said. "He was working 18 to 20 hours a day, but he remained cheerful and loquacious when he showed up with three or four hours sleep. In contrast, Jane Wyman was seen out almost every night dancing like a son of a son. Yet the North Hollywood Women's Professional Club named her its 'Ideal Working Mother' for 1946."

Near the end of the film, when the epilepsy of Reagan's character is disclosed, he goes upstairs to commit suicide with a revolver. This is his big scene with Lindfors. He tells her, "Death isn't the worst thing in a man's life—it's only the last."

She counters, "I don't know the reason for death, but I do know that life has its own reasons—and it isn't ours to end."

Before the end of the film, she convinces him not to shoot himself.

In that, the movie's plot is different from that within Wylie's novel. In the book, John kills himself by deliberately walking into the path of an oncoming truck.

In a memoir, Reagan wrote, "If you think this was a hard story to bring to life on the screen, you're right."

Shooting the various scenes of Night Unto Night ended on December 29, 1946. Reagan remembered Christmas Eve on the set. "Eggnog was served and by two o'clock that afternoon, we were drunk. We needed the sun, but got threatening gray skies. I went home to the most depressing Christmas of my life." As predicted, Night Unto Night was an utter flop. One reviewer asserted that, "Jack Warner should have left it collecting dust in some archive." Another reviewer, in pointing out the inadequacies of Reagan's performance, asked, "Where is John Garfield, even Dane Clark, now that we need him?"

After viewing the drab and uncompelling Night Unto Night, which, based on his orders had been shelved for years, Jack Warner decided to co-star Reagan and Viveca Lindfors in yet another movie together, a casting choice he never explained. He summoned Reagan to his office: "I have this important new film I want you to make with Viveca and Claude Rains. It's called Up Till Now, and in it, you play a communist."

"At first, I thought he was joking," Reagan recalled. "Then I realized he was serious."

"Me, a communist?" Reagan asked Warner in astonishment. "In case you don't know, there's a Red scare on. Do you want me to get blacklisted?"

"Read the script tonight and you'll understand why I want to make this movie, particularly right now when all of us are under investigation from Washington."

That night in his library, Reagan studied the script by David Goodies, who had just signed a six-year contract with Warner Brothers to develop screen treatments. The credibility he was currently enjoyed was based on the successful transition of his novel, Dark Passage, into a movie co-starring Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall. [Released in 1947, it had been marketed with the tagline: TOGETHER AGAIN: BOGART AND BA-CALL—IN DANGER AS VIOLENT AS THEIR LOVE.]

In Up Till Now, Claude Rains would be cast as a puzzled father of two sons, one of whom (Reagan) becomes a communist, and another (possibly Arthur Kennedy), a fascist.

Lindfors would play a naturalized American citizen who explains the value of democracy to the politically errant brothers. Her conversations would, before the end of the film, persuade each of them to repudiate their former political convictions.

Warner told Reagan, "You see, with this film, I can go before HUAC and repudiate communism and present myself as a defender of democracy, attacking evil communism. In the HUAC witch hunt in Hollywood, I don't want them to catch me flying a broom."

Actually, even though the movie had not been made, weeks later, Warner appeared before HUAC and cited Up Till Now as testimonial to his commitment to the propaganda war against the communists.

"The film will star Ronald Reagan, the truest American and the most anti-communist in all of Hollywood. With the help of its producer, Jerry Wald, Up Till Now will show us battling un-American ideologies. It will unmask Reds in the film industry and expose our foreign enemies. Democracy has no middle lanes, left detours, or right alleys—only the great big highway of American Liberty, sufficiently broad and straight for all to travel in peace."

Back in Hollywood, Reagan met with Goodies, finding that he was currently rewriting a script based on W. Somerset Maugham's The Letter, which in 1940 had been one of Bette Davis' most memorable movies. The new treatment was to be entitled The Unfaithful.

Goodis told Reagan that he'd written Up Till Now "to give people a look at themselves and their American heritage." In his own words, Goodis was "mesmerized to meet a bigtime movie star like you."

Reagan later told Wald, "That Goodis fellow practically was foaming at the mouth. It seems he worships my screen image. He wanted to date me. Imagine!"

A few weeks later, without explanation, Warner abruptly canceled Up Till Now.

As late as 1957, Goodis still harbored a crush on Reagan. He got in touch with him and asked him to play the male lead opposite Jayne Mansfield in an upcoming film, The Burglar. Reagan rejected the film role, just as he had turned down the author's sexual advances. Dan Duryea was cast as the male lead instead. Today, The Burglar (1957) reigns as a film noir classic, one of the greatest heist films ever made.

Instead of The Burglar, Reagan accepted the lead in Hellcats of the Navy opposite his wife, the former starlet Nancy Davis.

As Nathan J. Juran, the director of Hellcats of the Navy, later said, "Ronnie could have been making love, at least on screen, with Jayne Mansfield. Instead, he ends up with Nancy. I hope they have some off-screen chemistry. They sure didn't have any on screen in our turkey of a movie."

Meeting in a closed door session at the Waldorf Astoria in New York, the Motion Picture Association of America released on December 3, 1947, what became notorious as "the Waldorf Statement." In a two-page press release, studio moguls ranging from MGM's Louis B. Mayer to Columbia's Harry Cohn, attacked the "Hollywood Ten," a group of writers and directors, each of whom was facing a jail term for contempt of Congress.

Although Reagan initially had reservations about the Blacklist, knowing what harm in could cause, particularly to innocent people, he ultimately endorsed it as a necessary evil.

In a speech to SAG, Reagan lauded its members "for doing more than any other union in America to rid itself of communists" He went on to vilify producers who still hired suspected communists.

[By 1953, Reagan got what he wanted: SAG adopted a bylaw that barred communists and required new members to swear loyalty oaths.

A cynical Melvyn Douglas was still bruised from the beating which his wife, Helen Gahagan, had experienced in recent Senatorial elections at the hand of Reagan's ally in the suppression of pinkos, Richard Nixon. Douglas later commented on that: "Reagan was hardly the family values man he appeared to be. He was seducing practically every virgin in Hollywood. Before he banged them, he did not, so I heard, require them to sign a loyalty oath."]

Some observers defined it as "Love on the rebound." With the understanding that Jane Wyman was spending her nights in the arms of Lew Ayres, two shapely blondes were about to enter Reagan's life.

At the end of the war, Reagan and William Holden bonded as never before. Each of them turned to the other for emotional support. In many ways, Holden replaced Robert Taylor, George Murphy, and Dick Powell as Reagan's closest comrade.

In 1941, Holden had married an attractive divorced woman, actress Brenda Marshall, whose real name was Ardis Ankerson. On May 2, 1946, the couple gave birth to Scott Porter Holden.

As Holden admitted, "I was never much of a family man." He spent many nights away from home, often out with Reagan as his drinking companion. When the two men walked into Ciro's on many a night, all that the waiter had to ask was, "The usual?"

In addition to their respective family problems, both of them were worried about their careers. Holden would listen sympathetically to Reagan's woes about Jane and the movies he'd been assigned, before pouring out plenty of his own pain. He admitted to Reagan, "I've hit rock bottom. I'm almost thirty and a wreck—a second-class actor in Hollywood with little hope of longevity. I'm getting shit wages, just enough to feed my family and perhaps pay my liquor bill. On most nights, I stick you with the tab, since you're drawing bigger bucks."

Holden invited Reagan to pick him up after a day's shoot at the set of his latest movie, The Dark Past (1948), co-starring Lee J. Cobb, Adele Jergens, and Nina Foch. It was a remake of the 1939 Blind Alley. As the star of this psychological thriller, Holden played an escaped convict, convicted killer, and dream-shackled gunman, who hides out with his gang in the isolated home of a psychiatrist, whose family and guests he holds hostage.

"When I joined him on the set, Bill's biggest complaint was the flat-top haircut which the film's director, Rudolph Maté, ordered him to get," Reagan said. "Bill hated it. That man was fastidious about his hair, going to the barber once a week. He told me he didn't want to play a killer, preferring to make Westerns instead. That's what I wanted to do instead of so-called romantic comedies."

At the 1939 World's Fair in New York, a beautiful blonde, Adele Jergens, was voted "The Fairest of the Fair." In Hollywood, her publicists began calling her "The Girl with the Million Dollar Legs," which "seriously pissed off" Betty Grable, the holder of that title.

Subsequently, Columbia redefined Jergens as “The Champagne Blonde.” When William Holden introduced her to Reagan, he admitted, “I fell in love.”

It was on the set that Holden introduced Adele Jergens to Reagan. He later said, “I think I fell in love with her the moment I saw her walking across the sound stage toward me. I asked her out that very night for a date.”

A “chorus girl blonde,” the Brooklyn-born actress accepted. Over dinner at the Brown Derby, he learned about her background. During a stint as a Rockette at Radio City Music Hall in Manhattan, she was named “Number One Showgirl in New York.”

She had also worked as a chorus girl at the Brooklyn Fox Theater and as a model for the John Robert Powers Agency. While understudying for the role usually reserved for the stripper Gypsy Rose Lee, in the 1942 stage version of the musical review Star and Garter, she filled in for the star one night when Lee was ill. A Columbia talent scout had chosen that particular evening to attend. His “discovery” of Jergens eventually led to a movie contract in 1944. During the months to come, she was cast opposite Rita Hayworth in Tonight and Every Night (1945).

In the final years of World War II, Jergens became one of the most popular pinup girls among G.I.s, rivaled only by Betty Grable and Rita Hayworth, both of whom viewed her as formidable competition.

In films, Jergens was often cast as either a blonde floozie or as a burlesque dancer. After Reagan began taking her out. Holden noted that their romance was taking a serious turn.

One night, Reagan proposed marriage to her, and she accepted, with the understanding that they’d marry as soon as his divorce was finalized. She had never been married. Since it would not be proper for her to wear an engagement ring, as he was still wed to Jane at the time, he gave her a diamond bracelet instead. He even purchased a mink coat to go with it.

A jealous Evelyn Keyes claimed, “Jergens knew how to get ahead at Columbia. She slept with Harry Cohn, who had the hots for her. At one time, she was fucking both Ronald Reagan and Cohn.”

Jergens was often seen out on the town with both Holden and Reagan. At first, Hollywood gossips assumed that Reagan was merely “The Beard,” concealing the adulterous relationship Holden was having with his co-star. When Holden, Jergens, and Reagan were spotted one morning leaving his Londonderry apartment at 5AM, each of them dressed for work, word spread that the “chorus girl cutie” was having a three-way with both actors.

At this point, Jergens developed a friendship with Virginia Mayo, who, ironically, was set to co-star in The Girl from Jones Beach with Reagan.

In her home in Thousand Oaks, California, in 2004, shortly before her death, Mayo told author Darwin Porter, “Adele and I had many talks about Reagan. She told me that he was a “real gentleman, and he bestowed many gifts on her.”

“I think I’m helping him recover from the loss of Jane,” Jergens confessed to Mayo. “I think he’s rushing too soon into another marriage, although I’ve already agreed to it. Encouraged by Bill Holden, he’s going through a heavy drinking period. Even when drunk, though, Ronnie is still a gentleman, unlike Bill. When he’s stinking drunk, Bill becomes a monster and sometimes hurts me. He gets very rough.”

Mayo asked Jergens if the rumors about a three-way with Holden and Reagan were true.

Too Many Blondes?

Adele Jergens, (left), with Marilyn Monroe, her ferociously competitive co-performer in Ladies of the Chorus. As it happened, Reagan got involved with each of them at the same time.

"Adele was evasive, but I read between the lines," Mayo recalled.

Jergens told her, "I won't go into that, but I will tell you this: Bill and Ronnie are the two cleanest actors in Hollywood. I once came over to Ronnie's apartment. He'd given me the key, and I planned to meet him there later. In the living room, I poured myself a drink. I heard all this laughter coming from the shower. At first, I thought Ronnie had brought home another woman. It turned out to be Bill. Both of them came out of the shower a little later, with their bodies wrapped in towels. If you ask me, you must know, both of them smelled like a bar of soap. But they always did. I think each of them took at least four showers a day, unlike some actors, who managed to get under the water only two or three times a week, if that."

When Reagan was starring in The Girl From Jones Beach (1949) with Virginia Mayo, Adele Jergens was filming Ladies of the Chorus (1948), at Columbia. Cast as a chorus girl, she starred opposite Marilyn Monroe in her first significant film role. The two actresses played mother and daughter, even though Jergens was only nine years older than Marilyn.

Reagan remembered that he had once met Marilyn at a photo shoot. He greeted the director, Phil Karlson, who welcomed him to the set. In the early 1950s, he would direct John Payne, Jane Wyman's former lover, in three movies, eventually helming Elvis Presley in Kid Galahad (1962).

Karlson liked Reagan and invited him to watch Marilyn do her big number—"Every Baby Needs a Da Da Daddy."

"I could tell that Reagan was mesmerized by Marilyn," Karlson said. "His eyes practically bulged. He told me that he felt Marilyn was heading for big stardom. Frankly, I think she gave him a hard-on. Fortunately, Adele was nowhere around. She would have been jealous."

At the end of the number, which she did in one take, Marilyn ran over to Reagan. She gave him a wet kiss on the lips. "We've met before. Don't you remember?"

"Who could forget you, kid," he said. "You were sensational."

"I'm even more sensational when you get to know me," she claimed.

Before Jergens appeared on the set, Karlson noticed that Marilyn slipped Reagan her phone number. "Come up and see me sometime, big guy," she said, imitating Mae West.

"I knew from that moment that Adele had some serious competition." Karlson claimed.

Lauren Bacall, backed up by Humphrey Bogart, announced that she was willing to risk suspension by refusing to appear in The Girl from Jones Beach. As she told friends privately, "My main objection would be having to appear in such a revealing white bathing suit."

"It was the second Ronald Reagan picture I turned down," Bacall said. "Both Bogie and I had refused to appear with him in Stallion Road."

The lead female role in The Girl from Jones Beach, a fluffy romantic comedy, went to the blonde bombshell, Virginia Mayo, to be directed by Peter Godfrey, who had previously helmed Reagan in that abject disaster, That Hagen Girl.

After reading the script, Reagan objected to his role, telling Jack Warner that he didn't want to do it. "I see myself sitting tall in a saddle for the camera—you know, like John Wayne or Gary Cooper. Are you, by any chance, sitting on a script like Frank Capra's Mr. Smith Goes to Washington? Look what it did for Jimmy Stewart."

"You're doing that Jones Beach thing or else," Warner warned him. "Just today, I put Bacall on suspension for refusing to play the female lead."

Reagan himself knew that it was a role that called for Cary Grant. In fact, when the movie was released, one reviewer claimed, "Cary Grant could have phoned in Reagan's role."

Reagan described his role as that "of a modern painter of the Vargas or Petty Girl type. Eddie Bracken played my sidekick. The plot called for me to romance a dozen or so gorgeous models."

In the plot, Reagan played Bob Randolph, who, as an illustrator, has drawn the perfect model, "The Randolph Girl." Bracken is hired by television producers to find the real life Randolph Girl. But Reagan, as Randolph, loudly asserts that the beautiful girl in his illustration had been inspired by a composite of a dozen or so models.

Eventually, the search leads to Ruth Wilson (Mayo), who looks like the living image of the illustrated version of the Randolph Girl. When the character played by Reagan learns that, he changes his name to Robert Venerik, claiming that he is a Czech immigrant who knows very little English. That allows him to enroll in a class where Ruth teaches English "as a second language" to new arrivals. From that point on, the plot leads to its inevitable, somewhat contrived, conclusion. The viewer easily surmises, based on dozens of clues and signals, that Reagan and Mayo will, before the film's end, fall in love.

Jones Beach: Lotsa Girls, Lotsa Flesh, Lotsa Fun.

Mayo recalled the late morning when she had to make her first appearance in a skimpy white bathing suit. "The bathing suit is the most unfriendly garment in the wardrobe department. A girl can't keep a secret in a bathing suit."

Reagan gets The Girl from Jones Beach. "Mayo They Be Happy Forever."

Summoning her courage, she put on the bathing suit and walked outside her dressing room door. Reagan was waiting there for her. "He gave out a wolf whistle that could be heard in Chicago," she said. "I loved it! He restored my confidence."

He later said, "That bathing suit on Virginia would have raised the dead. The film we were making wasn't much, but Virginia's white thighs would guarantee box office."

Reagan later wrote that at one point, "Eddie Bracken got so goggle-eyed over the beauties in the film—not just Virginia—that he stepped on my heels and tripped me. It cracked my coccyx. It was my first experience with the pain of a broken bone. Unfortunately, it would not be my last."

Godfrey had to shoot around Reagan until he recovered, which caused the picture to run over budget.

Jane Wyman had taken the children, Maureen and Michael, for a holiday in Hawaii. She turned her house over to him, since she had a live-in staff there, who would take care of him during his convalescence.

One afternoon, Bracken visited Reagan. "I was filled with apologies for causing the accident. As I was heading into his bedroom, a beautiful young blonde emerged," Bracken said. "She flashed a smile at me and quickly left. After her face registered with my brain, I realized that it was that new girl, Marilyn Monroe, who had just come from Ronnie's bedroom. She was getting a hell of a lot of publicity, and I just knew it was Marilyn."

In the next room, Bracken faced Reagan who, despite being bedridden, had a smile on his face.

"That blonde," Bracken said. "That was Marilyn Monroe!"

"One and the same, but let's keep that as our little secret."

"My lips are sealed," Bracken responded.

"Thank god Marilyn's weren't," he quipped.

"For three seconds, I didn't get it, until the light dawned," Bracken said. "Marilyn had given him a blow-job, so that he wouldn't have to exert his back."

"Ronnie looked at my face as I was registering what had happened. He quickly picked up on it."

"You catch on quick, you dumb bone-crusher," Reagan said. "look what you've done to me, you fart!"

"Lying flat on your back obviously has its rewards," Bracken said.

"But Marilyn and I are going to have to delay 'number two' until my back heals, thanks to you."

[Film historians and movie trivia buffs have long speculated about what prompted Adele Jergens to break off her engagement to Ronald Reagan. Virginia Mayo provided the answer." Adele found out that Marilyn (Monroe) was slipping behind her back for sex with Ronnie. She called the whole thing off, but she didn't return the mink coat or the diamond bracelet."

Before her death on November 22, 2002, Jergens gave her final interview. At the time, she was living in a retirement community at Camarillo, California.

"If I had played my cards right, I might have become the first actress ever to be First Lady of America. Too bad I let Reagan slip through my fingers over a jealous spat over Marilyn Monroe. I should have forgiven him."

Today, the world, except for dieheard fans, have forgotten the dazzling blonde of the film noir era.

Journalist Alan K. Rode summed up her appeal: "Adele Jergens could sing, dance, strut, and act with the best of them. She will always epitomize that bygone era of hardboiled repartee, sleek fedoras, and sequined, spangled burlesque queens. For better or worse, she was that gorgeous gal that the heavies in movies just had to have along for the ride."]

Reagan had serious misgivings when it was announced that he was going to co-star with Ida Lupino in a movie called Woman in Hiding, to be shot during the late summer of 1949.

This was to be his first picture under a new deal Wasserman had arranged with Jack Warner. Reagan still had three years to go under his contract with Warner Brothers. Under the revisions arranged for him by Wasserman, he would make only one picture a year for Warners for a pre-defined fee of $150,000. He would otherwise be free to work for other studios.

Then Wasserman arranged for yet another contract, this time between Reagan and Universal Studios. In May of 1949, an agreement had been reached that stipulated that Reagan would make five pictures for Universal over a five-year period for a salary of $75,000 per picture.

On the surface, he had maintained an uneasy friendship with Lupino, "except she leans too far to the left for my tastes."

"If Lupino is not an actual Red, she's at least a deep magenta," he told William Holden.

Apparently, at the time they were scheduled to make a movie together, Lupino had not yet learned that Reagan was filing reports about her political activities with the FBI.

Twice before, he had been slated at Warners to co-star with Lupino, in both Kings Row and Juke Girl, but in each instance, she had gone on suspension rather than accept parts she disliked.

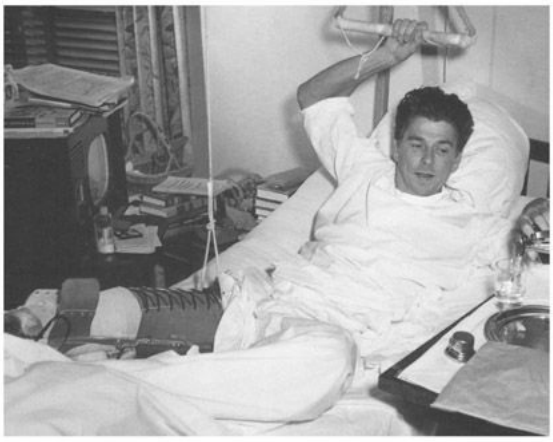
On the Saturday before shooting was scheduled to begin the following Monday, Reagan agreed to play in a for-charity baseball game for the benefit of the City of Hope Hospital. Some of the town's leading male actors were teamed against an opposing group composed of film comedians.

Before the end of the first inning, Reagan, after hitting the ground during a play, screamed out in excruciating pain.

Rushed to the hospital in an ambulance, he learned the bad news. He would not be shooting with Lupino (or with anyone, for that matter) on Monday. "My leg was sheathed in layers of tape and moleskin, with straps from these mummy wrapping hitched to a thirty-five pound weight by means of a pulley," he wrote in a memoir. "Twenty-four hours later, my eyes were swollen shut, my teeth hurt at even the touch of a tongue, and I itched and peeled all over. I was allergic to the wrappings. For more than a week, the massive histamine doses kept me only semi-conscious; then I settled down to weeks of discomfort because there was no removing the bandages."

An X-ray had shown that he had broken his right thigh bone in six different places. His hospitalization lasted for seven weeks. After that, he still would not be fully recovered. "Months in a cast was followed by a steel-and-leather brace, and that was followed by crutches. At long last, I was able to hobble around on a cane."

Initially, when Jane Wyman was in London shooting Stage Fright, she lent Reagan access to the home they used to share but which now, thanks to their divorce settlement, she occupied. There was a staff on site to take care of him. When she returned from England, Reagan was moved to the home of his mother. There, Nelle waited on him day and night at the house he had purchased for her on Phyllis Avenue. She was in her late sixties and ailing, but drove over to the Farmers' Market every day in her old Studebaker to buy fresh fruit and groceries for him.



Reagan recovers from a shattered thighbone after a charity baseball game. Marilyn came to give him “lip service.”

“I cooked all his favorite foods and tended to him like the baby boy I had long ago given birth to,” she recalled. “When he could walk again and take care of himself, he moved out. I cried all that day and half the night. I didn’t want him to leave, but to stay with me.”

Directed by Michael Gordon, Woman in Hiding went into production on schedule. The director arranged for actor Howard Duff, fresh from an affair with Ava Gardner, to replace Reagan as the male lead.

Lupino objected to the handsome replacement when she met him. “I don’t like him,” she told Gordon.

Apparently, she changed her mind. One night, Duff seduced her, and she later married him.

Months later, Reagan encountered Duff at a party. “Thank you for breaking your leg. Ida was against me until she succumbed to my masculine charm.”

Years later, by the time Reagan ran for Governor of California, Lupino still retained her negative impressions: “I blamed the bastard for deserting the Democrats,” she claimed.

During his long periods of convalescence, Reagan could count on only one visitor, Marilyn Monroe. As he told William Holden, “I never knew when she would show up. For the most part, she was always in a hurry, perhaps going off on another date. She was one busy girl, but she knew I needed sex. I was flat on my back, but I could count on her to give me lip service. That brought me some sexual relief. My back and leg might not be in working order, but at least one part of my plumbing was still satisfactory. Marilyn’s a great gal. You should date her sometime, Bill. Just don’t let your wife know.”

During World War II, Captain Ronald Reagan was stationed in California, handling PR for the Army. In that capacity, Captain Reagan ordered his staff photographer, Private David Conover, to visit a local factory to take pictures of women on the homefront who were turning out aircraft, munitions, and parachutes. These morale-boosting photos of pretty girls contributing to the war effort were for publication in Yank magazine.

One of the girls he photographed that day was Norma Jeane. She could hardly know at the time that she’d eventually have an affair with Private Conover’s commanding officer – or that the officer would become, long after her own death, the President of the United States. Conover later claimed that the eyes of Norma Jeane “held something that touched and intrigued me. She should be a movie star.”

After lunch, he requested that she change into a red sweater, and he took more pictures of her in which her breasts were more prominent. When Conover came into the office of his boss (Reagan) a week later, he noticed that he’d pinned up that picture of Norma Jeane. Reagan said, “This young lady, not Lana Turner, should be called The Sweater Girl.”

Holden, among others, including Dick Powell and June Allyson, believed that Marilyn viewed Reagan as a father figure more than a lover. “She was going through a rough period in her life,” Allyson recalled. “Even though he was incapacitated, Ronnie was that shoulder for her to lean on.”

Sometimes, Marilyn didn’t seem so rushed, and she’d spend hours with Reagan in his Londonderry apartment during his long recuperation.

She related to Reagan that originally, Harry Cohn had held out such promises to her, even admitting that he’d put her on the casting couch. “He told me he was looking for a backup for Rita Hayworth, with whom he was having a lot of trouble," Marilyn said. She even shared some of her secrets with Reagan, including that her hairline had been lifted through electrolysis, with the intention of highlighting her widow's peak.

On one visit, she shocked him. "I thought you were my old girlfriend, Lana Turner. You look just like her."

"Only younger," Marilyn said. "I am the new Lana Turner, made up to look just like her."

One afternoon, she arrived heartbroken and fell into his arms. "Cohn has let me go from Columbia. His promises are shit."

"You know what Cohn's final words to me were?" she asked Reagan. "He called me a 'goddamn cunt' and told me he never wanted to see me on the Columbia lot ever again."

When Reagan had met her on the set of Ladies of the Chorus (1948), Marilyn had told him that the picture with Adele Jergens was going to be a big hit. It wasn't—in fact, it flopped at the box office.

She revealed that she had studied and "worked so very, very hard" for the part. At one point, she'd gone to a seedy burlesque theater in downtown Los Angeles. Billing herself as "Mona Monroe," she'd stripped for the men. She later said, "I heard from one of the ushers that whenever I came on, the men placed their coats over their genitals to do their business in the dark."

She even went to see a performance by the elegant Lili St. Cyr. This tall, buxom, and statuesque blonde brought glamour, almost a sense of refinement, to the art of striptease. Marilyn visited her performance every night and met her backstage. What she didn't tell Reagan was that she had a lesbian affair with St. Cyr.

While at Columbia, Marilyn had fallen in love with her strikingly handsome voice coach, Fred Karger, who conducted his own band. What she didn't know, but would soon find out, Karger had another woman competing for his love-making. The competition was formidable: Jane Wyman.

During her chats with Reagan, Marilyn apparently left out many details of her life. She presented only limited but often tantalizing facts about her past. She didn't tell him about her lesbian affairs, because she knew he wouldn't understand such things.

As author Michael John Sullivan once wrote in his book, Presidential Passions, "Reagan's understanding of sexuality was exceedingly simplistic: For him, sex was either black or white so that sexual feelings of a highly complex or conflicting nature were both threatening and incomprehensible. The inflexibility of his narrow sexual sensibilities is perhaps best seen in his unchanging attitude toward homosexuality. Working in a business that is home to a very high percentage of gays and bisexuals, he remained intimidated by the prospect of sexual diversity."

In contrast, Marilyn understood.

In addition to St. Cyr, Marilyn was also engaged in a lesbian liaison with Natasha Lytess, her drama coach at Columbia.

Marilyn had to carry around a datebook to keep abreast of her affairs, which included Karger, but also actor John Carroll and even producer Joe Schenck.

When Reagan saw a picture in Variety of Marilyn on a date with Pat DiCicco at the Cocoanut Grove, he warned her about this hustler, who had been married to Thelma Todd (murdered) and Gloria Vanderbilt (beaten).

It was through Reagan that Marilyn once met Holden, who was scheduled to appear in Born Yesterday at Columbia.

Over drinks with Holden and Reagan, Marilyn said, "You two butch numbers are excepted, but I find that most male actors are 'pansies,' because acting is a feminine art. When a man has to paint his face and pose and strut and pretend emotions, he isn't doing what is normally masculine."

"Hello, fellow pansy," Holden said to Reagan. "To prove my masculinity, I'm going out to fuck every starlet in Hollywood."

Holden seemed enchanted with Marilyn—in fact, he left Reagan's apartment that night, promising to drive her home.

When she visited Reagan again, during a discussion about Holden, she said, "Through Bill, I've discovered the dumb blonde role that will make me one of the biggest stars in Hollywood. In Born Yesterday, I'll play Billie Dawn, a great role. Bill thinks I'm perfect for it. He's going behind Cohn's back and arranging a test for me at Columbia. He thinks the test will convince Cohn to give me another chance."

One rainy afternoon, Marilyn arrived at Reagan's apartment, her eyes red from crying. She said that the designer, Oleg Cassini, had made a gown for her, and had presented it to her as a gift. "I returned the favor," she said.

In her gown, she attended a party at the home shared by Cassini and his wife, Gene Tierney. "The bitch threw me out the door the moment I came into the foyer," Marilyn claimed. "In front of everybody, she exploded in fury. Her exact words, and she shouted them loud enough for everybody to hear, were, 'How could you invite this tramp? She's a nothing!'"

Reagan offered her what comfort he could, and then, in return, she offered him her own kind of comfort.

Four days later, Marilyn was back in Reagan's apartment, this time telling him the bad news. Harry Cohn had refused to look at her test for Billie Dawn in Born Yesterday. "I won't tell you what else the bastard said about me."

Somehow, she managed to get herself cast in a cameo role in another movie, Love Happy, with the Marx Brothers. She asked Reagan, "Will I have to bed all the Marx Brothers?"

"Probably, but not at the same time," he answered.

That was followed by another role that year in A Ticket to Tomahawk, with Dan Dailey and Anne Baxter. She was delighted when the director, Richard Sale, told her, "You can sing and dance better than Betty Grable."

That Saturday, Grable herself arrived at Reagan's apartment with a gift. He hadn't seen her since her marriage to bandleader Harry James.

When June Allyson heard about their reunion, she said, "I'm only guessing, but I don't think they resumed their affair. It was just two old friends getting together to talk about their early days in Hollywood, trying to climb rungs of the ladder to stardom."

Reagan was very saddened to hear news over the radio on July 5, 1948, that Carole Landis—another blonde he'd known from his early Hollywood years—had overdosed on sleeping pills and died. It was reported that she had been despondent over the breakup of her affair with Rex Harrison.

Allyson admitted to her friends, Peter Lawford and Van Johnson, that she, too, had had a brief fling with Reagan when he came to visit her one afternoon. "He was still walking on crutches at the time. I was the one who had to seduce Ronnie. It was just a two-week fling. I was mad at Richard [a reference to her husband at the time, Dick Powell] at the time. Ronnie was between marriages. Nothing came of it. We remained friends."

Years later, she told Johnson, "Could you imagine? I'm one of the few women in Hollywood like Marilyn Monroe, who seduced two U.S. presidents. Although I had John F. Kennedy before Marilyn, in her case, she had Ronnie before I did."

At one point, Reagan flew Marilyn to Miami Beach. He checked into a suite at the Roney Plaza, booking her into the more modest Helen Mar Hotel, a few blocks away.

During their time together, he took her for three nights in a row to hear his favorite entertainer, Sophie Tucker, billed as "the Last of the Red Hot Mommas." She was appearing in a sold-out revue at the Beachcomber.

To end each show before the essentially Jewish audience, she sang, "Yiddische Momme." For some reason, this was Reagan's favorite, although he was the least Jewish person in the night club.

Sophie also invited Reagan and Marilyn to her big birthday bash on February 9,1950. In 1887, she had been born in the Ukraine, which had been ruled during that era by Czarist Russia. A crowd of celebrities flew in from around the country, including Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, George Burns, and Joe E. Lewis, along with newer comedians who included Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin. Frances Langford sang.

Nightclub entertainer Sophie Tucker: "Ronnie got it all wrong. What in hell did I have to do with Whistler's Mother?"

Reagan was among the honored guests asked to say a few words at the podium. For some reason known only to himself, he called Sophie "the Whistler's Mother of Show Business." He praised her talent and congratulated her for her contribution to charity. "Sophia fled from Czarist Russia to come to our shores seeking the American Dream. That dream has come true for her."

Sophie closed her birthday gala by singing her signature song, “Some of These Days.”

Backstage, as a farewell, Reagan and Sophie lip-kissed. After that, Sophie kissed Marilyn, revealing to Reagan in a broad aside, “My advice, Ronnie, is to marry this sweet little sugartit. Make an honest woman of her. Take the word of the Last of the Red Hot Mommas.”

Marilyn Monroe: The last of the Red Hot Mommas urged Reagan “to make an honest woman out of her. Marry her and to hell with Jane Wyman.”

During their final dinner together on Miami Beach, Reagan told Marilyn that he’d booked her aboard a plane separate from his own flight as a means of discreetly hauling her back to Los Angeles. “It’s been fun,” he said, “but it’s over now. Someone else has moved into my life.”

“So, it’s just one of those things,” she said, appearing on the verge of tears. She never could stand rejection.

Back in Los Angeles, she waited two weeks before showing up on his doorstep again. He welcomed her into his apartment.

“We did our thing,” she later said. “But there was never any commitment, any definition of our relationship, or whether it had come to an end. It did, eventually, of course, but I ended it…Not him! Do I know men?”

Mobile again, no longer walking with a cane, Reagan launched one of his most serious romances, one within a series of “between marriages affairs,” this time with gossip and entertainment columnist Doris Lilly. Cindy Adams, the New York Post columnist, once wrote, “Doris was never fond of poverty. She was meeting rich people when the rest of us were in camel’s hair. She received a prized sable coat from a male admirer, who was a little bit married.”

“If it were true that money grew on trees, all my friends would be married to apes,” Lilly said. For years, she wrote a popular gossip column for the New York Post. Later, she admitted that her column was sometimes “silly,” and that the people she wrote about were often “shallow.” But they’re pleasant and they smell good and they eat well and drink good wines—and that’s all right.”

Columnist Doris Lilly was a social butterfly whom Reagan called “My Gilded Lily” as she flitted from millionaire to millionaire.

Even as a young contract actress working for Cecil B. DeMille, Lilly had an eye for people already established, but also for up-and-coming millionaires. She sensed that Reagan, although a “failed actor” (her words) when she began to date him, was “really going places one day, perhaps in a field different from the movies.”

Lilly told author Kitty Kelley that Reagan “liked the big, outdoor blonde, Pasadena Rose Bowl Parade queen type of California woman. I know, because I was one of them. Whenever they were in town, we went to see George Jessel or Sophie Tucker, his favorite entertainers. We went ice skating in Westwood by the old veterans’ home. I listened to all his stories and his endless rants about politics. We were often separated on different coasts. Sometimes the references in his letters were sexual.”

On April 28, 1948, in a letter he wrote to her, he said, “I’d like to be tossing off a ‘short one’ with you.”

One Sunday morning, when she called him, and after a few minutes of dialogue, she accused him of having “another blonde in bed with you.”

He later sent her a note. “Your call interrupted no Sunday matinee (d--n it: I was just fogged over and sleepy.”)

He never wrote out the words “damn” or “hell.” They were always abbreviated to “d—n” or “h—l.”

On their dates, he was still driving that turquoise Cadillac, that birthday gift from Jane Wyman before their divorce.

“Reagan and I had a delightful little romance in 1948,” Lilly claimed. “Intimately, he was nothing memorable, but he was an appealing-looking guy who was very, very sweet. I hate to say that he was weak—maybe a nicer word would be ‘passive.’ He loved to go out and be seen at all the nightclubs in Hollywood in those days, and he loved to drink, but was never a drunk. He was a very gentle, very square, very hayseed type of man.”

She later denied that she had ever admitted to an intimate relationship with Reagan. “I don’t talk about sex. That’s not my generation.” However, it was well known among Reagan’s friends that Lilly often indulged in a sleepover with Reagan, leaving before dawn. William Holden and Reagan’s best male friends were aware of the relationship, because he talked privately about his plans to marry her. He confessed to Holden and others, “The sex was great.” Obviously, based on what she later said, it was greater for Reagan than it was for Lilly.

Years later, she recalled that one night, Reagan was filled with total despair, “I just can’t get it right,” he told her. Reportedly, he was almost sobbing. “I’m no good alone. I need someone to share my life, and Doris, you are that someone.”

She said, “What I knew for sure was that he didn’t love me, and I didn’t love him. I could have had him if I’d wanted him. If I was willing to make the big moves, push, be there, encourage him, never leave him alone for a moment. He would never leave me if I made him think it would be wrong to do so. Those soft, vulnerable eyes staring into mine. I couldn’t do it [i.e., marry him]. I would only bring him more misery later on. I let the moment go.”

“But the day was saved,” Lilly said. “Along came Nancy to save his soul.”

In 1951, after she broke up with Reagan, Lilly’s tongue-in-cheek novel, How to Marry a Millionaire was published by Putnam. Ironically, its 1953 adaptation into a film became one of the most popular movies Marilyn Monroe ever made.

Lilly later wrote a sequel, How to Marry a Billionaire (Delacorte, 1984). “A million dollars isn’t much money these days. You can’t even get a decent house for that.”

Lilly is also said to have been the inspiration for the Holly Golightly character in Truman Capote’s novella, Breakfast at Tiffany’s, which evolved, in 1961, into a movie hit starring Audrey Hepburn. [Capote had wanted Marilyn Monroe to interpret the role. Other women, not just Lilly, also claimed to have been the inspiration for Holly.]

Lilly said, “There was a lot of wondering about who was the original Holly Golightly. Pamela Drake and I were living in this brownstone walk-up on East 78th Street, exactly the one in Breakfast at Tiffany’s. Exactly. Truman used to come over all the time to watch me put on my makeup before I went out. There’s an awful lot of me in Holly Golightly.”

Lilly later said, “After me, I don’t think Ronnie went out with anyone on a very serious basis. He was a new bachelor with a roving eye. From what I heard, he took out a girl only once or twice before dumping her. Some of his affairs lasted a whole week.”

When Reagan became President, Lilly sold two of the love letters he’d written to her for $4,400. Financier Malcolm Forbes purchased them and presented them as a gift to Nancy Reagan. He waited until Reagan left office so that she would not have to declare them as gifts.

Lilly was furious when she heard what Forbes had done. “That bitch [a reference to Nancy] is so jealous of any other woman who knew Ronnie that she’ll probably destroy the letters so that future generations won’t know there was anyone else but her in his life. It’s a damn shame that Malcolm gave them to her, because those letters should be preserved as part of history.”

Perhaps out of friendship with Reagan, both Hedda Hopper and Louella Parsons rarely reported on his post-Wyman romances. However, columnist Sidney Skolsky ran many a juicy tidbit, detailing a number of affairs of the women in his life, including Adele Jergens, Monica Lewis, Patricia Neal, and Nancy Davis, whom he referred to as “a pretty model.”

Connie Wald, who had been married to Jerry Wald, a close friend of Reagan, recalled that period of his life “between marriages.”

“His career was going downhill, and he was drifting from the bed of one beautiful young woman to another. I must say, the girls really went for him. He had his pick of Hollywood beauties. He was so sweet and nice, and he still had his good looks. Yet he was a very private man. He didn’t want anyone to look inside. He was never really serious about anyone until Nancy Davis came along, and even she had a hard time nailing him. She faced stiff competition from half the dames in Hollywood. Many a starlet was anxious to become the second Mrs. Ronald Reagan, president of the Screen Actors Guild.”

Even the fan magazines picked up on Reagan, the new “Hollywood swinger.” Silver Screen wrote, “Never thought we’d come right out and call Ronald Reagan a ‘wolf,’ but let us face it. Suddenly, every glamour gal considers him a super-sexy escort for the evening. He admits he’s missed a lot of fun and is out to make up for it. Some say that the torch of Jane Wyman has finally been reduced to a feeble flame.”

Reagan claimed his hot date, Kay Stewart, had “Betty Grable legs and Betty’s blonde hair, although in this picture she had reverted to her natural “wren brown.”

Sometimes, Reagan double dated with other married couples, particularly Robert Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck, who were having their own marital troubles. They would divorce in 1951. One night, Reagan was spotted with starlet Kay Stewart, whom he called “My Yellow Rose of Texas.

Stewart and Reagan often talked about how they got started in Hollywood in the late 1930s. She had a brief appearance in Ernst Lubitsch’s 1939 Ninotchka, and she had worked with Preston Sturges in his comedies. Reagan said, “Kay had never really had a chance to show off her talent.”

Both Stewart and Reagan were recovering from recent divorces. She had been married to Langdon William Proctor.

Reagan told Stanwyck, “Kay wants to be as big a movie star as you are.”

Stanwyck shot back, “As if that were possible.”

Penny Edwards, shown here in full cowgirl drag with Roy Rogers. When the “King of the Cowboys” wasn’t in the saddle, Reagan became the horseman.

Actually, Stewart went on to garner nearly a hundred credits, mostly in TV series, such as Charlie’s Angels, Baretta, Medical Story, and The Doris Day Show.

“My romance with Kay ended before it really began,” Reagan told Taylor. “She’s looking for another husband, and it isn’t going to be me.”

Penny Edwards had a small role in That Hagen Girl with Reagan and Shirley Temple. Three weeks after making that box office failure, he called her for a date, which led to several outings and what was rumored as a prolonged sexual fling.

At the time Reagan met her, she was appearing in Two Guys from Texas (1948), with Dennis Morgan and Jack Carson. He quizzed her a lot about Morgan, and she said she knew very little about him, except Jane paid at least five visits to the set to see Morgan. Edwards later said, “I think Ronnie suspected something was going on between Dennis and Jane. I felt something was, but I’m not a blabbermouth.”

Edwards was blonde and blue-eyed—“just my type,” Reagan said.

Stanwyck said, “Ronnie was a gentleman who preferred blondes but married brunettes.”

Edwards had appeared in 1943 in The Ziegfeld Follies with Milton Berle. “He took my virginity and gave me the wrong impression about men. I had never seen a nude man before, so I just assumed that all of them had a tree truck between their legs. Did I soon learn differently."

Reagan would go for long periods without calling and then suddenly, "in the middle of the night, he'd ring up for a date," she recalled.

He learned that she'd become involved on and off the screen with Roy Rogers, "King of the Cowboys." When his wife, Dale Evans, retired as "Queen of the Cowgirls," Edwards filled in for her, signing on for such pictures as Sunset in the West (1950). She told Reagan "You take Roy out of the saddle, and he isn't much, if you get my drift."

"I've heard the same said about John Wayne," Reagan said.

"They can't say that about you, lover boy," Edwards said. "What stamina! What endurance!"

"My thing with Ronnie might have gone somewhere had it not been for my mother," Edwards recalled. "She was a real Bible thumper, a religious zealot. She hated Ronnie, and called him a whoremonger."

He met her a few more times, including as part of a date with her right before he married Nancy Davis. She told him she was making Pony Soldier (1952) with Tyrone Power. "Guess what? I'm shot with an arrow, I ride in a burning wagon, I am kidnapped by Indians and thrown from a horse. I have to swim in a raging river, and I'm tied to a flaming stake to be set on fire. Otherwise, there's not much action, certainly not from Ty Power."

He later learned she'd taken up with bisexual Rory Calhoun, with whom both of them had worked on That Hagen Girl. But then, she abandoned her film career to join the Seventh Day Adventists. The Los Angeles Times headlined the news—PENNY EDWARDS CALLS WHOA TO HOSS OPERAS.

A veteran infighter of the diva wars: Peggy Knudsen.

Her retreat was only temporary. In the late 1950s, she returned briefly to film some Westerns. She ended her life making appearances at Western conventions, dressed in cowgirl outfits and signing autographs for members of her dwindling fan base.

Reagan's involvement with starlet Peggy Knudsen was so brief it hardly counts. From Duluth, Minnesota, she arrived in Hollywood hoping to break into the movies. As she told Reagan, "I ended up working with two of the biggest bitches in Hollywood, Bette Davis in A Stolen Life (1946) and later, that same year, with Joan Crawford in Humoresque."

She also appeared with Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall in The Big Sleep. "Don't believe all those stories about Bogie being faithful to his wife," Knudsen said.

When she dated Reagan, she had emerged from a divorce from Adrian P. Samish. She finally decided that Reagan wasn't going to marry her, so she went after and won Jim Jordan in 1949.

Reagan never saw her again, but read in Variety that she was appearing in Istanbul (1957) with Errol Flynn. Reagan had seen Flynn, drunk and extroverted, at a party a few months earlier. "Poor Peggy," he said. "She's getting Errol on his last legs, just before the lid is closed on his coffin."

Florida-born Dorothy Shay, known as "The Park Avenue Hillbillie," was another Reagan conquest. As part of her art, she usually dressed like a Park Avenue socialite, but when she opened her mouth, she sounded like a low-end Florida cracker from the Panhandle.

Dorothy ("The Park Avenue Hillbillie") Shay.

When Reagan met her, she had scored one of her biggest recording hits, "Feudin' and Fightin." Her 1947 The Park Avenue Hillbillie, rose to number one on Billboard's chart of bestselling popular albums.

Later, Shay worked with Bud Abbott and Lou Costello in the movie, Comin' Round the Mountain (1951). "Lou and I used to talk dirty," she said. "Real raunchy stuff. I told him that of all the guys I'd bedded, Ronnie was strictly missionary position. In contrast to him, I did everything. I think my kinky maneuvers turned him off. I don't believe he'd ever experienced any 'rosebud' fore-play. There was a part of him that he wanted to keep very, very private."

Eileen Howe, whose "True Confessions" were promoted on the front page of this French magazine.

Reagan became intrigued by starlet Eileen Howe after reading about her in the newspapers. For a time in the late 1940s and early 1950s, she was hailed as "the prettiest girl in Hollywood."

In December of 1946, Louella Parsons ran a strange item in her column, claiming, "Eileen Howe is allergic to touch, and can't even hold hands with her boyfriend."

"Where in hell did Louella get that idea?" Reagan later asked after dating Howe.

A former model for the Hartford Agency in New York, Howe became fodder for gossip columnists once she'd arrived in Hollywood. In May of 1947, Dorothy Kilgallen claimed, "Gilbert Roland, once Constance Bennett's husband, is wooing Eileen Howe."

As a starlet in Hollywood, she was secretly dating Lew Ayres, who otherwise was expressing "undying love" for Jane Wyman.

Howe's date book was filled with suitors who included Jimmy Van Heusen, Errol Flynn, Dean Martin, and movie Tarzan Lex Barker.

Like those men, Reagan was drawn to her measurements of 35-23-35. She had to work Reagan in between calls from Howard Hughes. Ted Briskin was seen dating her after his divorce from Betty Hutton. Tony Curtis, Vince Edwards, and Scott Brady were also on her trail.

Reagan gave up the chase in January of 1952 right before he married Nancy. Columnist Hay Hoye wrote: "Gary Cooper's latest 'friend' is Eileen Howe."

Reagan's conclusion about her: "She didn't do too bad for a gal who can't stand to be touched."

Singer Evelyn Knight was not the most beautiful blonde Reagan ever dated, but she was talented, quite good looking, and had a bubbly personality that charmed him, at least temporarily.

Known as "The Lass with the Delicate Air," she was a popular recording artist in the 1940s and 50s, having scored a big hit with "Buttons and Bows." Her duet with country singer Red Foley, "My Heart Cries for You," was a lament heard on jukeboxes from Maine to Florida and west to Oregon.

Reagan first spotted her during a visit to the Blue Angel Nightclub in Manhattan. He waited until her final performance and then invited her out for a midnight date. She was seen leaving his hotel suite the following morning. Back in Los Angeles, he attended her shows at both Ciro's and the Cocoanut Grove.

He claimed that Knight was his favorite singer, saying that he preferred her to Jo Stafford, Peggy Lee, and Dinah Shore. He told William Holden that his greatest night with her was at a small club in San Fernando Valley, where both of them had been drinking heavily. Knight took the microphone and sang all the favorites whose names were called out to her from the audience. "She knew them all, and never missed a beat," he said. "We ended up closing the joint down."

Singer Evelyn Knight dedicated "My Heart Cries for You" to Reagan.

He asked Holden, "Guess who my competition is? Tony Martin, Bing Crosby, and Gordon MacCrae. Those singers are a randy bunch." He'd heard that Ray Sinatra, a cousin of Frank Sinatra, had signed on as her musical conductor. "I wonder if Ray takes after Frank."

The last time he saw Knight was in 1954, two years after his marriage to Nancy. She told him, "I'm getting out of the business. Supper clubs are dying, and the sound of rock and roll fills the air waves."

Knight ended up living in obscurity in Phoenix, where she hired out as a babysitter, usually to people who knew nothing of her illustrious past.

Reagan dated the Massachusetts-born Ruth Roman, a sultry brunette, before she married Mortimer Hall in 1950. When he learned that she was the daughter of immigrant parents from Lithuania, he told her, “If all the girls in Lithuania look like you, I’m taking the next boat there in the morning.”

Ruth Roman: “If guys like Ronnie Reagan couldn’t get Ava Gardner, they settled for me.”

Her father had been a circus barker, who died when she was very young. As a means of supporting her family, her mother became a char-woman.

Reagan told Hedda Hopper, “Ruth has really struggled to get beyond one of those ‘blink-and-you-miss-me’ parts.”

Roman played a supporting role to Rita Hay-worth in Gilda (1946) and to Bette Davis in Beyond the Forest (1949). Finally, she nabbed a key role in Champion (1949) with Kirk Douglas.

“I love acting,” she told him. “But it can break your heart. It has mine several times.” She said that she had posed for stills for crime magazines at $5 an hour as a means of earning $200 to travel by train from Massachusetts to Hollywood.

One day, Reagan visited the set of Champion where he chatted briefly with its director, Mark Robson. While Roman was in the shower, Robson introduced Reagan to Lola Albright. Reagan then secretly asked Albright out on a date.

Eventually, after months of struggle, Roman was awarded the female lead in Alfred Hitchcock’s Strangers on a Train (1951). Originally, the male lead was to have gone to his friend, William Holden, who pulled out at the last minute. Subsequently, that key role went to a weaker actor, Farley Granger. The second male lead was given to Robert Walker, who was dating Nancy Davis at the time.

After her completion of Strangers on a Train, Roman was cast with Jane Wyman in Starlift (1951). Reagan became a bit agitated after hearing that. Doris Day, whom he was also dating at the time, was in that movie, too, and he didn’t want either Day or Roman to discuss him with his ex-wife. “Jane and I are divorced,” he told Roman, “but I still feel embarrassed when she encounters women with whom I’m having an affair.”

By the time she made Starlift, Roman was no longer bedding Reagan, but he did see her on occasion. “In my talks with Jane, your name never came up,” she assured him. She told him that Gary Cooper was also in Starlift.

“He propositioned me, even though I heard he was still in love with Patricia Neal.”

“And married, too,” Reagan added.

Hailing from Akron, Ohio, singer/actress Lola Albright was buxom and blonde. On her first date with Reagan, she wore a gown with such low colletage that it left little to the imagination. She came to Hollywood in 1947, but didn’t get a good role until her involvement in Champion, two years later.

Reagan wondered if she’d been seduced by Kirk Douglas, who was known for bedding actresses with whom he appeared.

Reagan may have gotten her a role in his own The Girl from Jones Beach, released the same year as Champion. At any rate, he admired her very much and noted that she had a fairly successful career in Hollywood without ever becoming a big star.

Lola Albright tried to imitate Betty Grable's celebrated World War II pinup photo, but didn't quite pull it off.

Years before, Reagan had seduced the real thing. Lola was "merely the mock."

In time, he saw her as a nightlife singer on television's detective series, Peter Gunn (1958-1961), as created by Blake Edwards. Albright was cast as the romantic interest of the series' namesake, Peter Gunn, played by Craig Stevens. Reagan as a rather crass joke said, "Until you, I used to be Craig's love interest." Later, Reagan went to see Elvis Presley's Kid Galahad (1962), because he heard that Albright was in it.

Reagan also maintained another, indirect link, to Albright. In 1952, she married actor Jack Carson, the best friend and often movie sidekick to Dennis Morgan, with whom Jane had conducted her most enduring love affair.

As far as Albright's dating of Reagan, it appears that he took her out to a nightclub on perhaps two occasions as part of "a harmless encounter," he said. "Lola was very charming, a talented star who could both act and sing, and a nice person, something not always encountered in Hollywood."

Ann Sothern was acquainted with Reagan's second wife, Nancy Davis, before he was. Both of these women had appeared in Shadow on the Wall. If the blonde-haired Sothern had had her way, she might have been the one who married Reagan instead of Nancy.

Ann Sothern: “I worked with Nancy Davis, but what I did with Ronnie, I wouldn’t exactly call ‘work.’”

In 1949, Sothern was in the throes of divorcing Pennsylvania-born actor Robert Sterling, whom she’d impetuously married in 1943, when thousands of other couples seemed to be rushing with equivalent wartime zeal into the bonds of matrimony.

Sterling had been a flight instructor throughout most of the war. After his release from the military, he found that his career had faltered during his absence. Likewise, after appearing in several postwar films, including as the featured actress within the popular Maisie series, Sothern’s own career “was on the skids,” as she put it.

Since Reagan and Sothern always seemed to be laughing and joking with each other on their “fundates,” his friends, including Dick Powell and June Allyson, thought they might eventually traipse down down the aisle together. “I knew that Ann was most willing,” Allyson said.

Reagan, however, may have found Sothern too aggressive. She’d told him, “When a gal is getting rid of a husband, it’s time for her to go shopping for another.”

Although he dated her from anywhere from three weeks to a month, marriage was not on his agenda. She’d gained a bit of weight, and she was two years older than he was. As he told William Holden, “I like my dates to be ten to fifteen years younger than me.”

“So you can be a father to them?” Holden facetiously asked.

“Yeah, right!”

“You say ten to fifteen years,” Holden said. “You’ve got it all wrong. Try twenty to twenty-five years.”

The Sothern/Reagan romance ended abruptly. Allyson thought she knew the reason why. Shortly after filming A Letter to Three Wives (1949), Sothern contracted infectious hepatitis after being injected with an impure serum as part of a medical procedure while she was in England for a stage performance.

Reagan didn’t wait around long enough for her to recover.

A more serious relationship for Reagan developed with Betty Underwood, a starlet who had had a minor role in The Girl from Jones Beach (1949).

A former Powers model in New York, the strikingly beautiful Underwood was one of dozens of young women who had come to maturity during World War II and had migrated to Hollywood. She arrived there in 1948, and began dating Reagan, who was in the last throes of his divorce from Jane Wyman.

One night, he invited her to a premiere. “I like to arrive with a bombshell on my arm,” he said. “That way, Jane won’t think I’m still in mourning over her desertion of me.”

In Hollywood, Underwood became better known for dating famous men than she was for her movie career. She enjoyed a romance with the former Mr. Joan Crawford (Franchot Tone), which caused a rift between her and actress Jean Wallace, who was married to Tone at the time.

Betty Underwood. As one reporter wrote, “Betty Underwood plays Ronald Reagan like a fiddle, making him chase her all over the East Coast, from New York to Florida.”

Scott Brady, the brother of Laurence Tierney, was a handsome stud, the former lover of Anne Bancroft, who dated him at the same time Underwood did. “Scott was very proud of his equipment—and rightly so,” Bancroft said.

Brady said, “I liked Betty a lot. But in those days, my phone was ringing off the walls, not only from hot babes, but a lot of famous male stars, too. I guess word of my gift had gotten around. I turned her over to Reagan.”

That was not exactly the case. Brady didn’t actually turn her over to anybody. Underwood charted her own course.

Reagan’s affair with her lasted until March of 1951. The year Reagan married Nancy (1952), Underwood became engaged to Lester Deutsch, the multi-millionaire aeronautics pioneer.

Shirley Ballard on Reagan: “A hard guy to nail down.”

At last report, she was still alive in 2013. If asked to dredge up a memory of Reagan, she recalled him as “charming, delightful, and very romantic.”

If she had any regret at all, it involved her burning of his love letters, which would potentially be worth a lot of money today.

A Los Angeles native, the attractive starlet, Shirley Ballard, also appeared in Reagan’s date book at the time. Fourteen years younger than him, she was another talented newcomer to the industry who never became a full-fledged star. After her heyday, parts were infrequent and minor, and included a brief appearance in the 1979 film Mad Max, starring Mel Gibson.

When Hedda Hopper asked Reagan about Ballard, he said, “It was nothing, Hedda, She’s a fine girl. We were just ships who passed in the night without colliding.”

Reagan was introduced to Peggy Stewart by her brother-in-law, Wayne Morris, who had co-starred with Reagan and Jane Wyman in those Brother Rat movies.

Peggy Stewart: “After my divorce at the end of the war, I was shopping around. Ronnie fell into my cart, but hopped out.”

Growing up in West Palm Beach, Florida, Stewart, a beautiful starlet, was twelve years younger than Reagan. She’d entered a wartime marriage to actor Don (“Red”) Barry, but their wedded bliss didn’t make it till the Victory parades.

She became known for a string of B Westerns, in which she appeared with such cowboy stars as Sunset Carson, Wild Bill Elliott, and Gene Autry.

She broke into movies at the same time as Reagan did, making her debut in Wells Fargo (1937), in which she was cast as the teenage daughter of Joel McCrea.

“I’ve played every role from a chorus girl in Man About Town (1939) to a convict in Girls in Chains (1943),” she said.

When Reagan no longer called, she “free lanced” in the romantic department until actor Buck Young came along. She married him in 1953, and was still married to him at the time of his death in 2000.

In later years, Stewart often appeared dressed as a cowgirl at film festivals, where her fans remembered her. A fan would approach her, “I still remember you in Cheyenne Wildcat (1944).”

Stewart was still working as late as 2012, when she was cast as “Grandma Delores” in the Adam Sandler comedy, That’s My Boy.

Reagan momentarily fell for “my songbird,” Monica Lewis, a dimple-cheeked beauty known as “America’s Singing Sweetheart.” One of her biggest hits was “Put the Blame on Mame,” the highlight of Rita Hayworth’s movie Gilda. Other hits included “I Wish You Love” and “Autumn Leaves.” The theme and title associated with the Autumn Leaves was made into a movie (1956), starring Joan Crawford.

Lewis’ singing voice was later used for commercials on the TV series, General Electric Theater, which Reagan hosted.

No, it isn’t Lana Turner. It’s Monica Lewis!

Still alive at the time of this writing, Lewis wrote an autobiography, Hollywood Through My Eyes: The Lives and Loves of a Golden Age Siren, in which she detailed her romances with Reagan and Kirk Douglas.

She also wrote about her discovery by Benny Goodman and her ill-fated stint at MGM, where she was groomed “as a threat to Lana Turner. I was in the right place at the wrong time.”

At the time Reagan dated her, Lewis was the singing voice of “Miss Chiquita Banana,” a cartoon TV commercial. In 1948, she appeared on the first ever Ed Sullivan Show. She married record producer Robert Thiele in 1945, but divorced him in 1947. A few months later, she was seen out with Reagan. They made an attractive, compatible couple, but nothing very serious came out of their romance, since Reagan, and perhaps Lewis, too, were each “playing the field.”

Reagan was reportedly shocked when he learned that Lewis had married Jennings Lang in 1956.

Monica Lewis with her husband, Jennings Lang, the man who delivered the only known punch to the face of Ronald Reagan.

[In 1951, Lang had been involved in one of that year’s biggest Hollywood scandals. Producer Walter Wanger discovered that his wife, the beautiful and sultry Joan Bennett, sister of Constance Bennett, was having an affair with Lang, a theatrical agent at the time. They conducted their romance clandestinely, often at vacation spots in the Caribbean. In Los Angeles, they enjoyed “quickies” at his apartment in Beverly Hills.

Wanger learned of the affair. Like a crazed cuckold, he lay in wait for them, shooting Lang in the testicles when he emerged from a car with Bennett. Helater pleaded temporary insanity, eventually escaping with a four-month jail sentence.]

Reagan was acquainted with Lang, as he had become the head of MCA’s West Coast TV operations.

In the halls of one of MCA's office buildings, Reagan encountered Lang during the time he was married to Lewis. "Jennings, my good fellow," Reagan said, mockingly. "I hope everything is in working order. You're the first castrato I've ever met."

Losing control, Lang punched Reagan in the face, bloodying his nose. Apparently, this was the first and only time Reagan had ever been struck in the face in Hollywood.

Lang later became a producer, turning out such pictures as Airport 1975. He never forgave Reagan for his insult. After he left MCA, he attacked him. "Reagan is the invention of that Hollywood conglomerate, MCA," he charged. "Every facet of his life, from his film career to his entry into politics, to his money in the bank, is indirectly controlled by MCA. He is the puppet, with MCA pulling his strings, with the help of the Mafia."

A diminutive beauty, Wisconsin-born Christine Larson graced movie screens from 1948 to 1955 in a series of grade B Westerns and long-forgotten potboilers like Last Train to Bombay (1952) and Valley of the Head Hunters (1953).

She became better known in TV series, including The Cisco Kid and Four Star Playhouse, and in 1950, she also starred in five episodes of Dick Tracy.

In Hollywood, Larson became notorious for her varied affairs with screen actors, and was often featured in the gossip columns. She had a long affair with actor Johnny Mack Brown, who had been one of the greatest halfbacks ever to play for the University of Alabama's Crimson Tide.

In Hollywood, Brown had been a romantic leading man, appearing opposite such stars as Greta Garbo, Mary Pickford, and Joan Crawford. His widely publicized affair with one of his leading ladies, Marion Davies, then mistress of William Randolph Hearst, damaged his career.

Baha'i Beauty: Christine Larson

When Jack Carson spotted Reagan with Larson one night at the Cocoanut Grove, he quipped, "Out with a redhead for a change?"

Larson and Reagan were often spotted together going horseback riding, usually on Sunday afternoons. She was a champion equestrian and a rodeo queen. She told him, "My greatest ambition in life is to own a Lipizzaner stallion. Why don't you buy me one?"

"I thought I was stallion enough for you," he answered.

She not only went riding with him along the trails of the Hollywood Hills, but she designed his cowboy gear too. Before dating him, she had been a designer for the Western Costume Company. "I prefer to dress my men from the skin, beginning with their jockstraps," she once said. He liked the suits she gave him, except for one. It was all in red, and included red boots and a red ten-gallon hat. He refused to wear it.

William Holden said, “Christine was different from Ronnie’s usual girlfriends. She was absolutely gorgeous with great legs. I slipped behind Ronnie’s back and bedded her a few times. A hot little number.”

Holden later claimed that “Neither Christine nor Nancy Davis knew it—at least I don’t think they did—but Ronnie was also carrying on at least three other affairs when he was courting them. I screwed around a lot myself in those days. But I was more selective than he was—I mean, I went for the class dames like Audrey Hepburn and Grace Kelly.”

For Reagan, at least, there was a potential problem associated with Larson’s choice of religions, especially if Reagan continued his involvement in politics. She was a follower of the Bahá’i faith. It was reported that Larson got Reagan to attend at least four Bahá’i services with her.

[Ranked as one of the world’s fastest-growing religions, and founded by Bahá’u’lláh, a much-persecuted visionary who was exiled for his teaching in 19th-century Persia, Bahá’i is a monotheistic religion emphasizing the spiritual unity of humankind, asserting that there is only one God, the source of all creation, and that the human purpose is to learn to know and love God through such methods as reflection, service to humanity, and prayer. The religion, which has more than five million adherents worldwide, recognizes the link to God of such prophets and messengers as Moses, Muhammed, Jesus, Buddha, and Krishna.]

The playwright, O.Z. White, who knew both Reagan and Larson, claimed, “Reagan would talk about politics, Christine about the Bahá’i. In that religion, it is forbidden for a member to enter politics.”

Even so, Larson claimed that Reagan was moved by her faith and its universal message. When he became President of the United States, he asked for a halt to the executions of the Bahá’i people in Iran.

At one point, as reported by June Allyson, “Ronnie got down on bended knee and proposed marriage to Larson the old-fashioned way. She told me she was in her twenties, but I’d heard that she was actually 33 at the time.”

Along with an engagement ring, he presented her with a diamond wrist watch. She promised she’d get back to him with her answer the next day. As promised, she called him the following afternoon, rejecting his offer of marriage, but telling him that she planned to keep the wristwatch.

At the time, he was dating Larson at her apartment on North Beverly Glen, he was also dating Nancy Davis, who had an apartment on South Beverly Glen. On some days, he’d have a late afternoon session with Larson before driving over to escort Nancy to dinner.

One night, according to Larson, “Ronnie appeared on my doorstep in a state of panic. Even though I’d not accepted his marriage proposal, we had continued to see each other. He’d told me he’d just come from the apartment of Nancy Davis.”

“She claims she’s pregnant, and I’m the father,” Reagan told Larson. “I’m not so sure. This may be just a trick to lure me into the marriage trap.”

That night, Reagan left Larson’s home and drove alone to Slapsie Maxie’s nightclub on Wilshire Boulevard. It was one of his favorite haunts. Although she was on a date with someone else, he spotted starlet Selene Walters.

She was later described as “a big California blonde star, like one of those beautiful Rose Bowl queens Reagan always lusted after.”

At some point, Walters slipped him her phone number and address. She would later become the centerpiece of one of the most notorious chapters in Reagan’s “between marriages” horndog periods.

Larson later lamented having rejected Reagan’s proposal of marriage. “I made a terrible mistake,” she confessed. “I liked him a lot, although I was not in love with him. I could not have imagined that one day, he would be Governor of California. If I had married him, I would have been First Lady of California. It never occurred to me that he’d rise that far in politics.”

Larson died in 1973, and, of course, wasn’t alive to see her former lover obtain an even more important government office.

Actually, what hastened the end of the Reagan/Larson affair was the day she told him that she had fallen in love with Gary Cooper and that they were engaged in a torrid affair in spite of their age difference.

In 1989, someone asked Reagan if he’d ever proposed marriage to Christine Larson. “I do not recall any person by that name,” he said. “I have no memory of her whatsoever. I dated a number of young ladies in those days, but nothing serious—that is, until my dear Nancy came along.”

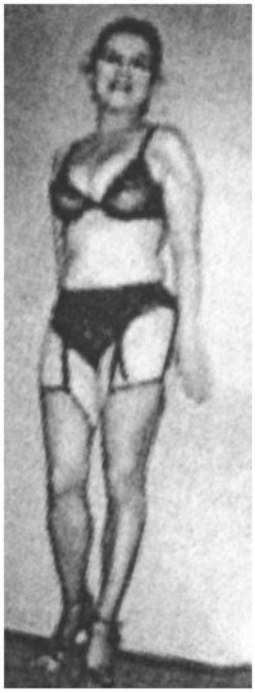
Bob Thomas, author of Jack Warner, Crown Prince of Hollywood, said of Jacqueline Park, “Her life had been the stuff of trashy novels. Born in Philadelphia without a father; raised in New York’s Hell’s Kitchen by a promiscuous mother, worked as a dancer in Manhattan night spots; recruited by a madam as the plaything of millionaires; went to Hollywood for the kinky pleasures of director Edmund Goulding. She tried to be an actress, but mostly she worked nighttime for well-known figures including Cary Grant, who introduced her to the mind-expanding capabilities of LSD."



This blurred photograph shows Jacqueline Park, dressed receive visitors. She had a brief fling with Reagan, but a longer, more enduring affair with Jack Warner.

"A kinky footnote in dating career," Reagan told William Holden.

George Paley, a businessman from the Los Angeles area, introduced Park to Reagan, who seemed entranced by her beauty and her self-assured personality. He asked for her telephone number and called her the next day at the Studio Club, where she lived.

At that time, before his eventual move to a ranch in the Hollywood Hills, he was still living in the Londonderry Apartments. He made a date with her for the following night. He suggested that since he lived only a short distance away, it would be cheaper to take the bus. "Right away, I knew he was cheap, but I went over anyway."

At his apartment door, he greeted her in a red silk bathrobe with an ascot. "Our first date got off to a rough start," she later confessed. He didn't want to leave his apartment with me. When things got amorous later in the evening, it was embarrassing. He couldn't perform. He blamed it on the fact that he was still in mourning over his wife, Jane Wyman, who had divorced him."

In spite of that disaster of an evening, Park claimed she continued to see him. "He was an important man, the president of SAG. "We both were confident that his sexual prowess would return—and it did."

Transportation was always an issue between them. On her first date, she asked for cab fare back home. "I told him I was afraid to be out on the streets, a woman alone at two o'clock in the morning."

"He told me there were no rapists in his area, and that it was foolish to waste money on a cab. I barely had enough bus fare in my purse. It continued that way throughout our entire relationship. No cab fare…ever. He never took me to a night club. He never bought me a gift. He occasionally ordered take-out. I still don't know why he didn't want to be seen with me. I sure as hell didn't look like chopped liver. And he was divorced, after all."

Reagan had a more favorable memory of Park than she had of him. He told June Allyson, "Jackie is a curious mixture of a fragile beauty and worldly wisdom learned through the school of hard knocks."

His relationship with Park ended brusquely on the night she arrived at the Londonderry Apartments and confronted him with news that she was pregnant. "It was the worst night of my life," she recalled. "He accused me of having affairs with other men. At one point, he shouted at me, 'All you starlets are trying to entrap a man by getting pregnant and demanding marriage. First, I don't think the kid in the oven is mine. We were never seen together. There's no proof we ever had a sexual relationship. You're going to have to deal with this god damn thing yourself. I know I'm not responsible. You'll not get one cent from me. One of your other boyfriends will have to give you the money for the abortion.'"

In tears that night, she left his apartment, "taking the bus, of course. I didn't plan to go after him in court with a good lawyer. I was afraid that if I defied him, I'd lose my membership in SAG."

A friend of hers, Bentley Ryan, came to her rescue. She credited him with arranging the details of her abortion.

As was later speculated, had she given birth to Reagan's child, there might have eventually been another son (or daughter) arriving at the door of the White House, "demanding to see Daddy."

After Reagan, Park dated many famous men, including Frank Sinatra after Ava Gardner dumped him. "Frank liked orgies," she said. "I didn't. We broke up when he demanded I go to bed with him and another woman."

For a time, she conducted a secret affair with the handsome lawyer and playboy, Greg Bautzer. "One night, he told me to arrive after midnight. By then, I had a car. Before I got out of my car, I spotted a woman leaving his house. I saw him kissing her goodbye. When she walked under the streetlight, I recognized her face. It was Jane Wyman."

Ironically, in 1961, Park became the mistress of Jack Warner, Reagan's former boss. "He was just as cheap as Reagan. A lousy tipper. His underwear was torn. He patched together thin bars of soap in his bathroom. He gave me a weekly allowance of $200, but sometimes shortchanged me."

She recalled being taken to London, where they attended a reception in which he introduced her to Princess Margaret. "Jack told her Royal Highness, 'Jackie here has a heart of gold and a snatch to match.'"

"He refused to take me to the White House when he got an invitation from John F. Kennedy in 1962," Park claimed. "His excuse was, 'I can't take my mistress to the White House.' Later, when he returned to Hollywood, he told me, 'I'll be damned. Jack Kennedy slipped away with me to one of the private rooms. Waiting for us was his own mistress and a gal for me, too.'"

Years later, after Warner ended their relationship, Park recalled Reagan: "He just ran out on me when I got pregnant. He was a swinger in those days. He went out with this girl and that girl. But the moment he married Nancy, he became a Republican. He reformed, and there is nothing more boring than a reformed swinger."

Park later became a Manhattan "psychodramatist," [in this case, a sex therapist], charging male clients $100 an hour to act out their sexual fantasies. She also wrote a book, Memoirs of a Hollywood Mistress, but found trouble finding a publisher.

When Kitty Kelley's 1991 book, Nancy Reagan: The Unauthorized Biography, came out, the accusations of actress Selene Walters made headlines. A typical one read GIPPER THE RIPPER. Her stunning charge was that Reagan had raped her. Only two American presidents have ever been charged with rape—first, Reagan, and later, Bill Clinton.

Walters did admit to meeting Reagan, "the lone wolf," when he appeared at Slapsie Maxie's nightclub one night when she was in the company of another man. She also claimed that she slipped him her phone number and address. Her motives may have been more career-oriented than based on any physical attraction for him.

"He was the president of the Screen Actors Guild, and I thought he might help my career. God knows, I needed some help."

She later said that she was asleep when her doorbell rang at three o'clock that morning. It was Reagan.

"I opened the door and let him in," she later told People magazine. "Once inside, it was the battle of the couch. I was fighting him. I didn't want him to make love to me. He's a very big man, and he just had his way. Date rape? No, that was Kelley's phrase. I didn't have a chance to have a date with him."

Based on the events of that night, Walters said she had no ill will toward Reagan. "I even voted for him for president. I don't think he meant to harm me."

Some reporters claimed that Reagan's aides managed to keep Walters' revelations from being printed in The Washington Post, The New York Times, and The Los Angeles Times.

But the week Kelley's book was released, Reagan was accosted on the steps of a church, where he and Nancy were paying one of their biannual visits.

In front of TV cameras, a reporter called out: "Did you rape Selena Walters?"

Reagan politely said, "I don't think church would be a proper place to use the word I would have to use in discussing that."

The reporter later commented, "That was not exactly a denial."

The reporter's encounter with Reagan, with Nancy clinging tightly to the arm of her husband, was broadcast on TV news across the nation.

Both Doris Day and Jane Wyman appeared in Reagan's next film, It's a Great Feeling (1949), a silly piece of fluff spoofing Hollywood. But none of their scenes was together. In addition to Day, the actual stars of the picture were Dennis Morgan and Jack Carson, in yet another of their movies together.

Is It Really a Great Feeling?

Reagan appeared in a cameo with Dennis Morgan in a scene that takes place in a barbershop. It is one of the few times that Jane Wyman's former lover (Reagan) came together with her present lover (Morgan).

In her autobiography, Doris Day, Her Own Story, by A.E. Hotchner, Ernest Hemingway's friend, Day claimed that she had met Reagan through mutual friends who had moved to Los Angeles from New York.

This was at the time Reagan was divorcing Jane, and Day was in the throes of divorcing her second husband, saxophonist George Weidler. She had previously been married to trombonist Al Jorden, with whom she had a child, Terry Jorden, who later changed his name to Terry Melcher, adopting the name of Day's third husband, Martin Melcher.

At the time she started dating Reagan, Day had just emerged from a romance with Jack Carson, her co-star in her first film, Romance on the High Seas (1948). Carson and Day had also co-starred in her next film, My Dream is Yours (1948). Their romance had been called "mutually therapeutic." She was trying to keep him from drinking himself into oblivion, and he was attempting to wean her from her addiction to smoking three packages of Camels a day.

"The first time I saw her, I adored this pretty blonde with the freckles," Reagan said. "She had a real bubbly personality."

Reagan's first date with Day was in May of 1948, at the time Jane was filing for divorce. Day remembered that he spent most of the first evening "talking mainly about Janie. I lamented George."

"I'm a failure," she said to him.

"Not at all!" he responded, trying to reassure her. "Jack Warner told me you're going to become one of the biggest stars in Hollywood."

"But I failed at the two things I wanted most in life—that was to be a good wife, and to have a happy marriage."

“There were two things that impressed me about Ronnie,” Day wrote. “How much he liked to dance, and how much he liked to talk. Ronnie was really the only man I’ve ever known who loved dancing. There was a little place on Cienega that had a small band and a small dance floor, where he often took me. He danced well and had a pleasant personality, so I invariably enjoyed going out with Ronnie.”

Whereas Day was a Republican, Reagan at the time was still a liberal Democrat. She listened intently to his discourses, although his points often didn’t match her conservatism. She suggested he might tour the country giving speeches. “He’s what I would call a political personality—engaging, strong, and very voluble.”

Reagan was overshadowed by other actors in the “cattle call” that Jack Warner issued for most of his then-underused stable of movie stars.

Depicted above: Doris Day, Dennis Morgan, and Jack Carson, listening through a peephole.

As Day’s biographer, David Bret, wrote: “The two would sneak off to his apartment high in the Hollywood Hills, and make love while marveling at the panoramic view below.”

Previously, Reagan and Day had each been directed by Michael Curtiz. She complained that he had given her great insecurity. “He wants me to lose weight and have hollow cheeks like Marlene Dietrich.”

“I’m back to being a bachelor again,” he said. “This was my first apartment in Hollywood. When I married Jane, I took her to live with me here. But these days, or nights, it gets pretty lonely wandering around this bachelor flat without anyone to love. This place brings back a lot of memories, both good and bad.”

“I’m surprised you moved in again,” she said. “I’d have preferred starting over again somewhere else.”

As Reagan told June Allyson, “Doris needs a lot of reassurance about her looks.”

She told him, “Sometimes I look at myself in the mirror, and I burst into tears at all those freckles.”

“You’re beautiful,” he said. “So fresh-faced. The freckles add to your charm.”

“I don’t know,” she said. “I have to spend so much time in makeup that I feel I’m wearing a plaster mask whenever I face the cameras. I’d give my soul to look like Hedy Lamarr.”

He was vaguely disturbed when he learned that Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens had befriended her and welcomed her to Hollywood, asking her to parties. These included an invitation to the home of Stanley Mills Haggart, the set designer and advertising agent.

Reagan always felt that Smith and Stevens had only “set Jane and me up so that, as a bisexual couple, they could move in on us.”

Even though he apparently never made his intentions known to Day, Reagan talked about the possibility of proposing marriage to her to such good friends as George Murphy. Dick Powell and June Allyson were also aware of the possibility of a marriage between the singing star and Reagan.

He even went so far as to discuss with Murphy the business angle of such a liaison. “I didn’t want to become Mr. Jane Wyman, but I’m thinking over being Mr. Doris Day. That might be a career goal, as I move into middle age. The roles are already drying up. I could be very aggressive, get the best movie deals for her, the fattest recording contracts. I’d make a great manager for her.”

On the set of It’s a Great Feeling, Reagan shook the hand of the director, David Butler, who welcomed him. Butler had been a former actor himself on the stage, and later in the Silents, but he became better known for second-rate musicals. Reagan soon learned that Butler had developed an unreciprocated crush on Day.

Reagan learned that he and Jane were not alone in making a cameo appearance in Butler’s film. They were joined by Errol Flynn, Gary Cooper, Joan Crawford, Sydney Greenstreet, Danny Kaye, Patricia Neal, Eleanor Parker, and Edward G. Robinson, along with Directors Michael Curtiz, Raoul Walsh, and King Vidor. Butler even had cast himself in a cameo.

Reagan had only one scene, set in a barbershop, not with Jane, but with Morgan and Carson. There was an undercurrent of sexual rivalry. Either known or unknown to Reagan, Jane had continued her long affair with Morgan. Complicating matters, Day had broken off with Carson before landing in Reagan's welcoming arms.

In the scene, Carson is in the barbershop, lamenting his difficulties in shooting his latest film. In the seat beside him is a man whose face is covered with a hot towel. When the towel is removed, it's revealed that the mystery man is Reagan himself.

Day plays a woman trying to break into Hollywood with the help of Morgan and Carson.

Before heading back to Wisconsin, Day appears as a Parisian prostitute in a black wig, crooning, "There's Nothing Rougher Than Love." Finally, she gives up and returns to her hometown of Gurkeys Corners, where she is set to marry her local hayseed boyfriend, Jeffrey Bushfinkle. Carson finds them at the altar. The bride and bridegroom have their backs to the camera. After their marriage vows, Bushfinkle lifts the veil of his bride to kiss her. He is seen for the first time. He looks like Errol Flynn. It IS Errol Flynn!

Later, Carson complained to Reagan. "When I made my first picture with Doris, Romance on the High Seas (1948), I was the fucking star. By the time this turkey is in the can, I'll be out there as her supporting player. She'll be the star."

At the end of the shoot, Carson encountered Reagan again. "In that last scene with Flynn, he and I almost came to blows—no, not that kind…"

Reagan later speculated why he and all the stellar personalities were cast in this "lightweight fluff. Jack Warner had all of us under contract, and I think he wanted to give us something to do until something better came along."

After finalizing his cameo, he called Lew Wasserman. "Get me a Western, god damn it!"

"Not now, Ronnie, baby," his agent said. "You're going to be flown to England to make The Hasty Heart with Patricia Neal. If you're lucky, you'll get to fuck her, although Gary Cooper is a tough hoss to follow."

At the time of his cameo in It's a Great Feeling (1949), Reagan, as president of SAG, was facing the "growing menace" of television and its threat to the Hollywood film industry. He wrote: "Supplies of headache powder are running low, and there's moaning and groaning in the land of make believe—for Hollywood and the entire entertainment industry are caught in the throes of a revolution."

SAG entered into a dispute with motion picture producers. At one point, actors threatened to go on strike.

The dispute, as Reagan explained it, developed within a context wherein screen actors had sold their services with the understanding that movies were intended only for exhibition in theaters. "Films should not be used in television without additional payments to actors."

The producers claimed they had a right to use a film they made and paid the actors for in any medium they chose.

In the end, the producers held firm on not granting residuals from television to actors for films they had made, some dating back to 1930, long before television became an almost universal fixture.

Patricia Neal was not Jack Warner's first choice, nor the first choice of director Vincent Sherman, for the role of the nurse, Sister Margaret, the only female role in The Hasty Heart (1950), based on the hit play by John Patrick. Originally, Eleanor Parker, who had co-starred with Reagan in The Voice of the Turtle, had been cast in the role, but had to drop out because she was pregnant.

Reagan and Neal, as friends and “civilians” aboard the ship returning to the US from England at the conclusion of filming.

Reagan seemed pleased when Neal was designated as her replacement, because he had worked so smoothly with her in John Loves Mary. That was a comedy. The Hasty Heart was a serious drama set in Burma during World War II, most of its scenes taking place in a military hospital. When Reagan signed on, he thought he was going to be cast as Latchie, a dying Scottish soldier, clearly the film’s most meaty and pithy part. But he soon learned from Sherman that the role had gone to an Irish newcomer, Richard Todd. A handsome actor born in Dublin, Todd walked off with the prize, for which he would later win an Oscar nomination.

Reagan had to be satisfied with the far less charismatic role of “Yank,” a compassionate American soldier recovering from malaria. In the hospital, he tries to befriend the often hostile Latchie.

Neal, instead of uprooting herself to London for the four-month filming, with Reagan, of The Hasty Heart, would have preferred to remain in Hollywood, co-starring with Gary Cooper in Task Force, because she was madly in love with him. Cooper promised to write her every day during their separation, which he did not do.

Neal and Reagan arrived together in bombed-out, post-war London during one of the bitterest, coldest winters in twenty or so years. “There was no heat anywhere,” Reagan said.

Although jealous of his having been awarded the star role, Reagan maintained a surface politeness with Todd. Todd later recalled, in an interview, “Reagan had a lot of complaints about filming in England. After the war, England froze the amount of money a producer could take out of the country. To spend the revenue earned in Britain, movie companies were shooting in England. Reagan felt that that represented a total lack of grace on Britain’s part, considering that the United States had ‘saved England from Hitler’s Nazi grip’ (his words).”

Filming was at the financially troubled Elstree Studio, which was being rebuilt after damage from Nazi bombardments during World War II, and slowly being adapted for use as a television production facility.

In The Hasty Heart, Latchie can't relate to others in the ward, although Yank tries to win his friendship, as does Neal as the nurse. At the time of his casting, Todd was thirty years old and had been a British paratrooper. He asked Reagan, "How many Nazis did you kill during the war?"

"I made propaganda films for the Americans," Reagan said, perhaps with a pang of guilt.

"We were shooting in England, but we were supposed to be in Burma, where it was hot," Todd said. "Sometimes, we had to appear in our shorts. Reagan continued to complain about the chill and dampness. 'I'm freezing my balls off,' he told me. 'The gals back in Hollywood won't like that.' That was the first time I realized that Reagan could talk like a regular bloke."

After the first week of filming, Todd invited Reagan to go on a pub crawl with him. Reagan told Todd, "I feel my film career is about over and yours is just beginning. I envy you. But one thing I don't envy is trying to make it in post-war Hollywood. It was always a vicious place. But the deadly rattlers have been replaced with man-eating dinosaurs. I may go into politics on a national level, although my involvement in politics has damaged my film career. I made enemies of directors and producers who might otherwise have hired me."

Todd also claimed that, "The image of Jane Wyman hovered over the set of The Hasty Heart like she was the co-star of that picture. Reagan was still in love with her, although having dates—perhaps affairs—with others. He and Patricia Neal were together practically every night. He once told me that he thought he and Jane would get back together. Once, I jokingly asked him, 'if he got back with Jane, would he give me his cast-offs?' He had no answer for that. While shooting the film, he spent a lot of time on the phone with Jane in California. He was eager for news not only of her, but also of the children. "

Neal later credited Reagan with giving her a lot of support during the filming. "We would have dinner and even go dancing at one of the local halls. He was a good dancer. People may have been shabbily dressed and their food rationed, but at night they sang and danced with all their hearts. They were happy the war was over. English food was horrid, a lot of cardboard fish with soggy bread crumbs and exhausted vegetables. Reagan missed his steaks and had a batch flown in from '21' in New York. But when he invited Neal to a steak dinner at the Savoy Hotel, the chef came out and apologized. 'The steaks, Mr. Reagan, have gone bad.'"

Neal said, "Ronnie knew differently. The chef and the kitchen crew had eaten them."

Sherman recalled, "Both Pat and Ronnie were depressed over their affairs of the heart. They were pining for Gary Cooper and Jane Wyman. I had to put up with these two lovesick puppies."

At the Savoy, Neal and Reagan had adjoining suites. Waiters and maids noted that they kept the connecting doors open at all times. One maid reported that she'd caught them having a shower together. When Todd heard about this, he said, "My motto is, if you're not with the one you love, make love to the one you're with."

When Neal was appearing on Broadway with Anne Bancroft in The Miracle Worker (1959), she modified her account of her experiences in London. Bancroft was seriously dating the designer, Stanley Mills Haggart, at the time.

"I once said that Ronnie never made a pass at me," Neal said. "What I didn't say was that I made a pass at him. On several nights, we cuddled up. What else was there to do? It was so god damn cold in London after the war. Of course, I wished it were Gary in my bed. At the time, Ronnie was mourning for Janie but getting cozy with Doris Day—and with me."

In the Dining Room of the Savoy Hotel, Reagan and Neal often dined with Elizabeth Taylor and Robert Taylor, who were in London together filming Conspirator (1949). He still numbered Robert among his best friends. Robert confessed to Reagan, "Elizabeth and I are getting it on."

Neal formed a friendship with a young dentist, Hamish Thomson, who was in love with her friend, Helen Horton. One weekend, Thomson drove Neal and Reagan on a sightseeing tour of the Cotswolds. "We played a quiz game," Neal said. "The question was, 'What would you like to be if you could be anybody in the whole world'?"

Reagan answered, "President of the United States."

Virginia Mayo, who had made The Girl from Jones Beach with Reagan, attended a Royal Command Film Performance of the movie, Scott of the Antarctic [the third most popular film at the British box office in 1949], starring John Mills. "Our party in London included Alan and Sue Ladd," she recalled, "along with Larry Olivier and Vivien Leigh. Vivien fell asleep during this dull and depressing movie, and her right breast popped out. I nudged Ronnie to awaken her and inform her of her tit malfunction. Instead of watching John Mills, he spent the rest of the movie staring at that exposed breast of Scarlett O'Hara, which he didn't get to see in Gone With the Wind."

Before the screening, Reagan had met Queen Elizabeth (a.k.a. Elizabeth Bowes-Lyon, identified in later years as Queen Elizabeth, The Queen Mother], but not her daughter, Princess Elizabeth [who ascended to the throne in 1953, and was later identified as Queen Elizabeth II], who was pregnant at the time. Reagan was also introduced to Princess Margaret and Prince Philip.

When not otherwise involved, and when he had time off, Reagan wandered among "the nooks and crannies of Mayfair, exploring old curiosity shops. I expected Nell Gwynne to emerge from her royal carriage at any minute."

One night, at the Bar of the Savoy Hotel, Neal heard Reagan pondering whether the United States should attack the Soviet Union and destroy it while the U.S. still had exclusive access to the atomic bomb. "We could establish for centuries to come the Pax Americana," he said.

Whereas Vincent Sherman had known Reagan for years—in fact, he'd directed some of the scenes from his Juke Girl with Ann Sheridan—Neal met the director in London for the first time. He had a reputation for seducing some of his leading ladies, such as Joan Crawford and Bette Davis. "You're next," he told her.

Reagan and Todd bonded more as filming progressed. "I think he forgave me for taking the role he wanted," Todd said. "At one point in the film, he gave me a massage on camera. If he had not become president, he could have hired out as a masseur. If I recall, he gave me an erection."

It can be assumed that Todd was joking, but perhaps not.

Todd later recalled, "Ronnie buttered me up when he heard I had been cast opposite Jane Wyman and Marlene Dietrich in Alfred Hitchcock's upcoming Stage Fright (1950), to be shot in London. I think Reagan wanted me to be a go-between, running messages to Jane on the set in our upcoming film. He told me he thought there was a good chance that if she would agree to meet with him, there could be a reconciliation."

"I didn't think so, but I humored him," Todd said. "I promised to put in a good word for him with Jane."

Todd later delivered a bombshell, telling Sherman, "Reagan approached me shortly before his marriage to Nancy Davis and asked me to make one final plea with Jane Wyman to re-marry him. I found this astonishing, because the grapevine claimed that Nancy was already carrying Reagan's baby on her long route with him to the altar."

According to Todd, Reagan said that he'd call off his upcoming marriage to Nancy "if Jane came through."

During the filming of The Hasty Heart, Sherman claimed that Reagan was "very thin skinned when I critiqued his performance. In his memoir, Where's the Rest of Me?, he had good words for everyone but failed to mention me."

During the four months that Reagan worked in London, Sherman noted a radical shift in his politics, as Reagan moved away from the Democrats and into the camp of the Republicans. As he'd later put it, "I spent those months in England while the Labour Party was in power. I saw firsthand how the welfare state sapped incentive to work from many people in a wonderful and dynamic country."

Sherman claimed that Reagan tried to get over Wyman by having a secret affair with a script girl on the set of The Hasty Heart. "She was sort of a mousy-looking creature with glasses, but she had big tits," Sherman recalled. "I heard that she joined him for shack-ups when he took a vacation after filming. They were seen together in Wales, Ireland, and France."

When Sherman returned to Hollywood, Jack Warner told him, "I want to get rid of Reagan. Most of his pictures are lousy. Did you see crap like That Hagen Girl and Night Unto Night? He was a pretty boy when he was running around Hollywood in the early 40s fucking Betty Grable and Lana Turner. But he's getting jowly and moving into middle age. I'll throw him in crappy films and maybe he'll break the contract."

As Reagan entered the 1950s, he faced the dilemma of all other actors confronting the Big 4-0. He had long talks with Jimmy Stewart, Robert Taylor, Dick Powell, and George Murphy. Hollywood was a great burial ground for young romantic leads turning middle-aged. A few of the better ones, including Stewart, Henry Fonda, and Cary Grant, could survive in the right pictures, but most of the others were cast aside.

Reagan feared that his tomb was waiting for him at Forest Lawn. If he couldn't continue a career in movies, what should he do with the rest of his life? Though he initially resisted it, did appearing on that little black-and-white box in people's living rooms loom in his future?

Reagan had signed to make five movies with Universal at a salary of $75,000 per movie. When he refused to appear in the first two movies Universal offered him, Lew Wasserman, his agent, was forced to renegotiate his contract. What emerged was a three-picture deal, beginning with Louisa (1950), followed by Bedtime for Bonzo (1951), and concluding with Law and Order (1953), the last finally fulfilling his dream of getting cast in a Western.

Universal filmed Louisa in 35 days for a budget of $800,000, much of which went to its "elderly talent" that included Charles Coburn, Edmund Gwenn, and Spring Byington. On the set, Reagan had a reunion with Coburn, accusing him once again of "cutting off my legs in Kings Row, you miserable old fucker."

In this scene from Louisa, Piper Laurie evokes a rebellious teenager, Reagan a frustrated middle-aged adult. Charles Coburn looks on.

It was during the making of Louisa that Stage 18 was converted into a mammoth party hall, marking Coburn's 60th anniversary in show business. A surprise guest at the party was Jane Wyman, who made no special overtures to the man she'd just divorced.

Even though Reagan was appearing in weak films during his post-war era, he still maintained a certain popularity among fans who cited his "likable personality." In the first poll of Modern Screen readers, Reagan ranked fifth in popularity, following in the wake of John Wayne, Alan Ladd, Clark Gable, and newcomer Farley Granger.

Reagan and Piper Laurie in Louisa. She was barely legal.

Most movies at the time were devoted to young love, but not Louisa. It was about the romance of a dotty grandmother (Byington), torn between two suitors. Directed by Alexander Hall, the congenial family comedy cast this plump woman as the mother of the character played by Reagan. She comes to live with her architect son. Once there, she is pursued by an elderly grocer (Gwenn). Coburn was cast as Norton's boss, an aging, bombastic roly-poly who is also a rival for Byington's affections.

Reagan, as Norton, is the befuddled, anxious son, watching his mother's antics. Cast in the role of Reagan's wife was Ruth Hussey, sweet as his helpmate in an un-challenging role. Piper Laurie, making her film debut, is cast as Reagan's daughter, who's coping with the affections of Scotty Becket, her young boyfriend.

Some critics hailed the film as a "geriatric love story."

Reagan's role could have been played by any one of dozens of actors. It was not a showcase for his limited acting talents. Yet in spite of his lackluster role, he later said, "Louisa is a good and healthy plus to any list of screen credits."

Reagan found London-born Gwenn a delight, and congratulated him on his performance as Kris Kringle in the 1947 film, Miracle on 34th Street, for which he won a Best Supporting Actor Oscar.

Reagan had known Byington since the 1930s. She told him that she had two dreams: One involved purchasing a small coffee plantation in Brazil—she was already learning Portuguese—and another involved enrolling in flying lessons.

"Two worthy goals," Reagan told Hall. "Not a bad ambition for a woman born in 1886."

Reagan welcomed Hall's direction, telling him, "If you could do for me what you did for Robert Montgomery in Here Comes Mr. Jordan (1941), I'd be pleased indeed. [For his involvement in that picture, Hall had been nominated for an Academy Award as Best Director of the Year.]

Cast as boyfriend Jimmy Blake in the movie, Scotty Beckett was a Californian who started in show business when he was three years old. Although he had made a name for himself appearing in the Our Gang comedies of the 1930s. Reagan had met him when he played the child manifestation of the Robert Cummings' character in Kings Row.

One might assume that an off-screen as well as on-screen romance might have developed between Laurie and Beckett. He was born in 1929, she in 1932. But instead, that eighteen-year-old neophyte actress fell into the arms of a 39-year-old instead, Ronald Reagan.

Laurie accompanied Reagan on a tour to promote Louisa in his former residence, Des Moines, and later to his hometown of Dixon. Nelle, looking very frail, also joined the tour. In the words of one reporter, Reagan appeared in a "cocoa brown suit and tie" at the Paramount Theater in Des Moines, where he had once been a radio announcer. He introduced a stunningly beautiful Laurie, who wore an emerald green strapless gown as temperatures soared outside, within a theater that had no air conditioning.

Reagan told his audience, "Hollywood people aren't really like what you read in the gossip columns." Backstage, he whispered to Nelle, "They're even worse."

After leaving Des Moines, witnessing all the changes that World War II had brought to the town, he remarked, "You can't go home again."

It seemed that the entire town of Dixon came out to greet Reagan and his mother. The mayor presented him with a key to the city, and banners along the main street proclaimed WELCOME HOME DUTCH. He led the parade, riding down Main Street in a cowboy outfit on a palomino. Later, at a banquet, Nelle and Reagan serenaded diners with "In the Good Old Summertime."

During his dedication of a new swimming pool, Reagan addressed a crowd, calling them a "pack of sissies. We used to swim in the river."

In 1950, Reagan (on the right) returned to his hometown of Dixon, where he'd been a lifeguard.

At a dedication ceremony for the town's new swimming pool, he stripped off his clothes, except for a scarlet bathing suit, and showed off a trim, fit physique, still holding up after all these years.

A daughter of Detroit, the beautiful teenager, Piper Laurie, was making her film debut in Louisa with Reagan and other members of the cast. She had signed a contract with Universal, and was getting a big buildup by that studio's publicity department. The staff claimed that she bathed in milk and ate flower petals to protect her luminous skin. Her ancestors were Jewish immigrants from both Poland and Russia.

Reagan was the first big star to be captivated by Laurie's beauty, or at least he was the first to date her. But other handsome male stars lay in her future, including Paul Newman and Tony Curtis. Howard Hughes had also cast his eye on her.

One night at a premiere, Ann Sheridan introduced her to Clark Gable. As Gable later told Sheridan, "That is a very, very pretty gal. Too bad I'm such an old man."

Upper photos: Piper Laurie, teenaged sex symbol, gets "cutsie patriotic."

Lower photo: Piper Laurie, having lost her virginity to Ronald Reagan, is escorted by him to a premiere of Francis (1949), starring Donald O'Connor with a "Talking Mule."

As Reagan turned forty, he was just at the age that many men think of seducing younger girls, even teenagers.

Such was the case with Reagan and Laurie. When he had been introduced to her on the set of Louisa, where she played his sixteen-year-old daughter, she noted that he held her hand for an extra long time.

During the filming, Reagan chatted with the teenager, listening to her complaints about the script and the character she was playing. To live up to Universal's publicity, which had hyped her as "The Girl Who Eats Orchids," she was served flower petals for lunch in the commissary, even though she found them distasteful.

At his invitation, she became a frequent visitor to his dressing room.

One day, the film's producer, Robert Arthur, approached her, telling her it wasn't proper for such a young girl to be seen going in and out of Reagan's dressing room. Arthur reminded her, "Reagan is old enough to be your daddy."

After that, she started turning down invitations to visit Reagan in his dressing room, but he was persistent, inviting her to the Hollywood premiere of Francis (1949), the picture starring Donald O'Connor in the story of a talking mule. It launched a series of Francis sequels. Both Laurie and Reagan were photographed with the mule. At the event, members of the Universal staff (in theory, at least) served as their chaperones.

There was no seduction during the shooting of Louisa. All that Laurie got from Reagan was a kiss on the cheek.

However, the cast was asked several months later to perform Louisa on the Lux Radio Theater. At the end of the broadcast, Reagan invited Laurie to dinner, promising he'd serve hamburger steak instead of "those god damn orchids they force you to eat."

He had to ask permission from Laurie's mother, Charlotte Alperin. The woman seemed apprehensive, but reluctantly agreed, perhaps because Reagan was such an important figure in Hollywood.

In the car, heading to his home, Laurie noticed him looking at her. But surely, she asked herself, it wasn't in that way.

In his apartment, with its panoramic view, he offered her a glass of wine, turned on some romantic music, and retreated to the kitchen.

She later wrote in her autobiography, Learning to Live Out Loud, "I didn't know if Ronnie knew I was a virgin. I knew I wanted to make love with him. I wanted to be completed by this wonderful man who clearly desired me. He would know what to do."

The revelations she made in that memoir later made headlines. Susannah Cahalan of The New York Post wrote. "Ronald Reagan wasn't 'the great communicator' in the sack."

Laurie described the bedroom romp as "without grace. Ronnie was more than competent sexually. He was also a bit of a show-off. He made sure I was aware of the length of time he had been 'ardent.' It was forty minutes. And he told me how much the condom cost."

However, she claimed that he'd ruined the romantic experience she'd envisioned by telling her, "There's something wrong with you" during their drawn out intercourse. "You should have had many orgasms by now—after all this time. You've got to see a doctor about your abnormality, and maybe that doctor can find out why it hurt you so at first. There's something wrong with you that you should fix."

She later lamented, "His words to me were cold and just plain stupid. And in a moment in my life when I might have benefitted from it the most, he offered not the slightest trace of humor or kindness."

Months later, she was sent on a publicity tour with Reagan to Chicago.

A Universal executive, Charles Simonelli, who was on the tour with them, told Laurie, "He is good at making all those speeches. Do you think he's running for president or promoting Louisa?"

Later that night, he followed her back to her suite at the Ambassador East Hotel and asked if he could come in. She refused, but suggested a walk in the night air instead. The question of age came up, and he seemed troubled that she was only nine years older than his daughter, Maureen.

He kissed her passionately, and told her he wanted to be with her again. She said she had another beau, the singer, Vic Damone. "The truth was, I no longer found Ronnie to be someone I wanted to be close to. His insensitivity had been wounding, and, in retrospect, even cruel."

During the walk back to the hotel, she told him that she had been honored that such a famous movie star "had been the first." As she looked at his face, he appeared shocked. She later wondered, "Did he know I was a virgin? Didn't the stain on the sheet send him a signal?"

During the final year of Reagan's presidency, Laurie was invited to the White House for the "goodbye gala" of all of his old friends, mostly from his Hollywood days.

She cabled her regrets and later explained why she did so: "I told myself it was because I didn't agree with him at all, politically, but that wasn't the complete truth. I hadn't seen him since before he'd become Governor of California. After all those years, it seemed odd to be invited. I assume the guest list had been put together without his input, and that I would simply be among a large group of actors with whom he'd worked. That would have made me uncomfortable. As disappointing as it was, the relationship had been more important to me than that. I wished to save myself embarrassment. Who knows? I might already have been wiped from his memory."

Before he shot Louisa, Reagan had made a far more serious film, Storm Warning (1951), an anti-Ku Klux Klan "message picture." The last such movie Warners had made was the 1937 anti-Klan film, Black Legion, starring Humphrey Bogart.

Pain, betrayal, and strife in this scene from Storm Warning as Steve Cochran, playing a bigoted brute, gets physical with his wife (Doris Day), and her sister (Ginger Rogers).

But despite the fact that technically, it was an older film, Louisa was released before Storm Warning.

Jerry Wald, Reagan's long-time friend and a former screen writer, was the producer of Storm Warning, and he ran into trouble casting the four leads—that of a crusading district attorney, Burt Rainey, and two sisters, Marsha Mitchele (a fashion model), the other, Lucy Rice, a pregnant waitress living in a small Southern town with her brute of a husband, Hank Rice.

During the film's development, it had been tentatively entitled Storm Center. Wald had considered casting Bette Davis as the older sister, with Jane Wyman playing the married waitress.

Wald sent the script to Lauren Bacall, who studied it with Bogie, the star of Black Legion (1937), the first anti-KKK film at Warners. Bogie recommended that she reject the role. She didn't feel she was right for the part, so he cabled Jack Warner. Enraged, Warner ordered that his contract player go on her sixth suspension.

He then sent the role to Joan Crawford, who had recently heated up the screen in The Damned Don't Cry with Steve Cochran, a story about a gangster and his moll. Crawford heard that Doris Day was about to be signed as the younger sister. Consequently, she, too, rejected Storm Warning, sending a memo to Wald. "Who in hell would ever believe I was the sister of Doris Day?"

Ginger Rogers was called, and she immediately accepted the role. After winning 1940's Best Actress Oscar for Kitty Foyle, she had long ago proved that she was a dramatic actress—and not just the dancing partner of Fred Astaire.

When Wald presented the script to Doris Day, she felt that the role of the younger sister would be a challenge, a non-singing part. She declared that "I'm not up to it." Wald had heard that her first husband, the trombone player, Al Jorden, had been abusive to her, and that she might draw upon her own horrible memories to portray the battered woman. She wanted to work with Rogers, whom she claimed had been "my idol since I was just a girl going to the movies."

"You and Ginger are both Christian Scientists," Wald said, "so when you're not due on the set, you can talk religion with each other."

Since Wald had liked Cochran so much as the gangster in The Damned Don't Cry, it was surprising that he did not immediately consider him for the role of Hank. He kept referring to the part as a "Stanley Kowalski type character." He'd seen Marlon Brando on Broadway and decided to offer him the role. Within a week, he'd heard from Brando. "You must be joking," was all he wrote.

Two movie veterans, Ronald Reagan and Ginger Rogers, posed for a publicity still for Storm Warning, their pose suggesting the film was about a benign romance.

Far from it. The film dealt with the effect of the Ku Klux Klan and the terror it generated in a small Southern town.

Surprisingly, Wald next considered José Ferrer, who was a very different type of actor and would have been horribly miscast. Finally, he went back to what was obvious all along, and cast Cochran as the handsome, hirsute, sexual menace.

A former cowpuncher, Cochran had drifted into the theater, appearing as Mae West's co-star in the stage production of Diamond Lil. At night, he kept her bed warm. As West proclaimed, "It takes a big man to satisfy a big gal like me."

When Cochran learned that Wald had offered the role to Ferrer, he told the producer, "What a mistake that would have been. The role calls for a male sexpot, which Ferrer just ain't. As for me, the gals of Hollywood, and some of the cocksuckers, too, call me 'Steve the Schvantz.'"

Wald signed Stuart Heisler (The Glass Key/Dallas/Tulsa) to direct Storm Warning, with the stars billed as Ginger Rogers in the lead, followed by Ronald Reagan, Doris Day, and Steve Cochran. The casting of Rogers and Day would later confuse some fans, who went to see Storm Warning thinking that it was a lighthearted musical.

Reagan had met Heisler when he'd made the 1944 wartime propaganda movie, The Negro Soldier, a documentary-style recruitment piece targeting African-American men. Coincidentally, Heisler had been the film editor on Jane Wyman's first movie, The Kid from Spain (1932). "Her part was so brief, I hardly noticed her," Heisler told Reagan.

In his casting of Reagan, Wald told him, "I'm considering various other titles—The Violent Friends!, Cause for Alarm!, The Outraged City!, Outcry!, The Fallen!, Winner Take Nothing!, Thunder in the Night!, and End of the Line!, always with an exclamation point at the end of each title."

After rejecting each of those titles, he devised the title, Ku Klux Klan, Storm Warning, eventually dropping the reference, within the title at least, to the KKK.

The film begins on a bizarre film noir note, with Marsha (as played by Rogers) arriving on a rickety bus late at night in a little town that is shutting down fast. She witnesses a man being dragged from his jail cell and murdered. Two Klansmen then remove their hoods, revealing themselves as Charlie Barr (Hugh Sanders) and Hank (Cochran).

By the time she reaches her sister's home, she learns that Lucy (Doris Day) is married to Hank, whom she'd just witnessed help murder a man.

Ironically, although the KKK is known for its anti-black stance, the two people murdered during the course of the movie included a white man and, later, a white woman.

Marsh faces a dilemma when she finds that her sister is madly in love with Hank and expecting his baby. The plot thickens when Rainey, the town's District Attorney (Reagan) learns that she actually witnessed the murder. He wants her to testify against her brother-in-law, Hank, and other members of the Klan.

The movie ends in violence, with Day getting fatally shot, the only film in which one of her characters ever dies on the screen.

Each of the principal stars had already seen the Broadway version of A Streetcar Named Desire, the controversial 1947 Broadway play by Tennessee Williams for which Warners had acquired the screen rights. In the filmed version—eventually released in 1951—Brando would repeat the role he had made famous on the stage, and Vivien Leigh would play Blanche DuBois.

All four of the stars of Storm Warning noted its similarity—with the exception of the KKK subplot—to A Streetcar Named Desire.

When Williams saw the movie, he accused the scriptwriters of plagiarism, although he never pressed any legal action against writers Daniel Fuchs and Richard Brooks. Brooks would go on to write and direct Elmer Gantry (1960) with Burt Lancaster in a classic performance.

Doris Day's biographer, Tom Santopietro, would certainly agree with Williams' assertion. He wrote: "When fashion model Marsha Mitchell arrives in town with her 'high-fallutin' ways,' she interrupts the blissfully ignorant blue-collar marriage of her younger sister Lucy and Hank Rice. Just as in Streetcar, Blanche DuBois' arrival intrudes upon her younger sister's marriage to Stanley Kowalski. Hank Rice is, like Kowalski, presented as a crude, bigoted roughneck, and Cochran is here outfitted like Brando's Kowalski, right down to the tight-fitting T-shirt. Most striking of all is the long-simmering sexual tension between Stanley and Blanche here mirrored in the quick-to-boil sexual attraction between Hank and Marsha, an attraction that end in an explosion of violence and death."

District Attorney Rainey (i.e., Reagan) is eager "to rid the town of a bunch of hoodlums dressed up in sheets." When Marsha confronts Lucy with what her husband has done, she claims, "I don't care what he's done. I'm not gonna leave him." Her dedication evokes Stella's devotion to Brando in Streetcar.

In the footsteps of Kowalski, Hank tries to rape Lucy's older sister, as Brando did to Blanche DuBois.

Storm Warning's outdoor scenes were shot in the small California town of Corona, in Riverside County, southwest of Hollywood, which the set designers had defined as the community most closely resembling a town in America's Deep South. As Reagan said in his memoirs, "It was rumored to be the center of Klan activity here on the West Coast."

Storm Warning ends violently, as Doris Day is fatally shot, the only film in which a character she plays dies. Reagan and Rogers look on in grief.

He recalled that one morning, shooting a street scene at 3AM, he was approached by "a little character who sidled up to me and whispered out of the corner of his mouth, 'I hear this movie is about the Klan. I'm in the local outfit, and if you need to rent some robes, let me know.'"

In Corona, Reagan staked out "two nests for myself." One was a jailcell in which he could nap between takes. Another was the stockroom of a women's ready-to-wear shop on Main Street, where he could be made up and changed into his drab wardrobe as a small town district attorney. Wald had instructed the wardrobe department, "Don't dress him up— just off-the-rack garments that don't really fit right. He's not posing for some men's fashion magazine."

When it was released, no one registered any laughs from members of the audience, but when it's viewed today, some politically savvy viewers guffaw at the words expressed by a character who (rather awkwardly) says to Reagan's, "Everything would be okay if nobody interfered with us from Washington."

On the final day of shooting, Rogers had lunch with Reagan. "Wald told me I can't help but win another Oscar for this."

"I wish you luck—Oh, just to have one Oscar!" he lamented.

During the filming of Storm Warning, gossip columnists published items about Day dating Reagan. Apparently, he never actually proposed marriage to her, but discussed the possibility with George Murphy. "If you want to run for high office one day," Murphy advised, "Doris would make a great choice—what a personality! She can sing, too. Even if you bore your audience with one of your long-winded speeches, they'll still show up to hear her sing 'Sentimental Journey.'"

If Reagan ever actually decided to propose marriage to Day, he waited too long. She was also dating someone else and would, in fact, marry Martin Melcher on April 3, 1951. Both were practicing Christian Scientists.

Melcher would be an unfortunate choice. When he died in 1968, Day discovered, to her horror, that he had squandered her lifetime earnings in poor investments.

Wald decided to launch Storm Warning in the South, but soon perceived that towns such as Atlanta and Birmingham were, in his view, "too racist." He decided on the more neutral city of Miami (Florida) where Storm Warning was screened in a public theater on January 17, 1951.

Wald had approved an ad that depicted a Klansman beating Rogers below a blaring headline that read —"UNDER THE HOOD, HE WAS PURE YELLOW."

Day came down with the flu and canceled her scheduled appearance at the film's premiere in Miami. Reagan had planned to continue his affair with her, but when she dropped out, he called another blonde and invited her down to Miami instead. Her name was Marilyn Monroe.

Reagan had flown Marilyn to Miami once before, stashing her on Miami Beach. Once again, he booked her into the relatively cost-conscious Helen Mar Hotel. This "second time around" ended their relationship when he refused to escort her to the premiere. "I wanted to make a grand entrance with flashbulbs popping, with you and Ginger. She's always been one of my idols."

When he still refused, she denounced him. "I'm good enough for you to fuck, but not to be seen with in public," she said.

[Eventually, Marilyn would not only get to meet her idol (Rogers) but would work with her as well. Along with Cary Grant, they starred together in Monkey Business (1952).]

Critical response to Storm Warning was essentially negative. Bosley Crowther of The New York Times defined Storm Warning as a "mechanically melodramatic film, superficially forceful but lacking real substance or depth." Critic Dennis Schwartz claimed that the film "trivializes the serious subject of race hatred with an inadequate depiction of the KKK. Surprisingly, the racial hate message of the Klan is never touched upon. These Ku Klux Klan members seem to be only interested in keeping outsiders away from their town, dressing up in their robed costumes to act tough while in disguise and using the Klan to hide their thieving criminal activities."

One critic claimed that Reagan was "his usual mediocre self." The reviewer for Cue liked it, calling it "a first rate melodrama—a grim, gripping story."

The film marked Wald's last effort for Warner Brothers. After his work on it was finished, he left the studio to form his own production company. His relationship with Reagan went back to his early days at Warners when Wald was a contract screenwriter.

After that, Reagan pitched many projects to Wald, describing the kind of roles he wanted. He expected to spend part of the 1950s starring in films produced by Wald. But proposals from Wald never came in. Wald did, however, contact Jane Wyman, casting her in her memorable 1951 film, The Blue Veil.

In the 1980s, Rogers would be invited to Reagan's White House. "I didn't get to dance with Ronnie, but Vice President George Bush told me that his 'great dream' involved dancing with me, based on his having seen Fred Astaire and me in Top Hat (1935)."

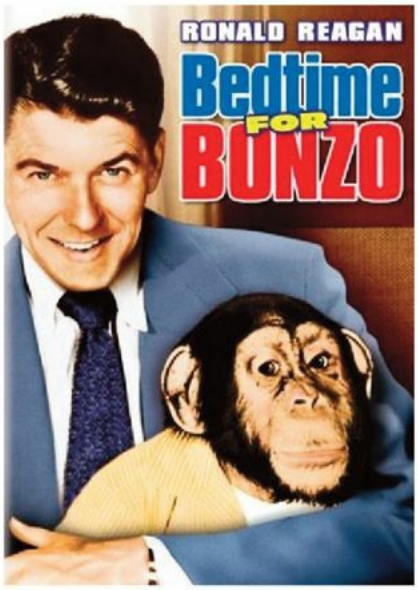
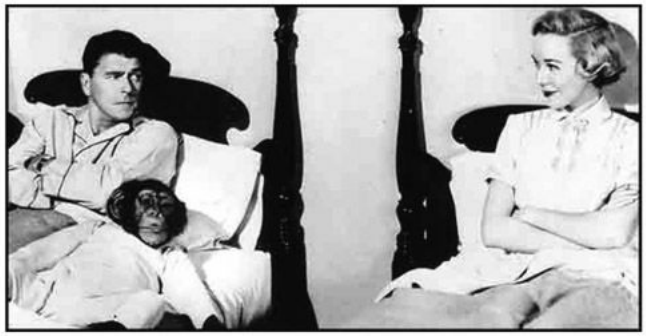
More than Kings Row, more than Knute Rockne—All American, Reagan is famous for having made Bedtime for Bonzo (1951) for Universal. He was cast as Peter Boyd, a psychology professor, who tries to teach human morals to a chimpanzee (Bonzo), hoping to solve the "nature versus nurture" question. To that effect, he employs Jane Linden (actress Diana Lynn) to pose as the chimp's mother, with Reagan the father. As a scientific experiment, they raise him exactly like a child growing up in the 1950s.





Their “child,” a chimp named Bonzo, causes bedroom consternation for Ronald Reagan and Diana Lynn.

When it opened, Bonzo got rather good reviews, Variety defining it as a “first-rate comedy,” and The Hollywood Reporter labeling it as “a smash.” But when Reagan’s political enemies viewed it in the 80s, one Democratic candidate wrote, “Bonzo wasn’t the only actor in this embarrassment with his tail hanging between his legs.”

Regardless of whether any of them saw the movie, political opponents used Reagan’s making of this film to mock him with such headlines as BONZO GOES TO WASHINGTON. Some critics claimed that Bonzo showed more intelligence than Reagan. A random survey taken in Los Angeles revealed that the only film most people on the street could name that Reagan ever made was Bedtime for Bonzo.

Frederick de Cordova was designated as director of this trifle. In time, he helmed such stars as Elvis Presley, Tony Curtis, Audie Murphy, Yvonne de Carlo, Humphrey Bogart, Bob Hope, and Errol Flynn. But he was forever mocked for having directed Reagan in Bedtime for Bonzo. When he directed Johnny Carson’s The Tonight Show, the TV host frequently ridiculed Reagan and, less frequently, De Cordova for Bonzo.

Reagan’s leading lady was a Los Angeles actress, Diana Lynn, who had been a child prodigy at the age of twelve, showing an amazing talent at the piano, and eventually developing a deep and abiding friendship with author Gore Vidal. She appeared in the comedy My Friend Irma (1949), in which Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis made their film debut.

A Viennese character actor, Walter Slezak, played a zoology professor, with his corpulent figure, bushy hair and mustache, his shifty eyes, and high-pitched, sneering voice.

For some reason, Reagan never saw the complete cut of Bedtime for Bonzo until he ordered, during the course of his presidency, that it be screened at the White House. His only comment was, “You’re a chump if you make a movie with a chimp—they’re born scene stealers.”

After Bonzo, Reagan's longtime wish came true. Director Lewis R. Foster at Paramount, in a production for William H. Pine and William C. Thomas, cast him in a western, The Last Outpost (1951). As a "man in gray on horseback," Reagan was cast as an officer in the Confederate Army in conflict with his brother, depicted by Bruce Bennett playing a Union officer. The plot revolves around the Confederacy trying to intercept gold shipments heading East from the Southwest. Reagan insisted that the producers pay for the transport of his own horse, "Baby," to Arizona.

You'll have to see the movie to learn why Reagan, cast as the dashing leader of a Confederate cavalry unit in Arizona, ends up dressed as "a Yankee in blue." At least his dream came true: He finally got to star in a Western.

Here, he has eyes only for the ravishingly beautiful Rhonda Fleming, Hollywood's Queen of Technicolor.

Other than his horse, what made the film exciting was its female co-star, Rhonda Fleming, who would also be cast as his leading lady in three future productions.

Still not married to Nancy Davis, he came down with a new bout of his chronic "Leadinglady-itis." Stunningly beautiful, Fleming was one of the few actresses he ever worked with who was actually born in Hollywood instead of having migrated there. At the time she met Reagan, she was between husbands.

Reagan's actual relationship with Fleming has been one of the most misunderstood in his repertoire. George Murphy claimed that he "fell in love with Rhonda during the making of The Last Outpost."

June Allyson said that one night, when she invited Reagan to dine with her husband, Dick Powell, and herself, "All he did was talk about Rhonda. He may have been the first guy who called her the 'Queen of Technicolor.' He went on and on until I got jealous, praising how 'incredibly beautiful' she appeared before the color cameras with that porcelain skin and flaming red hair.'"

In Reagan's tell-nothing memoir, Where's the Rest of Me? he merely mentions that he was cast opposite Fleming. However, Irv Kupcinet, a columnist for the Chicago Sun Times, in his autobiography, published in 1988, included a curious passage. He claimed that Reagan, "the handsome bachelor, was mad about the girl" (Fleming).

"Rhonda was fond of Ronnie, but not in love. One night, Reagan was so frustrated that he pulled out his gun and fired a shot at her. I'm sure he was wide of the mark purposely, but he did scare the romance out of their idyll. I often wondered what the course of history might have been."

A year later, Fleming called Kupcinet's story "awful" and "crazy." In a statement, she claimed: "Reagan and I weren't social on or off the set. We certainly didn't have a romance."

In Edmund Morris' book, Dutch, he wrote: "My research cards show Reagan stepping out with at least sixteen young and beautiful actresses from Doris Day and Rhonda Fleming to the peachy and not-yet-legal Piper Laurie. God knows how many more there were or how many came back to spend the night. He was always shy about speaking of such matters when I interviewed him as an old man."

Since he needed money, Reagan agreed to accept a low salary of $45,000 for starring in Hong Kong (1952) less MCA's ten percent commission. He remembered the day at Warners when he got $150,000 per picture.

This movie poster is significant for one reason: The designer misspelled Reagan's last name, billing him as "Regan."

The producers of The Last Outpost, William H. Pine and William C. Thomas, as well as director Lewis R. Foster, and even its distributor, Paramount, were so pleased with the on-screen chemistry of Rhonda Fleming with Reagan that they cast them together in Hong Kong (1952).

As Reagan recalled, "This was my first time to play a bum." He was cast as Jeff Williams, an often un-shaven, down-on-his-luck, American ex-soldier who decides to stay on in Hong Kong after the end of World War II. He hopes to make a lot of money selling surplus equipment left in Asia by the departing Armies.

"First a fucking chimp, now a four-year-old Chinese boy to steal the scenes." He was referring to child actor Danny Chang, who had the third lead. Reagan takes him in after discovering him wandering lost and alone.

He plots to steal a precious jeweled idol the boy possesses, and then to desert him, until his better nature, as prompted by his growing love for the very decent character played by Fleming, a Red Cross volunteer. At the time he meets her, Reagan has been embittered by his run of bad luck, but he's eventually won over by the charm and innocence of the boy and by the loving compassion of Fleming.

In an interview, Fleming said that Reagan was "more glowing and vibrant when he was telling yarns offscreen than when he was playing before the cameras. I don't think he felt very comfortable as an actor. Actually, I think he truly wanted to be in some other profession."

Here, in Hong Kong, Reagan appears with child star Danny Chang. With a touch of bitterness, he later said, “Never appear with scene stealers like a chimp or a child.”

Reagan told director Foster, “I’ll soon be forty-five years old. At this point in my life, I had hoped to be either Duke Wayne or at least Bill Holden. I should have playing the hustler, Joe Gillis, in Sunset Blvd.”

Reagan said “Hong Kong, with its paranoid politics about the communists, came and went before you could blink your eyes.”

The film’s review in The New York Times suggested that its title might more aptly have been “Ping Pong.”

Reagan returned to Warners, his alma mater, for two more movies. Reunited once again with Virginia Mayo, he co-starred with her in She’s Working Her Way Through College (1952). Shortly before she died, Mayo told author Darwin Porter, “I thought Ronnie and I had something going, and I liked him a lot. But Nancy Davis showed up all the time—and nothing came of it.”

She's Working Her Way Through College would not be the only time Reagan toiled in burlesque. At the nadir of his career in the 60s, he'd MC a burlesque act in Las Vegas.

Mayo played a woman who, in an effort "to improve her mind," abandoned her career in burlesque to enroll in a Midwestern college, where she rents a room from Reagan, a professor, and his wife, as played by Phyllis Thaxter. Between classes, in an attempt to boost ticket sales for the University's floundering drama department, Mayo's character choreographs a musical, in which the very talented Gene Nelson, cast as a football star, joins her, as does another blonde beauty, Patrice Wymore, who was even more famous for her marriage (1950-1959) to Errol Flynn.

Director H. Bruce Humberstone also cast Don DeFore as Shep Slade, an obnoxious, boastful, ex-champion footballer, who still has a yen for Reagan's wife, his former sweetheart from younger days.

When Reagan went to see the final cut of She's Working Her Way Through College, he remarked, "It's (nothing but) a showcase for Virginia's gams."

As his farewell to Warners, Reagan starred in a baseball picture, The Winning Team (1952), with Doris Day as his wife. "Since you didn't become my wife off screen, I guess you can play my wife on screen," he told Day.

Reagan cuddles up with a "working student," Virginia Mayo.

He was cast as Grover Cleveland Alexander, one of the foremost legends of American baseball. He later said that he enjoyed making the film as much as he did Knute Rockne—All American. "I also got to do some real acting dealing with Alexander's drinking problem—shades of Ray Milland in The Lost Weekend."

Alexander, of course, was the baseball great who won the championship for the St. Louis Cardinals against the New York Yankees in the 1926 World Series.

Before shooting began, Reagan trained for three weeks with Cleveland's Bob Lemon and with Detroit's Harry Priddy, pitching and learning "the difference between throwing from the mound and just throwing."

Alexander, the baseball great, nicknamed "Old Pete," had died in 1950. Although Day got star billing because of her box office clout, the real star of the picture was Reagan.

Although Reagan continued for a while to be cast in minor film roles, The Winning Team hastened the end of any big movie career for him as a middle-aged actor. Day's biographer, Tom Santopietro, summed up the problem: "Reagan did not have the emotional depth of acting chops to bring off the complex characterization required. He is simply not a very interesting actor, and is not up to the task of appearing in every scene. His lack of technique and resulting inability to access the required emotional complexities are evident in every scene requiring a display of emotion."

Later, Day was reported to have said, "My role required for me to do little more than appear angelic and be supportive and helpful. My God, where was Nancy Davis? She should have played my part."

Lewis Seiler, who helmed The Winning Team, had first directed Reagan in Hell's Kitchen (1939) with the Dead End Kids.

Reagan actually liked the script about Alexander, who had been a heavy boozer and suffered epileptic seizures.

This was Reagan's second time playing an epileptic, beginning with "that dismal failure," Night Unto Night (1949).

Day and Reagan were backed up with strong support from character actor Frank Lovejoy, who defined himself as "a boy from the Bronx." At the time he met Reagan, he had just appeared with Joan Crawford in Goodbye, My Fancy (1951). That movie would become his best remembered. "I'm always cast as the movies' Everyman," he told Reagan.

Reagan almost faced a disaster. He had recovered from breaking his right leg in a charity baseball game. However, in one scene from The Winning Team, he fell and almost inflicted the same injury to his left leg. Priddy, Detroit's second baseman, had accidentally stepped on him. "I suffered a painful laceration," Reagan claimed, "and had to hobble around for days. At least he didn't break my leg."

Day later recalled, "Aimee, the wife of Grover Cleveland Alexander, was the most boring role I ever had to play. I wasn't surprised when it failed to score a home run at the box office. Ronnie was already in his 40s trying to act like a 21-year-old."

Both of them talked about their upcoming marriages, Reagan "praising Nancy as if she were a goddess fallen to earth," in Day's view.

She was more realistic about her own new spouse. "I've settled down in Toluca Lake with Martin (Melcher) to a life of non-bliss."

Time dismissed The Winning Team, attacking the "rookie performance" by Reagan.

Even though Day "hated myself in the thankless role," she won Photo-play's Gold Medal for being "the most popular actress of the year."

Reagan departed from the Warner's lot on January 28, 1952, after fifteen years of filmmaking. There was no fanfare, "not even a gold watch," he said. "I thought a goodbye from Jack Warner might be in order. I got only silence. I asked for my final paycheck. I was told, 'It's in the mail.'"

As he pulled his car out of the studio parking lot that day, he noticed an attendant removing his "permanent" nameplate from in front of what had, for years, been his parking space.

Years later, when he was running for Governor of California, Warner was approached to open his wallet for the campaign.

Refusing to contribute, he said, "No, no, no, Dennis Morgan for governor, Ronald for first friend."

Released from his long-enduring contract with Warner Brothers, Reagan found himself adrift in a sea of aging, unemployed actors, each of them on the verge of turning fifty. Dick Powell had told him, "The road between forty-five and fifty goes by as quickly as a summer cloudburst."

Once again, he was rescued by the same Paramount team that had cast Rhonda Fleming and him in The Last Outpost and Hong Kong: producers William H. Pine and William C. Thomas, along with director Lewis R. Foster.

The moment Reagan read the script for Tropic Zone (1953), he knew it would be a dud. He called it "a sand-and-banana epic," although it was hardly an epic.

"The script was hopeless, but I was grateful to the boys for hiring me before. As a favor to them, I agreed to make Tropic Zone."

Actually, Lew Wasserman, his agent, later revealed, "I practically had to beg Pine and Thomas to use Ronnie again."

Chapter Thirteen

Jane Battles Marilyn for the Man Who Becomes Her Husband No. 4 and No. 5.

A "Cougar on the Prowl," Jane Seeks Young, Hot, and Handsome Male Flesh on the Hoof

Jane lamented to Paulette Goddard, "Just my luck. To win Ronnie, I had to fight off Betty Grable, Susan Hayward, and a wagon load of starlets at Warners. To get my claws into my new husband, Fred Karger (depicted twice with Jane in photos above), I had another road block. Little Miss Monroe herself. Freddie is that rare specimen—a living doll!"

"But just when I thought I'd knocked Marilyn out of the race, around the bend comes another Adonis...Rock Hudson, who can offer Freddie something I can't."

"Beloved Belinda in a Lovable New Role," proclaimed the ads at Warners. As Jane reported to work at her home studio, these ads were already in production in the art department. She had a leading role in a fluffy new comedy, a Kiss inthe dark. Her co-star would be David Niven, on loan from Samuel Goldwyn. In events which transpired, the British actor's name would be billed over hers.

David Niven, whose mysterious war record as an Allied spy is still a matter of conjecture, played this love scene with Jane's full understanding of his former affair with her gossipy friend, Paulette Goddard.

She called Jane, wanting to know if she had yet succumbed to his manly charms.

"No," Jane answered. Since shooting began, he's had this sore throat and retreats to his dressing room when he's not needed on the set."

"Sorry about that, girl," Goddard said. "You're missing out on something really wonderful. I should know."

The second male lead would be played by Wayne Morris, her old flame from the late 1930s. But as Jane told Paulette Goddard, "With Wayne and me, the candle has already burnt out at both ends."

Over lunch with Jane, Morris told her, "I've gone from leading man to the meathead boyfriend who loses the girl—like in this thing we're making!"

"At least you've got a job, sugar," she told him. "And in the Hollywood of today, that's a damned fine accomplishment!"

The three leads would be supplemented with a strong supporting cast that included Victor Moore, Broderick Crawford, and Maria Ouspenskaya.

After reading the script, Jane told her director, Delmer Daves, "I thought that Jack Warner could come up with stronger material for an Oscar winner like me."

"Be patient," he told her. "I see another Oscar in your future. After all, you can't expect to win Oscars back to back like Luise Rainer."

A Kiss in the dark's plot centered around a concert pianist, Eric Phillips (Niven), who returns from a tour to discover that he's inherited an apartment house with loony tenants. His favorite is a beautiful photographer's model, Polly Haines (Jane). Niven has trouble with his resident manager, the zany Victor Moore, the scene stealer of the film.

Jane remembered her role chiefly for the fact that as a photographer's model, she had to undergo more than two dozen wardrobe changes.

She had first met Crawford when they had appeared together in larceny, inc. with Edward G. Robinson. "What a puny role for a star like me," he told her. The events of 1949 would later represent the pinnacle of his career, as he'd win the Best Actor Oscar for his role as the crooked politician in all the King's Men, its script based on the bestselling book by Robert Penn Warren.

Jane had great respect for Ouspenskaya, and was later very sorry to learn that a Kiss in the dark was the final role for the aging Russian actress. After many distinguished performances, she died on December 3, 1949, at the age of 73. She suffered a fatal stroke after severe burns from a fire in her house. She had ignited it after falling asleep with a lit cigarette.

She Falls in Love with Her Co-Star, Rock Hudson, Until the Night She Discovers Him in Bed With Her Husband

In addition to being sick, Niven could not master moving his fingers across the piano keybord in any convincing way. He later admitted, "An expert played the piano with his arms through my tailcoat while I rolled my eyes and looked soulful."

She tried to put a good face on the film, saying, "The role is a test of my versatility. Comedy is as exacting as drama. It demands more of a performer technically, although audiences aren't as apt to give a good comedy performance the recognition it deserves."

The observer in London defined a Kiss in the dark as "one of the silliest and trashiest stories seen on the screen for many a long day." Time claimed, "The film is a daffy romantic comedy apparently intended to show that Oscar-winning Jane Wyman is not really a deaf-mute."

Preparations for her next film began with a call from director Michael Curtiz, telling her that Jack Warner had cast her in a comedy called The octopus and Miss Smith.

"Your leading man, girlie, is Dennis Morgan. Maybe you guys will spend time on film, not all time fucking. Morgan is no more big box office. He'll play second violin to you."

"You mean, second fiddle," Jane said.

"Fiddle, violin, trumpet, who gives a fuck?"

Jane was cast as Jennifer Smith, with Morgan as Davy Jones (alias Bill Craig), who claims he's a zoologist, maneuvering an underwater vehicle. He is actually a submarine engineer on a secret government mission. After an accident at sea, he rescues Jane, but because of the secrecy associated with his job, he can't tell her who he is.

When she recounts the story of her rescue to her business partner (Eve Arden), and to representatives of the Tyson Institute, which intends to finance a project for her, they think she's crazy. Since Morgan can't tell her who he really is, the inevitable complications ensue. All ends well, however, and eventually, Jane wins her sailor both on and off the screen.

Jane blew her top when she heard that the film's title had been changed to The lady Takes a Sailor (1949), but she was otherwise cooperative.

When she was criticized for accepting such a silly part, she told Louella Parsons that had she not accepted the role, a lot of employees at Warners would have been fired, based on Jack Warner's policy of laying off employees because of dwindling post-war profits. "It might have been a mistake, but I made a lot of the crew happy by accepting the role."

Jane maintains her resolve in this comedy about ladies, sailors, errors, and mistaken identities. above, Dennis Morgan, Eve Arden, and a mystified (until the final reel) Jane.

Curtiz had assembled a supporting cast that was stronger and more talented than the frothy and somewhat silly plot. Its members included Eve Arden, Allyn Joslyn, Fred Clark, Tom Tully, and William Frawley. Jane's former friend, Craig Stevens, was awarded a minor role, but the two of them avoided each other whenever possible. Jane and Reagan had broken from Stevens and his wife, Alexis Smith, after that weekend in Palm Springs.

She told Curtiz, "I've been away from comedy too long, and I'm off in my timing. Comedy is damn tricky. I take my hat off to anyone who can play it well. Fortunately, we've got my gal pal, Eve Arden. She's always on her mark."

On her final day on the set of The lady Takes a Sailor, Curtiz told Jane she had to sail to England for her next movie, Stage Fright, to be directed by Alfred Hitchcock.

"Who's my leading man in this one?" she asked Curtiz.

"Marlene Dietrich," he answered.

Before leaving for England, Jane filmed a cameo for inclusion within the otherwise completed it's a Great Feeling (1939), a film in which her lover, Dennis Morgan, played the male lead. Reagan was in the picture, too, but he and Jane had no scenes together in that all-star Warner Brother's extravaganza.

In one scene of that movie, Jack Carson and Morgan are grooming Doris Day for stardom. Carson says, "I'll see to it that she's as good in this as Jane Wyman was in Johnny Belinda."

"She didn't even talk in that one," Morgan says.

Carson replies, "Well, you can't have everything."

it's a Great Feeling marked the film debut of Maureen Reagan.

It was positioned into a scene where Jane is called into the office of the producer (played by Bill Goodwin), and is told that Carson was going to direct her in Made-moiselle Fifi, her next movie. Jane faints upon hearing that she has to work with a director who, the audience learns, is notoriously temperamental.

Jane's attempt to train her daughter Maureen, pictured above in a scene with her from it's a Great Feeling, sparked the child's interest in becoming an actress.

Jane later said, "If producers and casting directors were looking for 'cute' and 'perky' in the early 1950s, I was their gal."

At this point, a blonde kid (Maureen) enters with a glass of water. She hands it to Jane and says, "Here, Mommy, take this."

Maureen, in a latter-day evaluation of her first screen appearance, claimed, "I thought I was just terrible, certainly the weak link in an otherwise fine production."

Reagan had returned from England after making The Hasty Heart. Plans called for him to care for and protect Maureen and Michael while Jane went to London shooting Stage Fright with Alfred Hitchcock. Jack Warner promised her star billing over her co-star, Marlene Dietrich.

The two male leads were Michael Wilding and Richard Todd. Ironically, Todd had been Reagan's co-star in The Hasty Heart.

"When I first arrived at the studio, Marlene was the first to greet me," Jane recalled. "She was the epitome of graciousness, although I heard from Hitchcock that she bitterly resented getting second billing. Ironically, she became the most visible star of the picture."

"I admired Marlene's figure," Jane said. "She was almost fifty, yet retained her sense of glamour and enchantment. She invited me to lunch that day and stuffed herself with steak and kidney pie. I had to watch my weight and settled for a salad. Yet she never gained weight."

Hitchcock usually opted to include a “blink of the eye“ cameo of himself in each of his films. In Stage Fright, he opted to make that appearance in a London street scene with Jane.

As it happened, according to Dietrich, Hitchcock would have preferred for an English actress to play Jane’s role, and he would have been happier if Tallulah Bankhead (whom he had previously directed in lifeboat (1944), had been given the part played by Dietrich. Jack Warner had personally vetoed each of those preferences.

Later, when Jane confronted the director about his preference for an English actress, he admitted that he had wanted Jean Simmons.

Are the most menacing killers always the handsomest? Here’s Jane in Stage Fright with the film’s scariest psycho, her tormentor, Richard Todd.

Stage Fright was a murder mystery, some of it relayed in flashback, based on the Selwyn Jepson novel, Man Running, with a screen treatment from Whitfield Cook, Ranald MacDougall, and Alma Reville (the director’s wife). Dietrich rewrote some of her own dialogue.

Jane was cast as Eve Gill, an American who is studying at RADA, wanting to become an actress. She develops a crush on fellow actor Jonathan Cooper (Todd), who is secretly in love with the flamboyant stage actress and singer, Charlotte Inwood (Dietrich).

Jane befriends Todd when he claims that Charlotte came to him in a blood-stained dress after killing her husband. When he went to retrieve a new dress for her at her home, witnesses saw him leaving the scene of the crime and he was fingered as the killer.

Eve meets Detective Wilfred O. Smith (Wilding) and is drawn into his orbit, finding out that his middle name is “Ordinary.” She bribes Charlotte’s cockney dresser, Nellie Goode (Kay Walsh), and Jane becomes “Doris Tinsdale,” hired to be Charlotte’s maid.

From that point on, the plot employs many of Hitchcock’s tricks before it reaches its dramatic conclusion. It turns out that Jonathan is the real murderer after all, and that Hitchcock tricked the audience with a faux flashback.

Super glamorous Marlene Dietrich lights up for demure Jane Wyman in this scene from Stage Fright. Jane complained to Hitchcock, "I may have an Oscar, something Marlene doesn't have, but she has everything else--She's taken a bite out of Richard Todd, she's snared Michael Wilding, she's got the Dior wardrobe, the glamour, and the songs."

"She might be telling us she's "The Laziest Gal in Town," but she's damn busy looking after Marlene!"

Two veterans of the English stage were cast as Jane's parents, Alastair Sim as Commodore Gil, and Sybil Thorndike as Mrs. Gill. Sim was a Scottish character actor who, in addition to his theatrical career, had been a leading star in British cinema in the 1950s, appearing in more than fifty movies. Jane was amazed at the tonal control of his voice and his sensitivity to the nuances of the English language. "Only John Gielgud rivaled him," she said.

She adored Thorndike, who had been made a Dame Commander of the Order of the British Empire. George Bernard Shaw had written Saint Joan specifically for her.

Others in the cast included Hitchcock's daughter, Patricia Hitchcock, in her movie debut as Chubby Bannister in a humorous vignette.

Even though Dietrich detested Hitchcock, he gave her the star treatment, allowing her to bring in Cole Porter to help her with her one big song in the movie, "The Laziest Gal in Town." At first, she'd rejected it, claiming "It is too old." But it went over so big with audiences that she sang it on tour for the rest of her professional life.

For her other song, "La Vie en Rose," Dietrich purloined the signature song of her French lover, Edith Piaf. Hitchcock finally agreed to include it in the film, after protesting that the song was already too well known.

He also let Dietrich hire Christian Dior to design her wardrobe, which the diva insisted on taking home with her at the end of filming.

"Next to Marlene, I looked like a little brown wren," Jane complained.

When she saw the first rushes, Jane burst into tears, seeing herself depicted on the big screen as a drab maid. She called Jack Warner and he agreed. He phoned Hitchcock, ordering him, "Let Jane spiff herself up. After all, she is one of our studio's marquee attractions, and there is nothing to be gained by making her look like Marjorie Main on a bad day."

Hitchcock tried to reassure Jane. "You're an attractive woman in your own right. You're one type, Marlene is another. You're also twelve years younger than she is. The camera will catch that. So why worry?"

"Jane's refusal to stick to the script annoyed me," Hitchcock said. "She should have been a pimply faced girl. Wyman just refused to be that, and I was stuck with her. Suddenly, with Warner's blessing, she started showing up with more makeup. She just refused to stay in character the way it was written."

Although Jane frequently tangled with Hitchcock, their relationship remained more tranquil than his with the more temperamental Dietrich. Jane later said, "We had a pleasant uneasiness between us at all times. In other words, I didn't find him a cuddly teddy bear. I also didn't like it when he told me that he preferred to direct blondes."

As shooting progressed, Dietrich began to pay more and more attention to Jane, overcoming her initial jealousy at her star billing. As Jane recalled, "On days when Marlene had no studio call, she would come on the set just the same. She'd fix my dress, make suggestions about my hair and makeup, and help me in many ways."

Later, Jane had unattractive stories to relay to Paulette Goddard, who was no friend of Dietrich, since Goddard was jealous of the star's appeal to Erich Maria Remarque, the renowned writer whom Goddard eventually married.

Jane claimed, "At one point, when Dietrich was messing with my hair, she fondled my breasts."

It isn't known if this really happened, or whether Jane was being spiteful to Dietrich. However, the German diva had been known to pull that stunt with other female stars, as once reported by, of all people, Mae West.

Dietrich told Jane, "If the Academy gave Oscars for great performances as a lover, I would have a shelf filled with replicas of that statuette."

At first, Jane found the Irish-born stage and film actor and former soldier, Richard Todd, "Handsome enough to win any maiden's heart." That year, he would marry Catherine Grant-Bogle, whom he'd met at Scotland's Dundee Repertory Theatre. "Hitchcock told me that Marlene had already 'auditioned' the young man [i.e., Todd], who was two years younger than me," Jane said.

As regards Todd, Michael Wilding said, "Dick was taking bachelor's privilege before settling down to wedding bliss. That is, of course, bedding any available lass he could. Jane seemed the most susceptible to his Irish charm and wit."

At the time of Jane's first excursion to a Mayfair pub with Todd, he turned her off by talking about his experience of working with Reagan in The Hasty Heart.

"If you don't mind, I'd rather close that chapter of my life."

During her filming of Stage Fright, Jane's attorney sent her documents defining the date of her divorce from Reagan as July 18, 1949.

Jane rejected Todd's next two invitations for pub crawls with him. Then one afternoon, she received a letter from Lew Ayres. In it, he reminded her that he'd been married twice before (to Lola Lane and Ginger Rogers), and telling her that he had no desire to repeat the process. "I may never marry again. At least you and I made a great film together, and had endearing moments of love. But it must end."

Louella Parsons was in London at the time, and she heard that Ayres had dumped Jane. Normally, the gossip maven and the actress were the best of friends, but on this occasion, Parsons told friends that "Jane was icy cold."

"I have no plans to marry anyone," Jane told Parsons.

"Perhaps I got Jane on the rebound," Todd recalled to Wilding and others. "But she came to my dressing room and fell into my arms. I think she needed reassurance that she was still desirable to men. Before that night ended in her hotel suite, she was assured about just how desirable she really was. It took a loving Irishman like myself to do that job. From then on, we had this thing, although I kept it from my bride-to-be. There was a lot of sneaking around."

Dietrich got involved in details associated with Todd's upcoming marriage. She wanted to know the birth dates of both Todd and Grant-Bogle.

Astrologist Carroll Righter was Dietrich's professional stargazer. The actress consulted him at least three times a week. A cultured homosexual, he would advise her to see Jean Gabin one evening, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. another evening, or Ernest Hemingway on a third night.

In front of Jane, Dietrich told Todd what she'd learned from her astrologer. "You must not marry that girl. The stars are never wrong. My life is ruled by the stars. If you marry her, you'll be making a ghastly error."

Todd later said, "Marlene, or rather her stargazer friend, was right. My marriage ended in divorce."

Hitchcock told Jane, "The only thing I like about Todd is his expressive eyes. You have other qualities, but I think you also have some of the most expressive eyes of any actress in film today."

"Thank you," Jane said, "but I can assure you that Richard has hidden talent—not just his eyes."

"I see, my dear," Hitchcock replied. "I will have to take your word for it. Unlike George Cukor, who is in town filming a movie, I do not put my leading actors on a casting couch."

During the making of Stage Fright, Wilding was ending his marriage to Kay Young, whom he would divorce in 1951, allowing him to marry Elizabeth Taylor the following year. Prior to his marriage to Taylor, he had been the fourth most popular star at the box offices of Britain.

Both Dietrich and Wilding were immediately attracted to each other. "When I introduced them, they were practically making love," Hitchcock said. "I wanted to tell them to get a room. In a sense, they did. Her dressing room."

On their first day together, Wilding was bewitched by "the world's most glamorous grandmother." As he recalled in a memoir, The wilding way, "My first sight of her was breathtaking. She was lying on a sofa, draped in furs, her lovely legs gleaming in black tights, looking like a 20th Century Venus. I was completely bewitched and tongue-tied until she broke the silence herself."

"Before Marlene took up with Michael, I got a sample of her world-famous oral talents," Todd said. "So did George Bernard Shaw, I heard, on their first meeting. After she serviced me, she told me that even though she opposed my upcoming marriage, she considered my bride to be a very lucky girl. I considered that a great compliment, considering some of the guys she had serviced. You name them, Gary Cooper, Yul Brynner, Joe DiMaggio, Kirk Douglas, Burt Lancaster, George Raft, Orson Welles, John Wayne, General George Patton, John Gilbert, Howard Hughes, Ronald Colman, John F. Kennedy, and such ladies as Colette and Barbara Stanwyck."

Before Jane met Michael Wilding (above), Dietrich told her, "He's the British equivalent of Jimmy Stewart."

"That's good to know," Jane answered. "I've had Jimmy, and liked him, so maybe this newly liberated bachelor gal will make a new conquest."

"Too late," Dietrich told her. "I saw him first, dear heart."

Wilding was nearly twelve years younger than Dietrich. She found him sophisticated and amusing, and he entertained her with amusing anecdotes about his life. As her biographer, Donald Spoto, wrote, "[wilding] had scarcely been introduced to her when she offered herself to him, as if the way for her to feel young was to prove to herself that she could keep a young man. 'I am too old for you,' she said bluntly. Obviously, he did not agree."

During the shoot, Dietrich and Wilding became the most photographed couple in London, their romance generating tabloid fodder. But it was not destined to last. Maria Riva (Dietrich's daughter), in her memoirs, provided the reason why her mother did not remain with Wilding.

Riva wrote: "During the Wilding time, my mother kept up her devotion to Maurice Chevalier, became involved with a famous American actress known not only for her talent, pined for Jean Gabin, received her baseball player when he needed cosseting, loved Erich Maria Remarque, her charming general, Edith Piaf, a gorgeous Teutonic blonde who became her German pal, and worked full time at being indispensible to her immediate entourage."

Riva was being discreet, not revealing some of the other names with whom Dietrich was involved at the time.

After the filming, Dietrich told both Jane and Riva, "I don't like Hitchcock. Why they all think he is so great, I don't know. Josef von Sternberg was great, Stage Fright is bad. Maybe in cutting, he'll do all his famous 'suspense' to save it. He certainly didn't do it while we were shooting this monstrosity."

Privately, Wilding told Hitchcock, "I don't like this Wyman creature. Perhaps Ronald Reagan went for her. I'm not sure who Reagan is. I've never seen one picture of his. I hear he's a second rate actor. She suffered being the only Yank in an all-English cast."

Publicly, he said to the press, "Miss Wyman carried off her role with dignity and poise. I think she held her own beautifully."

At the end of the shoot, Hitchcock told the press, "Marlene Dietrich is a professional star. She is also a professional cameraman, art director, film editor, costume designer, hairdresser, makeup artist, composer, and producer—and director."

The next morning, she read in the london express observer that Marlene Dietrich had been spotted at one of the London airports while awaiting the departure of a flight to Paris. A journalist had reported that after being asked what it was like working with Jane Wyman, "Miss Dietrich merely shrugged her shoulders and walked toward the departure gate."

Upon the release of Stage Fright, Dietrich got rave reviews, Hitchcock, Jane, and the movie not faring well. The word used to describe Jane was often "mousy."

Another reviewer mocked Jane's attempt at a Cockney accent, except when she said "mattam" for madam. "That was the only Cockney enunciation she managed to get correct," he wrote.

Years later, Jane said, "On the screen, I was supposed to be falling in love with Wilding. Nothing could have been further from the truth. In my scenes with him, I could-n't make out half of what he was talking about."

Fans today, especially those who watch Turner Classic Movies, seem to appreciate Stage Fright more than those who saw it back in 1950.

In an inaccurate report, the daily express ran a story asserting that Lew Ayres had flown into London and was seen dancing with Jane Wyman. The journalist wrote, "I hear wedding bells in the background."

Jane was not with Ayres, as he had previously broken off with her. She was dating her latest beau, Clark Hardwicke, described as a "millionaire sportsman." He was actually a golfer. But he did look like Ayres, so the inaccuracy in the report was based on a case of mistaken identity.

Jane in 1950, on the loose with Clark Hardwicke, capturing a young man's fancy until the real thing came along.

Jane's affair with the young man would continue after her return to Hollywood.

A pivotal moment came for her in London right before she left. On a sightseeing trip in a chauffeur-driven Rolls Royce provided by the studio, she asked her driver to stop in front of an imposing building. She thought it was Westminster Abbey. Actually, it was Westminster Cathedral, the largest Catholic church in England. She later told a reporter, "I'd never seen such a sight in my life."

She spent an hour inside, marking the beginning of her interest in the Catholic liturgy. She attended the Cathedral every day during the remainder of her stay in London, becoming fascinated by the rituals inside, including mass, rosaries, the wardrobe of the priests, and the panorama of church history extending back to its Old Testament beginnings. On the day of her final visit, she made a strange statement: "I'm going to become a Catholic even if it kills me."

In Hollywood, among the bills that had piled up, she first opened a letter from her divorce lawyer, Lloyd Wright. He charged her $7,500 for divorcing Reagan. She sent him a check for $5,000 and marked it "Payment in Full." He accepted her reduced fee.

Plain Jane, without makeup, testifying in court about her intention of divorcing Reagan.

Ironically, her letterhead read, “Mrs. Ronald Reagan, Hollywood, California.”

When Clark Hardwicke returned to California, she was seen frequently with him. There were rumors of an upcoming marriage.

Ruth Waterbury, a former assistant to Louella Parsons and the former editor of both Photoplay and Silver Screen, didn’t think so. “Let’s face it: Clark Hardwicke is a cute, sexy kid with a good athlete’s body. Janie was feeling light and giddy, and Clark filled the bill for that mood. She used him to distract herself. I never heard her say anything really deeply felt about him.”

[The last time Jane was seen in public with her dashing young beau was in august of 1950, when Movie Life covered the preview of The Glass Menagerie, her latest film based on the hit Broadway play by Tennessee williams. after that, Hardwicke slid into the graveyard of her forgotten beaux.]

A new saga in the very dysfunctional life of the Wingfield family began when Charles Feldman and Jerry Wald, as producers, set out to bring Tennessee’s The Glass Menagerie to the screen. They envisioned it as a 1950 release directed by Irving Rapper.

Casting was a major issue fraught with trauma. Tennessee rarely got his wish when it came to the stars who were hired for screen adaptations of his plays. Originally, he’d wanted Teresa Wright for the role of Laura. “Her sad eyes and the aching vulnerability in her voice would make her ideal as Laura,” he told Feldman.

But by the time Tennessee reached Hollywood, he had changed his mind, telling Feldman, “Only Judy Garland can capture the poignancy of Laura.”

The producer had his own ideas. “I’m pitching the role of Amanda [the play’s steely matriarch] to Ethel Barrymore and the part of Laura [amanda’s disabled and overly vulnerable daughter] to Jeanne Crain.”

In the weeks that followed, Feldman ran into more and more roadblocks and kept calling Tennessee to report on changes in his vision for the cast. In the first of these calls he announced, “I think Gene Tierney should play Laura, with Montgomery Clift in the role of the Gentleman Caller.” Tennessee at least liked the idea of Clift.

Two days later, Feldman called again with another change: “How about Marlon Brando as the Gentleman Caller, and Tallulah Bankhead as Amanda?”

“As much as I adore Tallulah, don’t you think she’s a bit strong to play a gentle Southern belle?”

Before Feldman called again, he’d spoken to Brando. “Marlon said he’ll never work with Tallulah again unless the Earth is attacked by Martians.”

[in 1947, Tallulah and Brando had starred together, with frequent outbursts of spleen, rage and fury, in the Jean Cocteau play, The Eagle Has Two Heads.]

A week later, Feldman called again. “I’ve come up with the best idea of all: Miriam Hopkins, that Savannah magnolia, as Amanda, with Ralph Meeker playing the Gentleman Caller. He’s less than lovable to work with, but brazenly masculine for the role.”

Although it had been pre-arranged that the film would be distributed by Warner Brothers, there were rumblings from Louis B. Mayer at MGM. Enraged, he had telephoned Tennessee’s literary agent, Audrey Wood, claiming he owned the rights to The Glass Menagerie because Tennessee, while on salary at MGM, “wrote the play on our dime. By giving this to Warner’s, he’s biting the hand that fed the little faggot. I’m finding it harder and harder to cast Greer Garson. But she’d be great as Amanda. I also resent Williams’ criticism of my judgment at MGM.”

[Tennessee had told the press that he had been dropped by MGM “in retaliation for my unwillingness to undertake another stupid assignment after i fucked up on Marriage Is a Private Affair (1944) for lana Turner.”]

Mayer’s threat of a lawsuit did not materialize, and eventually, to his humiliation, he lived to see his own daughter, Irene Mayer Selznick, produce Tennessee’s second film, a Streetcar named desire, for Warner Brothers, not MGM.

Tennessee was surprised once again when Feldman called to tell him that he’d just signed the British star, Gertrude Lawrence, to play Amanda. Tennessee knew her as a singer, dancer, and musical comedy performer. The Glass Menagerie would be Lawrence’s only film in which she worked at an American studio with an otherwise all-American cast.

Since, contractually, Feldman had the power of casting, Tennessee relented, but nevertheless threw in a dig, “Is Lawrence bringing Daphne du Maurier to Hollywood with her?”

[Both Tennessee and Feldman knew that lawrence and the world-famed novelist were lesbian lovers.]

When Tennessee actually met Lawrence, he was deliberately provocative: “In London, Noël Coward told me that he lost his virginity to you when he was just thirteen years old. According to Noël, the two of you did it on a train.”

“That story is absolutely true,” she answered. “I fear I scared off the boy from women for life.”

With some reluctance, Tennessee accepted a screenwriting credit with Peter Berneis, the play’s adapter.

Tennessee shuddered when he learned the details of the movie’s final casting. The role of Laura went to Jane Wyman.

He feared that she was too old for the part, but the co-producer, Jerry Wald, assured him she’d be terrific. “Jane, of course, isn’t fresh anymore. But she studies a character for weeks and throws herself into the part.”

It was the director, Irving Rapper, who called Tennessee to tell him that the pivotal character of Tom Wingfield would be played by Arthur Kennedy, and the part of the Gentleman Caller would be given to Kirk Douglas, then in the first flush of his stardom.

Visiting the set, Tennessee met with Jane, later defining her as “a strong, cold, and determined bitch.”

He remembered her divorced husband, Reagan, dropping by the set to give her a poodle for her birthday.

Kirk Douglas as the “Gentleman Caller,” with Jane as the girl whose psyche is as damaged as her club-foot.

“I later met John F. Kennedy before he became President,” Tennessee said. “I thought he was much too good looking and sophisticated to get elected. As for Reagan, there is no way in hell that I could believe this un-talented actor would ever become president. It was inconceivable. I guess I don’t know how to pick them in politics.”

He made this statement in 1980 to Margaret Foresman of The Key west Citizen.

Reagan invited Tennessee to join Jane and him in the commissary.

As Tennessee remembered it, Reagan and Jane talked about which boarding school would be the right choice for their daughter, Maureen. “They decided on Palos Chadwick School at Palos Verdes. That’s where Joan Crawford sent her daughter, Christina, instead of smothering her. I’m sure Joan would have decided on death-by-strangulation if she knew that Christina would write that horrid little memoir, Mommie dearest, [published in 1978] about her adoptive mother.”

Tennessee continued: “Maureen never wrote a daddy dearest book about Reagan, but that other daughter of his, Patti Davis, came close, or so I’d heard. I never read crap like that before.”

After Reagan bid Jane and Tennessee goodbye, he headed out the door.

Ten minutes later, Tennessee left the commissary with the intention of beginning his afternoon walk. He later told Darwin Porter, “Reagan was outside, waiting to be picked up by someone. This blonde suddenly pulled up in her car. I strained my one good eye. The face was unmistakable. That blonde taking Reagan away, no doubt, for a session of love in the afternoon, was none other than perky little Doris Day.”

Interpreting the role of Laura was a rough challenge for Jane, as she had to play the club-footed and deeply depressed daughter of the spectacularly dysfunctional Wing-field family. She lives in a world of her own, collecting fragile glass animals. She shares the apartment with her brother, Tom (as played by Arthur Kennedy), and her iron magnolia mother, Amanda (Gertrude Lawrence). Tom is a frustrated would-be writer earning a meager living laboring in a warehouse. The three survive in a tenement building in St. Louis. The absent husband of the house, a telephone repairman, “fell in love with long distance” and, years before, abandoned his family to survive as best they could.

Wanting his disabled sister to find a potential beau, Tom brings home a gentleman caller (Kirk Douglas) as the movie heads toward its tragic dénouement. At a particularly poignant moment, he informs the very vulnerable Laura that he’s already engaged to another woman.

Jane used her expressive eyes to convey her character's vulnerability, living in her "world of glass." She told Rapper, "In some respects, Laura reminds me of that lonely little girl I left behind in St. Joseph."

Although Rapper was the wrong director for the job—it called for an Elia Kazan—he did try to make effective use of Jane's bittersweet docility in closeups.

She recalled, "It takes more than a limp to play a lame girl. It takes a definite frame of mind, in which you project yourself into the part so fully that you even think like a handicapped person and act like one. In Menagerie I wear a specially designed shoe that makes my left foot turn in and that actually forces me to limp."

Ironically, Jane's personal hobby involved collecting glass replicas of animals. She even lent Warners some pieces from her personal collection.

During the filming, Michael Reagan became desperately ill with some kind of flu virus and had to be hospitalized. When she wasn't needed on the set, Jane was with him at the hospital.

Rapper warned that she was risking shutting down production if she contracted the flu herself.

She later became furious that Warners publicity promoted the film like some sex drama with large lettered typeface proclaiming:

HE WAS TOO SHY FOR TOO LONG…AND THEN CAME FRESH GUY.

The filmed version of The Glass Menagerie (1950) did not do well at the box office. Even Douglas expressed his disappointment. "Unfortunately, the movie was not well directed," he said, "and Gertrude Lawrence's vanity had to be appeased. She insisted on a flashback, where she was young and glamorous, so no one would think she was the old lady that she actually was. The elements didn't mesh; the movie just didn't come off."

Years later, Douglas would recommend that moviegoers wanting to see The Glass Menagerie should, in lieu of the version he was in, catch the 1987 version directed by Paul Newman, starring his wife, Joanne Woodward.

In reference to the 1950 version, Tennessee himself later stated, "I detested the film. As I predicted, Lawrence was a dismal error in casting. The movie version was a dishonest adaptation of my play. I would soon get used to that in Hollywood's other attempts to film one of my dramas."

For a brief few months, Jane Wyman captured Greg Bautzer, a powerful attorney and the most sought-after bachelor in town.

She had nothng but high praise for him, telling a reporter, “He’s a woman’s man, thoughtful, considerate, attentive. If you ask him to the most informal dinner party, he’ll send flowers the next day with a sweet note. If you go nightclubbing with him and are separated from him for so much as one dance, he’ll send a waiter with a scribbled message, ‘Miss you.’ When you’re with him, you know that for him—at that moment at least—you’re the only woman in the world and the most beautiful.”

Bosley Crowther of The new York Times agreed with Tennessee about the miscasting of Lawrence. He called her “a farcically exaggerated shrew with the zeal of a burlesque comedian to see her diffident daughter wed. Her Southern accent has an occasional cockney strain.”

Crowther, however, had kinder words for Jane’s performance, defining her acting as “beautifully sensitive.”

Time magazine wrote: “Miss Wyman is constitutionally incapable of looking so ethereal as Julie Haydon, who played the role on Broadway. But with the help of shoulder-length hair and a childlike smile, she gives the part of the girl half her age an almost equally poignant sincerity.”

Jane told Rapper, “I worked harder on Laura than I did on Johnny Belinda.”

A native Californian, the same age as Reagan, Greg Bautzer began to date Jane in 1950. He was one of the most prominent attorneys in Hollywood, with clients who ranged from Howard Hughes to Ingrid Bergman.

Many of his female clients—most of them top stars—were also his lovers. He seduced Lana Turner when she was just sixteen and went on to long, tumultuous on again, off again affair with Joan Crawford. His roster of seductions featured Dorothy Lamour, Ava Gardner, Ginger Rogers, Rita Hayworth, Peggy Lee, Merle Oberon, Joan Caulfield, Marguerite Chapman, and Evelyn Keyes. He finally married actress Dana Wynter in 1956.

Others seduced by him included Lucille Ball, Tallulah Bankhead, Gene Tierney, Marlene Dietrich, and Jayne Mansfield.

“I think Greg was born with really good looks,” Jane said. “He stood 6’2” and was a great dancer. He was well built and took care of his athletic body. He was not only very intelligent, but a brilliant attorney with great charisma.” She shared these views with the homosexual actor, Clifton Webb, with whom she co-starred in the 1959 movie, Holiday for lovers.

The July, 1951 issue of Photoplay filed a report on the romance between Jane and Bautzer:

“The guy has something, there’s no doubt about that. ask any man what it is and he’ll tell you. Bautzer’s a man’s man, virile, successful, a gentleman where he works, or where he plays. and he’s out to win, wherever he is, in the courtroom, at the poker table, or on the tennis court. Yet somehow, once he has won, he seems to lose interest —as though the fun were all in the battle, and the victory anticlimactic.”

It appears that Bautzer seduced Jane long before they made any high-profile appearances, such as escorting her to the premiere of her hit movie, The Blue veil (1951).

At that premiere, both of them encountered Ronald Reagan, who was dating starlet Nancy Davis at the time. After Bautzer introduced her to Nancy, he whispered to Jane, “Not my type. Maybe it’s all that Reagan can get these days.”

Once they went public with their affair, columnists and fan magazines speculated on the probability of an upcoming Bautzer/Wyman marriage.

Modern Screen proclaimed, “At last, a girl who can make Greg Bautzer forget about Lana and Ava, etc.”

A reporter discovered that both Jane and Bautzer had taken blood tests as a prelude to marriage.

Another reporter for Modern Screen saw Jane and Bautzer at a party hosted by George Sanders. He wrote, “Usually Bautzer works the room. But on this particular evening they spent most of the night in the corner making goo-goo eyes at each other. They did talk to their host and later to the producer Gabriel Pascal. That was big of them, since the party was in Pascal’s honor.”

Then, suddenly, Bautzer was no longer seen with Jane, but with Ginger Rogers, who had recently made Storm warning with Reagan. After listening to Lena Horne at her show at the Cocoanut Grove, Bautzer and Rogers danced the night away. At their booth, he frequently kissed her.

Paulette Goddard later provided the clue as to why the affair between Jane and Bautzer ended so abruptly. “Greg could charm the pants off a girl, and Hollywood cock-suckers never let him alone—notably his client, Rock Hudson. He arranged Hudson’s divorce, incidentally. But there was a Jekyll and Hyde quality to Greg. He had violent fights with Joan Crawford—I mean knock down, drag-out fights. Alcoholism ran in his family. When he had too much to drink, Mr. Hyde came out.”

“Jane told me that he arrived at her doorstep unexpectedly one night and caught her in bed with that handsome hunk, Howard Keel, with whom she was co-starring in Three Guys named Mike. Jane said that Keel escaped, but Greg practically put Jane in the hospital. That was the end of that.”

Lana Turner turned it down, and Ava Gardner rejected it. June Allyson accepted it, but at the last minute had to notify MGM that she had to bow out because she was preganant. “A Blessed Event is on the way. But call Jane Wyman. She’s looking for something light and fluffy after The Glass Menagerie.”

Allyson was right. Jane accepted the role in Three Guys named Mike (1951), in which she played Marcy Lewis, an airline stewardess, in this black-and-white comedy directed by Charles Walters.

Three Guys named Mike was made in an era when a job as a "stewardess" was considered glamorous, and when an airplane ride to anywhere was an exciting and adventurous novelty.

The three handsome "Mikes" in the film included Van Johnson, playing a research scientist; Barry Sullivan, an advertising executive; and Howard Keel, an airplane pilot. Sidney Sheldon, who in time would evolve into one of the bestselling novelists in the world, wrote the screenplay, whose theme revolved around three guys chasing after Marcy.

Walters, who was gay, had just directed Judy Garland in Summer Stock (1950). Garland had been fired from annie Get Your Gun (1950), the title role subsequently being awarded to Betty Hutton, with Keel as her leading man.

Even though Allyson had to bow out of the film's lead role, she telephoned Jane every two or three days for updates about what was happening.

Allyson had always remained in touch with Johnson, her close friend and co-star.

As Jane told Allyson, "All that Van and I do is talk girl talk. I'm ever so grateful to him for all those nights he took me dancing during the War."

A New Yorker, Barry Sullivan stood 6'3", and Jane found him "very manly, the type of guy whose shoulder a girl can lean on."

She met him during the peak career period of his life, when he'd appeared in his most famous movie, cast as a director in The Bad and the Beautiful (1951), opposite Lana Turner and Kirk Douglas. He had also played opposite opposite Bette Davis in Payment on demand (1951).

Keel was married, having wed Helen Anderson, who had been in the chorus of his stage musical, oklahoma!. In the early 1950s, at the peak of his career, he became known for seducing his leading ladies, especially Kathryn Grayson and Ava Gardner, each of whom had co-starred in Show Boat. Apparently, he struck out with Doris Day in Calamity Jane (1953).

Jane had been attracted to his macho flair, his booming baritone style, and his studly good looks. During luncheons together, they shared memories of their awful childhoods. Keel had been born the son of a poor and violent coalminer who had committed suicide when he was a young boy. Before breaking into show business, he'd been a singing waiter and other more dubious professions. He admitted to Jane that on rare occasions, "When I was broke, I sold my services to older women."

"Well, I'm two years older than you. How much do you charge?"

"For you, baby, it's free. I'll pay you."

"That's very flattering. I think I'll take you up on that offer."

She later told Allyson, "Our bopping lasted until the end of filming. Then for him it was back to Helen. How lucky she is. Howard is a man and a half, maybe even more than that."

In his memoir, only Make Believe, Keel wrote, "I lost Janie at the end of the film. I guess she thought airline pilots were a wayward lot."

The movie made a tidy profit for MGM, although reviews were tepid at best. Time found Jane's performance perky enough, but claimed, "The plot device of three Mikes chasing her is a thin idea spread pretty thin."

For her next picture, Jane moved over to Paramount, wanting to take her dressing room trailer with her. However, the gates of Paramount weren't wide enough to allow it access inside.

She was looking forward to her next picture, Here Comes the Groom (1951). Not only would it give her a chance to sing and dance, but it would mean a reunion with Bing Crosby, one of her favorite performers.

They had seen each other infrequently over the years for "dalliances." He'd first seduced her when she had an uncredited bit part in his 1936 musical, anything Goes. [ironically, Crosby appeared in the 1956 version of Anything Goes, too.]

Their director assigned to Here Comes the Groom was Frank Capra, with whom Jane had always wanted to work, even though, since the end of the war, his career had fallen into great decline. Critics derided his style of filmmaking as old-fashioned, overly idealistic and sentimental. More sophisticated movie fans had emerged from the ashes of World War II, calling for more cynical heroes than a Capra character.

Here Comes the Groom: Perpetuating the myth that weddings make a girl happy.

In the Paramount commissary, Jane lunched with both Crosby and Capra until Crosby was summoned to the head office. She told Capra, "Bing's still adorable, but I've noticed a lot of changes in him. He seems deeply troubled. More temperamental. Although he's so very nice to me."

"As long as he treats you like a lady, what else matters?" Capra asked. She seemed to agree.

After their luncheon reunion, she spent the night with Crosby, inviting him to a friend's apartment. She encountered a disillusioned man, who seemed to find comfort in her arms. He was still married to the former actress and nightclub singer, Dixie Lee, but they lived in separate parts of their home, along with their four boys: Gary, twins Dennis and Phillip, and Lindsay.

For the first time, she learned that Dixie was suffering from ovarian cancer, and had been an alcoholic for years.

Crosby sensed that Jane was very unhappy to be appearing with Alexis Smith. “I thought you, Craig Stevens, and Reagan had all been great friends.”

She told him she didn’t want to talk about it. “That’s over now.”

The rest of the cast consisted of Franchot Tone, James Barton, Alan Reed, Minna Gombell, and wünderkind Anna Maria Alberghetti, an opera prodigy from Italy.

Alberghetti had performed professionally since the age of six and had made her Carnegie Hall debut in New York at the age of thirteen. In time, she would appear on several occasions on The ed Sullivan Show.

Jane learned that the original story of Here Comes the Groom by Robert Riskin had been shopped around for several years, and that it had, for a while, been considered as a vehicle for James Stewart and later for Bob Hope. Hope, Crosby’s co-star in all those “Road Movies,” called on the first day of shooting: “Bing, so now you’re reduced to taking my rejects?”

[during the shooting of Here Comes the Groom, Riskin, Capra’s alter ego, suffered a stroke and had to undergo surgery for a blood clot in his brain. He was left partially paralyzed and confined to a wheelchair for the rest of his life. He would never write again.]

In the plot, Crosby was cast as a newspaper reporter, Pete Garvey, stationed in Paris. He visits an local orphanage and falls in love with a young boy, Bobby, and his little sister, Suzi. He wants to adopt them and bring them back to live with him in Boston. But U.S. Immigration warns him that he must marry within five days or the adoption will be voided and the Parisian kids deported.

In the movie, the child character (Theresa) played by Alberghetti is also up for adoption. Her immediate problem gets solved when an well-meaning American couple, Mr. and Mrs. Godfrey (Alan Reed and Minna Gombell) take her away after her soulful rendition of “Caro Nome.”

Back in Boston, Crosby learns that Jane, his fiancée when he left, is now engaged to her boss, the blueblooded and very rich Wilbur Stanley (Franchot Tone), and that she plans to marry him. Garvey learns that Smith, cast as Winifred Stanley, is also in love with her fourth cousin (Tone). The usual Capra complications ensue, but the public knew in advance that it could count on a happy ending with all matters resolved.

In their duet together, “In the Cool, Cool, Cool of the Evening,” written by Hoagy Carmichael with lyrics by Johnny Mercer, Jane and Crosby overshadowed even their talented array of backup musicians.

When it was released by Decca Records, “In the Cool, Cool, Cool of the Evening” reached the bestseller chart on Billboard, landing there in September of 1951 and nesting there for six weeks.

The lyrics had Americans singing throughout the autumn:

In the cool, cool, cool of the evenin’, tell ‘em i’ll be there.
In the cool, cool cool of the evenin’, better save a chair
When the party’s getting’ a glow on, ‘n’ singin’ fills the air,
In the shank o’ the night, when the doin’s are right, you can tell ‘em i’ll be there.

On screen, Jane showed such chemistry with Crosby that a reporter visiting the set wrote of a possible romance. He was right. Columnists began to pick up on that, even though Crosby was still married.

He and Jane got to know each other as never before. He confided details of his life to her which he had shared with only two or three other friends. Louis Armstrong described him as “a lost, lonely dude.”

He admitted that he “suffered Catholic guilt” but had indulged in a series of extramarital affairs, calling himself a “serial adulterer” and labeling his behavior as “compulsive.”

“I have no trouble finding beautiful women willing to hop into bed with me,” he confessed. “Often, they just want to use me.”

“Are you sure it’s not your melodious voice that wins them over” she asked him, facetiously.

When Hope arrived on the set, Crosby told him, “Jane and I are considering marriage, but only after Dixie dies. We are mutually supportive of each other. She’s also great in bed, a charming companion, and a rather sophisticated lady. I think she would make a wonderful wife.”

“Make me best man,” Hope said. “Of course, since it’s a public appearance, I’ll have to charge you.”

“Let me put it this way,” Crosby said. “Jane is the tonic in my vodka, the cream in my coffee, the caviar on my toast.” As for the best man fee, I’m being generous giving you two dollars.”

One day, Crosby said, “I’d like to meet Maureen and Michael. In the meantime, I’ve invited my four boys to lunch with us in the commissary. You might find out for yourself if you want to be the stepmother of these losers.”

During the lunch, Jane sensed that his sons were afraid of their father. “He was rather sharp with them,” she later told Capra. “In Gary’s case, he canceled his order of a steak and selected a salad for him instead.”

Jane was correct in her assessment of the tensions between Crosby and his boys. After the singer died in 1977, son Gary wrote a “Daddy Dearest” type of memoir entitled Going My own way, in which he depicted Crosby as “cruel, cold, remote, and both physically and psychologically abusive.”

Crosby did admit to Jane that he reserved the harshest punishments for Gary. As the young man later wrote: “Each Tuesday afternoon, he weighed me in, and if the scale read more than it should have, he ordered me into his office and had me drop my trousers. I dropped my pants, pulled down my undershorts, and bent over. Then he went at it with a belt dotted with metal studs he kept reserved for the occasion. Quietly, dispassionately, without the least display of emotion or loss of self-control, he whacked away until he drew the first drop of blood, and then he stopped. It normally took between twelve and fifteen strokes. As they came down, I counted them off one by one, and I hoped I would bleed early.”

[Bing Crosby’s sons came to tragic ends. lindsay died in 1989 and dennis in 1991, both of them suicides from self-inflicted gunshot wounds. Gary died in 1995, when he was 62, of lung cancer. in each case, Jane still retained fond memories of Crosby and wrote him long, heart-warming letters, addressing his grief.

None of these sons inherited any of Crosby’s millions. His will created a blind trust stipulating that none of his offspring would receive inheritances until they reached the age of 65. only Phillip lived beyond that age, dying at 69, in 2014, of a heart attack.]

Capra later said, “When I finally got Jane and Bing to walk down the aisle at movie’s end, it was straight out of it Happened one night [released in 1934, and directed by Frank Capra] with Clark Gable and Claudette Colbert. I decided that if I was reduced to having to steal from my own picture, it was time for me to take a long rest.”

Crosby was paid $150,000 for his performance; Jane, $125,000. Capra made off with $176,000.

Jane later told June Allyson, “I withdrew from Bing’s affection because stories were printed that he planned to divorce Dixie and marry me. I was getting awful letters at the studio. Homewrecker was the mildest accusation against me. I realized it was time to go.”

Here Comes the Groom made money in spite of its critical reviews. Joseph McBride, Frank Capra’s biographer, wrote, “The plot itself had seen better days. All Capra was able to do was magnify its flaws.”

The kindest words appeared in The new York world-Telegram in a critique by Alton Cook: “Now that Jane Wyman has her Oscar safely tucked away, she is back at being our most pixieish comedienne and making her share of things very mirthful as a fisherman’s daughter out to crash Boston’s most blue blooded circles. When Frank Capra is in exactly his best mood, he and his writers have the maddest and funniest flights of fancy ever produced on this continent.”

Another critic nailed it more accurately: “Here Comes the Groom is pure Capra-corn!”

Capra later recalled, “Jane traded her crying towel for the glamour girl’s raiment and became a dish to behold.”

While Jane was still married to Reagan, Evelyn Keyes, “Scarlett O’Hara’s Younger Sister” in Gone with the wind, decided to throw a big bash to celebrate the first anniversary of her marriage to director John Huston. The co-hosts were directors Lewis Milestone (all Quiet on the western Front) and Jean Negulesco (Three Coins in the Fountain).

Keyes wanted to hire a band to entertain her 200 guests, among whom were some of the stellar members of tout Hollywood.

Keyes had worked with musician Fred Karger on The Jolson Story (1946) and suggested that he pull together a band for the night to entertain her guests. He hurriedly agreed and knew just which of his fellow musicians was best for which instrument. After only two days of rehearsals, they were “ready for showtime,” as he told Keyes.

Reagan had always wanted to work with Huston, but never got the chance after failing to nab the role he wanted in the director’s The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (1948), starring Humphrey Bogart.

Huston and Keyes soon became very good friends of Reagan and Jane. They frequently visited each other’s homes, and also went double-dating together at various clubs.

When Karger and his band took a 30-minute break, Keyes introduced him around to Hollywood hostesses.

In fact, Karger and “my boys” were such a smash success at the party that some of these show-biz hostesses, that very night, began plans to book him for their own special events.

At one point, it was not Keyes, but Judy Garland who introduced Karger to Reagan and Jane. Garland grabbed Jane’s arm. “Come with me to the can. I need to take a crap!” Reagan was left talking with Karger, of whom he later said, “What a nice young man.”

In the large ground floor bathroom of the Huston ranch, hawk-eyed Garland, though a bit drunk, picked up on Jane’s interest in the handsome young band leader.

“Privately, I’ve hired Freddie for duties other than music. But he’s a great musician. He’s worked with me on some numbers. He’s one of the music directors over at Columbia.”

“Is he married?” Jane asked.

“He’s divorced. Sounds like you’re interested, girl! If you’re like me, I never got enough when I married Vincente Minnelli. I guess he was saving it up for Gene Kelly.”

“Mr. Karger is awfully handsome, even charismatic,” Jane said.

“Not only that, but Freddie’s hung like there’s no tomorrow,” Garland said. “I’ll arrange for you guys to get together late one afternoon for drinks at my place.”

“He’s available, now that Rita has dumped him,” Garland said.

[Garland was referring to the involvement of Rita Hayworth with Karger, who had worked privately with her, coaching her for scenes in Gilda (1946) and The Loves of Carmen (1948).]

After taking her self-styled “crap,” Garland grabbed Jane’s arm again. “C’mon, I’m going to sing over the Rainbow for these drunken slobs.”

Although Keyes had hired Karger and his band, the hostess had also persuaded some of the most famous entertainers in the world to sing free for her guests, including not only Garland, but Frank Sinatra. After they performed, Jane herself asked if she could sing two numbers, going into a whispered conference with Karger.

This huddle would be the first of many a tête-à-tête that would continue on and off until Karger’s death. Or, as Jane put it to Garland on another night, “Our huddle that night at the Hustons led to a cuddle..and beyond.”

In a memoir, Keyes wrote, “It was the best goddamned party I ever attended.”

The next weekend, on a Sunday afternoon, Reagan and Jane arrived unannounced at the Huston ranch. It was not unusual for friends to just drop in for the weekend at the Hustons. Invitations were not necessary.

Their living room was in shambles. Upon seeing them, a hung over Huston said, “Evelyn, it’s time for Bloody Marys—and don’t be stingy with the vodka, darling.”

Sipping drinks with her guests, Keyes related what had happened the previous night. They had invited Humphrey Bogart, Lauren Bacall, Ida Lupino, and Collier Young to join them for dinner.

“At around one o’clock this morning, John here decided he wanted to play football with the boys,” Keyes said. “Bogie was barefoot at the time. For a football, he used my $1,000 ceramic vase. Bogie dropped it, and it shattered into pieces. He cut his foot on the sharp pieces. Betty [Bacall] while scolding him all the while picked out the slivers with tweezers.”

Throughout the afternoon, Huston revealed to Jane and Reagan that he was a world class drinker. Despite becoming increasingly intoxicated, he told one fascinating story after another.

As dusk descended, when everyone agreed that they were hungry, Huston invited all four of them down to Olvera Street, the Mexican section of Los Angeles, for tacos and beer. “Jane and John had had quite a few, but Ronnie and I were restrained,” Keyes recalled. “At the end of the fest, Ronnie put a giddily drunken John and Jane into the back seat and took the wheel, with me sitting up front beside him.”

“We’ll be the policemen, and I’ll drive,” Reagan announced.

In her memoir, Keyes wrote, “Ronnie was a sober-minded, responsible citizen even then. A nice Democrat. I wonder where he went wrong.”

The Blue veil: Jane with Richard Carlson...The love that might have been.

Jane was seen around town dating Curtis Bernhardt, a director far older than she was. It may or may not have been a romance. He’d helmed her during the war in My love Came Back (1940), and they had remained friends. Now he had a new picture for her called The Blue veil (1951). He wanted her to play a nun-like nursemaid.

“Me? A nun? You’ve got to be kidding!”

She was perplexed, but over just one night’s dinner, he sold her on the role.

She told him, “Bring it on. I’ll play anything except lesbians, hookers, and gun molls.”

She was called back to the studio for some retakes on Here Comes the Groom. During the course of those touch-ups, she had lunch with Bing Crosby. When he was informed of her newest film offer, he urged her to go for it.

“I don’t know,” she said. “It’s been such fun working with you in a musical. After Johnny Belinda and The Glass Menagerie, my nerves are frayed. I’m ready for the recuperation ward. The Blue veil is one tough role.”

“But at least, unlike Johnny Belinda, you’ll get to talk,” Crosby answered.

A week went by before Bernhardt called again from an office at RKO. “I’ve got bad news. Garbo saw the French version of The Blue veil. She wants to use it as a vehicle for her comeback picture.”

[Bernhardt was referring to a French picture, directed by Jean Stelli, Le voile bleu. it had been released in German-controlled Paris in 1942 and became one of the biggest film successes during the nazi occupation of France, an era when Germans heavily censored any film shown in their captured territories.

But soon after her initial enthusiasm, Garbo notified Bernhardt that she was not going to accept the role.

[In the late 1940s and early 50s, Garbo occasionally accepted a script, making it known that she was contemplating a comeback, and then rejecting the roles, perhaps based on fear of facing the cameras after such a long absence from the screen. Such was the case with The Blue Veil.]

The Blue veil: Matronly Jane with the then ingénue Natalie Wood.

After Garbo's departure, Bernhardt sent the script to Ingrid Bergman, who responded, "After all those condemnations based on my love affair with Roberto [Rossellini, whom she later married], I've become persona non grata in Hollywood. I'll have to turn it down. The public will probably mock me in a nun's role."

Only then did Bernhardt once again appeal to Jane. "You're our gal," he said. "Garbo has bolted."

The script arrived, an adaptation by Norman Corwin from a story by the French author François Campaux. Norman Krasna and Jerry Wald, Jane's old friends, were co-producers. Wald cabled, "I've been serarching for another Wyman picture after Johnny Be-linda. I assure you, The Blue veil is it. It has your second Oscar written on every page. Not only that, but I've cast your buddy, Joan Blondell, as a supporting role."

The title of the film came from the blue veil that French nursemaids commonly wore. The melodramatic plot centered on LouLou Mason, a war widow (played by Jane) who, after the death of her newborn baby, devotes her life to raising other people's children. The film is a series of vignettes about the families and children Jane becomes involved with as a nursemaid.

In the wake of the death of her newborn, Jane takes a job caring for the infant son of Frederick K. Begley (Charles Laughton), a corset manufacturer who lost his wife in childbirth. He proposes marriage, but she rejects his offer. Instead, he marries a woman named Fleur (Agnes Moorehead), who immediately fires Jane.

That leads her into a series of adventures in various homes, none more notable than when she begins the care and supervision of Stephanie (as played by the then-juvenile actress, Natalie Wood), the daughter of a fading musical actress Annie Rawlins (Joan Blondell).

As the teardrops fall, LouLou experiences one heartbreak after another within the various homes, even fleeing with one boy, Tony, to Florida. When his mother, Helen Williams (Audrey Totter), decides she wants him back.

Jane's character is arrested.

She ends her days as a janitor working in a children's school. There, she is spotted by one of her former charges, Dr. Robert Palfrey (Don Taylor). When he finds her, lonely and nearly destitute, he takes her home with him to raise his own children.

During the first week on the set of The Blue veil, Bernhardt introduced her to a strong supporting cast who included not just Blondell, Laughton, and Moorehead, but Richard Carlson, Carleton Young, Audrey Totter, Cyril Cusack, Dan O'Herlihy, and Don Taylor, fresh from having played Elizabeth Taylor's husband in Father of the Bride (1950) and Father's little dividend (1951).

Lunching with Blondell, Jane said, "My God, I've got to go from twenty to seventy. Only Perc Westmore, my old makeup artist, can pull that one off."

[whereas Perc defined the pattern for her makeup, he had to be hospitalized during the shoot.]

"No actor ever impressed her as much as Laughton, a towering and portly thespian known in both America and England. He was also a notorious homosexual, his status well known within London's theater circles. "He taught me how to act, walk, and talk like an old person. I learned more in two weeks from him than I did from any director. He made me feel old, and I mean that as a compliment. But I was only thirty-seven at the time, and in the prime of my life, with hormones raging. It was a big leap from that to old lady, but I finally got there."

The Blue veil: Jane, decrepid but dignified.

Jane chatted with Natalie Wood, who told her she wanted to escape the curse of such child stars as Shirley Temple, whose career ended when she turned adolescent. "Right now, I'm playing daughters to such parents as Fred MacMurray, Margaret Sullavan, and James Stewart, and I'm slated to be Bette Davis' daughter in The Star. As you know, I'm calling your friend, Blondell, 'mom'."

"If The Blue veil flops, we'll all pick our whistlestops," Wald told her. "If not, we'll take our bows. It's a challenge for you, but you have the talent to pull it off. Better than Garbo ever could."

Jane detested the invasive press, but granted one interview during the shoot. As the statement indicates, no one ever accused her of being "The Great Communicator," as they would Reagan in later years.

"We're put into this world. No one knows why. Sometimes I don't like it. Sometimes, I'd rather be in heaven. Meanwhile, I'm here for a certain number of years. Nothing adds up for me except how much good you can show people during that span. Without a goal, you don't live, you drift. I've set myself quite a few. This is the only one that's ever made sense."

Writing in The new York Times, Bosley Crowther defined The Blue veil "a whoppingly banal tear jerker that will lure multitudes of moviegoers who like nothing better than a good cry. Curtis Bernhardt's soupy direction stretches Wyman into a series of parchedly sunlit episodes contrived to squeeze the heart and present this lady as a quivering-lipped saint. Wyman has little to do herself except age daintily. Since, like the rest of The Blue veil, Wyman is so far removed from flesh and blood, we can only leave her and it to heaven."

At awards time, for her performance, Jane won a Golden Globe Award for Best Actress and also nominated for an Oscar.

The Blue veil grossed nearly $4 million, the most financially successful picture RKO released that year. For the first time in her long career, Jane was named one of the film industry's "Top Ten" box office draws.

Jane wouldn't take Maureen Reagan to see Johnny Belinda because it involved a rape, but she made it a point to escort her to a screening of The Blue veil. In her memoirs, Maureen recalled the experience. "The Blue veil was that movie where she loses a baby and then becomes a governess; she spends the rest of her life saying goodbye to one child after another. What a depressing movie! And she had to live with this character every day. No wonder it was sometimes difficult to get a smile out of her."

Maureen later told her friends at school, "My mother sat through the entire movie and didn't shed a tear. She has no sense of drama."

Jane's competitors for the Oscar that year (1951) included Katharine Hepburn for her role in The african Queen; Eleanor Parker for detective Story; and Shelley Winters for a Place in the Sun.

All of them lost to Vivien Leigh, taking home her second Oscar for her memorable performance as Blanche DuBois in Tennessee Williams' a Streetcar named desire.

Blondell was nominated for Best Supporting Actress, but lost to Kim Hunter as Stella in a Streetcar named desire. variety defined Blondell's performance as her best since a Tree Grows in Brooklyn (1945). In The Blue veil, she played a neglectful show business mother of a twelve year old. One writer said, "Blondell added vinegar to a movie drowning in molasses."

It was a year of honors. Very briefly, Jane was reunited with her co-star in The Year-ling. As he'd matured a bit, Gregory Peck looked handsomer than ever. She surely recalled her romantic nights with him. Both of them had been given Photoplay's Golden Award of 1951 for Favorite Actor and Favorite Actress of the year.

After the Awards Ceremony, she asked him, "If we're so goddamned popular, why not do a picture together?"

"Great idea," he said. "I'll lobby for the right script."

Their dual roles never materialized.

After Reagan's separation from Jane, he got to know Fred Karger before she did. When he was flirting around with the idea of marrying Adele Jergens, he often picked her up during the early evening night after she'd finished work her day's work on ladies of the Chorus. In it, she played Marilyn Monroe's mother, even though she looked like her sister.

Fred Karger: Babe magnet.

On the set of that movie, Karger was responsible for the staging of Marilyn's big number, "Every Baby Needs a Da-Da Daddy."

On three different occasions, Reagan and Jergens double dated with Marilyn and Karger. Reagan was surprised to learn that Marilyn was living with Karger's mother, Anne, and his daughter, Terry.

Karger told Reagan, "I brought Marilyn home and asked mother to take care of her, because she was lost, broke, and lonely. Anne just adores her. So does my daughter."

When Reagan started secretly seeing Marilyn, especially when he was convalescing with a broken leg, Marilyn complained to him, “Freddie does-n’t love me. A man can’t love a woman and feel contempt for her. He’s ashamed of me and wants to change me. He says he can’t take me out because I dress like a trollop.”

MM as she looked when Karger first dated her.

Her biographer, Fred Lawrence Guiles, wrote: “When Marilyn realized she was in love with Karger soon after their first dinner, she felt she must persuade him to marry her. That he didn’t seem about to do so was a reality to which she finally would resign herself. Fred Karger was to have the singular distinction of being the only human being Marilyn attempted to disarm and yet who was resistant up to the end.”

Once, after she hadn’t visited for quite a while, she showed up “slightly altered.”

“Freddie told me I had this small blemish, a fleshy tip, that made my nose appear too long. He arranged for me to go to a plastic surgeon to take care of it. The surgeon also removed some cartilage and inserted it into my jaw to make my chin stronger. Before that, Freddie was calling me ‘chinless’.”

“You look more gorgeous than ever,” Reagan assured her.

Later, when Marilyn became the roommate of Shelley Winters, she told her, “Freddie is so neat, he even keeps his pubic hair trimmed. He thought my upper teeth protruded, so he set up an appointment with an orthodontist, sending me to this Dr. Walter Taylor, who is a specialist in cosmetic surgery.”

Later, when Marilyn took up with agent Johnny Hyde, she told him that, “Freddie makes me feel inadequate. After a night with him, I’m churning in frustration. He won’t do certain things in bed I like.”

“I’ll bet he’s a secret homo,” Hyde said.

“He also told me that he can never marry me because I would not make a fit stepmother for his daughter, Terry. She adores me.”

Maurice Zolotow, one of Marilyn’s early biographers, wrote that Karger was “the epitome of courtliness. But when Marilyn fell for him, he was sour on women. When he talked of love, it was to express a world-weary hopelessness about the honor of women. He claimed that women were not capable of genuine love. He believed that no one could give herself honestly and entirely to one man for whom she cared. He said women ‘were too shrewd, too practical.’”

One moonlight night on Santa Monica Beach, Karger, a bit tipsy, said those three magic words that Marilyn was longing to hear—“I love you.”

She later told columnist Sidney Skolsky, “Those words were better than a thousand critics calling me a movie star. All the fame and bright lights I had dreamed about suddenly were in me.”

But the next day, in Marilyn’s words, “Freddie forgot about what he’d told me on the beach. He was his same cynical self with all the barriers to his emotion erected around him. He even teased me about my ignorance of culture and history.”

He told her, “Your mind isn’t developed. Compared to your body, it’s embryonic.”

Joan Blondell later said, “All the problems that Freddie found in Marilyn he didn’t find in Jane. Jane was more his type. Marilyn for sex, Jane for marriage.”

Karger’s first known outing with Marilyn as his date was at the premiere of The asphalt Jungle (1950), her first breakthrough movie. “I deserved something from him,” she told Skolsky. “In 1948, for his Christmas present, I bought him a $500 gold watch which I'm still paying off at the rate of $25 a month."

She later told Skolsky, "One of the reasons I fell for John Kennedy is that he looks like Freddie."

When Karger began dating Jane, Marilyn heard about it and exploded in fury. When she learned that he planned to marry Jane, she told Winters, "I will hate Jane Wyman for the rest of my life, even in heaven. I wasn't all that interested in Reagan, but I played around with him just to get even with Jane for taking Freddie from me. I'm still carrying a torch for the guy. He should have been an underwear model."

After The Blue veil, Jane returned to Warners for a cameo appearance in Starlift (1951). Directed by Roy Del Ruth, its all-star cast included James Cagney, Gary Cooper, Gene Nelson, Frank Lovejoy, Virginia Mayo, Phil Harris, Gordon MacRae, Randolph Scott, Doris Day, and Ruth Roman.

At the time, Reagan was dating both Day and Roman.

"I'm not on the screen for very long," Jane said, "but at least I get to sing 'I May Be Wrong (but I Think You're Wonderful).'"

The silly plot concerned two pilots, Mike Nolan (Dick Wesson) and Rick Williams (Ron Hagerthy), who try to meet Nell Wayne (Janice Rule), a fictitious film star performing in a star-studded musical in San Francisco. Before meeting Rule, Roman introduces them to Day and MacRae, who are rehearsing, "You're Gonna Lose Your Gal."

Although Starlift takes place during the Korean War, Jane said that it evoked fond memories of her times at the Hollywood Canteen during World War II.

Bosley Crowther, the acerbic critic for The new York Times, summed it up: "The acts are unspeakably slapdash, and the romance is painful beyond words. The performances given by Janice Rule and Ron Hagerthy as the flier are as sappy as they could possibly be, and Dick Wesson as a pushy pal of the flier is downright insufferable."

Hollywood columnists were surprised when Jane accepted the role of Betty Blake Rogers, the wife of Will Rogers, Sr., the legendary humorist and lariat-twirling cowboy from the Ziegfeld Follies. The picture was The Story of will Rogers, set for a 1952 release from Warner Brothers, with Michael Curtiz directing.

Glam Jane becomes Plain Jane again, this time in The Story of will Rogers.

As columnist Sidney Skolsky noted, "The part of Rogers' wife so clearly called for that gentle lady, Phyllis Thaxter, who once played Ronald Reagan's wife in a film. Thaxter knows how to play 'nice,' without the usual spoonful of saccharine. But why did a big star like Oscar-winning Jane Wyman take such a small role—a part that could have been handled by hundreds of actresses of minor talent?"

Thanks to the passage of time, Jane's reasons for accepting the minor role can be determined. To begin with, she was planning to star in a very strong role as a movie star who returns to Broadway in an aptly titled script called Broadway Revisited. It was a powerful role, although there was a rumor that Jack Warner had originally offered it to Lauren Bacall, who would play a similar role in her future on Broadway in applause, a stage musical based on all about eve.

Jane had a secret reason for wanting the part: She hoped that, based on her performance, producers could see that she could impersonate a stage actress. She had witnessed many stars approaching forty or beyond who had extended their professional lives, after movie roles evaporated, by appearances on the stage.

There was another reason. She had just appeared with her pal and sometimes lover, Bing Crosby, in Here Comes the Groom. He thought he could play Will Rogers and actually submitted to a screen test. He asked Jane to co-star as his wife. However, when he saw himself on the screen, he had to admit that his own personality and the persona of the humorist were not a perfect fit. As he told Jane, "Will and I don't go together like love and marriage, or a horse and carriage."

Jane was ready to bow out of the role after Crosby's screen test bombed, but Warner persuaded her to accept the role as a favor to him. He had decided to cast Will Rogers, Jr. in the part of his father, but he was very inexperienced and had no marquee name.

"I need someone who can get movie fans to buy tickets," Warner told her. "If you'll go along with me on this one, I'll assure you of some big pictures coming up where I'll give you the lead. I've requested this kind of concession from Bette Davis on at least on two occasions when she was big around this studio, and she agreed."

The mogul was referring to Davis taking a secondary role in The Man who Came to dinner (1941) with Monty Woolley and watch on the Rhine (1943) in which she played second fiddle to Paul Lukas.

Directed by Michael Curtiz, with whom Jane had a dreaded reunion, The Story of will Rogers featured a supporting cast of now familiar faces to her, including James Gleason, Carl Benton Reid, Eve Miller, and Slim Pickens. Steve Brodie and Eddie Cantor were also in the cast.

Virtually all of America had tuned in for details about Rogers' tragic death in 1935, when he was killed in a plane crash en route from Fairbanks to Alaska's northernmost tip, Point Barrow. His close friend, Wiley Post, also died in the wreck. In the movie, Noah Beery, Jr. interpreted the role of Post.

During a dialogue with Curtiz, he told her that her role had been offered to both Eleanor Parker and Phyllis Thaxter—yes, the same housewifey actress suggested by Skolsky.

The role of Will Rogers, in addition to being offered to Bing Crosby, had been considered for both Herb Shriner and Charles Drake. Curtiz also told her that Will Rogers, Jr., the son of the subject of the film, had been screen tested and subsequently rejected for the role way back in 1942. In contrast, on this newest effort, he got the part.

"Big year for me, 1942," Curtiz said. "I was hot shit. Casablanca, you know. Your boy, Reagan, didn't get Bogie's part."

Jane was introduced to her leading man, Will Rogers, Jr., who had had a varied career. From January 3, 1943, to May 23, 1944, he had been a U.S. Congressman from California when he resigned to rejoin the U.S. army. Through a varied career, he'd been a minor actor, writer, and publisher.

He closely resembled his father, though lacking any of his talent. He later told the press that he found Jane "wonderful to work with, tremendously helpful and supportive. She taught me more about acting than Curtiz did."

Publicly, Jane said nothing, but complained to Curtiz, "I find him tiring to work with— retake, retake, and more retakes until he gets it right, if he ever does."

Reviewers were puzzled that the script by Frank Davis and Stanley Roberts contained so many historical inaccuracies about Will Rogers, Sr. Although his son was very familiar with his father's life, he apparently never alerted the writers about the points where they were wrong. For example, the movie depicts Rogers' father, Clem Rogers, as a delegate from Oklahoma at the 1932 Democratic convention that nominated Franklin D. Roosevelt. Clem Rogers, the grandfather of Rogers, had died in 1911, the year his grandson was born.

After a screening, Jane told Curtiz, "I don't like the way I look on the screen. As for that drab wardrobe you forced me to wear, it stinks. I refuse to do anything to promote the film."

She was right. The critics damned her performance with faint praise, using such words as "likable," "supportive," "pleasant," and "displays a gentle attitude."

She described her role as "a simpering onlooker." Years later, when she saw it on TV, she said. "I think I used Nancy Davis as my role model, you know when she gazes adoringly at Reagan when he's making one of his endless speeches."

In spite of its many weaknesses, The Story of will Rogers was one of the top box office hits of 1952, grossing $2.65 million in U.S. rentals.

In later life, Rogers, Jr. appeared in several TV productions, and was one of several actors to host syndicated reruns of the hit series, death valley days, whose original run was hosted for a season by Reagan himself.

Jane lived long enough to be saddened by the increasing deaths of people she had known. In 1993, she heard over TV news that Rogers, Jr. had committed suicide at the age of 81, after suffering heart problems, several strokes, and an ongoing series of hip replacements.

Jane always listened to broadcasts from Hollywood, especially roundups of news in the entertainment industry.

Cougar Jane with the younger and very well-heeled Travis Kleefeld, whose society mother was anything but amused.

The date was March 4, 1952. Leading off the afternoon news was an announcement that Ronald Reagan had married the MGM starlet, Nancy Davis, in the Little Brown Church in the Valley, in Studio City, California.

Stunned, Jane turned off the TV. The next day, reporters besieged her, wanting her to reveal her feelings and reactions. It seemed that the world wanted to know.

"I wish Ronnie and his bride all the happiness—and that's all I have to say. It's not my affair."

"What do you think of Nancy Davis?" one reporter called out to her.

"I have never heard of the lady until today," she falsely claimed.

"But she's a movie star," he yelled back.

"I doubt that," she said. "I read variety from its front cover to the back page. I don't recall reading about any Nancy Davis. Excuse me, I'm late for an appointment."

Exactly thirteen days from the date of Reagan's marriage, Nancy made her own announcement to the press. She reported, "I'm engaged to Travis Kleefeld, and I'll have nothing else to say about it."

As reporters rushed back to their offices and their typewriters, the first questions on everyone's lips was, "Who in the fuck is Travis Kleefeld? Do we have a picture of this guy?"

A devastatingly handsome young man, Kleefeld was ten years younger than Jane but looked much younger even than that. When they had been secretly dating, he was often mistaken for her son.

After the announcement of his engagement to Jane, he became an overnight celebrity. The search was on to find out who he was.

No complete answer ever emerged, but there were clues. It seemed that Jane had met the dashing young man at a Christmas party, and had begun to date him right away.

Speculation was rampant. Had Jane deliberately chosen to announce her engagement so soon after Reagan's marriage? Was she rushing into something impetuous because her former spouse had beaten her to the altar? Only she knew the answers.

Very little was known about him. He was said to be rich, and that he didn't have to marry Jane for her money. He was the scion and heir to a well-known contracting family, and he worked in the family business, which he would one day inherit. His friends, however, said that his secret desire was to be a singer like Frank Sinatra.

[Five years after the announcement of his engagement, Kleefeld did launch a fairly unsuccessful singing career, billing himself as "Tony Travis." He generated little enthusiasm for his talent, despite the fact that he had quite an acceptable singing voice.]

Two weeks after Jane's wedding announcement, she was summoned to Warner Brothers. The studio mogul told her that a ton of fan mail had come in from her devotees, denouncing her decision to marry a man so much younger than herself.

"You've been called everything from a cradle snatcher to an old bag lady seeking to corrupt a handsome young man," Warner said. "You've made a laughing stock of yourself. Your fans are deserting you in droves. Hundreds claim that they will never go to see another Jane Wyman picture."

When a reporter investigated the reaction of Kleefeld's parents, it was obvious that collectively, they interpreted the upcoming marriage as horrifying. One family member said, "I hear Jane Wyman is forty-five if she's a day."

Actually, at the time, she was only thirty-eight.

When the fan magazines hit the stands, Jane was humiliated and burst into tears at the unflattering coverage.

Columnist Ruth Waterbury, a close observer of Jane's, later recalled, "The situation matched that [of the storyline] of her future picture with Rock Hudson called all That Heaven allows, the story of an older woman falling for a young man. Was Jane in love with Kleefeld enough to withstand the hostile reaction of the public? I think she loved him in her fashion. But eventually, she started to give in. She couldn't stand up to the mounting pressure and ridicule. In a few weeks, she called off the engagement, claiming that 'Travis and I aren't right for each other.'"

Since his family controlled the purse strings, the son and heir opted to acquiesce to their complaints. Modern Screen wrote, "Travis Kleefeld put a down payment on a mink coat for Jane Wyman just before the engagement was called off. Incidentally, relations between Jane and Kleefeld's mother were what you might call 'strained' when we were going to press."

Jane was also quoted as saying, "Age had nothing whatever to do with our decision not to marry. I guess we're the only two people who are not conscious of the difference in our ages. It was just that we decided that marriage was wrong for us and it was silly to go into as serious a matter as matrimony without being perfectly aware it was what we both wanted. Believe me, Travis and I will always be friends. I think he is one of the finest men I've ever met. But we have both realized that we went into this thing too quick and that it's better to break up before marriage than to go into the divorce courts later."

What Louella Parsons knew and other reporters didn't was that after breaking off the engagement, Jane continued to see Kleefeld on several occasions. "He's great in bed," Jane told Parsons in a confidential aside. From then on, she saw him in secret for the next few weeks, although he dated other, younger women.

When asked why she continued to see Kleefeld after breaking off the engagement, Jane said, "It's best that way—no entangling alliances."

She admitted to Parsons that she was jealous of the starlets that Kleefeld dated, knowing that the columnist would not print that comment.

Riddled with insecurities, Jane told Ruth Waterbury, "God, I feel old looking at Travis out with all those young, beautiful women. Don't print that!"

In spite of the fiasco associated with her engagement to Kleefeld, Jane entered her "cougar" period, although that term was not in vogue at the time. Today, of course, "cougar" is used to describe an older woman pursuing a younger man.

Along came Tony Trabert, an extraordinary tennis player who was thirteen years younger than Jane, but looked twenty-five years her junior. In the opinion of some observers, it survived as one of the most mysterious relationships of her life.

Was it an affair, a friendship, a passing fancy, or something serious? Jane was not talking. Trabert became the World's no. 1 tennis champion, and is included in the list of the twenty-one greatest players of all time.

Standing 6'1", he was considered by reporters "cute rather than handsome." There had been speculation that Kleefeld looked like Jane's son, but Trabert, in the words of one journalist, "could pass for her grandson."

Jane with the very young future tennis star, Tony Trabert. When June Allyson heard of this relationship, she sniffed, “The less said about it, the better.”

As a cynical Hedda Hopper said when she saw a picture of Jane with Trabert at a tennis match, “The next thing I’ll hear is that Jane has been hanging out around kindergartens.”

[Born in Cincinnati in 1930, Marion anthony Trabert was a stand-out athlete in both tennis and basketball at the University of Cincinnati.

In 1955, three years after dating Jane, his record was one of the most spectacular ever associated with an american tennis player. He had won a trio of the most prestigious amateur tennis tournaments—the French, wimbledon, and american Championships en route to being ranked world no. 1 among the amateurs for that year. He turned professional that autumn of 1955.

After his retirement in 1971, he began a 33-year career as a tennis and golf analyst for CBS, covering such events as the U.S. open. after an amazing career, Trabert retired in 2004, three years before Jane died.]

Originally, Judy Garland had signed with Paramount to appear as a Broadway star in a film entitled Just for You. Robert Carson had written its screenplay based on Stephen Vincent Benet’s story, Famous.

But after being fired by MGM on the set of annie Get Your Gun, Garland was still struggling with pill addiction. Bloated and puffy, she had failed in her diet.

Grande dame of the American Theater, Ethel Barrymore, co-starring with der Bingle and Jane in Just for You.

Consequently, Paramount decided to rewrite the script into a vehicle for Jane Wyman and Bing Crosby, pairing them together as a team based on the success of their previous hit, Here Comes the Groom.

Just for You, with a reworked script, was shot within a context of speed and intense pressure beginning in mid-

October of 1951, and finished shortly before Christmas for an early release in 1952.

Filming it was not a happy experience for either Jane or Crosby, who had discussed a possible marriage during the making of their previous film together.

This time around, however, “Der Bingle” was not in a romantic mood. Consumed by what he described as “Catholic guilt,” Crosby was morbidly obsessed with the agonies of his slowly dying wife, the former star, Dixie Lee, a victim of ovarian cancer. Also, his conflicts with his sons, especially Gary, were growing increasingly wrenching and bitter.

Jane’s private life was in upheaval as she drifted from beau to beau. Consumed with emotional anxieties, she also faced a health crisis, leading eventually to hospitalization because of a kidney stone.

In spite of her problems, and despite her status as a woman on the doorstep of middle age, she looked like a far younger actress than she actually was. That was fine with her, considering the skimpy costumes she’d have to wear in her upcoming picture.

Its director, Elliott Nugent, had assembled a strong supporting cast, including the formidable Ethel Barrymore, along with Robert Arthur, Natalie Wood, Regis Toomey, and veteran actress Cora Witherspoon.

Jane was cast in it Just for You as Carolina Hill, a musical comedy star on Broadway with a personal style evocative of Mary Martin. Carolina is the girlfriend of Jordan Blake (Crosby), a Broadway producer who is so busy and self-involved that he neglects his two children, Jerry Blake (Robert Arthur) and Barbara Blake (Natalie Wood).

In the film, Jane tries to bring harmony to the family and reconcile Crosby’s character to his son and daughter.

During their first luncheon together, Jane and Crosby talked about the plight of alienated children as being “a little too close to home” to each of their individual situations. Crosby was very estranged from his four sons, and between Jane’s career and her heavy dating schedule, she saw little of Maureen and Michael.

She was anxious to meet and work with “Miss Barrymore,” whom she regarded as the greatest actress in the history of the American theater. Ethel had been cast as Alida De Bronkhart, the principal of a snobbish girls’ school.

She found Ethel in declining health, living the last decade of her life. “I was young back in 1901, somewhat of a beauty. Look at me now, a withered rose in the summer garden, deep in December.”

Whenever possible, the two actresses met for tea or else had lunch together in the commissary.

“Zinging a Little Zong”...Just for You, with Bing and Jane.

Barrymore shared many memoires of Jane during their long discussions together, revealing details about her private life that didn’t get included in her autobiography, Memories.

Ethel tantalized Jane with tidbits from her past. “Twice in my life, two people have attempted to rape me. Tallulah Bankhead and my brother, John. Only one of them succeeded, but I won’t tell you which one.”

She also said that in 1900, Winston Churchill had proposed marriage to her. “Perhaps I should have accepted his proposal,” she told Jane.

Jane hadn’t seen Natalie Wood since they’d worked together on The Blue veil, where she’d played Joan Blondell’s adolescent daughter. “Here I am again playing a daughter,” she told Jane. “When will I ever grow up?”

[Four months later, Jane encountered natalie at a Hollywood premiere. The young girl rushed up to her to whisper confidential secrets. “Guess what? i’ve had my period. The flow of blood terrified me. i screamed for my mother, thinking i was dying. Mother had never explained to me the finer points of menstruation."

"Congratulations!" Jane said. "welcome to womanhood."

"i can't wait to check out the dicks of so many guys—Tab Hunter, Tony Curtis, Rock Hudson, maybe even Robert wagner. or perhaps that new guy, Jimmy dean. i've talked it over with my mother, and she thinks it should be this hot young actor, nick adams. in fact, she's selected nick to teach me the ways of the world."

"i think fourteen is an acceptable age," Jane said. "it wasn't that long ago that a fourteen-year-old was getting married and having children and following daniel Boone into the american wilderness."]

Paramount hoped to repeat the success of a Crosby/Wyman duet, which had been such a hit in their rendition of "In the Cool, Cool, Cool of the Evening."

In response, the composers came up with "Zing a Little Zong." When it was released as a recording, it enjoyed a moderate success, but they did not replicate the sales of their previous hit.

For his appearance in Just for You, Crosby was paid his standard fee of $150,000, with Jane receiving $133,000. During the shoot, she also signed a contract with Decca, who wanted to promote her as "The Dinah Shore of Tomorrow."

She was rather blasé about a recording career, although she made some records with Danny Kaye, Groucho Marx, and Jimmy Durante. Two of her comedy releases included "Black Strap Molasses" and, on the flip side, "How Di Ye Do and Shake Hands."

Just for You enjoyed only moderate success at the box office, and was certainly not a hit the way that Here Comes the Groom had been.

The Christian Science Monitor wrote, "As Broadway star Carolina Hill, Jane Wyman is abundantly qualified to strike a young man's fancy—or, as the story indicates, a young man's father's fancy. She plays with genuine affection scenes in which she tries to promote better family relationships among the Blakes, and with tender understanding, the difficult passages in which she discovers that she has inadvertently encouraged the young son to fall in love with her."

Writing in Showplace, critic Jake Karr said, "Just for You is artificial hocus-pocus. Miss Wyman bobs about ingratiatingly, mainly in abbreviated togs, displaying an elegant figure. She also pipes prettily some of the film's songs."

Mae Tinee of the Chicago Tribune found that "Miss Wyman sparkles like Lake Michigan on a sunny morning, and the studio provides her with some of the most becoming costumes a woman could have."

On most occasions, Jane kept quiet when asked about Reagan. She'd often leave the room "to powder my nose," if she were at a private party. If cornered by a reporter, she'd say, "Excuse me, I'm late for an appointment."

But Reagan angered her when, as president of SAG, he "launched a stupid campaign" (her words). He wanted to prevent fan magazines such as Photoplay and Modern Screen from writing about the private lives of "established stars." Jane expressed her disbelief that Reagan thought such a thing was possible to achieve in a free society with a free press.

In a public statement, Reagan said, "Such stories are all right for youngsters on their way up—Natalie Wood or Tab Hunter come to mind, perhaps Tony Curtis or Janet Leigh."

"But there comes a time when established stars such as Jane Wyman and myself should have control over what is written about them, with the option of a veto."

It is not known what prompted his outrage. Jane told friends that she suspected it was an event that occurred back in September of 1951, when she, escorted by Greg Bautzer, attended the premiere of The Blue veil.

On a chance encounter, the couple ran into another couple in the lobby of the theater: Reagan out on a date with the MGM starlet, Nancy Davis. He introduced his date to his former wife.

As Bautzer noted, "An iceberg came between these two ladies big enough to sink ten ships the size of the Titanic. But all of us were ever so polite."

When both couples arrived later at Ciro's, for some reason, Nancy and Reagan were directed to empty chairs at the table otherwise occupied by Jane and Bautzer. [Perhaps it was a mistake from a misguided maître d'hôtel, although it was later surmised that Bautzer himself had tipped the headwaiter and asked him to do that.] Not wanting to make a scene, Reagan and Nancy sat at the table with Jane and the handsome attorney, whom he already knew.

Bautzer said, "Reagan looked like he was sweating blood. But all of us were too well bred to make a scene.

Boy, did that guy look like he wanted to crawl out of his seat. Both Nancy and Jane behaved like two proper ladies, not bitter rivals in a love triangle."

It must have been terribly awkward for Nancy, because I'm sure she'd heard all the stories about how Reagan was still moaning over the loss of Jane. Everybody ordered something, something light, that is, and this 'double date' soon broke up as we went our separate ways. My evening didn't end until Jane swore on a stack of Bibles that I was better in bed than her former husband."

When the fan magazines heard what Reagan planned to do by presenting a censorship proposal to the members of SAG, they fought back. A typical response, an open letter to Reagan, appeared in Motion Picture Magazine, as composed by its editors:

> "You cited fan magazines about stories of your divorce from Jane wyman as being 'false and irresponsible' invasions of your privacy. we disagree, because you apparently didn't feel the marriage itself was a private affair. during your marriage, you opened your home to photographers and reporters and allowed pictures of your home, your wife, and your children, Maureen and Michael, to be taken. But if a happy marriage is news, then it seems to follow that the breakup of that marriage is also news. Yours is a business, Mr. Reagan, which is built on publicity. in this sense, actors are like politicians."

Most actors were horrified to learn about Reagan's position. Ida Lupino and many others at SAG advised him not to bring such a proposal to a vote.

His censorship proposal died like a victim shot in the heart.

Still floating from studio to studio, Jane was assigned a role in her next movie, love Story, scheduled for a 1953 release through Columbia.

[its title was later changed to the more sexually suggestive let's do it again.]

She was to be reunited with Ray Milland, her co-star from The lost weekend.

Doing It Again: Jane with Ray Milland, this time in a context more flippant than the emotionally wrenching The lost weekend.

Three weeks before director Alexander Hall was to begin rehearsals and shooting, Jane arrived at Columbia to work on her dance routines and songs.

As she waited in a rehearsal room, in walked Fred Karger. She'd first heard his small band at a party given by Evelyn Keyes and John Huston. "My dreamboat" she later called him. He had just come from a morning game of tennis.

As she'd later tell June Allyson, "He was the man with the Betty Grable legs, the male equivalent, of course. He wore a pair of tennis shorts, very tight, making things rather obvious. His outfit and T-shirt were sunflower yellow. I had never seen a tennis player in anything but white. He was beautifully tanned and a living doll. He told me he was going to be my vocal coach at Columbia. I'm afraid I said something obvious, an old line."

Paramount promoted movie depictions of Jane as cheesecake, wearing leotards and sexy, strapless, form-fitting tops. Fearing that he was focusing exclusively on her legs, she told the photographer, "My breasts have not altogether fallen, in case you want to photograph them—fully covered, of course—too."

"And what was that, my dear?" Allyson asked. "Maybe I'll use it sometime myself."

"I asked him, 'Did it hurt?'"

"You mean, my tennis game?"

"No, when you fell from Heaven," she answered.

Karger had dark, wavy hair, a compelling smile, and an athletic build.

Fred Lawrence Guiles, author of legend, The life and death of Marilyn Monroe, wrote, "Fred Karger's eyes danced with an exuberance that become mystifying only after you bumped up against his reserve."

It seemed that Jane fell in love with him almost at once, although she later confessed, "I never did break down the wall of reserve he'd constructed around himself." During the three weeks she worked with him, she got to know him "as Bathsheba knew David" (her words).

"He looks great in clothes, from tennis shorts to a tuxedo," Jane told Joan Blondell. "And he looks best of all without a stitch on. It would take a Michelangelo to sculpt a body like that."

Except for his tennis outfits, he always wore conservative, dark suits and never went out the door without putting one on. Most evenings, he wore a tuxedo when taking her nightclubbing and certainly for his public appearances as the leader of his band. Once, when he escorted Jane to a garden party, he selected a dark suit as his wardrobe to an event where other many other men were attired (his words) in "pussy pink or marigold pants."

"Almost overnight, Freddie has come to fill a void in my life," Jane told Paulette Goddard. "I think he is the man for me."

"Sounds to me you've found husband number four," Goddard said.

"I think you're right. I want to be with someone young and vital, not some grandpa like Reagan, who sits in the living room every night reading editorial pages and news magazines, not to mention endless books on politics."

"Ronnie talks politics day and night," Jane said. "Freddie and I share the same interests, including similar tastes in music. He likes to gossip about the movie colony, like I do. He also likes to spend every evening dancing in nightclubs, just like I prefer. Unlike Van Johnson, he doesn't drop you off at the end of the evening, with just a kiss on the cheek. After stripping down, he brushes his teeth, gargles, and jumps into bed to send a gal to Heaven."

Fred with Jane, in love, and happy.

While working with Karger during the day and spending her nights in his arms, she learned more about him. He was more than a vocal coach. She knew he had his own band, but he was also a composer and conductor.

He'd been born only a year before her, the son of the famous Maxwell Karger, a producer and director at the old Metro company before it became Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

In 1921, Maxwell died young, suffering a fatal heart attack aboard a train traveling from New York to Fort Wayne, Indiana. Fred's mother, Anne Karger, had lived with him at the Hollywood Hotel, and was known for staging Saturday night parties, which she called "Pops Evenings."

As a young boy, Fred moved among the Hollywood elite, getting a kiss on the lips from Rudolph Valentino, a lollipop from Charlie Chaplin, or the promise of becoming a child star from Mary Pickford. Jack Pickford, Mary's brother, always tossed him in the air, and Buster Keaton once brought him a pet baby rattlesnake. "Imagine giving a rattlesnake to a little boy," Fred said. "Buster was insane."

Fred with Jane, in love, and happy.

Fred had been born a Catholic, but was not a practicing one. "I'm out all Saturday night into the wee hours. When it's time for mass, I'm sleeping it off," he told Jane.

In August of 1940, he'd married a minor actress, Patti Sachs, who eventually left show business and became a high-powered lawyer. They had one daughter, Terence Meredith, nicknamed "Terry." When Sachs and Fred separated, she used her skill as a lawyer "to fleece me," Fred told Jane. "I got custody of Terry. My daughter and I live with Anne."

During his days, Fred was the assistant to Morris Stoloff, the musical director at Columbia. But at night, he made the rounds, playing at elegant private parties, including one at the home of Jack Warner. Because of his good looks, he and his band were often booked by some of the most famous hostesses of Hollywood, including Merle Oberon. Sometimes, he'd get a booking in the Escoffier Room at the Beverly Hills Hotel. On such an occasion, Jane always had a front-row table.

Hedda Hopper summed up the attraction: "Fred Karger and Jane had music in common and had a lot of laughs together. Since he was practically her age, she didn't have to go through any more older women/younger man publicity. He was as lonely as she was, and, unlike Bautzer, wanted to remarry. He felt rootless and disoriented, and wanted to get back into domestic harness again. At the time, everyone thought he was perfect for Jane. Even Ronald Reagan approved of him."

"I'm in love with Freddie Karger," Jane said in a giddy voice over the phone to June Allyson. "He makes beautiful music on and off the stage. I'm already calling him Freddie. He's gorgeous and all the plumbing is first rate and works perfectly—a maiden's dream. He is my Prince Charming, the man I've waited for all my life and didn't think I would ever find."

"Cool it, gal," Allyson cautioned.

As Maureen Reagan later wrote, “Mother brought Michael and me home one weekend from boarding school. It was a Halloween weekend, and I met Fred and his daughter, Terry, who was about six months younger than me. Michael, Terry, and I went trick or treating. When we got back, mother and Fred were waiting in the den. We walked in, and they sat us down and told us of their plans to be married. Boom! Instant extended family! Just add water and stir. When they got back from their elopement, we had these bags of rice to throw at them. I think I might have pelted Fred with clumps of rice a bit harder than tradition called for.”

On November 1, 1952, Jane Wyman married Fred Karger in Santa Barbara at El Montecito Presbyterian Church, although both were Catholic, a church that frowned on divorce. Fred’s best man was Richard Quine, the actor and director. They had the shortest honeymoon on record, one Sunday night in a suite at a Santa Monica hotel.

News of Jane’s Infatuation Goes Out to the A-list:

Above, Ethel Merman, Jane, and Fred Karger share a meal and some gossip. But what are all three of them looking at? The formidable Bette Davis had just appeared before them.

Both of them got up early Monday morning to begin filming let’s do it again (1953)..

Back in Hollywood, they quickly learned that both Louella Parsons and Hedda Hopper were furious at Jane for not giving either of them an exclusive scoop.

In another part of town, a young starlet, Marilyn Monroe, was, as she later recalled, “Crying my eyes out. I vowed to get even with Wyman if it was the last thing I ever did.” There were rumors that she had contemplated suicide that day by overdosing on sleeping pills.

When Oscar Saul, the producer of let’s do it again, arrived at the set that morning, he found a party underway. “I asked my assistant director, ‘What in hell is going on?’” Saul asked. “He told me that the cast and crew were giving a surprise party for Fred and Jane. They had eloped that weekend.”

At lunch in the commissary, screenwriter Nunnally Johnson stopped by to congratulate Jane and Karger. Later that night, he wrote to his friend, Claudette Colbert, who was at her home in Barbados. “Met Jane Wyman’s new husband—and that’s all there is to that!”

After Jane and Karger had been back in Hollywood for just two nights, her friends decided to throw a private party at Chasen’s, since there had been nothing festive for their actual wedding.

Ironically, also dining at Chasen’s that night was Marilyn Monroe with her chief supporter, the columnist Sidney Skolsky. He had done more to promote her career than any other writer in Hollywood, performing many of the kind of PR stunts for her that Louella Parsons had crafted for Reagan.

“When Marilyn heard of the private party for Jane and Freddie, she decided to crash it,” Skolsky said. “I urged her not to. That was the only bitchy thing I ever saw her do.”

She jumped up from the banquette and headed for the entrance to the private party. The usher there was a fan of hers and just assumed that she was among the invited guests.

Parsons was there that night, and witnessed Marilyn slinking into the party. Hedda Hopper was also there, accompanied by her son, William, and his companion, the designer, Stanley Mills Haggart.

Haggart later said, “I had known Marilyn since the days she’d first arrived in Hollywood. I knew she was up to no good. She glided into the room in a form-fitting pink dress and headed straight for Freddie. Jane was on the other side of the room, but she, like the rest of the guests, almost came to a standstill, gazing upon Marilyn and wondering what she was up to.”

“She sidled right up to Freddie and gave him one of her gooey wet ones, no doubt sticking her skilled tongue down his throat. Freddie looked completely flabbergasted, actually shocked. I looked over at Jane. She was bubbling over in fury."

"Congratulations, Freddie," Marilyn said, loud enough for the room to hear.

"That voice wasn't Marilyn's usual coo," Haggart said. "It was strident, obviously she wanted Jane to hear every word. After giving the groom another gooey one, she fluttered away, blowing kisses to Freddie as she departed."

Again, she called out in a loud voice, "Just because you're married doesn't mean you have to be a stranger. You can come knocking on my door any rainy night. I'm sure we can find something to do that will amuse you."

Then she returned to Chasen's main dining room to rejoin Skolsky.

Three weeks later, Marilyn had another run-in with Jane. Earlier, she had told Shelley Winters, "Even though Joe DiMaggio is in my life, Fred Karger is the only man I've ever loved. To hell with marriage licenses. I'll still go after him from time to time. I know he'll always give in to me. He didn't want to marry me, but he's still turned on by me. As for Wyman, that bitch will get hers."

Her revenge on Jane was enacted through a chance encounter. The event, which became notorious in Hollywood history, also occurred at Chasen's, this time in the ladies' room.

"Doing it Again?" Or was it the first time? Jane with Aldo Ray.

When Marilyn entered the lounge, she spotted Jane in front of a mirror, applying fresh lipstick. Details are missing. They obviously had words, and another woman in the lounge later reported that she heard Jane call Marilyn "a cheap little bleach blonde trollop."

At that point, Marilyn lunged at Jane, and ripped off her wig. Because of a scalp irritation, Jane had worn a wig that night to conceal her condition.

Jane screamed as Marilyn quickly exited from the ladies' room.

Within the week, the novelist, Jacqueline Susann, heard of the incident, which later became the most dramatic scene in her best-sell ing novel, valley of the dolls. The encounter was also depicted on the screen in 1967, with the real-life Susan Hayward cast as the diva who gets her wig ripped off.

Incidentally, that movie featured the doomed Sharon Tate, whose fate it was to be brutally murdered by a psychotic gang under the influence of Charles Manson.

Many years later, at a party in New York, a hostess introduced Jane to Susann. Jane glared at her hostess. "I'm a lady. Why should I want to meet this piece of trash?" Then she turned her back on Susann and walked away.

"If that's a lady, I'm the Queen of Sheba," Susann told her hostess.

Just at the point when Ray Milland had become a distant memory—like that Ellen Drew movie, night Plane from Chungking, you saw back in 1943—the handsome actor came back into her life. To Jane's surprise, she was told that her upcoming film with Mil-land would be a remake of The awful Truth. Adapted from a Broadway comedy, it had already been filmed three times, as silent movies in 1924 and 1929, and—in its most successful version, in 1937, starring Irene Dunne and Cary Grant.

Teamed with Milland for the first time since The lost weekend, Jane got star billing over him. Milland's career was in steep decline, but Jane was at her peak. The tired old script was given fresh, modern overtones. let's do it again was the story of a composer's wife (played by Jane) who tries to make her husband jealous. Her plan backfires and catalyzes her divorce from Milland.

Directed by Alexander Hall, let's do it again was produced by Oscar Saul, who had barged into Harry Cohn's office at Columbia saying, "Just think, Harry, we've got two Oscar winners, Wyman and Milland, in a picture together once again."

"Big fucking deal!" Cohn said. "I won't get excited until I see the box office receipts."

After greeting Hall and Saul on the set, Jane braced herself for a reunion with Mil-land in her dressing room, where she had already changed her outfit and adjusted her makeup three times. When he came in to greet her, she was taken aback. He had aged considerably, blaming his increasing loss of hair on the branding irons used to curl his locks when he'd co-starred in Reap the wild wind (1942) with John Wayne and Paulette Goddard.

As before, as he had back in 1944, he flirted with her. "Shall we take the advice in the title of our movie and do it again?" he asked.

"I think not," she said, politely, kissing him on the lips. "I prefer to keep the old memory intact."

As for Aldo Ray, the second male lead of let's do it again, Jane didn't give in to him, but he relentlessly pursued her anyway, making propositions in his "gargle voice." She remembered him as "very masculine, a bit rough around the edges but kind of sexy."

Ray had been a Navy frogman and had played football in college. He had a sizable endowment and had posed nude in a widely circulated underground photograph.

As he confessed, "I dropped trou for George Cukor, who helped me in my career." Ray also climbed the lavender ladder when he was cast with Spencer Tracy in Pat and Mike (1952). That movie also featured a particularly macho performance from Tracy's platonic friend, Katharine Hepburn.

After his performance with Jane, Ray fell into the arms of Rita Hayworth when they co-starred in Miss Sadie Thompson (1953).

Jane later recalled, "Every woman needs an Aldo Ray in her life, but never for more than six weeks. And then he has to go."

Let's do it again grossed $1.25 million at the box office. It was widely promoted with the advertising slogan, "Go Girl, Go!" That is what Jane did, letting loose in the role, even doing a wicked mambo, which was all the dance rage that year, and performing in such sultry song and dance numbers as "I'm Takin' a Slow Burn Over a Fast Man." Her performance brought out her farcical side, and her acting was compared favorably to that of Irene Dunne's in the film's 1937 predecessor. As for Milland's "serviceable" performance, critics pointed out that "He is no Cary Grant."

While Jane was still filming let's do it again, representatives from Warners arrived to ask her to pose for advance publicity photographs for her upcoming film, So Big (1953). Her two male co-stars, Sterling Hayden and Steve Forrest, had already been announced, as had its director, Robert Wise. Of course, Wise's two greatest triumphs lay in his future—west Side Story (1961) and The Sound of Music (1965).

The "soaper/saga," a novel written by Edna Ferber, was reaching the screen for the third time. As a silent, it had starred Colleen Moore, Nancy Davis' close friend. Jane's own friend, Barbara Stanwyck, had made it into a talkie in a 1932 version.

One night at dinner, after Jane announced to Stanwyck that she'd signed to reprise her role as the noble, valiant woman toiling in the soil, the diva stormed out of the room. She went two weeks before speaking to Jane again. "Sorry, Jane, but I get pissed off when I hear that another actress is reprising a role for which I've given my original interpretation."

When Jane called Paulette Goddard to tell her about her next two leading men, Goddard was excited. "My God, you're getting two of the handsomest, most masculine, hot, horny, and hung actors in Hollywood—all the girls say so. Steve, you know, is the brother of Dana Andrews, and all of us have had him, at least those of us who got him when he was sober. Forrest, during the war, fought in the Battle of the Bulge against the Nazis in their last big drive into the West. I hear that the Battle of the Bulge was named after Steve."

"Since Steve plays my son in the film—a kid I've named So Big—would that be committing incest?" Jane facetiously asked.

"Follow the advice of your latest movie ad," Goddard said. "Go, Girl, Go!"

The Literary Voice of the Great American Plain: Edna Ferber.

Both Goddard and June Allyson constantly advised Jane to play around. “It actually saves a marriage and keeps it from getting boring,” Goddard claimed.

At the time, Jane was indulging in what she called “the revenge fuck.” In 1952, although she had entered into the first of what would be two separate marriages to band-leader Fred Karger, she had heard rumors that he was still slipping around for trysts with his former girlfriend, Marilyn Monroe, who had also wanted to marry him.

When Hayden posed with Jane for the ads for So Big, she was immediately attracted to him.

In the early 1940s, during his marriage to blonde goddess Madeleine Carroll, Hayden had been billed as “the Beautiful Viking God.” He was known for seducing his leading ladies—Anne Baxter in Blaze of noon (1947); Dorothy Lamour in Manhandled (1949), and Marilyn Monroe in The asphalt Jungle (1950). Apparently, he managed to elude Bette Davis when they’d appeared together in The Star (1952).

Vintage Americana: Abandoning all vestiges of glamor, Jane portrays a pioneer woman sod-busting with her husband (Sterling Hayden) and raising a son in So Big.

After Jane posed for publicity photographs with Hayden, she told Wise, “Sterling, without a doubt, belongs among the gods of Valhalla. What a man! What a god! After being with him, how can I go home at night to Fred [Karger] and be satisfied?”

Steve Forrest was “another blonde god” [Jane’s words] but completely different in personality. He was a tall Texan, born to a Baptist minister in a family of thirteen, one member of which included his older brother, Dana Andrews. Enlisting in the Army at age eighteen, he’d returned to America and benefitted from the G.I. Bill, eventu ally receiving his Bachelor’s degree, with honors, from UCLA. He’d majored in theater and soon was working at the La Jolla Playhouse outside San Diego, where Gregory Peck discovered him and arranged for a screen test at MGM, which led to a contract.

Jane flew to New York to see Steve Forrest perform on Broadway in the aptly named The Body Beautiful.

Jane and he sometimes went nightclubbing together. One night at a tavern north of Santa Monica, they sang a duet together, the quality of which benefitted from his status as a trained vocalist.

She raved about him so much to June Allyson, that she, too, "sampled the wares" [allyson's words] when they starred together on TV in The duPont Show with June allyson, a series that was launched in 1959. Although Forrest had married Christine Carilas in 1948 and would still be married to her at the time of his death in 2013, he still played around.

In a moment of intimacy, Jane Wyman shows her screen husband, Sterling Hayden, a new outfit for their son, who is becoming "So Big."

"Women found him irresistible," Jane claimed, "beginning with a seduction of Lana Turner when he'd appeared in her 1952 picture, The Bad and the Beautiful."

As an actor trying to make it in Hollywood, Forrest was rumored to have "put out" for Reagan's friend, Robert Taylor, when they co-starred together in Rogue Cop in 1954. That same year, he was second billed to Reagan in Prisoner of war as one of the incarcerated G.I.s tortured by the North Koreans.

Jane is depicted with her “son” in the movie, So Big.

Once again, as in The Yearling, she played a frontier woman who bravely ekes out a living in an often cruel climate, triumphing against powerful odds.

When Jane saw the publicity photographs in which she’d posed with Hayden for So Big, she was enraged. She personally called Jack Warner to denounce them. “This is a tender story of Selina and her love for her son, her dreams that sustained her through years of rugged farm toil.”

“Sex sells, Janie,” the mogul answered. “Now I’ve got to go. Joan Crawford’s on the phone.”

She later denounced the ads as the “work of a pack of vulgarians.” The ads depicted her being grasped by a lustful, brutish Hayden. The copy read:

HE STOOD THERE SO BIG—LOVE HAD COME. INTENSE. UNASHAMED.

For the rest of his life, Hayden would be kidded about those ads. Gossipy Hollywood already knew about his endowment, the size of which was almost legendary.

Literary fans of Edna Ferber protested the advertising, but it nonetheless succeeded in herd ing TV-crazed audiences of the 1950s into movie houses. Instead of listening to Jane’s protests, Warner approved an equivalent ad with equivalently lurid photos, this one with the headline:

SHE WAS READY TO FORGET SHE’D EVER BEEN A LADY.

As a married woman, Jane felt it was her duty to move Karger out of that little bungalow he shared with his mother and daughter, Anne and Terry. “I don’t trust grown-up men who still live with their mothers. Don’t tell me you’re another Clifton Webb who even attends parties with his mother?”

“You know I’m not that type,” he answered. “Webb can’t make you scream in ecstasy at night.”

She found a home for them on Beverly Glen Boulevard, with small, separate bedrooms for Maureen, Michael, and Terry. Anne was left alone in her bungalow. Jane’s living room was big enough to accommodate his two pianos and her one piano.

From the first, she found that their career demands often had them living in separate worlds. Sometimes, as he was staggering in from a late night gig, she was leaving to report to make-up on a film set.

When she wed Karger, whereas Jane was at the peak of her earning power, he drew a modest weekly wage and often picked up one or two hundred dollars for a gig at night. Nearly all of his money went either for alimony payments to his first wife or for the upkeep of his daughter, Terry, or to his mother, Anne.

Joan Blondell said, “Freddie in essence is a kept boy. That is not unusual in Hollywood. Many big stars like Jane support their husbands or else pay the bills of their boyfriends.”

Karger enjoyed living in his new wife’s luxurious world with two or three servants, including a nanny to look after their children when they were home and not away at boarding schools. On weekends, he liked to be served breakfast in bed.

After three weeks of married life with Karger, Jane got a call from June Allyson. “How’s married life, kid?”

“Freddie is a man of intellect, talent, and sophistication,” Jane said. “Except for the conflicts in our working schedules, I have only one complaint about him in the bedroom.”

“Don’t tell me he’s the type of guy you have to ask, ‘Is it in now?’”

“Quite the contrary,” Jane said. “You have to warn him not to put in those final inches or he’ll split me open. No, it’s not that. He has this habit of spending thirty minutes every morning deciding on which pair of underwear he wants. I don’t know why it matters, unless he’s modeling his drawers for someone.”

“Unlike my life with Ronnie, Freddie just can’t get enough,” Jane claimed to Allyson. “Sometimes he wakes me up in the middle of the night ready and raring to go. After all, I did get to know him on my aptly named film, let’s do it again.”

“Oh, if that were only true with Richard and me.” She was referring, of course, to her husband, Dick Powell.

Modern Screen wrote, “Fred Karger might have had a better chance if he’d married Sarah Jane Fulks and not the great movie star, Jane Wyman. But Sarah Jane disappeared a long time ago. Wyman is said to boss him around, and Karger, from all reports, is imbued with a manly pride and not used to taking orders from a woman. Also, he wants to become a bigtime musician like Harry James, and he resents it terribly when the press refers to him as Mr. Jane Wyman.”

In less than a month of marriage, Jane began to find flaws in her husband’s character. She admitted to Joan Blondell, “When he’s drunk, he’s dangerous to be around. When he found out I’d had a fling with Bing Crosby, he became violent and started breaking things in the living room. I explain my thing with Bing was before I met him, but that didn’t cool him off. I think he’s jealous because Bing, as a musician, is wildly successful and Freddie is still struggling.”

“As you know, I like to paint on Sunday afternoon. I had seven of my paintings decorating the walls of our living room. He was so mad, he broke a bottle of Scotch and slashed my art work.”

“Even when sober, he has a violent temper,” Jane told Blondell. “We attended this premiere. Some stupid fan called out to me, ‘Jane, who’s the guy with you? Is he important?’ That really pissed off Freddie. I had to restrain him or else he’d have slugged that fan.”

The most shocking revelation she learned about Karger was that he had a bad heart condition similar to that of his father, Maxwell, a condition so serious it had led to the producer’s early death.

“Up to then, I thought my husband was a stallion,” Jane said. “Now I know differently. He seems to go day and night, a fulltime job at Columbia and all those late night gigs with his band. He’s tired, overworked, completely exhausted, which makes him irritable.”

In March of 1953, he endured a mild heart attack. “We had him rushed to the hospital in an ambulance,” Jane told Allyson. “The doctor warned me he had to cut back on his schedule and give up smoking those three packages of cigarettes a day. I’m urging him to give up the band, too. I didn’t tell him that I’m often embarrassed to go to a Hollywood party to find Freddie and his band working as the hired hands for the night.”

A big blowup in their marriage occurred right before Christmas of 1953. Jane was late arriving home, and Karger and the children were collectively decorating the living room and the Christmas tree. When young Michael was left alone in the living room, the boy began lighting candles. He accidentally set fire to the decorations on Jane’s antique dining table, which was covered in heirloom lace.

A fire broke out and blazed out of control The fire department was summoned as it spread. When Jane got home, she was shocked to find her living room soaking in water, the ceilings blackened, and some of her valuable possessions destroyed.

She had such a fight with Karger that he moved out before Christmas Eve, spending two weeks in a suite at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Reportedly, Marilyn Monroe, in the aftermath of one of her frequent tiffs with DiMaggio, moved in with Karger when the former baseball player, in a rage, flew to visit his relatives in San Francisco.

Finally, Jane admitted to Blondell, “I miss the sex. I’m going over to the hotel to make up with Freddie and ask him to come home. The living room has been redone.”

After a year of marriage, Jane told Blondell, “I think I had a Hasty Heart rushing into marriage to Freddie.”

Her words were a reference, of course, to Reagan’s movie, The Hasty Heart.

Jane received a call from director Douglas Sirk, informing her that Universal had decided to remake that tearjerker, Magnificent obsession, based on Lloyd C. Douglas’s bestselling novel, originally published in 1929.

Its plot had previously been adapted into a film in 1935, starring Robert Taylor and Jane’s friend, Irene Dunne, in the lead roles. The script had originally been offered to Jane's other Catholic friend, Loretta Young, but she had rejected it. "Irene is my best friend. I don't want to remake the picture in which she was so glorious," Young said.

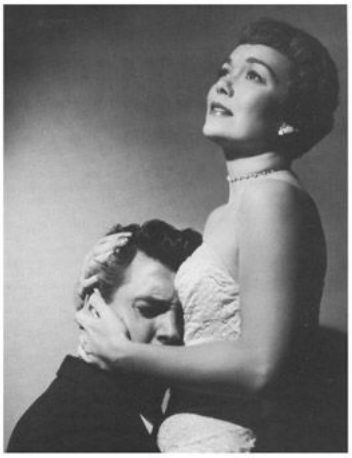
Jane's career in the mid-1950s was slipping, and Universal executives decided to give her a boost in this seminal soap. Executive Ed Muhl also insisted that "America's new heartthrob," Rock Hudson, be cast as the male lead. "The original Magnificent obsession made a big star out of Robert Taylor. I think the remake can do the same for Rock. Maybe lightning will strike twice."

Jane had rehearsed how to be a deaf mute before shooting Johnny Belinda. A month before the filming began, on Magnificent obsession, she studied how blind people react. "They just don't go around careening into the furniture and tripping over themselves," she said. The character she plays is blind throughout part of the movie.



Based on the directives of Jack Warner, the ads that promoted the tender love story portrayed by Jane Wyman and Rock Hudson were sensationalist and lurid.

Posters screamed: "A Story Of Love That Will Become One Of The Deepest Emotional Thrills Of Your Lifetime!", and "This was the moment unashamed, when this man and this woman felt the first ecstasy of their Magnificent obsession!"

Two days before shooting, Rock had taken an inner tube to ride the waves at Santa Monica beach. Soon, he was drifting way out to sea, where he rode the crest of a wave back toward the shoreline. Before he reached it, the crashing surf landed him on the beach with a broken collarbone.

Fearing that he'd jeopardize his big chance, he refused to let doctors put a cast on him, although he was warned that the bone would not heal properly and that he might feel pain for the rest of his life.

On the first day of shooting, Jane sensed that something was wrong with him when they came into body contact during rehearsals for a scene together. She went with him to his dressing room, where he confessed that his collar bone was broken. She promised not to tell anyone and to be careful in her love scenes with him.

Rock, born in Winnetka, Illinois, in 1925, was considerably younger than Jane. He stood 6'5" and towered over her. He was not only tall, but exceedingly handsome, wavy haired, and solidly built, a former Navy man who had become a Hollywood beefcake pinup, thrilling millions of teenage girls and gay men of all ages.

Jane was very patient with Hudson, even when some of their scenes had to be reshot thirty or even forty times.

On the set, producer Ross Hunter huddled with Sirk and Jane, telling both of them, "I want this to be a three-hanky movie. I like to give the public what it wants—a chance to dream, to live vicariously, to see beautiful women, jewels, gorgeous clothes, and to experience melodrama."

Hunter told Jane, "I'm the world's champion crier. That's why I'm so good at producing junk like our movie. Call me the 'Sultan of Soap Operas.' Even though I find it repulsive, I hawk heterosexual romance. In fact, I worship at its altar because it makes big bucks for me."

Hunter had served in Army Intelligence during World War II. Later, this gay man became a theatrical producer and director, known for light films starring Doris Day, Lana Turner, Debbie Reynolds (the Tammy movies) and later, Julie Andrews.

A Dane, Sirk had been one of Germany's leading stage directors before the war, later working for UFA studios. He was credited with making a star of Zarah Leander in Nazi cinema. Because his second wife, Hilda Jary, was Jewish, he said, "goodbye to Adolf" (his words), leaving Germany in 1937. By 1942, he was making anti-Nazi films in Hollywood.

Hudson later told Sara Davidson, who was working with him on his autobiography, "Doug would lock his office door, have the secretary hold his calls, and come after me on his knees. It was enough to keep him hooked and eager to help my career."

In Magnificent obsession, Rock was cast as a spoiled playboy, Bob Merrick. He has an accident in his speedboat, and his rescuers send for the only resuscitator in the area. Regrettably, Jane, cast as Helen Phillips, discovers her husband as he suffers a heart attack and dies. He, too, needed that resuscitator, the assumption being that if its life-saving powers hadn't been squandered on the character played by Rock, Jane's husband would have lived.

Jane's Helen refuses to accept Bob's generous offers and apologies. When he tries to pursue her by jumping inside her car, she escapes onto the street, where she is hit by an oncoming car and, as a result, becomes blind.

From then on, heartstrings are pulled. Along the way, Merrick discovers his spirituality, learning about the "magnificent obsession of helping others without making them aware of it. As only a Ross Hunter movie would dare, he even becomes a brain surgeon, not only saving Helen's life, but restoring her sight. After a long struggle and endless resistance, she falls in love with him, leading to an improbable but happy ending.

On the set, Jane was reunited with her friend, Agnes Moorehead, who had starred with her in The Blue veil. In Magnificent obsession, she played the role of Jane's trusted friend, Nancy Ashford.

It was during the filming that Agnes Moorehead's friend, the outrageously campy Paul Lynde, came on the set.

When Moorehead was called away, he told Jane, "The whole world knows Agnes is a lesbian—I mean classy as hell, but one of the all-time Hollywood dykes."

"I can play them all," Moorehead told Jane. "Bring 'em on. Domineering mothers, comical secretaries, neurotic spinsters, puritanical matrons."

Barbara Rush, a beautiful young actress, was cast as Joyce Phillips, Jane's stepdaughter in the film. Married to actor Jeffrey Hunter, she would appear opposite such stars as Marlon Brando, Paul Newman, Richard Burton, James Mason, Frank Sinatra, and Kirk Douglas during her movie career. She affectionately called Ross Hunter "Uncle Mame."

One of the supporting players, Otto Kruger, had been a matinee idol in the 1930s, later cast as suave villains or shady fellows. He'd appeared in films starring everyone from Barbara Stanwyck to Grace Kelly.

Mae Clarke, born Violet Mary Kootz in Philadelphia, had a small supporting role. Her career had peaked in 1931 when she played Frankenstein's bride and was chased by Boris Karloff in Frankenstein. That same year, James Cagney in The Public enemy smashed a grapefruit in her face at the breakfast table.

Hudson's romantic life was growing more and more complicated. One night, Ross Hunter invited him to Chasen's for dinner. "As Hudson entered the room, all the eyes, even the jaded ones attuned to male beauty, cast their gaze upon him," Hunter said.

He later told a jealous Sirk, "Rock was especially stunning that night. After two bottles of champagne, I told him that I wanted to spend the weekend with him in Palm Springs. It was even bigger than I had imagined."

"By the end of that weekend, I told him, 'I love you, Rock!'"

"Even with a broken collar bone, I was really put on the casting couch—first with Sirk, and, to top it off, now Hunter." Rock said. "I was getting a real workout."

Rock confided his being a victim on the casting couch to his friend and fellow gay actor, Roddy McDowall.

"Jane was always gracious and put me at ease in front of the camera," Hudson said. "I was nervous and didn't want to fuck up this big picture. It was my first real break. I think I brought out the mother instinct in her. Things got out of hand one night, though. What shall I call it? Mother love, perhaps? You get my drift."

"It's not that I had not had intimate contact with a woman before. In my day, I've delivered a few mercy fucks, notably with Joan Crawford at her house. Or a weekend with Tallulah Bankhead in Las Vegas. Those mercy fucks extended to fading matinee idols like Errol Flynn and Tyrone Power. I didn't mean for it to happen with Jane. I respected her too much. I think she turned to me when she heard Fred Karger was back, banging Marilyn Monroe."

When the film was released, it made ten times as much money as the original Taylor/Dunne version—in other words, it was a major hit.

Hudson got the worst reviews. Critic Doug McClelland called him, "comic strip handsome, thrashing about with no special distinction, his scenes lined up with all the depth and subtlety of great colored blocks."

The new York Times appraised Jane: "In appealing contrast to Miss Dunne's pristine languor, Miss Wyman is, as usual, refreshingly believable throughout."

Magnificent obsession was a big hit, earning $5 million for the studio. Thousands of letters poured into Universal, citing Hudson's stunning male beauty—"and those soulful eyes."

A star was born.

Magnificent obsession brought Jane another Oscar nomination. But that was the year (1955) that Grace Kelly won the Best Actress Award for The Country Girl.

Escorted by Fred Karger, Jane had flown to New York to promote Magnificent obsession. A suite was reserved for them at the Waldorf Astoria. Rock Hudson flew in the following day and paid an early afternoon visit to their suite. It was made clear that Rock and Karger would work out together at a health club on Manhattan's Upper East Side, and that Jane would spend part of the afternoon having her hair styled in advance of their gala event that evening. All of them agreed to return to Jane and Karger's suite later that afternoon, allowing time to dress in formal wear for that evening's gala event.

After some additional chitchat, Jane departed for her appointment with the hair-dresser. Twenty minutes after leaving the Waldorf, she realized she'd left a diamond bracelet—one of her most expensive pieces of jewelry—on a tabletop back at the Waldorf. She hurried back to the suite, fearing that a member of the housekeeping staff might steal it.

She entered the suite believing that she it was empty. Suddenly, she heard noises from the bedroom. When she opened the door, she found Karger and Rock engaged together in lovemaking. Karger was on the bottom, and he was the first to see her. "Oh, my God, Rock. It's Jane."

She grabbed her diamond bracelet and walked quickly toward the exit, leaving the men alone together. She didn't know what happened between them after that.

When she returned to the suite later that afternoon, she found Karger alone. He was already dressed in his tuxedo for the premiere. Rock, apparently, had left.

She said nothing. It was Karger who spoke first: "You've got to understand, honey. Both Hunter and Sirk told me that Rock is going to become the biggest star in Hollywood in just a year or so. I had to give in to him. He came on strong. With him headed for super stardom, he could get me assigned as musical director on all his films. I was doing it for career advancement…for us, darling."

Presumably, she assumed her most convincing mask of sophistication and tolerance. "It's okay, darling," she said. "Rock is very seductive. I, of all people, know that."

"You mean…?" He looked flabbergasted.

"I mean just that, my husband," she answered. "I had him before you. We'll have to ask him which of us he prefers."

"I can't believe this is happening," he said.

"I'm flying back to California alone," she said. "I hope you'll understand. Now let me get dressed so we can put on our best smiles as Mr. and Mrs. Jane wyman on the red carpet."

The months ahead were rough on the marriage. Jane called it "marriage on the rocks." Karger was gone nearly every night of the week. On some of those occasions, he was appearing with his band. But she suspected many of those nights were spent at Rock's home.

Karger and Jane began a slow drift apart. Hedda Hopper and Louella Parsons were soon made aware of their marital troubles.

That summer, Jane revealed to Parsons, "There will be no reconciliation. I have decided that things aren't working out between us."

"There's no hope?" Parsons asked.

"None."

"When Parsons contacted Karger, he told the gossipy columnist, "Let Jane speak for the both of us. It's her decision."

Hopper one morning led her syndicated column with the headline WYMAN/KARGER MARRIAGE ON THE ROCKS. She had learned that Karger had gone back to living with his mother, Anne, and his daughter, Terry.

Five weeks later, Parsons spoke to Jane and had a long talk with her. "I told Jane that both of them were equally to blame. I also said that I knew they had problems, but they were not important ones. I convinced her to take him back."

In a week, Karger was sleeping in Jane's bed again, and both Hopper and Parsons were writing about their reconciliation.

It is not known who, but some gossipy "friend" of Jane's reported an incident he'd learned. According to the revelation, Karger had spent a long weekend in Palm Springs, occupying a hotel suite with both Tyrone Power and Marilyn Monroe.

Jane might have overlooked his dalliance with Rock, but bringing Marilyn back into his life was too much. She could tolerate a liaison between him and Power, but not with Marilyn, or so she told Joan Blondell.

On November 10, 1954, she filed for divorce, charging mental cruelty. Her papers came through on December 7.

The day before that, she was received into the Roman Catholic faith, which, of course, frowns on divorce.

Blondell later said, "Many stars in Hollywood, though loyal Catholics in their spiritual hearts, don't always adhere to the church's rigid teachings. The Pope is so un-bending, only the most devout can follow his dictates. The church's sense of morality is too rigid for a mere human being with needs and desires. Life is about having fun. It's so damn short."

With movie roles drying up, Jane, in 1955, became the host of Jane wyman Presents the Fireside Theater, her gig lasting for three years.

"I was following Ronnie by appearing on the little black-and-white box," she told friends.

Fireside Theater was an anthology drama series that ran on NBC from 1949 to 1958, becoming the first successful series on American television. Shooting schedules were short and budgets skimpy, but the public loved it, even though most critics panned the telecasts. For most of its run, Fireside Theater was among the top ten most popular shows on television.

Both Frank Wisbar and Gene Raymond predated Jane as host, but she became the most successful because of her famous name, winning the most viewers.

It wasn't that she was not getting any film roles. Offers were for movies she didn't want to make, including Friendly Persuasion (1956) with Gary Cooper, a role that went to Dorothy McGuire. She praised the great latitude she had working in television during her tenure. She also agreed to star in fourteen of the series' episodes, eventually appearing with Joseph Cotten, Paul Henried, and Linda Darnell. One of them was Holiday in autumn (1955), wherein she co-starred with Fay Wray of King Kong fame. She also worked with actors she knew from earlier periods of her career, including Jack Carson and Dane Clark, even her former lover, Peter Lawford.

When she left the series, it would not be Jane's last venture into TV drama. "Bigger and better things—and a lot more money—were my distant horizon," she recalled much later.

Returning to the big screen, Jane starred in "a woman's picture," lucy Gallant, for producers William H. Pine and William C. Thomas. It was set for release in 1955.

For the first time, she'd be working with the strikingly handsome, muscular, 6'3", square-jawed actor, Charlton Heston. On being introduced to her, Heston startled her with his opening line.

"Did you know that Ronald Reagan and I have something in common?" he asked her.

"And what might that be?" she asked.

"We both posed nude for sculpture classes," he said.

[NOTE: whereas Reagan retained his "bloomers" during those modeling sessions, Heston, by all accounts, did not.]

The film's director, Georgia-born Robert Parrish, was a former child star. He was also a screenwriter and editor, having won an Oscar for the film, Body and Soul in 1947. As an actor, he'd appeared with her former lover, Lew Ayres, in the 1930 all Quiet on the western Front.

Jane was supported by two talented actresses, Claire Trevor, cast as Lady Mac (short for MacBeth), and Thelma Ritter as Molly. "Any time Trevor or Ritter appeared on camera, you can be assured they'll steal the scene," Jane said to Parrish.

On the first read through of John Lee Mahin's film script, based on the Margaret Cousins novel, Jane found out just how disappointed Heston was to be co-starring with her. "This movie is nothing but trashy soap opera," he said.

Off screen, Charlton Heston was cynical about his role in lucy Gallant, telling Jane:

"It's basically your show, with me wandering in and out for stud duty," Heston said. "I'm contracted to make this buzzard for one reason. Dollar bills!"

Jane didn't know what Heston was getting, but she was drawing $163,000 for ten weeks' work.

"When I heard you were my leading lady, I thought it was one of those May-December romances," he told her. I mean, you're thirty-seven, but I'm only thirty, although I look twenty-five."

After that put-down, she struck back. "Perhaps you're right. I see you're still carrying around your baby fat in that pudgy ass of yours. Better take it off, Chuck."

Although insulted, he took her advice and slimmed down for all of his next pictures, many of which had him half nude.

Haute mode: Jane, prepping for lucy Gallant's fashion promenade with designer Edith Head.

"Edith was a lesbian," Jane claimed. "She always managed to cop a feel when fitting me for one of my gowns."

During the shoot, she found him, "cold and distant," and he obviously did not like working with her in this story of marriage vs. career, the saga of a dress designer who sets up shop in a hick Texas oiltown where women, for the most part, are attired in calico and gingham.

Into her life comes Casey Cole (Heston), a lanky local rancher, who falls in love with her. Their love scenes were unconvincing. At one point, Heston joins the Army, but upon his return, he becomes an oil tycoon. Lucy's shop burns to the ground, and she faces a perennial question: Stay on and build a bigger store, or retreat into a marriage? Feminists hated her final choice.

Ritter's advice was "Having a man is better than ending up a rich old maid with a monogrammed water bottle."

The highlight of the movie was a spectacular fashion show. The film's costume designer, Edith Head, actually makes a rare appearance on camera. So did Alan Shiver, the actual then-governor of Texas, who introduces the fashion show.

Paramount publicity ran a promotional ad that both Heston and Jane found vulgar:

HE'S COLD—SHE'S HOT—SHE WARMS HIM UP.

Another copywriter got carried away, defining the movie as:

A STORY WITH THE FORCE AND POWER OF AN EXPLOSIVE GUSHER.

At the end of the shoot, Heston said, perhaps falsely, that "Jane's a lot of fun, down-to-earth, and unaffected."

When asked what she thought of working with Heston, Jane uttered: "No comment!" and walked away.

Bosley Crowther of The new York Times wrote: "Some of it catches sudden flashes and briefly revealing glints of the crudities and vulgarities of the Texas nouveaux riche. The ostentation of such things as lavish spending and going to backyard barbecues in evening gowns is subtly satirized."

The film, lucy Gallant, limped into theaters across the country, soon disappearing with a broken leg and quickly forgotten.

The teaming of Jane Wyman and Rock Hudson was so successful in Magnificent obsession that Universal decided to unite them again as a romantic couple in all That Heaven allows (1955).

The Rock Hudson she'd worked with on Magnificent obsession (1954) was not the same actor she had encountered on the set of all That Heaven allows (1955).

He had, during the interval between these films, become a big star. In the fan magazines, he and Marilyn Monroe were written about more than any other celebrities. Fan clubs had sprouted up in all the States.

Once again, the producer was Ross Hunter, who commissioned Peg Fenwick to write the screenplay based on a story by Edna L. Lee and Harry Lee.

It was the story of a May-September romance between a wealthy widow, as played by Jane, who lives in a small, suburban New England town with two college age children. One day, an exceedingly handsome and virile young gardener arrives to prune her trees. He is Don Kirby (Hudson), an intelligent, down-to-earth passionate younger man who leads an idealistic, Thoreau-inspired, walden Pond-style life outside the gossipy, mean-spirited town. Gradually, the couple fall in love, despite the difference in their age and class.

Her children are horrified. Son Ned (William Reynolds) accuses his mother of besmirching her late husband's memory. Daughter Kay (Gloria Talbot) is equally unenthusiastic, fearing that her mother will disgrace the family. She prefers her to wed Harvey (Conrad Nagel), a longtime family friend. In real life, Nagel, born in 1897, had been a romantic leading man on the silent screen. Jane doesn't seem attracted in any way to this older man, who could conceivably have played her father. At the time of shooting, Jane was forty-one, Rock, 29, although he looked even younger.

Jane with Douglas Sirk, who had slept with her acting partner.

Jane knew that Sirk was a sometimes lover of Rock's and she felt she could discuss her embarrassment with him. She revealed that she'd walked into her suite at New York's Waldorf and had found Rock seducing Fred Karger.

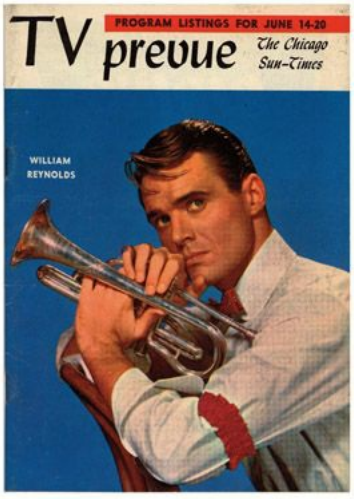
Jane, backstage, with Rock Hudson, who had slept with her husband.

"That is a problem," he said. "There will be love scenes between Rock and you."

"Don't worry, I'll pull them off regardless of how I feel about Rock's betrayal," she said. "I won't be the first actress in Hollywood who has faced this dilemma."

She decided she needed another hit, and she threw herself into this story of small town bigotry, prejudice, and narrow-mindedness.

On the set, at one of their first reunions since their embarrassment at the Waldorf, Hudson walked right over to her and kissed her on the cheek. "Great to be working with you again. Our last picture made me a biggie. People treat me different. Sometimes they just stare at me in awe. If I let out a fart after eating a bowl of chili, I get applause, like I've done something wonderful. It seems that everybody I meet thinks I can walk on water."



Cover boy William Reynolds, hailed as a "classic male beauty," played Jane's son in all That Heaven allows. Director Sirk told Jane, "I'd like to direct a love scene between 'Billy Boy' and Rock, but the world isn't ready for that...Yet!"

"I don't!" she said sharply.

"Oh, Janie, let's make this picture and forget about Freddie," Rock said. "He's trying to find himself. You must understand that in Hollywood, these things happen more than you would know."

For the sake of the picture, she told him she'd cooperate with him.

He said he'd been tapped by George Stevens to appear in his upcoming film Giant (1956), based on the Edna Ferber novel. His co-stars would be James Dean and Elizabeth Taylor. He claimed that both Alan Ladd and William Holden had wanted the lead role in Giant, but both had been rejected.

"Maybe you'll bed both of them, too," she said, sarcastically.

"Actually, that's what I plan to do," he said.

During the course of the day, he told her that his gay agent, Henry Willson, was forcing him into a lavender marriage with his secretary, Phyllis Gates, who was a lesbian. "I hate the idea of getting married, but too many of the fan magazines are running stories headlined: WHY ISN'T ROCK MARRIED?"

Within the first week, Jane was either introduced or else renewed her acquaintance with the rest of the cast, particularly Agnes Moorehead, who had previously starred with Rock and herself in Magnificent obsession.

When Jane filmed a scene with Reynolds playing her character's son, in reference to the character played by Hudson, he tells her, "All you see is a good-looking set of muscles."

Ironically, that is what Rock saw and appreciated when he was introduced to Reynolds.

[Many film critics have hailed Reynolds—who was native to los angeles and of norwegian ancestry—as the most stunning of the so-called "pretty boys" of the 1950s, others of whom included Robert wagner, Tony Curtis, and Tab Hunter.]

Sirk told Jane that he felt "Rock will go for this hunk big time. Billy boy is just his type. The question is, will Reynolds swing in Rock's direction?"

It is not known if Rock ever made a pass at Reynolds, as he so often did with handsome young men who worked with him on his films, once falling in love with a cameraman.

Reynolds had married Molly Sinclair in 1950 and remained wed to her until the time of her death in 1992.

The only published source attesting that Rock and Reynolds might have been lovers was a 2004 biography, Rock Hudson, by the prolific writer, David Bret. But there is no other confirmation, and the claim could have been just speculation.

During the filming of all That Heaven allows, as Jane moved deeper and deeper into her on-screen romance, the script rekindled sad memories of how the gossips of Hollywood had destroyed her own engagement to Travis Kleefeld, a young man she'd loved at the time. As an actress, she was drawing on that experience as a means of bringing the character of the affluent older widow in love with a younger man to the screen.

When reporters came to the set, Jane put up a brave front: She said, "After working with Rock Hudson the second time around, I'd say that he's got to be the biggest thing to hit the industry."

After Sirk read that that comment in the papers, he said to her, "Rock's got the biggest thing all right."

"Oh, you size queens," Jane responded, dismissing him.

During the filming, Jane bonded with Virginia Grey, who was her same age. Born in Los Angeles, Grey told Jane that Gloria Swanson had been her first babysitter. At the age of ten, Grey had made her film debut in the silent, Uncle Tom's Cabin (1927).

Jane, as well as most of Hollywood, knew of Grey's long-enduring affair with Clark Gable. She confided to Jane that she was heartbroken when he married Lady Sylvia Ashley in 1949. "He'd proposed to me months earlier," she said. "I'll never marry any other man if I can't have Clark. After all, once you've gone to bed with Clark Gable, no other man will do."

Virginia Grey: "It's Clark Gable or no one."

Unknown to Grey, Jane herself had long ago had an affair with Gable. Her appraisal of him as a lover was remarkably different from Grey's high evaluation.

The same year (1955) that Grey had worked with Jane, she'd also played a role in the film version of Tennessee Williams' The Rose Tattoo, working with the volatile and very temperamental Anna Magnani and the (calmer and more restrained) Burt Lancaster.

As Jane was leaving the studio late one afternoon, she ran into Karger, who was just arriving. At first, she thought he had come to see her, perhaps hoping for a reconciliation, although they had only recently divorced. He was courteous but distant, as she would later recall to Sirk, with whom she still confided.

It turned out that Karger was at Universal to retrieve Rock in advance of the plans they'd formulated for that evening. He explained it to Jane by claiming that Rock had hired his band as part of one of his upcoming outdoor parties.

That was the last time she saw Karger on the lot. However, Sirk and others told her that after that, Karger made it a point to wait for him across the street from the entrance to Universal. He was parked there many afternoons around the time when shooting had ended for Rock that day.

As Jane told Sirk, "Fred is obviously not playing for Rock every night of the week. Or perhaps he is, so to speak."

Don't worry," Sirk said. "Their romance won't last long. Rock is very promiscuous. I get him once or twice a week. And he usually keeps three or four studs on call at all times. The thing with Fred will blow over soon enough."

"I don't know why I'm so concerned about it," she said. "After all, I divorced him."

Critics dismissed all That Heaven allows as another "soaper from Sirk." However, it scored so big at the box office that in the wake of its success, Universal wanted to cast Jane and Rock in a series of romantic comedies together.

Rock would go on to his biggest success in light, romantic comedies, but the female role would not go to Jane, but to Doris Day, as it did in Pillow Talk (1959), a mega-hit.

Years later, Jane lunched with Sirk. She asked, "What's a damsel like me to do? I lost my husband to Rock, but his thing with Fred is over by now. Alas, those romantic comedies featured Doris Day instead of me."

"Well, why don't you chase after Fred and remarry him?"

"That's about the dumbest idea I ever heard," she said. "You can take that idea and shove it where the sun don't shine. I'll never remarry that jerk. NEVER!"

"Jane, my darling, You're protesting too much."

When all That Heaven allows was initially released, and dismissed as "a woman's weepie," Sirk said, "There is a short distance between high art and trash, and trash that contains an element of craziness is by this very quality nearer to art."

In the 21st Century, many film historians are inclined to agree with Sirk's assessment. all That Heaven allows has won praise from such filmmakers as Rainer Werner Fassbinder and Quentin Tarantino.

In 1995, the United States' National Film Registry added it to their list of films that it defined as "culturally, historically, or aesthetically significant."

Film historians today cite the movie as a critique of the conformity-obsessed America of the Eisenhower era.

Jane had a reunion with Van Johnson on the set of their latest picture, Miracle in the Rain (1956). Whereas she had returned to Warners (at least for the filming of this movie), he had been let go from MGM, where, in the 1940s, he'd been billed nationwide as America's Sweetheart, along with his female counterpart, June Allyson. In 1945, he had tied with Bing Crosby as America's top box office star.

Johnson poured out his frustrations to her.

Jane's "Miracle" with Van Johnson.

Before the end of his contract with MGM, he had co-starred with Elizabeth Taylor in The last Time i Saw Paris (1954). He'd also teamed with Gene Kelly as the sardonic second lead in Brigadoon, both pictures released in 1954.

He was still married to Evie Wynn, the former wife of Keenan Wynn, who had divorced her so that Johnson could marry her. As prompted by Louis B. Mayer, he had hoped that by doing so, he would squelch rumors about his homosexuality.

It wasn't just his declining career that troubled Johnson that particular day, but his loss of a role he coveted: He had wanted to play the Texas rancher, Bick Benedick, in the movie version of Edna Ferber's Giant, opposite Elizabeth Taylor and James Dean. But the coveted role had gone instead to Rock Hudson.

Jane tried to comfort him. "Rock stole that choice part from you, and he ran off with my husband, the sleep-around Fred Karger."

Perhaps with a bittersweet sense of irony, she told Johnson, "This is my last picture at Warner Brothers. I got my first screen credit here back in the 1930s—and now it's over. I don't expect Jack Warner to come out and say goodbye. He had another actor moving into Ronnie's dressing room before he had even finished packing. Things get gone and quickly forgotten around this joint."

The sappy plot of Miracle in the Rain by Ben Hecht had appeared in The Saturday evening Post back in 1943. Warners had invested $75,000 for the story back then, which at the time was considered a very high price. Hecht was a successful and highly visible screenwriter, known for such hits as His Girl Friday (1940), so he could command top dollar for his material. Yet for some reason, his Miracle had never been brought before a camera.

Before Jane's picture reached the big screen, Hecht's story had already been transformed into four separate productions for live television, in 1947, 1949, 1950, and 1953, respectively.

After reading the script, Warner said, "It's such a goddamn sad ending, it's bound to bring in an Oscar or two. After all, the soldier is killed and our meek little typist also dies in St. Patrick's Cathedral, clutching the G.I.'s talisman in her palm. You can't beat crap like that!"

In Manhattan's St. Patrick's Cathedral, Jane lights a candle in memory of her dearly departed after being comforted by a (very handsome) priest.

To her chagrin, she was later advised, "Movies about Catholic miracles have gone out of style."

Miracle's plot involved a young woman who falls in love with a soldier during World War II, Weeks later, he is killed overseas. The miracle arises when she gets up from her sickbed, even though she's seriously ill, and makes her way to St. Patrick's Cathedral. Miraculously, her dead lover appears again before her, giving her a lucky coin he had taken overseas with him, which later provides "proof" that he (i.e., his spirit) had really been there, and that she was not hallucinating.

Her friends felt that Jane's recent conversion to Roman Catholicism had influenced her acceptance of the role.

In Hecht's original story, Jane's character dies (presumably in a state of ecstasy) in St. Patrick's Cathedral. But Warner didn't want that to be made clear. In the wide screen version, the audience is left guessing: Did Jane's character die, or did she recover and go on with her life?

No longer flying high as Hollywood's Golden Boy, Johnson was nonetheless paid $150,000 for starring in the picture, Jane taking home $120,000.

Evocative of Reagan's departure from Warner Brothers, Jane's farewell was equally dismal. She called Jack Warner's office to tell him goodbye. She later said, "I didn't expect him to walk me to the gate. but he refused to take my call. So much for that. Hollywood has always been cruel on its aging dames. Perhaps Paramound will remake Gloria Swanson's Sunset Blvd. and cast me in the role of that aging screen diva, Norma Desmond."

At the gate, one man came out to greet her. An aging janitor, Hebnry Dolland, in his seventies, kissed her farewell. He'd remembered her when she was a Warners' chorus girl in the 1930s, and he told her he'd be retiring soon, too. "Not much to retire on, though."

"That's what we get for working for that tightwad, Jack Warner for all these years," she said, waving Dolland goodbye. It was her adieu to the studio that had employed her, sometimes traumatically, for such a long time.

Weeks after leaving Warners, Jane accused Jack Warner of sinking all his promotional budget into Giant, leaving Miracle in the Rain to open with relatively little advertising and almost no promotion. "It could have been a hit," she told Johnson. "It could have brought us Oscars. Instead, we were screened in front of empty houses."

The Academy ignored it at Oscar time. "At least I didn't catch pneumonia after having to act all those scenes in a god damn rain pour," Jane said.

The new York Herald Tribune joined dozens of other newspaper critics in lam-basting the movie. "Miss Wyman's typist is a glum portrait unrelieved by any sense of depth of character or humor. She is sad even when she realizes she is in love. There is hardly a change of expression when she learns of the death of her soldier boyfriend, played by Van Johnson. Miracle in the Rain is straight-faced and uncompromisingly dull."

Hecht came under fire for his "hankie grabber, which is not typical of this tough-talking former newshound." His Miracle was called "a tough lump of goo to swallow."

The new York Times was gentler in its condemnation, claiming, "Miracle in the Rain hits high, lovely notes on occasion, but too often lapses into soap opera."

The St. louis Post-dispatch labeled Miracle "a tearjerker that is as unabashed as any we've encountered."

“My future belongs on that little black box,” Jane said. “Maybe there’ll be a film role every now and then, no doubt playing a mother.”

Offers for big screen roles were few and far between. Those that came in were for what Jane called “monster pictures.” When she’d gone to a screening of what ever Happened to Baby Jane (1962), she was horrified, later claiming that “Bette Davis and Joan Crawford have disgraced themselves. They must have needed the money awfully bad.”

Journalist Vernon Scott wrote, “Fortunately, Jane is economically independent and can afford to sit on the sidelines rather than accept distasteful pictures.”

To Van Johnson, Jane said, “I refuse to play a dope addict, an aging prostitute, or, as I’ve told producers many times before, a lesbian. I turned down the role of a lesbian in walk on the wild Side (1962). It’s going to my friend, Barbara Stanwyck.”

“Takes one to play one,” Johnson said.

“Now Van, be kind,” she cautioned.

“Her former husband, His Lordship, Bob Taylor, once propositioned me at MGM,” Johnson claimed.

“That doesn’t surprise me at all,” she said. “I always suspected something was going on between Ronnie and Bob. All those weekends alone together in the wilderness.”

To cheer her up, Johnson invited Jane to a party he was hosting that Saturday night, promising her that there would be a surprise guest.

On the day of the event, she began dressing and working on her makeup at three that afternoon, arriving alone at the party at eight o’clock.

There were some thirty guests there, mostly male. After making the rounds and hearing endless compliments, Fred Karger emerged from Johnson’s bedroom dressed in his usual dark suit.

She was mildly shocked at seeing him again, because they had not contacted each other in months. He explained that he was staying temporarily with Johnson. “We’re roommates,” he said.

“Roommates?” She was skeptical. “Is that what they’re calling them this year?”

For part of the night, they talked about their less-than-bright careers and the problems generated by their children, Terry, Maureen, and Michael.

During the weeks ahead, she began to encounter Karger at other parties and, on occasion, when his band was hired for a gig. One night, she agreed to meet with him for dinner, and they began to see each other more regularly after that.

She later told Joan Blondell, “Our Catholic faith is bringing us together again. We spend a lot of time discussing Catholicism. I’ve been trying to lure Freddie back into the church again. We’re both at loose ends, not knowing where to go. The other night, when he brought me home, we kissed on my doorstep. I invited him in for a nightcap. He never left. It was wonderful having him make love to me again. I’m even considering re-marrying him.”

“Never a good idea,” Blondell warned. “If it didn’t work out the first time, chances are it won’t the second time on the merry-go-round either. I bet you’d face the same problems. And then there is the gay thing, hiding in the closet.”

“I can’t truly blame Freddie for turning elsewhere for that which I can’t give him,” Jane said.

The day Jane decided to remarry Karger, she phoned June Allyson to tell her the news. Unlike Blondell, Allyson seemed delighted. “I always thought Freddie was a living doll,” she said.

“And after all,” Jane continued. “He’s not the only man in Hollywood who has slept with both Rock Hudson and Marilyn Monroe—take the late, lamented James Dean, for example.”

Jane remarried Karger on March 11, 1961. Attending the ceremony were such dear friends as Allyson, Blondell, Paulette Goddard, Loretta Young, Irene Dunne, and Claudette Colbert. As Colbert later said to Jane, “What are we old bags to do now that movie roles are almost disappearing? I find that, unlike today, I attend more funerals than weddings.”

As Colbert had noted, it was a time for burying old friends and acquaintances. Reagan’s mother, Nelle, died in 1962, and Jane, accompanied by Karger, attended the funeral.

She offered her sympathies to Reagan, who looked grief stricken. “Welcome to the 1960s, Ronnie,” she said. “The Hollywood we used to know is Gone with the wind. I sure miss it. I know you’ll also miss Nelle something awful."

When she looked into his eyes, she saw the tears welling up. He said nothing.

"Nelle was such a good woman," Jane said, in parting. "They don't make them like her any more. She belonged to an America that is fast fading, and we belong to a Hollywood that is now making all these sick movies."

Maureen Reagan summed up her family situation at that time. "Mother was re-married to Fred Karger, and the two of them shared a small apartment in Beverly Hills. Dad and Nancy were living at the house in Pacific Palisades. Michael had moved in with them to finish up high school. Ron [i.e, Reagan, Jr.] was in kindergarten, and Patti was eleven years old and full of resentment for a twenty-two year old woman nicknamed 'Mermie" [i.e., Maureen herself] who sat next to her father on the sofa."

After remaining safely at home every night during the first three months of his re-marriage, Karger got an occasional gig, but not like he'd done in his heyday. Disco had come to Hollywood, and he was no longer in such demand. But sometimes, he didn't return home until three or four o'clock in the morning. She no longer asked where he'd been.

Throughout the course of most of her marriage to Karger, Jane managed to star in an occasional film or teleplay. But as her marriage entered its final months, she received no offers for either the big screen or for "the little black box," as she continued to call it.

She and Karger began to argue and fight a lot. He continued to have violent outbursts of temper.

They were also having problems with their children. Michael had dropped out of Arizona State University after only one semester. Like Reagan, she had cut him off financially.

Maureen was having marital problems. She'd wed John Filippone, a police officer, in 1961 but divorced him the following year. In 1964, she married David G. Sills, an attorney and Marine Corps officer. He moved her to San Clemente while he was stationed at Camp Pendleton, demanding that she abandon her acting ambitions. She later admitted, "I was a perfectly wretched housewife."

Out of boredom, she joined her father as a Republican volunteer during the 1964 presidential race of Barry Goldwater against Lyndon B. Johnson.

By 1967, she'd divorced Sills.

Long before that, however, Jane also faced the divorce judge.

Other than the usual charges aired before a divorce court, Jane never spoke about the reasons for the collapse of her second marriage to Karger. But two reasons have emerged over the years, mainly gleaned from friends like Blondell.

Karger had escorted Jane to the funeral of her friend, Dick Powell, who had died on January 3, 1963. Jane offered Allyson what sympathy she could, even though she knew that her friend had never been faithful to her actor/director husband. [Privately, Jane and many of her friends referred to allyson as "a nympho.]

Jane told Karger about Allyson's numerous affairs, including one with John F. Kennedy, who was later assassinated in November of the year of Powell's death.

"She sometimes seduces her leading men, including Peter Lawford," Jane claimed. "For years, Alan Ladd was the passion of her life, and later, Jimmy Stewart. She also has this thing for Dean Martin."

At first, Jane wasn't suspicious when June began to call Karger to "help me with some arrangements." She paid him $200 per consultation, and he told her, "It's about what I get for a gig."

A few times, when Karger returned home at four o'clock in the morning, Jane snapped sarcastically, "some gig." She told Blondell that she'd found lipstick on Karger's collar on more than one occasion.

Blondell said, "I'm not surprised. I've known that Allyson bitch for years, beginning in New York. She was known as 'Miss Hot to Trot.'"

What may have finally turned Jane off Karger was when he hired a twenty-two year old saxophone player, Terry Nelson, from Chicago, for his band.

Whenever Karger, with his band, went out of town on a gig, Nelson always roomed with him. In Los Angeles, Karger often spent long nights with the sexy young blonde, later informing Jane, "We had to rehearse some new numbers."

"I can imagine what those numbers were," she said. "Sixty-nine, for example."

Whenever she made accusations like that, he'd storm out the door, usually after breaking some objects.

She told Blondell, “I can’t go on with him. I’ve got to end it, sooner than later.”

One day, Nelson, through a family connection, arranged for Karger and his band to appear at a small club in his native Chicago. Bidding Jane goodbye, he and Nelson flew away.

Before the end of the gig, and before he’d flown back to Los Angeles with Nelson, Jane had moved out of their apartment. She left a brief note: “From now on, Buster, you pay the damn rent. Better yet, why not move in with Nelson? You’re practically living with him anyway.”

[Nelson outlived Karger, dying of AIDS in Chicago in 1984.]

In court on March 9, 1965, Karger charged Jane with desertion. Three weeks later, she countercharged, claiming “grievous mental cruelty.” She also revealed that she’d been the victim of “Karger’s uncontrollable temper.”

Reagan must have been dismayed when he picked up the papers that March. He had been approached by powerful monied interests to become the Republican candidate for Governor of California in the next election. His close friend, the song-and-dance man, George Murphy, had just been elected to the U.S. Senate from California.

Although the primary wasn’t until the spring of 1966, he would spend all of 1965 “gladhanding my way across the state.”

He was horrified when his name was brought up and his divorce from Jane spread all over newspapers in their rehash of her divorce from him. But Murphy told him not to worry about his status as a divorcé. “This isn’t fucking Alabama or Georgia in the Bible belt. This is California!”

After her (second) divorce from Karger was finalized, Jane told Blondell, “I guess I have no talent for marriage. That’s the last time for me.”

“Well, Reagan seems to have found his mate for life,” Blondell said.

“Ronnie is the marrying kind. I’m not,” Jane said. “He’s found his clinging vine, the one he always wanted, but he didn’t find an independent woman like me. This little former starlet creature is the kind of wife I never was.”

Despite the embarrassing charges that were aired in divorce court, Jane felt no hostility to Karger. In fact, far from the prying eyes of gossips, they sporadically got together “to catch up on things,” as she put it. Once, they were spotted together in San Francisco, provoking an item in a local newspaper column about the possibility of a third marriage of her to Karger.

[Jane and Karger remained friendly until the end. Three years after their divorce, he remarried. But, like his father, he had continuing heart trouble, and once had a heart attack. She visited him whenever she could.

When she heard that he was dying of leukemia, she claimed that she “went to the church every day, asking God to save Freddie.”

Despite her prayers, Karger died of leukemia in 1979 at the age of sixty-three.]

Jane would outlive her “two-time” and “two-timing” husband by twenty-eight years.

She would never marry again.

After appearing with her in some of Jane’s favorite movies, Agnes Moorehead— Jane called her “Aggie”—offered an interviewer some insights into Jane’s life.

“In some ways, I think Jane has entered the most contented period of her life. The intense careerism has mellowed and lessened; she has her good friendships, her rewarding sessions with the paintbrush and canvas, her pleasure in her developing children.”

“I think she has given up her illusions about men and the kind of life she had hoped to live with one. She has come to realize, in a sense, that she was her own best company—and she understands herself better than any other human being. At last, she is free of the foibles and assorted demands of a mate.”

Seven years of relative seclusion would pass before Jane returned to the screen, although during the interval, she would occasionally accept a role in a teleplay.

“I thought I’d spend the rest of my days hanging out paining landscapes in Carmel,” she told Paulette Goddard. “But then came November of 1980. All hell broke loose.”

She was referring, of course, to the election of her former husband, Ronald Reagan, to the office of President of the United States.

Stories about the ins and outs of their previous marriage were making headlines around the world.

As she told Goddard, “I was getting calls from Finland, Egypt, even Patagonia. Where the hell is Patagonia?”

She refused every request for interviews about her life with Reagan. She did make one statement, however: “I have no regrets about not becoming First Lady. Oh, no, the glare of the White House, with its fish-bowl existence for a First Lady, is not for me. I have perfectly wonderful memories of my years with the President. We are good friends, and we will always remain good friends.”

Reagan also refused to discuss his first marriage, except for one remark: “I was divorced in the sense that the decision was made by somebody else—not by me.”

An adept survivor in a fast-changing Hollywood, Jane managed, with skill and style, to revamping her image and her “look” with every decade.

Here’s Jane in the early 70s, sporting a look that enhanced her appeal to golden-age fans as well as to the casting directors of made-for-TV movies, daytime TV, and sitcoms.

A Special Feature

A young executive at Lorimar, one of the leading producers of TV programs, spoke to his board of directors: "If an old dame like Jane Wyman can still hobble around, and doesn't look like Phyllis Diller's grandmother, I see some real show biz marketability for her, having been married to Reagan and all that shit."

"Let's bring her back. Makeup can do wonders these days, or we could photograph her through gauze. Didn't the bitch once win an Oscar or something? Who cares? The big thing is that she was married to the President of the United States. I'm told that no one in American history ever divorced a man who went on to become President."

"We have the perfect series coming up," he continued. "Of course, the Hollywood Hills is filled with has-beens who could play the role, but there's no one who was once married to Ronald Reagan. Wasn't Hitler still alive when they got married?"

The young executive was told that in 1940, the United States had not yet entered World War II.

"My god!" he answered. "Way back then! She must have told Reagan when he walked in the door to wipe the dinosaur shit off his shoes."

Originally, Jane's friend, Barbara Stanwyck, had been offered the role of Angela Channing, the tyrannical matriarch of the Falcon Crest Winery in a TV soap tentatively entitled The vintage Years. Flush with success from his hit series, The waltons, Earl Hamner later changed the title to Falcon Crest, fearing that the first tag would indicate the soap was about old people.

Falcon Crest would go out on the CBS network for its first broadcast on December 4, 1981, running for nine trauma-infused seasons, shutting down on May 17, 1990.

Its lifespan more or less paralleled the two-term presidency of Ronald Reagan.

When Stanwyck bowed out, Hamner thought it would be wise to exploit the publicity generated by Jane Wyman, Reagan's first wife, who was back in the news again. He reportedly said, "Dare we bill her as 'The Woman Who Almost Became First Lady?'"

In the original pilot, Jane sported a gray wig, but that was later changed to her own dyed brown hair. "The preview audiences laughed at me for wearing that dreadful wig, and I put my foot down. Also, I told Hamner to soften my role. Originally, my character was too much of a god damn bitch."

He later called Jane "A tough broad, but she knew what she was doing. It was not her first time at the rodeo."

As a Napa Valley wine tycoon, Angela would spend the series feuding with and fighting her relatives, plus others, as a means of retaining control of the family legacy.

She battles one of the heirs to Falcon Crest, Robert Foxworth, and his wife, Susan Sullivan, but dotes on her handsome playboy grandson (Lorenzo Lamas), the real-life son of Fernando Lamas and Arlene Dahl.

"The Iron Lady of the Vineyards," Jane Wyman, veteran survivor of changing times in Hollywood, with the Falcon Crest gang in 1984.

Throughout the 8½ year run of the series, guest stars came and went, including Celeste Holm, still remembered for her role in all about eve (1950), who nearly burns down Falcon Crest.

A good hunk of tout Hollywood, notably Lana Turner, showed up for guest appearances. Jane had always detested her, an enmity dating back to the time "she messed around with Ronnie."

To boost ratings, other featured notables included Gina Lollobrigida (after negotiations with Sophia Loren fell through); Robert Stack, Cliff Robertson, Kim Novak, Leslie Caron, Lauren Hutton, Eddie Albert, Eve Arden, and Ursula An-dress, whose involvement caused a tiffle because of her status as one of Nancy Reagan's best friends.

One of the highlights of the series transpired when Jane, as Angela Channing, married Falcon Crest's lawyer, Phillip Ericson (Mel Ferrer). Consistent with her character, as developed by Jane, Angela does this not only for love, but for access to greater power. Ferrer's character maneuvered ambitiously through the politics of the family legacy until the writers of the series had him killed off in a plane crash.

At one point, Ginger Rogers, perhaps the ultimate symbol and archetype of Golden Age Hollywood, was proposed for the role of Susan Sullivan's mother. But the blonde was ruled as "not the right type" for the role. Jane Greer, star of many a 1940s film noir, was hired instead.

Hamner notified Jane that he was casting César Romero, as her co-star in the role of a very wealthy tycoon, who helps her "save the plantation." The script was still being written when she was told, "There will be some on-screen romancing." At the time, Romero was in his seventies and white-haired.

Although Jane had often accepted Romero as an occasional escort between her marriages—this lifelong bachelor had been the escort of many great Hollywood divas, including Joan Crawford—she was alarmed at the prospect of that new twist in the series' storyline. She was especially disturbed at the prospect of any kissing scenes between them.

Celebrity psychic John Cohan was a friend, confidant, and psychic advisor to Jane for many years. He had followed her interaction with another of his friends, Rock Hudson, during their filming of Magnificent obsession and all That Heaven allows.

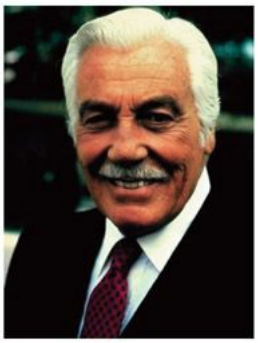
[Cohan has been a celebrity seer and channel of wisdom to stars who have included elizabeth Taylor for more than thirty years. during much of that time, he supplied columnist Cindy adams with his yearly predictions, many of which turned out to be surprisingly accurate.

Many insights about the stars can be found in Cohan's tantalizing memoir, Catch a Falling Star: The Untold Story of Celebrity Secrets, published in 2008. in it, he has much to reveal about former friends and clients, including natalie wood, Merv Griffin, John Kennedy, Jr., elvis Presley, Mick Jagger, and Rudolph nureyev. He also writes about "my dear friend" nicole Brown Simpson as well as "the love of my life," Sandra dee, the former wife of singer Bobby darrin.]

John Cohan...privy to celebrity secrets.

Cohan was also a friend of Romero, and was well aware of his long-lived crush on Desi Arnaz. When Jane learned that Romero was to be assigned as her love interest in Falcon Crest, she called Cohan to express her possible objections. "I don't want him on the show if there's to be a kissing scene," she said. "There's an AIDS epidemic, I don't know where his mouth has been the night before."

Cohan had a talk with her, telling her that "Cesar is a gentleman and a fine actor. I can assure you that he's as meticulous in his hygiene as he is in his grooming. You have nothing to fear."



César Romero..."The Latin from Manhattan."

Obviously, Cohan convinced her that Romero would present no threat, even during an embrace. She called Hamner the next day and told him, "I think Cesar will be ideal in the part of my beau."

Jane's friendship with Romero remained intact, despite her fears. A few weeks later, Romero resumed escorting Jane to various premieres or tributes to aging players in the film industry. They'd sometimes end the evening dancing. “He’s a great dancer,” she told Cohan, something he already knew, of course.

Starting out at $25,000 per episode, Jane’s fee for her involvement in Falcon Crest eventually rose to $100,000 per episode, making her the highest paid woman in television.

John O’Connor, in The new York Times, summed up Falcon Crest in 1981. “And so it goes, the standard stuff of soaps, with a crisis bubble bursting at least three times between commercial breaks. At fadeout, Jane Wyman is meaningfully stroking a falcon on the grounds of her estate. The stage is set for anything.”

The other actors in the series often complained to Hamner that Jane was telling them how to act. When Hamner confronted her with this, she said, “The poor dears, for the most part, have had no experience. If they’re bad, I’ll look bad. Now we can’t have that happening, can we?”

Throughout the run of the series, Jane bitterly resented any publicity that linked her to the Reagan presidency. Her former association with the President became especially visible at the 1984 Democratic Convention, when protesters opposing Reagan’s policies carried signs “JANE WYMAN WAS RIGHT” within view of television crews.

Her salary as a highly visible actress was sometimes compared to that earned by Reagan in his capacity as president, columnists suggesting that she was being paid ten times more than he was.

She didn’t like it when critics jokingly referred to her series as “dallas with grapes.”

“We were more glamorous than dallas [1978-1991], but not as outrageous as dynasty [1981-1989],” she said.

Because of her declining health, Jane was absent throughout much of Falcon Crest’s final (1989-1990) season. She rallied, however, to the point where, in defiance of her doctor’s orders, she returned for the season’s last three episodes. In the final scene of the series, she raises her glass to either the vineyards or the series (no one was really, sure, as the moment was richly symbolic), “A toast to you, Falcon Crest,” she said, “and long may you live.”

On the last day of the series’ filming, she had told Hamner, “Honey, I’ve seen them come and go…mostly go. And now it’s time for me to make my exit. I’ll say this: It’s been a ride to hell and back. And I’m still here. Now I want to be alone.”

Golden age icon Loretta Young, Jane’s then closest friend, had married the famous dress and costume designer, Jean Louis, in 1993, when she was eighty and he was eighty-four. Young had been instrumental in motivating Jane to become a member of the Third Order of Saint Dominic, informally known as “Lay Dominicans.”

[Lay Dominicans define themselves as “Men and women, singles and couples, living a Christian life with a Dominican spirituality in the secular world. We find our inspiration following the same spiritual path taken by many Saints, Blesseds and other holy men and women throughout the almost 800 year history of the Dominican Order.”]

As a means of living closer to her friend, Jane had moved into the upscale resort community of Rancho Mirage in Riverside County, near Palm Springs, 120 miles southeast of Los Angeles.

When Young died in 2002, Jane was very distraught. More than ever, she seemed to cling to her Catholic religion.

The year (2001) after Young’s death, Jane’s only biological child, her daughter, Maureen, died from melanoma. Jane told Cohan, “There’s nothing worse for a parent than to outlive her own children.”

She was further devastated when Reagan died in 2004. She issued a rare statement about him. “America has lost a great President and a great, kind, and gentle man.”

Cohan recalled going to see her on his final visit, when he found her bedridden and in seriously declining health.

She asked him to stay overnight with her. In her condition, that was obviously not a sexual overture. She told him she was very lonely and just wanted someone to hold her. “I need that like a plant needs water,” she said.

Jane Wyman, on the set between takes during the final season of Falcon Crest. Forlorn, she looks into her future. The chorus girl cutie of the 1930s had become an aging matriarch.

He stayed with her and comforted her, later commenting on what a “charming, bright woman she was as a person, not just a great actress.”

At the age of ninety, on the night of September 1, 2007, death came to her in her sleep. She had left instructions to be buried in her Dominican habit.

A funeral mass was held two days later at the Sacred Heart Catholic Church in nearby Palm Desert. Michael Reagan delivered a short eulogy, asserting that “Hollywood has lost the classiest lady to ever grace the silver screen.”

In her later years, she had a favorite remark, “I am a little too old to be happy, but just old enough to be grateful.”

Many newspapers ran banner headlines, proclaiming, “THE FIRST MRS. REAGAN DIES.”

She had told Young and others, “I’m sure many headline writers will do that, but I would have preferred to be recognized as a star with my own achievements, rather than for a marriage I entered into decades ago.”

Let’s remember Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan not as old and decrepit—and ill—relics who survived to see the 21st Century, but as two kids in love with each other, or at least in love with love.

Late in her life, when Jane was shown this picture, she said, “God, we were gorgeous, and about to become the most publicized happily married couple of World War II.”

Special Feature: Hellcats of the Navy

"Ronnie and Nancy," as they were now called, never became the screen team they had dreamed about—a working duet equivalent to William Powell and Myrna Loy or Katharine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy.

But they did make one attempt at it in Hellcats of the Navy, a 1957 release from Columbia Pictures.

For Hellcats of the Navy, Columbia granted Reagan the usual contractual clauses allowing a star to select his own director. Subsequently, Reagan opted for Nathan Juran, who had helmed him in Law and Order (1953). Then Reagan successfully persuaded the studio to designate Nancy as his co-star.

Juran had been an Oscar-winning art director for such films as The Razor's Edge (1946). A year after his direction of Hellcats of the Navy, he'd achieve a rank in "camp heaven" after directing the sci-fi horror flick, Attack of the 50-Foot Woman (1958), a libidinous romp that seemed perfect back then for a Saturday night date at a drive-in. [Its storyline? After an aborted murder attempt, an alluring and scantily clad socialite, massively and majestically enlarged after an encounter with Aliens, seeks revenge on her lying, abusive, and cheating husband.]

One evening, the co-starring, co-habiting, married couple sat down in their living room to read the script of Hellcats. It was based on a widely publicized book by U.S. Admirals Charles A. Lockwood and Hans Christian Adamson, about a real-life Naval operation that had unfolded in 1944. The film would open with an introduction by Fleet Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, who had directed a naval campaign in the Tsushima Strait and the Sea of Japan during World War II. His mission's aim involved maneuvering a flotilla of U.S. submarines through underwater obstacles and heavy minefields. In the movie, Nimitz's character was portrayed by the actor Selmer Jackson.

The film's scriptwriters were credited as David Lang and "Raymond Marcus."

It wasn't until 1986 when an anti-communist U.S. president learned that the film-script had actually been written by a blacklisted screenwriter, Bernard Gordon, who had opted for "Marcus" as a pseudonym.

In the screenplay, Nancy is in love with Commander Casey Abbott (Reagan). Simultaneously, she's also involved in a minor romance with a member of his crew, frog-man Les Barton (Harry Lauter).

Abbott must struggle not to get his personal feelings mixed up with his high-profile role as commander.

Reagan, as Abbott, leading a fictional submarine, U.S.S. Starfish, is ordered to interrupt the flow of war supplies en route from Japan to voracious Japanese forces invading China. Most of the action takes place in the obstacle-studded, heavily mined waters off the Asiatic mainland.

As an actor, Reagan's worst problem was that he suffered from claustrophobia, a lifetime terror of small, enclosed spaces. For unrelenting hours at a time, he was forced to work with as many as sixteen cast and crew members, all of them packed like sardines into the tiny reconnaissance tower of a working submarine.

A dramatic point in the film occurs when Reagan, as Commander Abbott, has to make a "Command Decision," evocative of the 1948 Clark Gable film of that same name. In Hell-cats, when Reagan makes an equivalently crucial decision, he signals its weightiness to the audience by narrowing his squinty eyes, tightening his jaw muscles, and furrowing his brow, which was beginning to wrinkle at this stage of his middle-aged years.

As Nancy studied her character of Nurse Lt. Helen Blair in Hellcats of the Navy, she found she'd been cast in a "Love Triangle," perhaps evoking memories of her own life and the role played in it by Jane Wyman, the third part of a competitive trio that flourished prior to Nancy's marriage to Reagan.

When a Japanese destroyer bears down on them, Reagan orders his submarine to dive into very deep waters as a means of avoiding enemy shells. Lauter, preoccupied with his duties as a frogman, and outside the sub on the waters of the wide open sea, is left to die. A few scenes later, audiences know that Reagan's competitor for the love and carnal affections of Nurse Nancy has descended to a watery, fish-bitten grave.

The submarine's chief officer, Lt. Commander Don Landon, and the film's third male lead is played by Arthur Franz, who had previously appeared in such war movies as The Sands of Iwo Jima (1949) with John Wayne, and The Caine Mutiny (1953) with Humphrey Bogart.

Unlike Reagan, Franz had been a real-life hero during World War II, serving in the U.S. Army Air Force. His plane had been shot down over Romania, and he was incarcerated in a POW, from which he escaped and made his way to freedom.

Offscreen, in the photo above, actor and co-star Arthur Franz (left) is all smiles with the Reagans when the cameras weren't rolling. But on screen, he and the character played by Reagan were bitter enemies.

Audiences didn't find Nancy alluring as Reagan's girlfriend in this movie. She was clad in a starched and un-sexy uniform, droning her nagging lines to Reagan without a trace of charm. Obviously, she was more alluring to him as a wife in private than as his on-screen lover.

Throughout most of Hellcats, the characters portrayed by Reagan and Franz are locked into a bitterly competitive feud until the end, when Reagan, by now working as a frogman himself, is rescued by Franz. All is forgiven, and Reagan, without a rival in love, can at last claim Nurse Nancy.

She later wrote that the kissing scenes with Reagan were the easiest she'd ever played on screen, not that there had been that many.

In the final reel, Reagan agrees to marry Nurse Nancy. She later told Juran, "I had less trouble getting Ronnie to marry me on film than I did in real life."

Reagan's assignment as commander of the Hellcats involved retrieving actual Japanese mines from enemy-patrolled waters so that Naval experts could determine, in the safety of their laboratories, why they were resistant to detection by sonar.

Reagan was disappointed when he saw the final cut of Hellcats of the Navy. In his first autobiography, Where's the Rest of Me?, he stated that he had wanted to make a film that evoked the quality of Destination Tokyo, a suspenseful 1943 film that had co-starred Cary Grant with John Garfield. Such was not the case. Reagan lamented that Columbia was more interested in the budget than in the script, and strongly criticized the recycling of stock footage from the studio's archives.

Edmund Morris, Reagan's authorized biographer, said that Hellcats was "a turkey so many-feathered it practically squawked off the screen."

After it was finished, and for a brief time, Reagan considered retiring to his little stud farm to become a fulltime breeder of race horses, a lifestyle that evoked his role, and the character he developed, in Stallion Road (1947).

"Hellcats ended movies for me," Reagan said.

[Actually, it didn't. The ill-advised The Killers (1964), still in his future, would represent his final adieu to films.]

Critic Glenn Erickson defined the script of Hellcats as "completely derivative and cornball." He also criticized the lack of realism derived from its use of stock footage. David Krauss called the production "bargain basement," and evaluated both Reagan and Nancy as "stiff." He went on to say that Juran's direction was "as dry as a military briefing."

In his first autobiography, in reference to filming Hellcats, Reagan wrote: "Nancy and I had a moonlight farewell scene on the eve of my departure for the dangerous mission that was the climax of the story. The first thing I knew, Nancy was crying instead of saying the lines in the script, and then she was giggling between sobs, laughing at herself for having gotten so carried away that [in her mind, at least] she was really saying goodbye and sending me on a suicide mission."

In each of Nancy's memoirs, she had almost nothing to say about either her role or her involvement in Hellcats, except for a remark about kissing Reagan. In one memoir, she said the film was released in 1956; in another, she wrote 1957—and got it right that time.

Variety commiserated with Nancy for being stuck in such a thankless role.

The New York Daily News cited Nancy's performance as "providing subordinate romantic interest which does not get in the way of the film's primary offering—action."

Other reviewers were less kind, especially when the movie was released on DVD during Reagan's presidency. "Nancy and Ronnie had as much chemistry in their on-shore romance as did Wallace Beery and Marie Dressler in the 1933 Tugboat Annie," wrote Kenneth David.

Chapter Fourteen

"Ronnie and Nancy"

The Long, Tortuous Road to Marriage, & The Dysfunctional Union of Two Competing Families

They Didn't Know It Yet, but the Fading (and Fired) Movie Star and the Failed (and Fired) B-List Starlet Had a Shared Rendezvous With Destiny

One blustery afternoon, Ronald Reagan in his "Bogie trenchcoat," took Nancy Davis to the marriage license bureau.

She shared her version of what love is. "It meant giving more than receiving, and it also meant sharing. I think you know you are in love when you no longer are the most important person you know. I would give my life for Ronnie. I feel lucky in that I have no doubt of my love and of my being loved.:"

Nancy Davis was disappointed that her very frugal husband, Ronald Reagan, had “deep pockets and short arms.” He didn’t want to spend money to hire a photographer to record the events associated with their wedding.

William Holden and his wife, the actress Brenda Marshall, however, hired a photographer to record their wedding reception and paid for a wedding cake. Knife in hand, Reagan looks like he’s about to attack the symbolic bride and groom crowning the multi-tiered confection..

She Became One of the Most Fascinating, Enigmatic, and Controversial First Ladies In American History—But How Did She Lure a Reluctant Reagan Into Marriage?

Nancy’s road to the altar was long and tortured, with many roadblocks and many detours. It would take two and a half years of steady pursuit on her part.

Before meeting Reagan, Nancy had composed a list of eligible bachelors in Hollywood, all of whom she considered worth marrying. Reagan’s name was at the top of the list. She decided to start at the top and work her way down the chart.

She opted to reach him through his friend, film director Mervyn LeRoy. For the previous few months, she’d received a lot of mail directed to “Nancy Davis” with information about rallies and meetings of the Communist Party. It was the era of Hollywood’s “Blacklist,” and she didn’t want to lose her chance at stardom for fear that she’d be mistaken for Red, or accused of socialist sympathies, or worse.

He told her he’d relay her concerns to Reagan, president of SAG, to see what he could do.

“But I’d prefer to speak to Mr. Reagan personally,” she said.

“First, let’s do it my way,” he said. “After all, I’m used to directing the scene.”

Über-Assertive, Now and Forever.

“I love to wear red, but I’m not a Red,” Nancy said. “If anything, I’m probably the most anti-communist starlet in Hollywood.”

Reagan had never seen Nancy in a film, not even East Side, West Side, a 1949 flick that had starred his friend, Barbara Stan-wyck, and in which Nancy had played a supporting role.

A hip Hollywood director like LeRoy knew Nancy’s real motive for wanting to speak to Reagan personally. “I think she wants to date you,” the director said.

“My calendar’s full, but I’ll consider it,” he answered. “I won’t ask you what she looks like, because I know that she must be attractive if she’s an MGM starlet.”

“Who knows? MGM might have signed her on as a threat to Marjorie Main. But, no, that’s not the case. Nancy is quite attractive, I assure you. I was the first director to discover Jane Wyman when I put her in a small part in Elmer the Great back in 1933. Maybe lightning will strike twice for you when you meet Nancy.”

Reagan told LeRoy that he’d think about dating her, but first, he wanted to investigate her placement “on a commie mailing list."

Out with Nancy, Reagan, for some reason, chose to wear his glasses, although for years, he usually avoided being photographed in them.

As Nancy joked, "It's not true that women don't make passes at men who wear glasses."

"She's no Ava Gardner, but she's kinda cute," LeRoy said. "She's single. You're single. Why don't you take her out?"

"And disappoint two dozen other Hollywood cuties that night?" he said. "I may ask her out. Then again, I might not. For all I know, I'll fall for the hot little blonde I'm seeing."

"Marilyn Monroe?"

"Been there, done that," Reagan answered. "No, another Marilyn—Marilyn Maxwell."

"You're moving in on Frankie's territory, I see," LeRoy said.

Reagan took two weeks getting back to Nancy. He did discover that there was a movie extra, Nancy Lee Davis, registered as a screen worker who occasionally got a job as an extra. Her name, indeed, was on a list of movie workers who, between 1945 and 1952, were suspected of affiliations with the Communist Party. She had also supported members of the notorious, disgraced, and blacklisted "Hollywood Ten."

Reagan reported this to LeRoy, and the director subsequently called Nancy with news that her name had been cleared of suspicion. But she still protested, claiming, "But I want to speak to Mr. Reagan myself."

Reagan warned her, in his call to her the following day, that their meeting would have to be for an early dinner, since he was due at the studio at 5AM the following morning.

She responded, "I have the same problem."

As it happened, both of them lied, since neither was involved in any film being shot at the time.

The historic meeting of the future President of the United States with his future First Lady took place in October of 1949.

When he arrived at her doorstep, she later told friends, "He had both legs. I'd seen Kings Row, where they were amputated. But he was on crutches."

[He was still recovering from a broken leg he had injured in a charity baseball game.]

He took her to LaRue's on the Strip, which back then was a hip gathering spot.

She claimed she was immediately attracted to him, "finding him nice looking." She also viewed his mind as "stimulating and, unlike all other actors, he could talk about something other than motion pictures."

Over dinner, he discovered that she'd never seen a performance of Sophie Tucker, "The Last of the Red Hot Mommas." Tucker was his favorite entertainer, which surprised her. She thought his favorite singer would perhaps be Doris Day, his favorite comedian Jack Benny. But, no, it was Miss Sophie, with her raunchy jokes and her very Jewish humor, had been scheduled for an appearance at Ciro's later that night.

By the time this photograph was taken, Reagan had proposed marriage to Nancy. but when he first met her, he wrote: “Bells didn’t ring. Nor did rockets explode.”

As he told Robert Taylor, “Nancy’s pretty, but not what I expected. A bit reserved, unlike Ann Sothern or Ruth Roman. Her large hazel eyes are her best feature. Otherwise, she’s a rather demure brunette.”

After Sophie’s act, the other couples danced to the music of Xavier Cugat’s band, but Reagan couldn’t join in, because of his injured leg.

At the end of her show, Sophie joined them at table. “I adore Ronnie,” she said to Nancy. Then she turned to Reagan. “A brunette for a change?”

The last time she’d seen him was after her performance on Miami Beach, where he’d showed up with a blonde, Marilyn Monroe, then an aspiring starlet.

He was honest with Nancy, telling her that he’d fibbed about that early morning call. “I didn’t want to be trapped in a blind date that didn’t go well. It’ll soon be dawn, so you can say this date was a knockout.”

On her doorstep, he kissed her on the cheek and left without any promise of calling her again.

When Nancy first started dating Reagan, she was twenty-eight, though claiming to be twenty-six. “That sounds better.”

Although he failed to make any promises, Reagan called her at 11AM and invited her out for another night on the town. She later said, “We had dinner that night, and the next night, and the night after that. For about a month, we must have gone to every restaurant and nightclub in Los Angeles.”

Rumors circulated that during their first month together, he was spending his nights in her small apartment in Westwood, a suburb west of Hollywood near the UCLA campus.

In Nancy’s second memoir, she admitted that she and Reagan soon tired of going nightclubbing every night. “We started spending more of our time alone in my apartment, where we watched movies and ate popcorn.” Presumably, they found other amusements, too. She looked forward to his taking her to Chasen’s every Tuesday night for its weekly special, “Beef Belmont.”

People who knew Reagan well, including Dick Powell, claimed, “Ronnie didn’t immediately fall in love. He had to be very gently led into those pastures like a horse, and be assured that the green grass was for grazing and that he wouldn’t end up in the glue factory.”

After the first activity-filled month, Reagan didn’t call Nancy as frequently, perhaps only once or twice a week. She feared he was losing interest.

Biographer Laurence Leamer wrote: “For a woman who sought a courtly Spenserian romance, Ronnie might seem a strange choice indeed. He was a man too scared by past romantic failures to fall easily into an impassioned union typical of youthful first love. But Ronnie was the first man Nancy had ever met who measured up to Dr. Loyal. She loved Ronnie. She wanted him, a man whom she could admire uncompromisingly, the way she admired Dr. Loyal.”

“Ronnie’s heart was frozen,” Leamer continued. “To him, spring was not the harbinger of summer, but only of another winter. Nancy put up with all of Ronnie’s ambivalence. She listened to his endless political talk, as Jane had not, and loved every word. She thought his most banal political remarks rang with profound meaning. She looked at him with pure adoration.”

[When Nancy became First Lady, that loving and sometimes ferociously protective gaze became known as “The Look.”]

Had Nancy Davis not gotten pregnant (Patti was on the way), Reagan might have carried Doris Day across the threshold instead.

"I was a gentleman who preferred blondes, but married brunettes," he told his friend, singer/actor George Murphy.

Here he is, publicizing his second picture with Doris, The Winning Team in 1952 (the year he married Nancy).

It was the last picture he ever made at Warner Brothers, a studio where he'd worked since 1937.

As he later joked, "On the way out the door, I felt the pointed toe of Jack Warner's shoe in my most hidden spot."

When Reagan didn't call, as he had before, she concentrated on her career and very soon—when she learned that he was dating other women, she started going out with other men. That was all too evident one noonday in the MGM commissary, when she heard a starlet at a nearby table bragging to her friends about a recent gift of jewelry from Reagan. So far, he had never given Nancy any gift, not even flowers.

Their 1952 baseball flick, The Winning Team," choreographed a "movie version" of what a Reagan/Day nuptial might look like.

In the photo above, bride and groom—with Doris wearing white satin, a veil, and lace— dig into the fixings for a cold, Depression-era wedding supper prepared, Americana-style, by well-wishing friends.

She later heard that while he was making Storm Warning (1951), he was seriously considering proposing to Doris Day.

Jane Wyman had heard that Reagan had been on the verge of marrying Nancy.

"Don't ask me why I'm so happy that the Davis girl is going out with other men," Jane told Joan Blondell. "I walked out on him, but I will cling to him at times for the comfort and security that only he can provide me. I know that if I ever got sick or something, and couldn't work, he'd be the first person to arrive on my doorstep."

As for Nancy, Jane learned she was still seeing Benny Thau at MGM.

"Ronnie didn't want to get too involved with Nancy," George Murphy recalled. "That's why he stopped seeing her so much. It was getting too god damn intense. Besides, I advised him to stick with blondes—no, not Marilyn Monroe but Doris Day. Doris was all that was fine and decent and would make an ideal First Lady if his dream of becoming president ever came true."

On one date, Nancy invited him to see her in The Next Voice You Hear (1950), wherein she co-starred with James Whitmore. After the movie, he told her, "Unpack your bags. You're going to be around Hollywood for quite a time."

On their dates, Reagan often shared his career woes with Nancy. In November of 1950, he gave a revealing interview to Silver Screen: "I'd love to be a louse on screen like Humphrey Bogart. You know, the kind of fellow who leers at the dolls and gets leered back. The guy who treats women rough and makes them love it. You know why I'd love to be louse? Because the public loves him. He makes money for his employers. He's talked about and swooned over. He grimaces forth from the pages of Silver Screen and people bring mouse traps to his doorstep. The louse business is, for sure, the open road to 'Fame in Films.'"

William Holden recognized that Reagan was in no hurry to make a commitment to another woman. "He was burned in his first marriage, and the pain still is deep. I understand why he wanted to keep dating other women. Of course, I'd call it more than dating."

Nancy discussed her own career problems with Reagan. She was featured in a number of picture layouts—in fact, Movieland heralded her as "A Star is Born." Despite the glamour of that connotation, she was photographed in jeans cleaning the house.

When director George Cukor saw the published version of these domestic photographs, he told friends, "The Hattie McDaniel image of a maid in Gone With the Wind is old-fashioned. The 1950s image of a maid should be none other than Miss Nancy Davis, who sure knows her way around a vacuum cleaner."

Hedda Hopper noted that Jane and Nancy each appeared in the same magazine. "Jane was all dolled up and looking glamorous, like a movie star should. In contrast, poor Nancy looked dowdy."

Jane and Nancy would never be mistaken for each other, although biographers over the years have noted a certain similarity in both of the "President's Ladies." Each has been perceived as a "strong-willed woman often displaying a fiery temper."

Despite the critical and commercial failure of many of her pictures, the studio insisted that Nancy continue to pose for publicity layouts. MGM sent her to the chic Amelia Gray's fashion shop in Beverly Hills for fittings of dresses from the latest Parisian designers, with the understanding that these dresses were to be borrowed for photo layouts. A sales clerk later said that "Miss Davis selected the wardrobe of a rich, thirtyish, unmarried society matron."

The stardom that Nancy had dreamed about did not come with the release of The Next Voice You Hear (1950). In that, she played a pregnant wife. "After that film, now I'm only offered roles for pregnant wives."

"Pregnant is something you don't want to get," Reagan cautioned.

"I noticed that when I go into a restaurant with you, the people at the other tables cast sly glances my way, checking to see if I'm showing any signs of pregnancy." Nancy said.

Rumors buzzed through Hollywood about Reagan's upcoming marriage to Nancy. In March of 1951, a columnist in Variety wrote: "Another date, this time for dinner at LaRue's on the Strip, adds fuel to the fires of romantic gossip raging about Ronald Reagan and Nancy Davis. Expect an announcement of marriage any day now."

That didn't happen. A year would drift by. Another year. Then another six months, even though some headlines had already announced Nancy as "THE NEXT MRS. RONALD REAGAN."

The Hollywood Reporter trumpeted, "Nobody's seen an engagement ring, but Ronnie is wearing his heart on his sleeve, and there's a twenty-karat sparkle in the eyes of Nancy Davis."

Modern Screen reported, "Don't look now, but here comes the bride. Ronald Reagan and Nancy Davis have had that 'about-to-be-married look' for more than a year now."

Louella Parsons weighed in with her take, writing in Modern Screen, "Are Ronald Reagan and Jane Wyman haunted by their perfect love? Not long ago, I went to dinner at their home, and Maureen came in to cut her birthday cake. Her mother and father stood by her side, polite to each other and respectful—so different from those gay kids who went barnstorming across the country with me years ago. I turned away so they couldn't see the tears in my eyes."

"I wonder—Do those embers of the once perfect love they shared still burn deep with haunting memories that won't let them forget?"

The report was unconfirmed, but one traumatic day, Nancy arrived to deliver something to Reagan at his apartment. It was perhaps a surprise gift she knew he wanted. After she knocked on his door, it was said to have been opened by a young actress, Christine Larson. Nancy left at once, taking the gift away with her. She was no doubt heartbroken.

During their weekends together, Reagan often shared his views with her on many subjects, as he was well informed. In most cases, even if she disagreed with him on a subject, she never argued. She was far more tolerant and sophisticated about homosexuality than he was.

He told her, "It's a tragic mistake and we should continue to view homosexuality as an illegal act. Participants should be subject to arrest and imprisonment."

When he became governor, he said, "Perhaps the only place in government that can employ homosexuals is the Department of Parks and Recreation."

In the media, that remark was widely denounced and defined as "vulgar, crude, ignorant, and tasteless." There were calls for "impeachment of the bigot."

Before Co-Ruling the Free World, Nancy Learns to Shovel Horse Manure at Her Boyfriend's Malibu Ranch

Nancy knew that their dating was getting more serious one night when he told her, "I really miss having someone to love—in fact, I hunger to have someone love me."

She later told her friends, "I knew at this point I had him."

During the final year before their marriage, Nancy and Reagan were living together, mostly at her apartment, like husband and wife. Weekends were usually spent at his Malibu ranch, sometimes with Michael and Maureen, when they weren't away at school. When they were in town, the children lived with Jane.

The ranch lay half a mile inland from the Pacific. Once there, visitors discovered a rundown old farmhouse that was gradually being fixed up. In March of 1951, Reagan had paid $85,000 for the property, on which he raised horses. When the first colt was born—he described it as "a gorgeous dapple filly"—he named her "Nancy D."

Ranching was not Nancy's thing. Her expressed distaste for it may have caused her to lose Clark Gable. She wasn't going to let that happen again. On the ranch, she threw herself into the spirit of it all, although admitting to friends, "I carried water to the horses and even shoveled manure. The closeness of animals, bugs, and dirt was a bit of a stretch for me, but at least I got to work shoulder-to-shoulder with Ronnie."

Sometimes, when Reagan drove the children back to Jane, she would invite him inside, even if Nancy were with him. "Jane was perfectly nice to me," Nancy wrote. "Not only had she been married to Ronnie, but she was very much 'The Star,' and it was her house and her children. I felt out of place, and I was a little in awe of her."

Later, as their "Love Triangle" continued, Nancy became very angry at Jane when she learned that Jane had convinced Reagan not to remarry until she did. She was dating bandleader Fred Karger at the time. Jane felt it would be embarrassing to her if Reagan remarried while she was still unwed.

When he learned about Jane's upcoming marriage to Karger, he felt he could go ahead and propose to Nancy.

As more and more people in the film industry learned about Nancy's link to Reagan, she was often asked, "What is he really like?"

She had a pat answer: "The secret is that there really is no secret. He is exactly the man he appears to be. The Ronald Reagan you see in public is the same Ronald Reagan I live with. He is not a fraud or a phony."

Reagan had seen Dr. Loyal and Edith many times, and both of them heartily approved of him. Loyal thought he was be "a good provider." Edith, on the other hand, told Nancy, "If I were twenty years younger, you would have me to fight off for this stud. He's a real catch."

When Nancy married Reagan in 1952, her movie career was drawing to a close. Months before the pre-defined end of her MGM contract, Nancy was told that it would not be renewed.

Mightier moguls than Nancy had already succumbed to the ax: Louis B. Mayer himself had resigned, more or less against his will, in the aftermath of a series of money-losing pictures he'd made.

As a means of softening the journalistic impact of her impending departure from the movie industry, Nancy preferred to tell reporters that she planned to retire from the screen and devote herself to her new role as a housewife and mother, a position that paralleled many of the beliefs and role models of the Eisenhower era.

But she still had a handful of undistinguished films to make for dwindling audiences to sit through. Worsening things was that she never really developed a fan base like Wyman and, to a lesser extent, Reagan.

The prospect of remarrying perplexed not only Reagan but Jane, Michael, and Maureen, too.

While he was still dating Nancy, Reagan was rumored to have spent the night of January 5, 1951, with Jane, celebrating her birthday, and, one assumes, some shared memories. The next day, he placed an excited call to Dick Powell. "Janie and I have made up. We're going to remarry."

But in just two weeks, Jane apparently changed her mind. The reasons are not known, but June Allyson speculated, "I think Ronnie told her that one day, he wanted to be President of the United States, and she didn't want to spend the rest of her life on the road to the White House."

Louella Parsons told of a private talk she'd had with Jane, not for publication. She had asked the columnist, "What's the matter with me? Will I ever find happiness?"

For a while, Reagan dated starlet Penny Edwards. According to her, he told her one night, "I like you just fine. But I think I've forgotten how to fall in love."

Another of Reagan's dates was Ann Sothern, who had once co-starred with Nancy. "When I dated Reagan, he had two things on his mind, politics and Jane Wyman. Even when he was supposed to be hot and heavy with Nancy, I noticed it was Ruth Roman he invited to the premiere of his film, The Hasty Heart (1949).

Sothern said, "He told me he gave Jane a small poodle with a note—'This is to keep you company until your lovin' man comes home again.'"

When Jane started work on a new movie, Three Guys Named Mike (1951), Reagan sent her a large bouquet of red roses. "I know you'll be safe with Van Johnson. But I don't know about Howard Keel and Barry Sullivan. Especially Keel."

One night, June Allyson and Dick Powell invited Reagan over to dinner by himself. He wanted to talk to the couple, who had remained his close friends over the course of many years. Allyson had also maintained an intense friendship with Jane until they had a falling out.

Reagan was wondering if he could more or less incorporate both Jane and Nancy into an extended family, celebrating reunions with Maureen and Michael during communal weekends at the ranch. He had promised Jane she could go to the ranch any time she wanted for horseback riding.

"Ronnie," Allyson said. "That's not going to work out. Nancy won't like it. It's a stupid idea unless you're planning to set up a ménage à trois. And a ménage à trois will only take place in your sexual fantasies."

As Michael later said, "Back in those days, the press was trying to promote a feud between my mother and Nancy. When I met separately with each woman, they had nothing but derogatory things to say about each other. I agreed with whichever one I was with at the time."

When friends asked Jane if theirs was a feud like that of Joan Crawford with Bette Davis, she denied it. "I have no grudge against Miss Davis. To show that there are no hard feelings, I plan to attend the funeral of the bitch."

Before and after his marriage to Nancy, Jane tried to avoid attending events or private parties and dinners where she would encounter Nancy. Reagan had stopped bringing Nancy by her home when he drove over to return Maureen and Michael to their mother.

However, on certain occasions, they were trapped together. One such event occurred in 1964, when Maureen hosted a lavish reception at the time of her second marriage (i.e., to David Sills). Nancy, Reagan, and Jane stood together in the reception line to greet their guests.

Although it was all smiles in the reception line, Jane and Nancy avoided each other for the rest of the day. Jane left early, privately telling Maureen, "Better luck with your second choice of a husband. I hope it won't be as disastrous as your marriage to that policeman—what's his name."

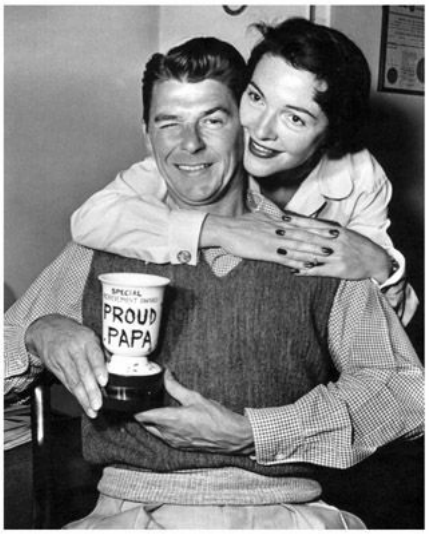
Joan Blondell described a last minute drama that transpired during the planning phases of the Nancy/Ronnie wedding.

“Jane came to see me and we talked and drank until around three o’clock in the morning,” Blondell said. “She wondered if she should stage an eleventh hour maneuver to get Ronnie back. She was determined to go to him in the pre-dawn hours and plead with him to remarry her. That ended when I reminded her that if she did that, she might have to get him out of bed with Nancy.”



Chains of love, Till death do us part: A proud, much-manipulated “Papa.”

“Later,” Blondell continued, “she told me that she had contacted Ronnie, and he agreed to meet her for a late breakfast at a secluded café in Santa Monica. I think she did ask him to take her back. But it was too late. He told her he was going ahead and marrying Nancy, even though he was still in love with Jane.”

“Ronnie won his victory,” Blondell said. “She wanted to be his wife again. Ronnie had always predicted she’d change her mind and want him back. But, according to Jane, he held out a compromise: He promised that during his upcoming marriage, he’d slip away and see her on occasion.”

“We’ll make love like we used to for old time’s sake,” he reportedly said.

Before and after Reagan’s marriage to Nancy, Maureen, his older offspring, revealed her fears about his upcoming marriage to Nancy. “She’s still young enough to have children. Not only will I have to think about adjusting to half brothers or sisters, but I’ll be torn between two families. Please understand, siblings aside, my loyalty will always be to you and my mother. I love both of you dearly.”

“How are you getting along with Nancy?” Reagan asked Maureen.

“I find her sympathetic to the problems of a young girl like me growing up in Hollywood. But any motherly love I have will be reserved for mother.”

Patti Davis, daughter of Ronald and Nancy Reagan, was the prodigal daughter, dumping the Reagan name and using her mother's maiden name instead to symbolize her disgust with her father's right-wing political views.

As for her own politics, she was a pot-smoking liberal. At the age of 41, she posed for the July, 1994, edition of Playboy, appearing on the cover with the hands of a black man cupping her (otherwise naked) breasts. She also made a direct-to-video Playboy Celebrity Centerfold, the tape showing her cavorting in lesbian settings outdoors, followed by a solo masturbation scene.

Patti's first novel, Homefront, published in 1986, recorded fictionalized events inspired by her own childhood and teenaged years, an artistic choice which seriously pissed off her father's Republican friends.

"I understand that," he said.

[Maureen would later write a memoir, First Father, First Daughter, in which she discussed the problems of Reagan marrying "The Other Woman." Adding to the complications of her family landscape, Nancy and Reagan eventually presented her with a half-sister and a half-brother.

Maureen later said, "Dad married Nancy just in time. Patricia Ann Reagan was born by cesarean on October 21, 1952.

Years later, Maureen suggested that there was jealousy between her half sister and herself. She remembered sitting on the sofa in the Reagan living room, watching her father bounce Patti on his lap, later tossing her up in the air. Maureen wistfully, and perhaps with deep touches of envy, remembered when she sat on her dad's lap, and when he had tossed her into the air.

With Reagan, Maureen would always try to be the loyal daughter, presenting Patti in the most unfavorable light. "She even changed her name to Patti Davis," Maureen said. "I'm proud to be a Reagan. She's not!"

Indeed, Patti Davis grew up to be the "black sheep" of the family. She became known for her liberal viewpoints, many of which contrasted with her father's conservatism. She was pro-choice on abortion, and favored gay rights. Reagan did not.

She was also an author, not portraying her family in a positive light in The Way I See It, in which she called her father, "cold, distant, and aloof to everyone except Nancy." She also charged Nancy with physical abuse.

Ron Reagan, Jr. “Like father, like son” in every instance except his love of ballet.

Nancy’s mother was horrified in 1994 when Patti posed for Playboy.

On May 28, 1958, both Maureen and Michael would be presented with another sibling, born Ron Reagan, Jr. He, too, reportedly embarrassed his father when he dropped out of Yale to become a ballet dancer.

As President, Reagan was quizzed by reporters about his son’s sexual orientation. Reagan answered, “We checked him out. He’s definitely straight.”

One amusing incident occurred on Saturday Night Live, during his father’s presidency. In a funny skit, Ron Jr. parodied Tom Cruise’s performance in Risky Business (1983) by dancing in his underwear—presumably while his parents were away— in a replica of the interior of the White House.

Nancy and Reagan watched the show that night, but reportedly did not understand it. When it was explained to the President, Reagan asked, “Who is this Tom Cruise fellow?”

In 1988, one reporter confronted Reagan, “Is it true, as some have it, that your son is not only a liberal, but an atheist?”

“I’ll have no comment,” the President said.]

Reagan’s friends, Robert Taylor, George Murphy, William Holden, and Dick Powell, claimed that “Ronnie went through the jitters about marrying again.”

If both Tom Cruise and the President's son worked in a male strip club, which would women prefer? Your choice.

"I'm still in love with Jane, but I also love Nancy, but in a very different way," he explained to Murphy.

"Nancy," he continued, "will be loving and supportive. I know that about her. But Jane is a seductive little vixen. She'll betray you, infuriate you, but you keep going back for more of what she dishes out. I'll share a secret with you. Unlike Nancy, Jane talks real dirty in a guy's ear—What a turn-on!"

Reagan later admitted that during his courtship of Nancy, "I did everything wrong, doing everything that could have lost her if somebody up there hadn't been looking after me."

In his autobiography, he wrote, "In spite of my determination to remain foot-loose, in spite of my belief that the pattern of my life was all set and would continue without change, nature was trying to tell me something very important."

"I loved Jane, and I am still in love with her, but as a wife, she never understood me and my aspirations. Nancy is just the opposite. She understands."

From the beginning of her relationship with Reagan, as Nancy later claimed, she sensed that acting was not providing fulfillment for Reagan. He seemed to want a career in something else, and she assumed that was politics, since he talked about that subject all the time.

Biographers have suggested that Nancy was the single most important source for leading Reagan out of the liberal camp into the right-wing den. But she denied that, claiming he was the one who got her interested in politics.

Before she married Reagan, Nancy consulted with Carroll Righter, Hollywood's reigning astrologer. He assured her that the "stars would shine on such a union." She felt confident to move ahead.

At long last, on February 29, 1952, that day arrived. At the marriage bureau, when they applied for a marriage license, an onlooker described their arrival.

"Ronnie looked a little pale in a turtleneck and trench coat, Nancy radiant in a white-collared black dress." It was the same black dress she'd worn on her first date with him.

Four days later, on the day of his wedding, Reagan was forty-one and had lost the youthful good looks that had drawn so many women to him during his early days in Hollywood. Nancy was thirty-one, although most of America thought she was twenty-six, because that's what was published in interviews.

In addition to their ranch, he would purchase a dream house along the Pacific Palisades.

In 1954, when he became a spokesperson for General Electric, that company would fill the house with every imaginable electric gadget designed for modern living, including a chandelier wheel with a dozen recessed colored lights, prominently positioned above their dining table.

William Holden was designated as Reagan's best man, his wife Ardis (the actress known as Brenda Marshall) serving as Nancy's matron of honor.

Nancy noticed that the Holdens weren't speaking to each other. They had had a fight the night before, after Ardis learned that her husband had had a fling with the bisexual actress, Judy Holliday, when they had co-starred together in Born Yesterday (1950).

Midway through the ceremony, Holden, with a few drinks in him, came up to Nancy. "Let me be the first to kiss the new Mrs. Ronald Reagan."

She quickly whispered to him. "You're jumping the gun. The ceremony's not over yet."

"No I'm not," Holden said, and kissed her anyway.

Nancy later claimed, "I certainly remembered that kiss from Bill. But I don't remember getting a kiss from Ronnie."

He had said he wanted no publicity. However, when they arrived at the Holden home for their modest reception, a photographer was waiting to record this historic event. Ardis had ordered a wedding cake.

At the reception, Reagan stood with Holden, looking over at Nancy and Ardis on the other side of the room.

"At least I know that with Nancy, I won't have a wife outshining me on the screen. No one is ever going to call me Mr. Nancy Davis, I can assure you."

"I'm with you, man," Holden said. "No one ever called me Mr. Brenda Marshall. That's what we get for marrying unimportant actresses, unlike Jane Wyman."

For their honeymoon night, Reagan drove Mrs. Ronald Reagan to the grandly historic Mission Inn in Riverside, where incognito movie stars often went for off-the-record trysts, especially on weekends. [In 1940, Richard and Patricia Nixon had celebrated their wedding reception here.]

After that night of passion, Reagan and Nancy set off to Phoenix to join Dr. Loyal Davis and his wife, Edith, who were vacationing there at the time.

Nancy later said, "Having a honeymoon with one's in-laws might have been a bit strange, I admit. But it worked beautifully, and Ronnie enjoyed the company of my parents who were so pleased with my choice of a husband."

As Edith told Reagan, "Honey, if you don't get it right the first time with Wyman, you're going to make it with Nancy. She'll be the best little wife a man could hope for, unlike those whores of Babylon out there in California."

During their drive from Phoenix back to Los Angeles, Reagan and Nancy were trapped in the worst sandstorm to hit western Arizona in twenty years. "The winds were harsh enough to make a coyote airborne," Reagan later said.

The winds at one point ripped the canvas of the retractable top of their convertible. For part of the ride, Nancy had to position herself on her knees on the front passenger seat, facing backwards, and holding the torn canvas together. Her hands became so frozen they had to stop periodically so that she could rub them together to help the blood circulate.

To some couples, the storm might have represented an evil omen. But for Nancy, at least, it wasn't so. She was totally optimistic.

Years later, as President of the United States, Reagan, one afternoon in the White House, told his aide (Secretary of the Treasury and later, Chief of White House Staff) the similarly named Donald T. Regan, "I found the ideal Cinderella. The shoe fit her little foot perfectly. As her Prince Charming, I promised to make her my Princess. Instead of that, I made her Milady and put her in a position more important than any damn run-of-the-mill princess. In fact, I plunged her into a life beyond her wildest dreams."

A Special Feature

White House Nights
Frank Sinatra & the Reagans
A Love Triangle

This photograph, taken on July 5, 1981 at the White House, on the occasion of Nancy Reagan's sixtieth birthday, was published on the frontpages of newspapers throughout the United States, even abroad.

Nancy was dancing, embraced in the arms of "the man of my dreams," Frank Sinatra, although he's wearing one of his worst toupées. She obviously regrets the intrusion of her husband, Ronald, who always suspected that "something was always going on between those two."

Originally, when he was still a pal of John F. Kennedy, Ol' Blue Eyes detested the Reagans. But when Bobby Kennedy, then Attorney General, made Frank persona non grata at the White House, the singer switched his political alliances.

He'd once said, "Reagan is a stupid bore who can't get a job in pictures." He'd also called Nancy, "A dumb broad with fat ankles who can't act."

But at this White House gala in 1981, he sang:

"I'm so proud that you're First Lady, Nancy,
Also so pleased that I'm sort of a chum.
The next eight years will be fancy as fancy as they come.
Nancy, Nancy, Nancy, with the smiling face."

"Gorbachev, Tear Down That Wall"

—Joyce Hodges

The 1930s-era starlet, Joy Hodges, was the woman who, early in the game, had filled Reagan in on the lowdown aspects of the entertainment industry during his first venture into Lotus Land. Consequently, she and Reagan became life-long friends. She lived through his presidency and beyond, dying on January 19, 2003, in Palm Springs, California, at the age of 88.

Auld Lang Syne: Two views of actress and danseuse Joy Hodges, from the era she welcomed then-newcomer Ronald Reagan to Hollywood.

Hodges once told reporters, "I got Ronnie his first pair of contact lenses and his first screen test. He was the first leading man in Hollywood to wear contact lenses, and he would take them out on a regular basis to show their then-new technology to friends."

When Reagan occupied the White House, he often invited her to dinner. Later, she commented, "At one party I found myself seated next to President Mikhail Gorbachev. I turned to him and said, 'Gorby, tear down that wall—and he did! Of course, Ronnie in Berlin later stole my line and it became his most famous statement as president."

She recalled her final meeting with Reagan in January of 2001. "He looked at me and summoned up a name from somewhere deep in his memory. He called me 'Miss Jones.'"

She figured that he had recalled how she had played "Miss Jones" in the 1937 Broadway musical, I'd Rather Be Right, produced by Richard Rogers and George Kaufman. Its most memorable musical number was "Have You Met Miss Jones?"

The plot centered on a beautiful heroine (Miss Jones, as played by Hodges) and her boyfriend (Austin Marshall). The couple desperately needs to increase their income before they can get married. Before the final curtain, a show-biz representation of the President of the United States steps in and gracefully solves the lovers' dilemma.

"Ronnie probably remembered me from the play, or if not, at least as the subject of that song," Hodges said.

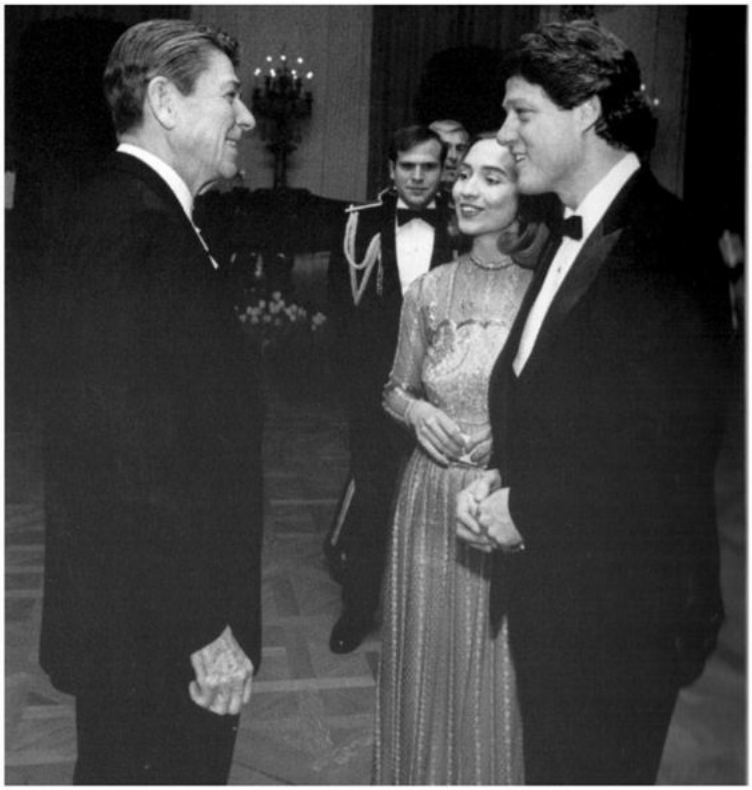
REST IN PEACE

In Memory of

Ronald Wilson Reagan

40th President (1981-1989) of the United States

February 6, 1911-June 5, 2004



At a White House Governor's Dinner, Ronald Reagan, 40th U.S. President, chats with Bill Clinton, the 42nd U.S. President, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, possibly the 45th U.S. President.

Near the conclusion of his first autobiography, Where's the Rest of Me?, Reagan was in a nostalgic mood. He remembered many of the people he had known, specifically acknowledging "May Robson, Alan Hale, Lionel Barrymore, Ethel Barrymore, Zasu (sic) Pitts, Eddy Arnold of the booming laugh, kindly Paul Harvey, roistering, scratching Wallace Beery, Charles Coburn (who amputated my legs), Adolph (sic) Menjou, and the greatest of all actors, Walter Huston."

Demurely, Reagan went on to label some of the less inhibited, more flamboyant actors he had known, specifically defining Ty Power, Errol Flynn, "Bogey," "Coop," Dick Powell, Wayne Morris, Clark Gable, and Jack

Carson, as members of “a special breed.”

Reagan ended his first (and relentlessly opaque) memoir on a reassuring, feel-good note, citing the usually rather blunt Clark Gable as saying, “The most important thing a man can know is, as he approaches his own door, that someone on the other side is listening for the sound of his footsteps.”

Referencing the happiness he’d found in married life with Nancy, and the wisdom he had found after the termination of his film career, he concluded, “(At last) I have found the rest of me.”

The Long Goodbye

In August of 1994, five years after his departure from the Oval Office, Ronald Reagan, with the ever faithful Nancy at his side, received the devastating news that he’d been diagnosed with Alzheimer’s disease.

Reacting to that, in November of that year, as autumn winds blew in from the Pacific, he penned a handwritten message to the American people. In part, it read:

“I have recently been told that I am one of the millions of Americans who will be afflicted with Alzheimer’s Disease…
“At the moment I feel just fine. I intend to live the remainder of the years God gives me on this earth doing the things I have always done…
“I now begin the journey that will lead me into the sunset of my life. I know that for America, there will always be a bright dawn ahead.
“Thank you, my friends. May God always bless you.”

From there, his health and his memory continued to deteriorate.

His friend, Merv Griffin, remembered visiting Reagan in his office in Los Angeles, at Century City. During that visit, the former President picked up a photograph of the White House. “This building looks familiar,” he said to the TV talk show host. “Where is it?”

Before he arrived in Hollywood, Reagan had been a gifted swimmer and lifeguard who saved 77 lives from drowning in the Rock River, near his home town of Dixon, Illinois.

But in retirement, he had to wear water wings and be propped up whenever he entered or departed from the waters of his pool by a security guard.

Flailing around for ways to fill his time, he developed and then defined a “special mission” for himself—gathering up magnolia leaves that had blown onto the pool’s surface. Recognizing the importance that Reagan associated with this task, Secret Service agents routinely collected bags of these leaves from other sites, placing them onto the surface of the pool’s water so he could then take credit for removing them.

Once a football star at Illinois’ Eureka College, Reagan, during his retirement, began to imagine that he had to get into uniform for the big game. “The team needs me!” he urgently and repeatedly told Nancy. He began to confuse scenes from his movies with his real life. Omnipresent were scenes from his famous football picture, Knute Rockne— All American (1940) that produced his all-time most famous line, “Win just one for the Gipper.”

One morning, the fast-deteriorating former president woke up sobbing, asking attendants nearby, “Where’s the rest of me?”—a question inspired by his critically acclaimed performance in Kings Row (1942), after a sadistic surgeon had maliciously amputated his legs. Decades later, from the depths of his dementia, he imagined that his own legs had been surgically removed.

The aging Titan would sometimes “cry like a baby” about taunts that his brother, Neil Reagan, had hurled at him, based on his belief that “Moon” had uttered those insults only a few hours before. Preceding him to the grave, his brother had died of Alzheimer’s Disease in 1996.

In reaction to her husband’s deterioration, Nancy, growing increasingly frail and having lost an alarming amount of weight, said “My heart is broken.”

As the first U.S. President to die during the 21st Century, Reagan passed on at his home in Bel Air, California, on June 5, 2004, not knowing that he had once been the most powerful elected leader in the World. His longevity defined him as the second longest-lived president in U.S. history, having survived 93 years and 120 days, just 45 days fewer than Gerald Ford.

After a state funeral in Washington’s National Cathedral, a ceremony presided over by then-president George W. Bush, Reagan’s body was flown back to the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, California.

There, at a sunset Memorial Service and Internment Ceremony, Nancy, overcome with grief, lost her composure, crying in public for the first time that week.

She accepted the folded flag that had been draped over the coffin of her one-and-only husband. As she kissed the casket, she mouthed the words, “I love you,” before her sad departure.

Her final words were, “Ronnie’s long journey has finally taken him to a distant place where I can no longer reach him.”

Ronald Reagan did not fear departing on another journey. He added a personalized footnote to his favorite poem, Alfred Lord Tennyson’s Crossing the Bar, verses that were read at his Memorial Service:

Sunset and evening star.
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea.

“We have God’s promise that I have gone on to a better world, where there is no pain or sorrow. Bring comfort to those who may mourn my going.”

—Ronald Reagan

“Who is this strange woman and why is she kissing me?” Reagan might have asked on February 6, 2000 the occasion of his 89th birthday.

As part of the celebration, Nancy had given him a piece of cake and a kiss. Their 45th wedding anniversary, scheduled for March 4, would transpire in less than a month. But he didn’t know who she was. He had no idea that he had ever married her.

Acknowledgments

Jane Wyman, Nancy Davis, and Ronald Reagan (despite the latter two's "reveal nothing" memoirs) chose not to tell us very much about what used to be called their "salad days." Perhaps they were just being discreet, preferring to emphasize their triumphs rather than their compromises and indiscretions.

We at Blood Moon subscribe to Oscar Wilde's adage that there's nothing else to do with gossip but spread it around. So consequently, we have decided to do it for them.

It took some effort, actually decades of it, to assemble this portrait of the Reagans' "Love Triangle."

We were aided in our research by a vast array of collaborators in the film colony. Virtually everyone who ever worked with the Reagans had opinions and insights about them, both good and bad. If we listed all of them—some of them wanted anonymity—it would fill many dozens of pages.

Those people quoted in this book were viewed as newsworthy enough to have been the subject of individual interviews over the course of many years. As the Reagans became increasingly famous, many "lesser souls" wanted to talk about their involvements with Nancy, Jane, and Ronald.

The list is long and convoluted, but here is a sampling of some of the contributors:

Jack Carson (who was especially insightful about his best friend, Dennis Morgan); John Payne (from a hospital bed in New York, following an accident); Susan Hayward (when she was semi-retired and my neighbor in Fort Lauderdale).

There were so many others: Glenda Farrell, Frank McHugh, Eddie Albert, Wayne Morris, Pat O'Brien, Edward G. Robinson, James Cagney, Allen Jenkins, Mervyn LeRoy, Priscilla Lane, Adele Jergens, Virginia Mayo, Ida Lupino, Phillip Terry, Ann Sheridan, Kent Smith, Audrey Totter, Rock Hudson, Raoul Walsh, Bruce Bennett, John Litel, Ray Enright, Tom Drake, Peter Lawford, Milton Berle, Bryan Foy, William Clemens, Lloyd Bacon, Anita Louise, Eddie Foy, Jr., Gale Page, Lewis Seiler, Michael Curtiz, Merv Griffin, Richard Thorpe, Alan Hale, Sr., Curtis Bernhardt, David Lewis, Jerry Wald, Viveca Lindfors, Alexis Smith, Peter Godfrey, Shirley Temple, Eve Arden, David Butler, Lewis R. Foster, Andrew Marton, Allan Dwan, and Nathan Juran.

As everyone in the business knows, the Hollywood Hills and the canyons of Manhattan are filled with (sometimes embittered) unpublished memoirs. It seems that everyone who was anybody, along with those who wanted to be, view their lives as worthy of a memoir. Year after year, most of these go unpublished

Blood Moon, however, receives some of these at regular intervals. Some representative titles have included: I Was Tyrone Power's Secret Male Lover, Liberace's Secret Life, and My Affair with Oprah Winfrey. Fear of libel often prevents the publication of many of these revelations.

Although many of their manuscripts never saw the light of publication, we are nonetheless grateful to the literary agencies operated by Bertha Klausner, Jay Garon-Brooke, and Ilsa Lahn for letting us wade through their "slush piles."

Manuscripts on Robert Taylor, Barbara Stanwyck, and especially Paulette Goddard (written by her former secretary) were most helpful, as were portraits of Dick Powell, Dennis Morgan, George Murphy, Betty Grable, Lucille Ball, and William Holden. Long before us, other authors attempted separate manuscripts on the subjects of this book—i.e., "tell-alls" about Nancy, Jane, and Ronald.

One of our greatest contributors was Joan Blondell, a dear friend and house guest. She was very helpful about the early career of her "fellow chorine," Jane Wyman, and filled with wonderful stories about backdoor intrigue at Warner Brothers in the 30s.

Another close friend, Van Johnson, on whose Manhattan terrace I spent many hours in the company of our mutual friend, songstress Greta Keller, had known and co-starred with Jane Wyman and (to a lesser degree) Reagan since World War II.

June Allyson was filled with revelations about the Reagans, especially in her later years, after she broke with Jane over a disagreement.

No one was more helpful than Stanley Mills Haggart, my former boss. He arrived in Hollywood during the Silent era and began writing about the film colony's fun and foibles in his voluminous diary. (It was never submitted for publication, and for good reason!) In the late 30s and early 40s, he had been Hedda Hopper's "leg man." In that much-envied and highly competitive position, he was often aided by his long-time companion, William Hopper (Hedda's son). William was a close personal friend of Reagan's, and appeared in bit parts in many of his early films.

Although Hedda couldn't print many of the indiscretions that Stanley and her son uncovered, confirmed, and delivered to her, she wanted to be keenly aware of what was happening after dark and during the pre-dawn hours of the industry that employed and fascinated her.

LOVE TRIANGLE

ITS AUTHORS

DARWIN PORTER

As an intense and precocious nine-year-old, Darwin Porter began meeting movie stars, TV personalities, politicians, and singers through his vivacious and attractive mother, Hazel, a somewhat eccentric Southern girl who had lost her husband in World War II. Migrating from the depression-ravaged valleys of western North Carolina to Miami Beach during its most ebullient heyday, Hazel became a stylist, wardrobe mistress, and personal assistant to the vaudeville comedienne Sophie Tucker, the bawdy and irrepressible "Last of the Red Hot Mamas."

Virtually every show-biz celebrity who visited Miami Beach paid a call on "Miss Sophie," and Darwin as a pre-teen loosely and indulgently supervised by his mother, was regularly dazzled by the likes of Judy Garland, Dinah Shore, Veronica Lake, Linda Darnell, Martha Raye, and Ronald Reagan, who arrived to pay his respects to Miss Sophie with a young blonde starlet on the rise—Marilyn Monroe.

Hazel's work for Sophie Tucker did not preclude an active dating life: Her beaux included Richard Widmark, Victor Mature, Frank Sinatra (who "tipped" teenaged Darwin the then-astronomical sum of ten dollars for getting out of the way), and that alltime "second lead," Wendell Corey, when he wasn't emoting with Barbara Stanwyck and Joan Crawford.

As a late teenager, Darwin edited The Miami Hurricane at the University of Miami, where he interviewed Eleanor Roosevelt, Tab Hunter, Lucille Ball, and Adlai Stevenson. He also worked for Florida's then-Senator George Smathers, one of John F. Kennedy's best friends, establishing an ongoing pattern of picking up "Jack and Jackie" lore while still a student.

After graduation, as a journalist, he was commissioned with the opening of a bureau of The Miami Herald in Key West (Florida), where he took frequent morning walks with retired U.S. president Harry S Truman during his vacations in what had functioned as his "Winter White House." He also got to know, sometimes very well, various celebrities "slumming" their way through off-the-record holidays in the orbit of then-resident Tennessee Williams. Celebrities hanging out in the permissive arts environment of Key West during those days included Tallulah Bankhead, Cary Grant, Tony Curtis, the step-father of Richard Burton, a gaggle of show-biz and publishing moguls, and the once-notorious stripper, Bettie Page.

For about a decade in New York, Darwin worked in television journalism and advertising with his long-time partner, the journalist, art director, and distinguished arts-industry socialite Stanley Mills Haggart. Jointly, they produced TV commercials starring such high-powered stars as Joan Crawford (then feverishly promoting Pepsi-Cola), Ronald Reagan (General Electric), and Debbie Reynolds (selling Singer Sewing Machines), along with such other entertainers as Louis Armstrong, Lena Horne, Arlene Dahl, and countless other show-biz personalities hawking commercial products.

During his youth, Stanley had flourished as an insider in early Hollywood as a "leg man" and source of information for Hedda Hopper, the fabled gossip columnist. On his nightly rounds, Stanley was most often accompanied by Hedda's son, William Hopper, a close friend of Ronald Reagan's.

When Stanley wasn't dishing newsy revelations with Hedda, he had worked as a Powers model; a romantic lead opposite Silent-era film star Mae Murray; the intimate companion of superstar Randolph Scott before Scott became emotionally involved with Cary Grant; and a man-about-town who archived gossip from everybody who mattered back when the movie colony was small, accessible, and confident that details about their tribal rites would absolutely never be reported in the press. Over the years, Stanley's vast cornucopia of inside Hollywood information was passed on to Darwin, who amplified it with copious interviews and research of his own.

After Stanley's death in 1980, Darwin inherited a treasure trove of memoirs, notes, and interviews detailing Stanley's early adventures in Hollywood, including in-depth recitations of scandals that even Hopper during her heyday was afraid to publish. Most legal and journalistic standards back then interpreted those oral histories as "unprintable." Times, of course, changed.

Beginning in the early 1960s, Darwin joined forces with the then-fledgling Arthur Frommer organization, playing a key role in researching and writing more than 50 titles and defining the style and values that later emerged as the world's leading travel accessories, The Frommer Guides, with particular emphasis on Europe, California, New England, and the Caribbean. Between the creation and updating of hundreds of editions of detailed travel guides to England, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Austria, Germany, California, and Switzerland, he continued to interview and discuss the triumphs, feuds, and frustrations of celebrities, many by then reclusive, whom he either sought out or encountered randomly as part of his extensive travels. Ava Gardner and Lana Turner were particularly insightful.

One day when Darwin lived in Tangier, he walked into an opium den to discover Marlene Dietrich sitting alone in a corner.

Darwin has also ghost written books for celebrities (who shall go nameless!) as well as a series of novels. His first, Butterflies in Heat, became a cult classic and was adapted into a film, Tropic of Desire, starring Eartha Kitt, among others. Other books included Razzle-Dazzle, about an errant female movie star of questionable morals; and an erotic thriller, Blood Moon, hailed as "pure novelistic Viagra, an American interpretation of Arthur Schnitzler's La Ronde."

Darwin's novel, Marika, published by Arbor House, evoked Marlene Dietrich for many readers.

His controversial novel, Venus, was suggested by the life of the fabled eroticist and diarist, Anaïs Nin. His novel, Midnight in Savannah, was a brutal saga of corruption, greed, and sexual tension exploring the eccentricities of Georgia's most notorious city.

His novel, Rhinestone Country, catalyzed a guessing game. Which male star was the inspiration for its lovable rogue, Pete Riddle? Mississippi Pearl praised it as "like a scalding gulp of rotgut whiskey on a snowy night in a bowjacks honky-tonk."

Darwin also transformed into literary format the details which he and Stanley Haggart had compiled about the relatively underpublicized scandals of the Silent Screen, releasing them in 2001 as Hollywood's Silent Closet, "an uncensored, underground history of Pre-Code Hollywood, loaded with facts and rumors from generations past."

Since then, Darwin has penned more than eighteen uncensored Hollywood biographies, many of them award-winners, on subjects who have included Marlon Brando; Merv Griffin; Katharine Hepburn; Howard Hughes; Humphrey Bogart; Michael Jackson; Paul Newman; Steve McQueen; Marilyn Monroe; Elizabeth Taylor; Frank Sinatra; John F. Kennedy; Vivien Leigh; Laurence Olivier; the well known porn star, Linda Lovelace; all three of the fabulous Gabor sisters, plus Tennessee Williams, Gore Vidal, Truman Capote, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis.

As a departure from his usual repertoire, Darwin also wrote the controversial J. Edgar Hoover & Clyde Tolson: Investigating the Sexual Secrets of America's Most Famous Men and Women, a book about celebrity, voyeurism, political and sexual repression, and blackmail within the highest circles of the U.S. government.

He has also co-authored, in league with Danforth Prince, four Hollywood Babylon anthologies, plus four separate volumes of film critiques, reviews, and commentary.

His biographies, over the years, have won more than 30 First Prize or runner-up awards at literary festivals in cities which include Boston, New York, Los Angeles, Hollywood, San Francisco, and Paris.

Darwin can be heard at regular intervals as a radio commentator (and occasionally on television), "dishing" celebrities, pop culture, politics, and scandal.

A resident of New York City, Darwin is currently at work on two biographies slated for release in 2015—Peter O'Toole, Hellraiser, Sexual Outlaw, and Irish Rebel; and Bill & Hillary—So This Is That Thing Called Love.

DANFORTH PRINCE

The publisher and co-author of Love Triangle, Danforth Prince is one of the "Young Turks" of the post-millennium publishing industry. He's president and founder of Blood Moon Productions, a firm devoted to researching, salvaging, compiling, and marketing the oral histories of America's entertainment industry.

One of Prince's famous predecessors, the late Lyle Stuart (self-described as "the last publisher in America with guts") once defined Prince as "one of my natural successors." In 1956, that then-novice maverick launched himself with $8,000 he'd won in a libel judgment against gossip columnist Walter Winchell. It was Stuart who published Linda Lovelace's two authentic memoirs—Ordeal and Out of Bondage.

"I like to see someone following in my footsteps in the 21st Century," Stuart told Prince. "You publish scandalous biographies. I did, too. My books on J. Edgar Hoover, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, and Barbara Hutton stirred up the natives. You do, too."

Prince launched his career in journalism in the 1970s at the Paris Bureau of The New York Times. In the early '80s, he resigned to join Darwin Porter in researching, developing and publishing various titles within The Frommer Guides, jointly reviewing the travel scenes of more than 50 nations for Simon & Schuster. Authoritative and comprehensive, they were perceived as best-selling "travel bibles" for millions of readers, with recommendations and travel advice about the major nations of Western Europe, the Caribbean, Bermuda, The Bahamas, Georgia and the Carolinas, and California.

Prince, along with Porter, is also the co-author of several award-winning celebrity biographies, each configured as a title within Blood Moon's Babylon series. These have included Hollywood Babylon—It's Back!; Hollywood Babylon Strikes Again; The Kennedys: All the Gossip Unfit to Print; and Frank Sinatra, The Boudoir Singer.

Prince, with Porter, has co-authored such provocative biographies as Elizabeth Taylor: There is Nothing Like a Dame.

With respect and a sense of irony about "When Divas Clash," Prince and Porter also co-authored Pink Triangle: The Feuds and Private Lives of Tennessee Williams, Gore Vidal, Truman Capote, and Members of their Entourages, as well as Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis: A Life Beyond Her Wildest Dreams.

Prince is also the co-author, with Darwin Porter, of four books on film criticism, three of which won honors at regional bookfests across America, including Los Angeles and San Francisco. Special features within these guides included the cinematic legacy of Tennessee Wiliams; the implications associated with strolling down Sunset Blvd., that "Boulevard of Broken Dreams"; behind-the-scenes revelations about the making of Ben-Hur, starring Charlton Heston. From Flesh to Trash, he previewed many of Andy Warhol's films and "unzipped" Marlon Brando. He also took a cinematic look at the legacy of Greta Garbo in the re-release of her movies of long ago, revisiting Mata Hari, Anna Christie, Queen Christina, Anna Karenina, Camille, and Ninotchka, among many others.

Prince, a graduate of Hamilton College and a native of Easton and Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, is the president and founder (in 1996) of the Georgia Literary Association, and of the Porter and Prince Corporation, founded in 1983, which has produced dozens of titles for both Prentice Hall and John Wiley & Sons. In 2011, he was named "Publisher of the Year" by a consortium of literary critics and marketers spearheaded by the J.M. Northern Media Group.

According to Prince, "Blood Moon provides the luxurious illusion that a reader is a perpetual guest at some gossippy dinner party populated with brilliant but occasionally self-delusional figures from bygone eras of The American Experience. Blood Moon's success at salvaging, documenting, and articulating the (till now) orally transmitted histories of the Entertainment Industry, in ways that have never been seen before, is one of the most distinctive aspects of our backlist."

Publishing in collaboration with the National Book Network (www.NBNBooks.com), he has electronically documented some of the controversies associated with his stewardship of Blood Moon in more than 50 videotaped documentaries, book trailers, public speeches, and TV or radio interviews. Any of these can be watched, without charge, by performing a search for "Danforth Prince" on YouTube.com, checking him out on Facebook (either "Danforth Prince" or "Blood Moon Productions"), on Twitter (#Bloodyand-Lunar) or by clicking on BloodMoonProductions.com.

During the rare moments when he isn't writing, editing, neurosing about, or promoting Blood Moon, he works out at a New York City gym, rescues stray animals, talks to strangers, and regularly attends Episcopal Mass every Sunday.

BLOOD MOON PRODUCTIONS

Entertainment About How America Interprets Its Celebrities

Blood Moon Productions is a feisty and independent New York based publishing enterprise dedicated to researching, salvaging, and indexing the oral histories of America's entertainment industry. As described by The Huffington Post, "Blood Moon, in case you don't know, is a small publishing house on Staten Island that cranks out Hollywood gossip books, about two or three a year, usually of five-, six-, or 700-page length, chocked with stories and pictures about people who used to consume the imaginations of the American public, back when we actually had a public imagination. That is, when people were really interested in each other, rather than in Apple 'devices.' In other words, back when we had vices, not devices."

Reorganized with its present name in 2004, Blood Moon originated in 1997 as the Georgia Literary Association, a vehicle for the promotion of obscure writers from America's Deep South. For several decades, Blood Moon and its key players (Darwin Porter and Danforth Prince) spearheaded the research, writing, and editorial functions of dozens of titles, and hundreds of editions, of THE FROMMER GUIDES, the most respected name in travel publishing.

Blood Moon maintains a back list of more than 30 critically acclaimed biographies, film guides, and novels. Its titles are distributed by the National Book Network (www.NBNBooks.com), and through secondary wholesalers and online retailers everywhere.

Since 2004, Blood Moon has been awarded dozens of nationally recognized literary prizes. They've included both silver and bronze medals from the IPPY (Independent Publishers Association) Awards; four nominations and two Honorable Mentions for BOOK OF THE YEAR from Foreword Reviews; nominations from The Ben Franklin Awards; and Awards and Honorable Mentions from the New England, the Los Angeles, the Paris, the Hollywood, the New York, and the San Francisco Book Festivals. Two of its titles have been Grand Prize Winners for Best Summer Reading, as defined by The Beach Book Awards, and in 2013, its triple-play overview of the Gabor sisters was designated as Biography of the Year by the Hollywood Book Festival.

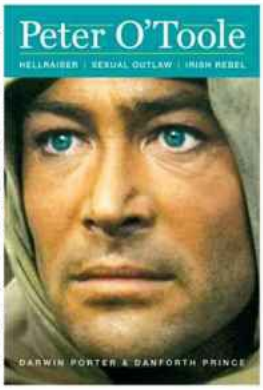
Danforth Prince, President
Blood Moon Productions, Ltd.

In the early summer of 2015, Blood Moon will release the grittiest, most unvarnished, and most comprehensive overview of the life, accomplishments, and scandals associated with the 20th Century's most astonishing (and most alarming) actor:

Peter O'Toole



One of the world's most admired (and brilliant) actors, Peter O'Toole wined and wenched his way through a labyrinth of sexual and interpersonal betrayals, sometimes with disastrous results. Away from the stage and screen, where such films as Becket and Lawrence of Arabia, made film history, his life was filled with drunken, debauched nights and edgy sexual experimentations, most of which were never openly examined in the press. A hellraiser, he shared wild times with his "best blokes" Richard Burton and Richard Harris. Peter Finch, also his close friend, once invited him to join him in sharing the pleasures of his mistress, Vivien Leigh.

"My father, a bookie, moved us to the Mick community of Leeds," O'Toole once told a reporter. "We were very poor, but I was born an Irishman, which accounts for my gift of gab, my unruly behavior, my passionate devotion to women and the bottle, and my loathing of any authority figure."

Author Robert Sellers described O'Toole's boyhood neighborhood. "Three of his playmates went on to be hanged for murder; one strangled a girl in a lovers' quarrel; one killed a man during a robbery; another cut up a warden in South Africa with a pair of shears. It was a heavy bunch."

Peter O'Toole's hell-raising life story has never been told, until now. Hot and uncensored, from a writing team which, even prior to O'Toole's death in 2013, had been collecting under-the-radar info about him for years, this book has everything you ever wanted to know about how THE LION navigated his way through the boudoirs of the Entertainment Industry IN WINTER, Spring, Summer, and a dissipated Autumn as well.

Blood Moon has ripped away the imperial robe, scepter, and crown usually associated with this quixotic problem child of the British Midlands. Provocatively uncensored, this illusion-shattering overview of Peter O'Toole's hellraising (or at least very naughty) and demented life is unique in the history of publishing.

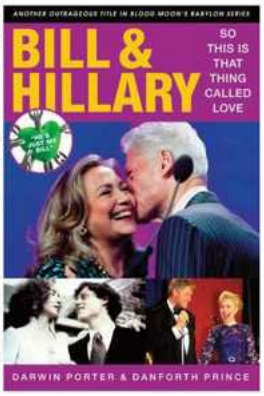
Bill & Hillary

So This Is That Thing Called Love



Blood Moon, famous for its exposés of celebrity scandal in Hollywood and in the political camps of both the Kennedys and the Reagans, has AT LAST turned its focus onto the role THE CLINTONS have played in Washington's Babylon.

No other big-league power team has ever done it like Bill & Hillary. With the release of this book, Blood Moon will prove that Democrats can generate scandals even more provocative than their Republican counterparts.

Unprecedented and unauthorized, this book is savvy about the ways smart people sometimes compromise in affairs of the human heart. It's not about politics, but about the political world's most enduring love affair, and the role of the Clintons as the world's most famous couple. It's based on revelations from witnesses to the dramas of a hard-nosed but nonetheless romantic team who might once again take over the Free World.

Its authors have studied virtually everything about the Clintons since their days as local celebrities in Little Rock. It all began when two students, meeting at Yale in 1970, united—based on their own brand of love—to launch "The Plan," events from which have already incited tragedy, triumph, screams of protest from sometimes horrified observers, and the ongoing fascination of celebrity-watchers everywhere.

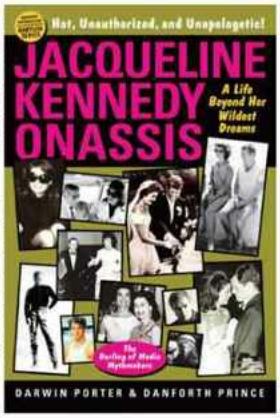
JACQUELINE KENNEDY ONASSIS

A Life Beyond Her Wildest Dreams



After floods of analysis and commentary in tabloid and mainstream newspapers worldwide, this has emerged as the world's most comprehensive testimonial to the flimsier side of Camelot, the most comprehensive compendium of gossip ever published about America's unofficial, uncrowned queen, Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis. Its publication coincided with the 20-year anniversary of the death of one of the most famous, revered, and talked-about women who ever lived.

During her tumultuous life, Mrs. Onassis zealously guarded her privacy and her secrets, but in the wake of her death, more and more revelations have emerged about her frustrations, her rage, her passions, her towering strengths, and her delicate fragility, which she hid from the glare of the world behind oversized sunglasses. Within this posthumous biography, a three-dimensional woman emerges through the compilation of some 1,000 eyewitness testimonials from men and women who knew her over a period of decades.

An overview of the life of Mrs. Onassis is a natural fit for Blood Moon, a publishing enterprise that's increasingly known, worldwide, as one of the most provocative and scandalous in the history of publishing.

"References to this American icon appear with almost rhythmic regularity to anyone researching the cultural landscape of America during the last half of The American Century," said Danforth Prince, Blood Moon's president and one of the book's co-authors. "Based on what we'd uncovered about Jackie during the research of many of our earlier titles, we're positioning ourselves as a more or less solitary outpost of irreverence within a landscape that's otherwise flooded with fawning, over-reverential testimonials. Therein lies this book's appeal—albeit with a constant respect and affection for a woman we admired and adored."

Based on decades of research by writers who define themselves as "voraciously attentive Kennedyphiles," it supplements the half-dozen other titles within Blood Moon's Babylon series.

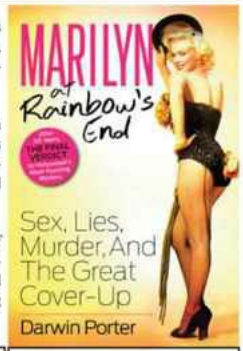
This book illustrates why Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, and why Marilyn Monroe was too dangerous to be allowed to go on living.

Less than an hour after the discovery of Marilyn Monroe's corpse in Brentwood, a flood of theories, tainted evidence, and conflicting testimonies began pouring out into the public landscape.

Filled with rage, hysteria, and depression, "and fed up with Jack's lies, Bobby's lies," Marilyn sought revenge and mass vindication. Her revelations at an imminent press conference could have toppled political dynasties and destroyed criminal empires. Marilyn had to be stopped…

Into this steamy cauldron of deceit, Marilyn herself emerges as a most unreliable witness during the weeks leading up to her murder. Her own deceptions, vanities, and self-delusion poured toxic accelerants on an already raging fire.



"This is the best book about Marilyn Monroe ever published." —David Hartnell, Recipient, in 2011, of New Zealand's Order of Merit (MNZM) for services to the entertainment industry, as defined by Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II.

MARILYN AT RAINBOW'S END

SEX, LIES, MURDER, AND THE GREAT COVER-UP, BY DARWIN PORTER
ISBN 978-1-936003-29-7 Temporarily sold out of Hard copies, but still available for E-Readers

"Darwin Porter is fearless, honest and a great read. He minces no words. If the truth makes you wince and honesty offends your sensibility, stay away. It's been said that he deals in muck because he can't libel the dead. Well, it's about time someone started telling the truth about the dead and being honest about just what happened to get us in the mess in which we're in. If libel is lying, then Porter is so completely innocent as to deserve an award. In all of his works he speaks only to the truth, and although he is a hard teacher and task master, he's one we ignore at our peril. To quote Gore Vidal, power is not a toy we give to someone for being good. If we all don't begin to investigate where power and money really are in the here and now, we deserve what we get. Yes, Porter names names. The reader will come away from the book knowing just who killed Monroe. Porter rather brilliantly points to a number of motives, but leaves it to the reader to surmise exactly what happened at the rainbow's end, just why Marilyn was killed. And, of course, why we should be careful of getting exactly what we want. It's a very long tumble from the top."

PINK TRIANGLE

The enfants terribles of America at mid-20th century challenged the sexual censors of their day while indulging in "bitchfests" for love & glory.

This book exposes their literary slugfests and offers an intimate look at their relationships with the glitterati—MM, Brando, the Oliviers, the Paleys, U.S. Presidents, a gaggle of other movie stars, millionaires, and dozens of others.

This is for anyone who's interested in the formerly concealed scandals of Hollywood and Broadway, and the values and pretentions of both the literary world and the entertainment industry.

"A banquet... If PINK TRIANGLE had not been written for us, we would have had to research and type it all up for ourselves…Pink Triangle is nearly seven hundred pages of the most entertaining histrionics ever sliced, spiced, heated, and serviced up to the reading public. Everything that Blood Moon has done before pales in comparison.

"Given the fact that the subjects of the book themselves were nearly delusional on the subject of themselves (to say nothing of each other) it is hard to find fault. Add to this the intertwined jungle that was the relationship among Williams, Capote, and Vidal, of the times they vied for things they loved most—especially attention—and the times they enthralled each other and the world, [Pink Triangle is] the perfect antidote to the Polar Vortex."

—Vinton McCabe in the NY JOURNAL OF BOOKS

"Blood Moon prides itself on mixing tabloid journalism, going to the source of gossip itself—okay, hearsay, or the quickly deteriorating minds of aging witnesses—with genuine moments of hard-work research (and there always is some of that in Blood Moon Productions' books) to come up with their titles.

"Full disclosure: I have been a friend and follower of Blood Moon Productions' tomes for years, and always marveled at the amount of information in their books—it's staggering. The index alone to Pink Triangle runs to 21 pages—and the scale of names in it runs like a Who's Who of American social, cultural and political life through much of the 20th century...The only remedy is for you to run out this February, in time for Valentine's Day, and buy Pink Triangle."

—Perry Brass in THE HUFFINGTON POST

"We Brits are not spared the Porter/Prince silken lash either. PINK TRIANGLE's research is, quite frankly, breathtaking. PINK TRIANGLE will fascinate you for many weeks to come. Once you have made the initial titillating dip, the day will seem dull without it."

—Jeffery Tayor in THE SUNDAY EXPRESS (UK)

ABOUT THE AUTHORS: Darwin Porter, himself an unrepentant enfant terrible, moved through the entourages of this Pink Triangle with impunity for several decades of their heyday. Early in 2014, he wrote a book about it.

"Every literate person in America has strong ideas about The Pink Triangle. This exposé of its members' feuds, vanities, and idiosyncracies will be required reading if you're interested in the literary climate of 'The American Century.'"

THOSE GLAMOROUS GABORS

Bombshells from Budapest

Darwin Porter

Zsa Zsa, Eva, and Magda Gabor transferred their glittery dreams and gold-digging ambitions from the twilight of the Austro-Hungarian Empire to Hollywood. There, more effectively than any army, these Bombshells from Budapest broke hearts, amassed fortunes, lovers, and A-list husbands, and amused millions of voyeurs through the medium of television, movies, and the social registers. In this astonishing "triple-play" biography, designated "Best Biography of the Year" by the Hollywood Book Festival, Blood Moon lifts the "mink-and-diamond" curtain on this amazing trio of blood-related sisters, whose complicated intrigues have never been fully explored before.

From the New York Review of Books: "You will never be Ga-bored…this book gives new meaning to the term compelling.

"Be warned, Those Glamorous Gabors is both an epic and a pip. Not since Gone With the Wind have so many characters on the printed page been forced to run for their lives for one reason or another. And Scarlett making a dress out of the curtains is nothing compared to what a Gabor will do when she needs to scrap together an outfit for a movie premiere or late-night outing.

"For those not up to speed, Jolie Tilleman came from a family of jewelers and therefore came by her love for the shiny stones honestly, perhaps genetically. She married Vilmos Gabor somewhere around World War 1 (exact dates, especially birth dates, are always somewhat vague in order to establish plausible deniability later on) and they were soon blessed with three daughters: Magda, the oldest, whose hair, sadly, was naturally brown, although it would turn quite red in America; Zsa Zsa (born 'Sari') a natural blond who at a very young age exhibited the desire for fame with none of the talents usually associated with achievement, excepting beauty and a natural wit; and Eva, the youngest and blondest of the girls, who after seeing Grace Moore perform at the National Theater, decided that she wanted to be an actress and that she would one day move to Hollywood to become a star.

"Given that the Gabor family at that time lived in Budapest, Hungary, at the period of time between the World Wars, that Hollywood dream seemed a distant one indeed. The story—the riches to rags to riches to rags to riches again myth of survival against all odds as the four women, because of their Jewish heritage, flee Europe with only the minks on their backs and what jewels they could smuggle along with them in their decolletage, only to have to battle afresh for their places in the vicious Hollywood pecking order—gives new meaning to the term 'compelling.' The reader, as if he were witnessing a particularly gore-drenched traffic accident, is incapable of looking away."

—New York Review of Books

About the Author:
Darwin Porter spent more than a half-century collecting anecdotes and interviews with virtually everyone ever associated with the Gabors, including a gaggle of Hungarian and Viennese eyewitnesses who remembered the Gabors before their American debuts. Jolie Gabor, the trio's mother, was a frequent guest within Porter's home in New York City, and for a period of three years, the Austrian-born cabaret singer, Greta Keller (Jolie Gabor's best friend and each of the three sisters' godmother) was a semi-permanent resident there. Jolie and Greta, "two shrewd and hard-nosed battleaxes from the mine fields of Old Europa," are included among the many sources which contributed to the hundreds of never-before-published revelations which permeate this astonishing triple biography.

INSIDE LINDA LOVELACE'S DEEP THROAT

Degradation, Porno Chic, and the Rise of Feminism

"THIS BOOK IS A WINNER!" An insider's view of the unlikely heroine who changed the world's perceptions about pornography, censorship, and sexual behavior patterns forever

The Beach Book Festival's Grand Prize Winner: "Best Summer Reading of 2013"
Runner-Up to "Best Biography of 2013" The Los Angeles Book Festival
Winner of a Sybarite Award from HedoOnline.com

"This book drew me in..How could it not?" Coco Papy, Bookslut.

A Bronx-born brunette, the notorious Linda Lovelace was the starry-eyed Catholic daughter in the 1950s of a police officer who nicknamed her "Miss Holy Holy." Twenty years later, she became the most notorious actress of the 20th century.

She'd fallen in love with a tough ex-Marine, Chuck Traynor, and eventually married him, only to learn that she had become his meal ticket. He forced her at gunpoint into a role as a player within hardcore porn, including a 1971 bestiality film entitled Dogarama.

Her next film, shot for $20,000, was released in 1972 as Deep Throat. It became the largest grossing XXX-rated flick of all time, earning an estimated $750 million and still being screened all over the world. The fee she was paid was $1,200, which her husband confiscated. The sexy 70s went wild for the film. Porno chic was born, with Linda as its centerpiece.

Traynor, a sadist, pimped his wife to celebrities, charging them $2,000 per session, It became a status symbol to commission an "individualized" film clip of Linda performing her specialty. Clients included Elvis Presley, Frank Sinatra, Milton Berle, Desi Arnaz, Marlon Brando, William Holden, Peter Lawford, and Burt Lancaster. The Mafia had found its most lucrative business—pornography—since Prohibition.

After a decade of being assaulted, beaten, and humiliated, Linda, in 1980, underwent a "Born Again" transformation. She launched her own feminist anti-pornography movement, attracting such activists as Gloria Steinem, and scores of other sex industry professionals who refuted their earlier careers.

Critics claimed that Linda's Deep Throat changed America's sexual attitudes more than anything since the first Kinsey report in 1948, that she super-charged the feminist movement, and that to some degree, she re-defined the nation's views on obscenity.

The tragic saga of Linda Lovelace changed beliefs about entertainment, morality, and feminism in America. This book tells you what the movie doesn't.

Darwin Porter, author of some twenty critically acclaimed celebrity exposés of behind-the-scenes intrigue in the entertainment industry, was deeply involved in the Linda Lovelace saga as it unfolded in the 70s, interviewing many of the players, and raising money for the legal defense of the film's co-star, Harry Reems. In this book, emphasizing her role as a celebrity interacting with other celebrities, he brings inside information and a never-before-published revelation to almost every page.*

WINNER OF FOUR DISTINGUISHED LITERARY AWARDS, THIS IS THE BEST BIOGRAPHY OF VIVIEN LEIGH & LAURENCE OLIVIER EVER PUBLISHED

Scarlett O'Hara, Desperately in Love with Heathcliff, Together on the Road to Hell

Here, for the first time, is a biography that raises the curtain on the secret lives of Lord Laurence Olivier, often cited as the finest actor in the history of England, and Vivien Leigh, who immortalized herself with her Oscar-winning portrayals of Scarlett O'Hara in Gone With the Wind, and as Blanche DuBois in Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire.

Dashing and "impossibly handsome," Laurence Olivier was pursued by the most dazzling luminaries, male and female, of the movie and theater worlds.

Lord Olivier's beautiful and brilliant but emotionally disturbed wife (Viv to her lovers) led a tumultuous off-the-record life whose paramours ranged from the A-list celebrities to men she selected randomly off the street. But none of the brilliant roles depicted by Lord and Lady Olivier, on stage or on screen, ever matched the power and drama of personal dramas which wavered between Wagnerian opera and Greek tragedy. Damn You, Scarlett O'Hara is the definitive and most revelatory portrait ever published of the most talented and tormented actor and actress of the 20th century.

Darwin Porter is the principal author of this seminal work.

Roy Moseley, this book's co-author, was an intimate friend of both Lord and Lady Olivier, maintaining a decades-long association with the famous couple, nurturing them through triumphs, emotional breakdowns, and streams of suppressed scandal. A resident of California who spent most of his life in England, Moseley has authored or co-authored biographies of Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip, Rex Harrison, Cary Grant, Merle Oberon, Roger Moore, and Bette Davis.

*"Damn You, Scarlett O'Hara can be a dazzling read, the prose unmannered and instantly digestible. The authors' ability to pile scandal atop scandal, seduction after seduction, can be impossible to resist."

PAUL NEWMAN

The Man Behind the Baby Blues, His Secret Life Exposed

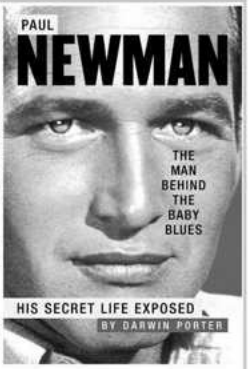
Darwin Porter

Drawn from firsthand interviews with insiders who knew Paul Newman intimately, and compiled over a period of nearly a half-century, this is the world's most honest and most revelatory biography about Hollywood's pre-eminent male sex symbol.

If you're a fan of Newman (and who do you know who isn't) you really should look at this book. It's a respectful but candid cornucopia of once-concealed information about the sexual and emotional adventures of an affable, impossibly good-looking workaday actor, a former sailor from Shaker Heights, Ohio, who parlayed his ambisexual charm and extraordinatily good looks into one of the most successful careers in Hollywood.

Whereas the situations it exposes were widely known within Hollywood's inner circles, they've never before been revealed to the general public.

But now, the full story has been published, as recorded by celebrity chronicler Darwin Porter—the giddy heights and agonizing crashes of a great American star, with revelations and insights never before published in any other biography.



ABOUT THE AUTHOR: "There are guilty pleasures. Then there is the master of guilty pleasures, Darwin Porter. There is nothing like reading him for passing the hours. He is the Nietzsche of Naughtiness, the Goethe of Gossip, the Proust of Pop Culture. Porter knows all the nasty buzz anyone has ever heard whispered in dark bars, dim alleys, and confessional booths. And lovingly, precisely, and in as straightforward a manner as an oncoming train, his prose whacks you between the eyes with the greatest gossip since Kenneth Anger. Some would say better than Anger."

How the FBI and its G-Men Investigated Hollywood

This epic saga of power and corruption has a revelation on every page—cross dressing, gay parties, sexual indiscretions, hustlers for sale, alliances with the Mafia, and criminal activity by the nation's chief law enforcer.

It's all here, with chilling details about the abuse of power on the dark side of the American saga. But mostly it's the decades-long love story of America's two most powerful men who could tell presidents "how to skip rope." (Hoover's words.)

Winner of Literary Awards from the Los Angeles and the Hollywood Book Festivals

"EVERYONE'S DREDGING UP J. EDGAR HOOVER. Leonardo DiCaprio just immortalized him, and now comes Darwin Porter's paperback, J. Edgar Hoover & Clyde Tolson: Investigating the Sexual Secrets of America's Most Famous Men and Women.

It shovels Hoover's darkest secrets dragged kicking and screaming from the closet. It's filth on every VIP who's safely dead and some who are still above ground."

—Cindy Adams, The New York Post

"This book is important, because it destroys what's left of Hoover's reputation. Did you know he had intel on the bombing of Pearl Harbor, but he sat on it, making him more or less responsible for thousands of deaths? Or that he had almost nothing to do with the arrests or killings of any of the 1930s gangsters that he took credit for catching?

"A lot of people are angry with its author, Darwin Porter. They say that his outing of celebrities is just cheap gossip about dead people who can't defend themselves. I suppose it's because Porter is destroying carefully constructed myths that are comforting to most people. As gay men, we benefit the most from Porter's work, because we know that except for AIDS, the closet was the most terrible thing about the 20th century. If the closet never existed, neither would Hoover. The fact that he got away with such duplicity under eight presidents makes you think that every one of them was a complete fool for tolerating it."

Humphrey Bogart
The Making of a Legend

The Gods bestow their gifts at random, and They decided to give Humphrey Bogart equal doses of good and bad luck. All those years of heavy drinking and smoking finally caught up with him in 1957. But, as compensation, the Gods granted him immortality.

Darwin Porter, in this revelatory biography, provides the greatest insight yet into how a young, struggling New York actor, Humphrey Bogart, became the movie legend, "Bogie," adored by millions around the world.

"Bogie, we hardly knew you." That's what readers will be saying after reading this daring, myth-shattering biography of the screen's most famous movie star. Award-winning biographer Darwin Porter reveals what really lay under that trench coat. Exposed with all their juicy details is what Bogie never told his fourth wife, Lauren Bacall, herself a screen legend.

It's all here. The screen icon's unknown affair with Bette Davis, his co-star in The Petrified Forest, and even details about his on-and off-screen romance with Ingrid Bergman during the filming of Casablanca—a secret liaison which has been falsely denied for years.

The Making of a Legend follows Bogie—originally known as "Hump"—from his birth on Christmas Day in 1899, through four marriages, and ending when he drew his last breath in January of 1957.

There's a revelation on every page. One tantalizing tidbit, for example, provides lurid details about how his third wife, actress Mayo Methot of "The Battling Bogarts," attempted to murder him.

In this biography, the mystery of Bogie's bumpy ride from Broadway to Hollywood has, like the enigma of The Maltese Falcon, been solved. He enjoyed affairs with the sexiest sirens of Hollywood's Golden Age, including Marlene Dietrich, Barbara Stanwyck, Ann Sheridan, Tallulah Bankhead, Joan Crawford, and a host of lesser but in most cases, fiercely ambitious divas. Within the pages of this book, pre-Code Hollywood—flappers, Prohibition, bathtub gin, and sex of all persuasions—is re-created.

We learn about Bogie's longtime affair with Verita Thompson, a liaison that lasted longer than any of his marriages and which included a final deathbed declaration of their love.

As Louise Brooks told the author in Rochester, New York, "You've heard of serial killers. Bogie was a serial seducer. He just stood there waiting for women, who swarmed to him like moths to a flame. Once they appeared, he showed them a real good time. That included me."

Or, as Bette Davis told the author in Los Angeles, "For crime-outre, what a place Hollywood was back then. Women like Joan Crawford were sleeping with different partners at least four times a week. Bogart was in the Flynn before anyone ever heard of Errol. Hollywood was one giant bordello. Men with women, men with men, women with women, and the public never knew."

This revelatory book is based on dusty unpublished memoirs, letters, diaries, and often personal interviews from the women and the men who adored him. There are also shocking allegations from colleagues, former friends, and jilted lovers who wanted the screen icon to burn in hell. All this and more, much more, in Darwin Porter's newest celebrity exposé, Humphrey Bogart, The Making of a Legend.

One of the most prolific biographers in the world, Darwin Porter inherited the diaries, notes, and oral histories of writers and witnesses who had known and followed the career of Humphrey Bogart beginning in the 1920s. This remarkable compendium of information results from three generations of Bogart fans watching, evaluating, and recording the foibles and eccentricities of America's most famous movie star.

"In 1980, Darwin Porter inherited a vast but disorganized archive that had been compiled over a period of 50 years by eyewitnesses to the Jazz-Age shenanigans of Humphrey Bogart. Enriching it with information from players who either loved or hated Bogart (or both), Porter distilled this treasure trove of historic data into one blockbuster of a Hollywood read."

Danforth Prince

"Porter's biography is laced with gossippy gems. It also paints a sympathetic portrait of Bogart as a loyal friend who went out of his way to help others. He also had some scandalous skeletons in his closet."

The National Enquirer

"Porter's book uncovers scandals within the entertainment industry, when publicists from the movie studios deliberately twisted and suppressed inconvenient details about the lives of their emerging stars."

Turner Classic Movie News

"Humphrey Bogart was one of Hollywood's most celebrated lovers, his romance with Lauren Bacall hailed as one of the greatest love stories of the 20th century. But before they met, he was a drug-taking womaniser, racking up a string of failed marriages and broken relationships with some of the world's most beautiful women. Here, in an extraordinary biography drawing on a wealth of previously unseen material, veteran showbusiness writer Darwin Porter reveals the explosive truth behind Bogart's shady past."

In the pages ahead, a description of the source of each individual piece of information is positioned very close to the spot where that information actually appears. Also, within the pages ahead, direct quotations have been transcribed "as they were remembered" by the witnesses who originally heard the remarks. They're presented with the same nuances, and with the same phraseologies, that were used when those remarks were originally transmitted.

CHAPTER ONE

It was an idyllic setting, a picture postcard of Victorian life that still thrived in America before its last vestiges were swept away by the coming of the Great War.

Ever since the final summer of the nineteenth century, handsome Dr. Belmont DeForest Bogart and his successful artist wife, Maud, with her frizzy red hair and strong jaw, had come to a manicured spot on the shoreline of Lake Canandaigua, one of New York State's Finger Lakes, to relax and go sailing on his deluxe yacht*, Comrade*, moored just two hundred feet from their gingerbread-decorated, two-story Victorian manse.

A local brewer, Jonathan Mulhouse, had built the house in 1871 for his rotund wife and their equally hefty brood of six very fat children. Although Mulhouse himself looked like a lean and mean Abraham Lincoln, his children resembled his blubber wife more than they did himself. The Mulhouse family was the scandal of Seneca Point. The children were ridiculed for their weight and for a physical deformity inherited from Mrs. Mulhouse. None of the brood had a neck. Locals called them the "no-neck Mulhouses." This genetic flaw also didn't come from Mr. Mulhouse, who had one of the longest necks east of the Mississippi.

The ridiculous appearance of the Mulhouses was not the only subject of local gossip. Rumor had it Mrs. Mulhouse allowed all her children to drink beer from her husband's brewery even though they were underage.

It had been with a sigh of relief that neighbors learned in 1899 that a New York doctor and his wife had taken over the Mulhouse home. "To judge from the size of Mr. Bogart's yacht moored on the lake, I think they are rich New Yorkers," the Mayor, Frank Schmidt, proudly announced at a private dinner of the Chamber of Commerce. "From what I hear, the Bogarts are a most respectable family."

The arrival of the Bogarts at Canandaigua and their departure every Labor Day was considered a news event to be reported in The Canandaigua Gazette.

On the particularly lovely summer afternoon of July 5, 1913, the spire of the tower room of the Bogart home still stood proudly after the Fourth of July fireworks. The lawns sweeping down to the lake were immaculately trimmed.

The crops were at full bloom in the adjoining farmlands, and cows grazed in the surrounding pasturelands. Even the woods seemed quiet except for a young farmhand sneaking into the darkest part of the forest with one of the local wives whose husband was in New York City on a business trip. From his bedroom window, the teenage son, Humphrey, nicknamed, "Hump," looked out at the weeping willows that fluttered in the wind so gracefully that their movements seemed to be the work of a choreographer.

When Maud had first seen the fluttery willows and a bubbling brook running alongside their property, she'd dubbed their new home "Willow Brook." She set about to furnish it with crystal, tapestries, classical statues, precious china, antiques, and Oriental carpets.

The Bogarts' neighbors were invariably from Boston or New York, and they'd come to Seneca Point, a rich community directly south of& ;Canandaigua, to escape from the blistering summer heat of those two cities. Wealthy businessmen hobnobbed with bankers, newspaper columnists, presidents of colleges, and even a well-cared-for clergyman who was said to drink five bottles of wine a day.

Dr. Belmont DeForest Bogart and his wife, Maud Bogart

Willow Brook, their summer house on Canandaigua Lake,

It was at Seneca Point that young Hump first met two men called the Warner Brothers. They were not the brothers who built a powerful Hollywood studio that would bring Hump his greatest fame when he was no longer called "Hump" but "Bogie." These Warner Brothers, Henry and David, designed and constructed steamboats, including some showboats that sailed up and down the Mississippi.

Even more fascinating was another pair of brothers, Frank and Arthur Hamlin, who lived next door to the Bogarts. Their father was the local banker. Ever since Hump rescued Arthur from the lake when the youngster fell off the dock, the Hamlins had told Hump he could consider "our house your second home."

Although Hump enjoyed playing games with the boys, he mostly liked coming over to visit their mother, Mary Hamlin, in the afternoons where she gave him rich pastries and told him& of her life in the theater.

She wrote religious dramas which played across the country. It wasn't Hump's type of drama but he loved listening to her stories about life in the theater. She knew all the great actors of her day and confided the most intimate stories about their personal lives.

"It's a world of make-believe," she told Hump. "You can lose yourself in the world of the theater." Mary urged Hump and his playmates to launch an impromptu theater at the lakeshore near the bandstand, setting up their own summer playhouse.

Until meeting Mary, Hump had never considered being an actor. When it was first suggested to him, he told Mary that it wasn't his kind of thing. "Father wants me to be a surgeon, but I'd rather be a sailor."

In time, breaking from religious dramas, Mary Hamlin would write Alexander Hamilton, a play that became a hit on Broadway. Warner Brothers, Hump's future studio, purchased the rights to it and filmed it in 1931. The movie became one of the most successful talkies of that time.

In his bedroom, a noise distracted Hump, who went to look out the rear of his window, from which he had a good view of the carriage road that ran over a one-lane stone-built bridge at the rear of their manse.

Their cook was receiving a load of fresh produce from a local farmer. From a horse-pulled carriage, he could see the unloading of the largest, ripest tomatoes he'd ever seen, along with peaches, potatoes, carrots, and grapes so fresh that the aroma of the vineyard rose to his second-floor open window. Maud always insisted that she get "only the best" of the local bounty before it was shipped off to the stifling city markets of New York City or Philadelphia.

Seneca Point in those days was a staunchly Republican enclave even though only that summer, a young Democrat, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, had arrived, ostensibly on what he'd told his cronies was a "hunting expedition." The daughters of the prosperous families of Seneca Point were said to have produced the loveliest single concentration of "female pulchritude" this side of Broadway. Roosevelt became enamored of one young belle, Beth Ferguson, whom he invited every afternoon to the lake for swimming. It was while showing off his prowess as a swimmer that Roosevelt had been stricken with a stomach cramp. When Beth saw his right arm go up into the air and then her boyfriend go under, she thought he was playing another one of& his many tricks on her. Since meeting her, he'd always chided her for being so gullible. At first& she'd thought that he was only pretending to be drowning. When he didn't surface for a while, she grew panicky and screamed for help.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt

The family of Dwight St. Davids was having a picnic nearby along the shores of the lake. Beth screamed to them to rescue Roosevelt. Their youngest son, Peter, was home for the holidays from Princeton. Sensing what was wrong, Peter, an expert swimmer, dived into the cold lake and swam toward Roosevelt. Peter went underwater and emerged with Roosevelt gasping for air. Peter brought the body ashore and called for his other family members to help him carry the body to the nearby Bogart home.

When Dr. Belmont Bogart came out onto his front verandah, he encountered what he thought was a dead victim of drowning. He rushed to give the young man medical attention.

The commotion attracted the rest of the Bogart family. Hump, Maud, and the two daughters, Catherine and Frances, also came out onto the porch. They looked in horror as Belmont seemingly brought life back to the victim. When young Roosevelt was breathing properly once again, Belmont ordered that he be taken upstairs and put in Hump's bed.

Laid to rest on the soft bed upstairs, Roosevelt fell into a deep coma-like sleep. Belmont ordered Hump to stay in the room with the recovering victim in case he should experience a turn for the worse. "Make sure that he's breathing all right," Belmont said before heading downstairs to join Maud.

Hump resented spending the rest of the afternoon and evening guarding Roosevelt. A surly Irish maid arrived with a tray of food for his supper. She plopped down the tray telling him, "Eat it if you don't want to starve."

"I don't like turnips," Hump protested.

"Then throw the bloody things out the window," the maid said before going out and slamming the door.

With those turnips still uneaten on his plate, Hump had fallen asleep somewhere during the middle of the night. Before nodding off, he'd checked on Roosevelt. The young man was snoring loudly.

The following morning, it had been Roosevelt who awakened Hump. The doctor and Maud had departed on a shopping expedition, and had left Hump to have breakfast alone with Roosevelt after the doctor had examined him and had pronounced him fit.

Roosevelt appeared to be in his late twenties or even early thirties. It had been over the breakfast table where Hump finally got his favorite dish—ham and eggs—that he'd begun to learn who their mysterious guest was.

Even though innocent at the time, Hump soon realized that Roosevelt, who had quickly become "Franklin" to him, was not supposed to be at Seneca Point but had told his wife, Eleanor, that he was in Philadelphia on business. "Being an attorney allows me to go out of town on occasion," Franklin said,& "and seize the opportunity."

"Are you related to Theodore Roosevelt?" Hump asked.

"Actually, he's my fifth cousin," Roosevelt said, "but we're not particularly close. In fact, I married one of my cousins, Eleanor. A fine woman but a bit plain. Perhaps you'll meet her one day. If you do, please keep my visit to Seneca Point a secret."

Hump promised that he would.

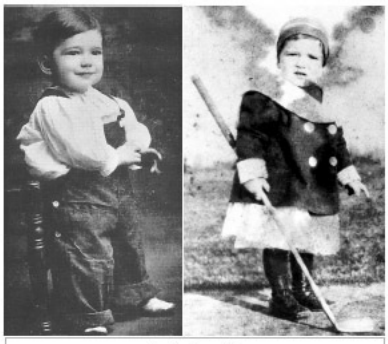
After thanking Hump for the hospitality and leaving a note for Dr. Bogart, whom he claimed “saved my life,” Franklin departed, planning to return to New York City. He told Hump he was heading for Washington, where he was going to become Assistant Secretary of the Navy. “Cousin Theodore held that post before moving on to become governor of New York and later president of the United States. Who knows? I might follow his trail.” Before leaving, Franklin said, “Since we share a dark secret, young man, I want to invite you to come and visit me in Washington when you grow up a bit more. Washington may not have as many beautiful young girls as Seneca Point, but I’m sure to find a suitable debutante for you.”

“That’s a promise I’ll hold you to,” Hump said before shaking the young politician’s hand.

“This is not good-bye,” Franklin said. “It’s just a temporary farewell until we meet again. Hopefully, under far better circumstances.”

The strange visit of Franklin Roosevelt to Seneca Point had been the highlight of Hump’s summer there. Otherwise, he found the days long, lazy, and slow. He craved action and wasn’t getting any excitement from anywhere except from books. He loved to read.

Back in his upstairs bedroom following a big lunch, he felt bloated. He liked to lie down after eating to digest his food.



Bogie, Aged 2

Maud always preferred to go with his father to sit on their large front verandah overlooking the lake. Over the lunch table, Hump had gotten mad at the mean family cook. Although the meal had consisted of two roasts, and a selection of seven fresh vegetables from the field, there was no ham& on the table. He always complained when he saw no ham.

Going downstairs for a glass of cold water, Hump looked out through the French doors onto the porch where his parents were resting in a large swing. He wondered if he’d ever grow to be as tall as his father, all six feet of him with shoulders so broad he could have been a football player. Even on the hottest days, Belmont never appeared outside the house unless he was dressed in a heavy suit of dark blue wool along with a white shirt and a stiff collar. He always ordered the maid to “make my collars extra stiff.”

Almost as tall as her husband, Maud was an Edwardian beauty. She invariably wore only mauve, lavender, or gray —mostly graceful silks that seemed to flow in the wind, or else heavily starched cotton dresses that were immaculately tailored. She had thirty pairs of high-heeled, high-button shoes, always with a lavender ribbon. The tiny shoes were like those of a little girl’s. Almost daily, Maud commented on her size two and a half feet. “They’re so tiny I don’t know how they carry me around. Some six-year-old girls have feet larger than mine.”

Remarks such as that always brought a compliment from Belmont. “In China I hear they bind women’s feet to make them as small, tender, and beautiful as yours. I don’t dare get you near a Chinaman because he’d kidnap you for his harem and make love to your feet all night.”

Returning with his cold water to take upstairs, where he was reading Joseph Conrad’s The Nigger of the Narcissus, Hump paused once again to look out at the bucolic scene of his parents sitting in the swing on their verandah on this perfect summer day.

From his black leather satchel, Belmont removed a syringe. Maud was wearing a long-sleeved dress in soft tones of mauve with gray accessories. She unbuttoned the pearl buttons on her left arm and rolled up her sleeve. With his wife's forearm exposed in all its porcelain beauty, Belmont very gently inserted a needle into her arm. She closed her eyes and leaned back in the swing as if enjoying a respite from the hot summer afternoon by a cooling breeze blowing in from the lake.

After having injected his wife, Belmont removed his jacket and rolled up the sleeve of his white shirt. He then injected the needle into his own arm.

Hump had seen enough. He didn't know exactly what was happening, only that his parents were injecting morphine into their arms. Morphine, he'd heard, was to be injected only into sick people. His parents weren't sick. They'd never looked better and healthier.

Placing the glass of water on a nearby antique, Hump quietly tiptoed upstairs. He didn't want his parents to know he'd been spying on them in a secret moment.

Back in his bedroom, he was deeply disturbed by that scene he'd just witnessed on the porch. He picked up his book and tried to resume reading it on his bed.

Somehow he knew that what his father was doing was not right, but he didn't exactly understand why it was wrong. From the safety of his bedroom, he tried to think this out rationally. His father was a surgeon and a leading heart and lung specialist, earning $20,000 a year, so Hump figured his father must have a valid reason to shoot morphine into himself and into Maud.

An awful reality dawned. His parents weren't healthy at all. They were sick and that's why they needed the morphine, perhaps to prevent some incurable illness.

He dropped his Conrad book to the floor and sat up in his bed. This idyllic summer home, and their grand life in New York City would surely come to an end if his parents died. Who would raise him and his sisters?

A paralyzing fear swept over him. He had to find out what was the matter with them.

His world as he'd known it was now in jeopardy.

Two days after Hump had seen his father shooting morphine into his mother's arm and his own arm, he went to Maud's studio and knocked on her door. When working, she'd left instructions not to disturb her for any reason, "even if someone is dying." Showing her displeasure, she threw open the door. "What is it?"

"I saw the needles going into your arms," he blurted out.

She pulled him inside. "You're to tell no one, especially your sisters. Certainly none of the neighbors."

"If you're sick, I want to know," he protested.

Very patiently Maud sat him down and told him that three years before he was born, his father had been in a dreadful accident after he'd earned his degree at Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons.

"Your father was an intern being driven in a horse-drawn ambulance going at top speed. The vehicle accidentally overturned when it hit an enormous pothole. Belmont fell out of the ambulance onto the cobblestones. The ambulance turned over on him, breaking five of his ribs and his left leg. The leg was not set properly. It had to be broken again and reset by more competent surgeons. Ever since that day, your father's health has declined, and he constantly suffers unbearable pain. He doesn't want you children to know the extent of his pain. He puts up a brave front for all of us."

"I'm sorry to hear that," Hump said. "That tells me a lot about father. But what's the matter with you? Why do you need morphine?"

"I don't suffer as much as Belmont does, but I have this skin disease. The words won't mean anything to you. It's called erysipelas, a streptococcal inflammation. That means fiery hot, red skin that burns me so badly at times it's like putting my skin on a hot stove. Sometimes when I'm in here retreating from the world, it's because I can't show my face. Either my left or right eye will close completely. A whole side of my face will burst into flames. The condition will even spread to my breasts. Morphine is the only thing to cure it. Belmont thinks that the condition is so severe, the pain so unbearable, that I will be driven crazy if I don't take drugs."

"But won't morphine turn you and father into drug addicts?"

Enraged, Maud grabbed the back of Hump's stiff shirt and ushered him toward the door. As he stepped into the hallway, she said, "Don't you ever come into my studio again." She slammed the door in his face.

Humiliated, Hump rushed down the hall, colliding into one of the Irish maids, Jane Byrne, "Watch where in the hell you're going, you little shit," she cried out at him. She used the word "shit" all the time.

All the servants called him "the little shit," never Humphrey. It was "the little shit" this, or "the little shit" that. For the rest of his life, Hump would refuse to allow the word "shit" to be uttered in his presence.

He didn't understand why Maud always recruited from the lowest class of Irish servants, each of whom received $3.50 a week in pay. They had vile tempers, horrible manners, and terrible language. Without provocation, a servant would suddenly strike either him or one of his sisters. Complaints about the behavior of the staff to his parents went unheeded. They didn't seem to care.

When Hump had told Maud that the male servant, Liam Mangam, had taken off his leather belt and had beaten him severely, she'd said, "I'm sure he wouldn't have done that if you'd been behaving properly."

After Maud had ushered him from her studio, Hump wanted to run away or at least escape from their summer house for the rest of the day.

He stood in the living room, not certain where to go. Over the fireplace mantle Maud had hung a baby picture he hated. It was an idealized portrait she'd painted of him in 1900 when he was only one year old.

Known as the "Maud Humphrey Baby," the portrait had been reproduced across the country, becoming the most famous baby picture in the nation. It later appeared on the label of the best-selling brand of baby food of its day, Mellins Baby Food.

Later in life, the man then known as “Bogie” would say, “There was a period in American history when you couldn’t pick up a God damn magazine without seeing my cute little kisser in it.”

Maud was a true Victorian illustrator, who believed that babies should be cherubic, their faces round, their cheeks evoking chipmunks. If they also had ruby-red lips, a long white starched dress, curly blond ringlets, large trusting eyes, and a frilly collar, so much the better.

On a wall overlooking the dining room table hung another Maud portrait of him when he was two years old. He was as chubby cheeked as ever but his slickly combed hair was revealed, no more baby bonnet. He looked like Little Lord Fauntleroy in side-buttoned overalls with rolled-up cuffs and a billowing white shirt, again stiffly starched.

Hump was determined that, if not today, maybe tomorrow, he was going to grow up to be a man and not some powder puff.

Later, on the same day he’d been banished from Maud’s summer studio, Hump wandered alone around the tranquil lake. Except for the turmoil going on in his own home, the setting looked like the fantasy life his Dutch ancestors had sought when they’d come over to help settle New York.

Hump always felt that it could be a dreamy life for all of the Bogarts if only his parents were different. They were cold and distant and never gave him the love he needed, not even a kiss on the cheek or a warm embrace.

Even though they were his parents, Hump didn’t know all that much about them, since they rarely mentioned their own childhoods. Both parents traced their lineage to Europe as far back as the early 16th century. Members of royalty were included among both Dr. Bogart’s ancestors and those of Maud.

Decades later, one royal link would be leaked to the press. It was reported at the wedding of Lady Diana Spencer to Britain’s Prince Charles, that his new princess was the seventh cousin of Humphrey Bogart on his mother’s side.

Dr. Bogart’s father, Adam Watkins Bogart, had run an inn for summer visitors to the Finger Lakes. Arriving from Holland in the 17th century, his family had farmed in Brooklyn, which until the 20th century had a “Bogart Avenue” in their memory. In 1853 the family moved to the Finger Lakes.

At Canandaigua, Adam had run a tough tavern, with a jailhouse in the basement. It was called Franklin House, and it was the only inn in Canandaigua, attracting men who smoked cheap stogies and wore muddy boots reeking of manure.

The woman he’d married, Julia, was considerably better off financially than Adam. After marriage, he moved with her to Jefferson House in the village of Watkins on Lake Seneca. There they ran a small three-story hotel with more than a dozen rooms to rent. It was here they gave birth to their first born, pretentiously naming him Cornelius Edward Bogart. Cornelius was killed at the age of six when he attempted to slide down the banister of stairs that led into the lobby of Jefferson House. He fell on his head on the black and white checkerboard Tuscan tile and died instantly.

Their second son, Belmont DeForest Bogart, was born in 1866, a year after the death of his brother. Julia was to live only two years after the birth of her second son. She developed a “mysterious” illness and lay in bed for five months, suffering. In her will, she left all her money to Belmont, and none to her husband, Adam.

In 1871, Adam sued her estate, eventually winning control of the money and his son. Julia had asked that Belmont be taken away from his father and placed in the care of either of her sisters.

After her death, Adam never remarried. Using Julia’s money, he grew rich when he created a method of lithographing on tin plates, a technique later used extensively in advertisements.

Maud had been born about a year before her husband on March 30, 1865, the daughter of a rich shoe manufacturer, John Perkins Humphrey, in Rochester, New York.

Her family was wealthy enough to finance her artistic career, sending her to the Art Students' League in New York from 1886 to 1894 and later to the Académie Julian in Paris where she'd studied with James McNeill Whistler. There were rumors that she'd had an affair with the fabled American painter, who was in his 50s when he first met Maud. Throughout her life, Maud never confirmed nor denied the rumor, saying, "It's for damn sure I didn't pose for Whistler's Mother."

It was in Paris that she'd painted her first nude. The model was the well-built former prizefighter, Rodolphe Julian, who frequently modeled in the nude at the Académie he'd founded. Some of the art students jokingly said that Rodolphe had founded the art school only so he could "show off his ample assets" before the art classes, as he'd often confess that he himself "knew nothing about art. I know what I like—and that's that."

Even though aging when Maud had met him, Rodolphe still kept his body as neat and trim as that of an Olympic athlete. In those days, only male artists were allowed to paint male nudes. Most art schools didn't even encourage female painters and, if they allowed them entrance, did not let them paint nude models either male or female.

At his Académie, Rodolphe changed all that. It was said that many young women signed up for his classes just to see what a man looked like in the nude. Many women at the time saw a naked man for the first time on their wedding night, with virtually no prior knowledge of the male anatomy.

"After looking at Rodolphe, and painting him, it's probably inevitable that we'll be disappointed with our husbands," Maud confided to a fellow art student, Mary Fielding, from Charleston, South Carolina.

Maud was known for her razor-tongued wit, and she found a perfect match in the equally sharp-tongued Belmont. Each could take the other down with biting sarcasm. Both of them passed this dubious characteristic onto their son, Humphrey.

Bogie's future director, John Huston, said the actor was known throughout his life for needling people, or "sticking in the saber," as Huston put it.

What his parents didn't pass on to their son was their political conservatism. Belmont was a Republican and a Presbyterian, Maud a Tory and an Episcopalian. Humphrey would grow up to become a liberal Democrat.

Born on Christmas Day, 1899, "a Christmas gift to his parents," as later reported by publicists at Warner Brothers, Humphrey DeForest Bogart came into the world at Sloane's Hospital in New York, weighing eight pounds and seven ounces. He'd been born six days before the end of the 19th century, and in later life always referred to himself as a "man of the last century."

He'd had an elongated foreskin, and his doctor father had recommended circumcision. Maud had been adamantly opposed, claiming that "was a barbaric Jewish custom."

Until he'd gone into the Navy at the end of World War I, Humphrey had lived with this extended foreskin. After his military service, when he ran into his former classmate, Doug Storer, at a tavern, he confided, "I had a doctor trim it a bit, but he left enough for me to still have fun."

Belmont himself in 1901 delivered his second child, a girl named Frances Bogart. Because she was chubby as an infant, Hump nicknamed her "Fat." When she grew up and lost her excess weight, she was called Pat. Two years later, another sister, Catherine, was born.

In his early years Maud and Belmont had big plans and high hopes for Hump. Belmont, dining at Luchow's, his favorite German restaurant on 14th Street in New York, boasted that his adolescent son would one day go to Yale and become a world-famous surgeon. "My wife says Columbia, but I definitely see the boy as a Yale man."

Hump's one and only attempt at performing surgery had ended in disaster when he'd attempted it when he was eight years old. His sister Catherine had developed a large boil with a pus-filled head. She begged her brother to puncture it, since Belmont was away on a hunting trip. Retrieving his father's first-aid kit, with its scalpel, needles, and cotton, he attempted to lance the boil with a needle. When it didn't work, he used his pocket knife. Immediately, a mixture of pus and blood shot with high velocity into his face. His screaming sister had to be rushed to the nearest hospital before she bled to death.

One afternoon, about a month later, Hump found Maud terribly depressed, revealing that she'd learned some "very bad news." She told him that she'd visited an itinerant fortune teller who was passing through the Finger Lakes that summer. "Your son will grow up to enjoy fabulous wealth and will know many loves," the gypsy had told her. "But both of your daughters are destined for tragic lives."

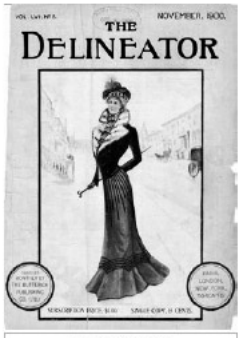
Hump was heartbroken to learn that Maud and Belmont had placed Willow Brook up for sale in August of 1913. If a buyer could be found, their summer home and their days at the lake would be over. Maud promised the children a summer cottage on Fire Island for the coming year.

She'd taken a position as an illustrator on the magazine, Delineator, and needed to be close to New York City, the magazine's base of operations. "The pay is fabulous," she told Hump. "Fifty-thousand dollars a year."



The Delineator
November, 1900

Walking down by the lake, Hump recalled his happiest times here when Belmont took him sailing on his champion yacht, Comrade. It was on that very lake that Belmont had taught Hump how to sail, a passion his son would enjoy until the day of his death.

In time, Belmont purchased a one-cylinder motor boat, which Hump had called Desire, and he went out, putt-putting around the lake all by himself. In later life, Bogie would tell friends that sailing on the lake by himself was "the only time in my life I've ever felt free."

His sister, Pat, later told friends that her brother went through a typical adolescent period when he developed crushes on males. "It was just a period," Pat said, "and in no time at all he grew out of it. He certainly didn't grow up to be a homosexual, as many of his leading ladies can testify."

That summer Hump made Belmont the focus of his attention. Belmont was tall and good looking, a strong man and avid hunter, a real outdoors type, everything that Hump wanted to be, but wasn't. When his father would invite him sailing, Hump was thrilled to have Belmont to himself and not have to share him with family or patients.

But after Belmont met his neighbor, Mrs. Harry Lansing, he no longer invited Hump sailing. Although a bit hefty, Mrs. Lansing was extremely beautiful to Belmont. He pursued the married woman when Maud wasn't present. Her husband, Harry, the son of a railroad tycoon, was never at home. Rumors were that he was an alcoholic. When not drinking, he was said to chase after other women.

Sometimes Belmont would announce to his family that he was taking Hump sailing with him. But when they got to the lake, Mrs. Lansing would be waiting for the doctor. Belmont always gave Hump money to spend in town while he sailed away with Mrs. Lansing.

Out there alone on the lake, Belmont was surely making love to Mrs. Lansing, or so Hump suspected. They'd be gone for hours. Instead of going to town, Hump would often wait for him beside the pier, no matter how long it took.

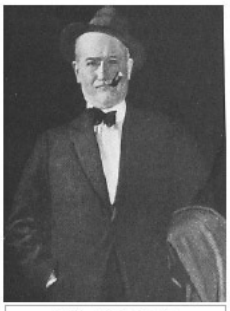
Perhaps Maud learned that summer of her husband's affair, or maybe she didn't. All Hump knew was that during those final days on the lake, before they returned to the city, Maud moved out of the master bedroom she shared with her husband and took a smaller bedroom on the top floor.

"I'm still going to be married to your father," she told Hump, "but one phase of our relationship is definitely over. You'll have no more brothers or sisters."



William A. Brady Sr.

That bitter rejection by his father was eased when Hump was introduced to Mrs. Lansing's daughter, Grace. Hump felt that she was the most beautiful girl he'd ever seen, even more stunning than Franklin Roosevelt's young mistress.

They'd met when Mary Hamlin had organized the resort's young people into the Seneca Point Players. Over his protests, she'd named Hump the producer and director and had cast& him as the lead in the players' first production, Sunset in the Old West. Mary had cast the Lansing daughter, Grace, as Hump's romantic female lead.

Before leaving for Seneca Point that summer, Hump had met a patient of his father's, William Brady Sr., a handsome showman and promoter and the son of Irish immigrants. Living next door, Brady had called on Belmont, claiming that "my cook has given me ptomaine poisoning."

Hump had also been in his father's office that day, and had found Brady a fascinating man. He regaled Hump with stories of his former life when he'd gone from shoeshine boy to newsboy, from stage manager to actor, and from comedian to play director. "Now I'm a producer," Brady said. "I also manage boxers, none of whom know how to throw a punch. That is, except for two winners, both heavyweight title holders, Jim Corbett and Jim Jeffries. I have luck with boxers named Jim."

Before Brady had been called into Belmont's office, the producer turned to Hump. "I have a son about your age, William Brady Jr. I'll introduce you to him. I'm sure you'll hit it off real swell."

Hump had to go to Seneca Point for the summer, but he eagerly looked forward to seeing young Brady when he came back to New York. Hump was in dire need of a male best friend.

When Brady Sr. learned that a local theater troupe was being formed at Seneca Point, he sent some discarded Broadway costumes to the Bogart family. Brady had just closed down a show on Broadway, The Girl of the Golden West, and he had plenty of outfits to spare, including chaps, boots, and western garb.

Hump tried on a ten-gallon hat that practically drowned his head, but he wore it in his first play anyway. He played the star, a role that depicted him as a "good man gone wrong." He'd become a gun-slinging bandit—that is, until he met the heroine of the play who "sets him on the straight and narrow path once again."

Grace, the female lead, won his heart in the play and also won his heart in real life. The audience around the bandstand peacefully watched this farce. They'd paid five cents each for tickets, plus another one penny for a glass of cold lemonade.

Throughout the rehearsals, thoughts of Grace had consumed Hump. The day after the play closed, he bribed one of the Irish maids to pack a picnic lunch for him. He'd invited Grace to go hiking in the nearby woods, and she'd accepted.

After their picnic on a blanket, he leaned over and kissed her. Decades later, Grace said she kissed him back, even though she'd never let a boy kiss her before. "He was handsome and charming, and I genuinely liked him. But he got carried away when I kissed him. He wanted to go farther."

As a summer rain fell across the meadow, Hump jumped up and begged her to strip off her clothing with him. Even though she remained fully dressed, he pulled off his trousers, shirts, and underwear and danced around her in the nude, urging her to take off her clothes too. "I'd never seen a boy's penis before," Grace said, much less one erect, and I was terrified. I started running across the slippery meadow heading for home, leaving him standing nude with his erection on the wet blanket."

He later told his friend, Peter St. Davids, "I'm not much of a lover, I guess.& I got the gal at the end of that stupid play, but not in real life."

Later when Grace Lansing had become Mrs. Gerald Lambert of Princeton, New Jersey and Palm Beach, Florida, she became friends with Bogie's first wife, Helen Menken, telling her of that summer on the lake with Humphrey. "I always regretted we didn't fool around that day," Grace said, "especially when he became a world famous screen actor. I could have claimed to be Humphrey Bogart's first love. But, alas, it was not to be."

With no buyer was found for Willow Brook, the Bogarts returned to New York City, where Belmont resumed his practice, and Maud took up her job as an illustrator for the magazine, Delineator, a position she would hold for twenty years. The sole purpose of the magazine was to sell dress-sewing patterns manufactured by its parent company, the Butterick Pattern Company, in an era when many women sewed their own clothing at home.

The magazine was one of the first to publish pictures of females in nightgowns, bathing suits, and underwear. Mainly, it featured women appearing in fashionable clothing. Its backers hoped that America's women readers would fall in love with the illustration, then go out and purchase the Butterick dress pattern.

In spite of its focus on sewing patterns, the magazine also had pages devoted to serious fiction. Its editor was the novelist Theodore Dreiser, who printed pieces by such famous journalists as H.L. Mencken. Maud was especially proud of the magazine because it published articles about her favorite cause, women's suffrage.

One afternoon, Hump's mother invited her boss, Theodore Dreiser, and the famously caustic visiting writer from Baltimore, H.L. Mencken, back to her townhouse for afternoon tea. Both men were ostensibly there to meet the "Maud Humphrey baby," even though Hump was a growing adolescent at that time.

The Bogart sisters were not at home. Hump dressed himself formally, as requested by Maud. He eagerly awaited his introduction to both men, even though he wasn't quite sure who they were. Maud had talked at length about their status as "literary lions."

Dreiser was the first to enter the house, firmly shaking Hump's hand. "My, oh my," he said, "how that baby did grow. They're still publishing Maud's portrait of you as an adorable baby, though. You're easily as famous as the Arrow Collar Man or the Schweppes Commander."

Dreiser had not yet written his masterpiece, An American Tragedy which wasn't penned until 1925, but Sister Carrie, written in 1900 when Hump was one year old, had already been broadly distributed throughout the country. Dreiser had brought an autographed copy as a gift for the boy. "Maud claims you read one novel a week. Try mine. I must warn you, though. Even my publisher tried to suppress this book."

With perfect manners, Hump accepted it with genuine gratitude. It would be the first of many autographed books that writers would present to him as tokens of their esteem. They'd eventually include men as diverse as Ernest Hemingway and Truman Capote.

At that point, H.L. Mencken arrived, with Maud on his arm, both of them having overheard the friendly exchange between Hump and Dreiser. Bombastically turning to Dreiser, Mencken said, “Your publisher didn’t want to suppress Sister Carrie because it was racy; he wanted to suppress it because its style is so weak. There are lines in that novel that simply don’t work, like ‘he worked in a truly swell saloon.’ Calling a saloon ‘truly swell’ sounds inarticulate and unsavvy, and sometimes I wonder how you got away with it. I could go on and on, citing other examples.”

Averting his gaze from Dreiser’s angry eyes, Mencken extended his hand to Hump. “Hello, I’m H. L. Mencken.” Hump stammered his hellos.

Ignoring Mencken, Dreiser returned to his dialogue with Hump. “Please overlook the occasional unevenness in my style. I’m interested in bigger game, especially the expression of broader ideas. I write as a means of proving that history does not dominate a man, but that it’s actually an expression of mankind at its most creative. It is man who creates history, not history that creates men.”

Taking off his coat, Mencken acerbically shot back. “Is that what we do?” he asked Dreiser. He turned back to Hump. “Be careful—reading Sister Carrie will stunt your growth.”

Smiling grimly at the insults, but holding his tongue, Dreiser got up, supposedly to pee. Maud showed him down the corridor to the toilet. Mencken sat down next to Hump on the sofa. “It was my reading of Huckleberry Finn at the age of nine that changed my life. It was, in fact, the most stupendous awakening of my entire life. It turned me into a bookworm and eventually a writer. Do you want to be a writer?”

“Father wants me to study medicine and follow in his footsteps.”

“Become anything but a shyster lawyer,” Mencken said. “I detest lawyers, especially Jewish lawyers. They are the worst.”

Hump silently noted that Mencken shared Maud’s anti-Semitism.

“After you’ve read the important books, go out and learn from life itself, taking all the worldly wisdom you can glean from the saloon keeper, the cop on the block, even the midwife, or especially the midwife if she performs a few abortions on the side. I figured being a newspaper reporter was the best way to meet people from all walks of life. After my first story, a five-line report about a horse thief, was published in the Baltimore Morning Herald, I was committed to journalism from that day forward.”

At that point, Maud came back into the living room with Dreiser, who looked over at Mencken. “Why don’t you move to New York and leave that hick town of Baltimore behind you?”

“New York is but a third-rate Babylon,” Mencken said. “I prefer the frowzier charms of Baltimore. Even that immense protein factory known as Chesapeake Bay.”

Dreiser had to excuse himself again to go up to Maud’s studio to look over some of her latest sketches.

Humphrey chose that moment to invite Mencken up on the roof to look at his pigeon coop. “Maud finds these birds disgusting and unsanitary. When I came down with pneumonia, she blamed the pigeons.”

Mencken didn't much like pigeons either. But he was entranced with the view of the New York skyline from the Bogart roof. The bracing air delighted him, and seemed to spark some crazed ambition within him. Hump suspected that he'd had a few whiskies before arriving at the Bogart house.

Mencken waved his arms in the air and seemed to be speaking to the world at large, and not specifically to Hump. "I want to be the native American Voltaire," Mencken said. "I see myself as the enemy of all Puritans.& I will become a heretic within academia—a one-man demolition crew of Victorian morality."

Later, Maud called them for tea in her little garden in back, although Hump suspected that both of these men would have preferred whiskey.

Over tea, Mencken continued to lecture Dreiser, albeit more diplomatically. "There is only one way to make money publishing books. You can write about only four subjects. First, murder stories. Second, novels in which the beautiful heroine is forcibly overcome by the handsome hero. Third, books about spiritualism, occultism and such claptrap. Fourth, any book devoted to Abraham Lincoln."

"Speaking of Lincoln," Dreiser said, "Someone recently submitted an essay for publication in my magazine. It's written by Theodore Ward, a historian, and based on extensive research. It's an exposé of the sex life of Abraham Lincoln, but I fear I cannot publish it, although it's a hell of an interesting article."

"Is it too controversial?" Maud asked.

"That it is," Dreiser said. "It maintains that Lincoln was a homosexual and had a five-year love affair with another man."

"I don't think that article will ever be published," Maud said.

"Maybe in fifty years the public will be ready for it," Mencken said.

As Maud was pouring tea for Dreiser, a large butterfly flew from a flower bush, winging by her head. Dropping her tea pot, she screamed as if ten rapists had surrounded her. She ran into the living room and up the steps leading to her studio.

Both Dreiser and Mencken looked to Hump for some explanation of this erratic behavior.

"All her life she's been terrified of butterflies," Hump said.

It wasn't only Dreiser and Mencken who wanted to meet the Maud Humphrey Baby. The stigma of having posed for that illustration followed Hump throughout of his school days. He'd been mocked and ridiculed when he'd entered Delancy School, which he'd attended to the fifth grade. He still hadn't shaken the curse when, at the age of thirteen, he enrolled in Trinity School, which was housed in a sandstone building at 91st Street between Columbus and Amsterdam Avenues. An Episcopal institutional "for the training of young gentlemen," it was the oldest continuously operating school in the country.

Doug Storer, a classmate, recalled that virtually every day after school, a gang of bullies waited for Hump, calling him "sissy" or chanting, "rock-a-bye baby."

The confrontation sometimes led to Hump arriving home with a bloody lip and, on more than one occasion, a black eye.

At school, Hump had turned out to be a poor student, excelling in nothing, and with particularly low marks in German. Since Belmont, a classically educated descendant of the original Dutch burghers of New York, spoke fluent German, he had demanded that his son learn the language too.

Hump's grades in other classes were almost as bad. As the months went by, it became apparent to Belmont and Maud that their son would not follow in his father's footsteps as a surgeon.

“He’ll be lucky if he graduates from high school,” Belmont told Maud. To compound matters, Hump developed scarlet fever and had to repeat the eleventh grade.

Although Belmont had been a notable athlete, Hump did not willingly participate in organized sports unless he was forced to as part of the school curriculum. He told classmate Storer that he especially disliked wrestling. “I loathe such close contact with other guys. There’s one fucking guy who gets a hard-on every time he pins me down on the mat. I can feel the God damn thing pressing up against me.”

Storer remembers that there was a debate among some of the girls over whether Hump was “handsome” or “just good looking.” His classmate recalls that, “His appearance was always neat. I never saw him when he wasn’t well-groomed. He had a slim figure with very dark eyes and jet-black hair that was always plastered down to his head with some kind of cream. He showed up every day in a dark blue wool serge suit with a vest and a stiffly starched white shirt with detachable collars held on by gold-plated brass buttons. His black shoes were always highly polished. His ties were never garish but always in some somber color like navy blue or berry brown, the stuff bankers wore at the time.”

In winter he’d appear in a Chesterfield overcoat with a velvet collar.

The author, Eric Hodgins, remembers that “Bogart always wore a black derby hat, rain or shine. It set him apart from the other boys. Many a time he would get that hat knocked off his head. But he always picked it up, dusted it off, put it back on his head, and went on his way.”

Hump told Storer that he didn’t want to get out of bed sometimes, knowing that at three o’clock that afternoon a gang was waiting to taunt him. He was not a fighter and had never taken on one of the neighborhood toughs in combat. If Hump defended himself at all, it was to raise his hands to protect his face.

One cold January afternoon, the toughest guy on the block plowed his steel-knuckled fist into Hump’s face, breaking his nose. He’d run all the way to his father’s office at 245 West 103rd Street. The office on the second floor of the family brownstone was covered in a thick moss green carpet with beautiful mahogany paneling rescued from a townhouse in Chelsea which had been demolished. It was one of the few houses in the neighborhood that had a telephone, a necessity because Hump’s father was a doctor. Belmont had tended to his son’s nose, making emergency repairs before taking him to the hospital. All the way to the clinic, Belmont had chided Hump for not defending himself better. “When I was your age, I could beat up any boy in my home-town. Maud’s making a sissy of you. I hate the name Humphrey she gave you. That’s a sissy name.”

Even as Hump had moved into his teenage years, Maud had continued to dictate his dress. At formal school dances, she’d demanded that he wear white kid gloves and black patent leather pumps. “I was like a God damn teenage dandy,” Bogie later told his favorite director, John Huston.

One afternoon Maud called her teenage son into her studio and revealed to him some of the male nudes that she’d painted in Paris. He was shocked because until then, he had known only her scenes of Victorian innocence.

For reasons not known to him at the time, she’d tried to explain to him when male nudity was acceptable and when it was not.

“When a man is nude and aroused, and is showing himself off, that is not acceptable,” she informed her son. “But when a man in a flaccid state is posing nude for an art class, that is acceptable. The men and women painting him have no actual interest in his sex. They view the body as a whole, as an object from which they can make an artistic statement. It’s the same when your father sees a nude man or woman in his office. He has them strip to examine them in detail. But as a doctor, he has the same disinterest in the nude body that an artist does while painting a nude in his studio. This is called sexless nudity.”

After that rather detailed and pedantic explanation, Maud invited Hump to accompany her that afternoon to her art classes.

At the Artists and Models Studio on Manhattan’s West 28th Street, Maud had been temporarily teaching classes to young illustrators who wanted to become working commercial artists like herself. Since she was widely known as a Victorian illustrator portraying an idealized fantasy life of home and hearth, she'd been an odd choice to teach classes with nude models, although her background in Paris had prepared her for such an assignment.

When she arrived with Hump at the studio, she still hadn't told him why he was here. It turned out that Maud had been filling in during a sick leave of Duane Edwards, the regular teacher. To an increasing degree, Maud had been leaving the house on mysterious errands. Hump had heard her talking over the phone several times with someone named "Duane," and he'd suspected that Maud was having an affair now that she was no longer sleeping in the same bed with his father.

In a back dressing room, Maud told her son, "Remember what I said about nude modeling. There is nothing about the nude male body that we have to be ashamed of. Our regular model is not here today. He's just a young boy who models for classes. The class has painted mature models, both female and male, in the nude. This week we are painting young boys. I want you to model nude and fill in for our regular model who is sick."

Horrified at his mother's suggestion, Hump wanted to bolt from the building. Except for a medical examination, he'd never pulled off his clothes before anyone, and certainly not in front of women. Since he had no real basis for comparisons, and hadn't seen any pictures, he had not been certain just how he measured up with other boys his age.

He'd always been curious about other male genitalia, but when he'd been at a latrine with other boys, he'd always looked away, afraid to be caught gazing at them. He'd feared that because of his reputation as a sissy, all he would need was to be spotted glancing at the genitals of other boys. He'd never showered with other boys and had never seen his father in the nude either.

When he revolted at the idea of the posing session, Maud taunted him. "Don't tell me you're afraid to take off your clothes in front of artists. Are you ashamed of the way you're developed? You don't have to be."

As he looked at her, he began to think that he hated her. Defiantly, he began to peel off his clothes. Before he'd taken his trousers down, she turned and walked away.

A school custodian came into his dressing room, finding Hump standing there looking pathetically naked. He handed him a white robe, telling him to wear it out into the studio. "When you go up on the platform in front of the class, drop your robe and sit naturally on the stool I put there."

Humphrey Bogart
as an angst-ridden teenager

Years later, Bogie recalled how he'd come into the studio so embarrassed that he didn't dare look at anybody. He was red-faced but he did as he was told and dropped his robe, going at once to a large stool in the center of the platform. There he had braced himself for a long sketching session, crossing his legs.

The custodian came out and pried his legs apart, exposing Hump's genitalia to the painters. His heart was beating so fiercely at that point& that Hump didn't much care what happened next. His only thought was that Maud was there, along with the others, looking at her son in all his shame.

As the artists painted, Hump tried to think of anything except what was actually happening in the studio.

The session ended exactly at noon. Hump put on his robe and retreated to the rear where the custodian brought roast beef sandwiches for the artists. He'd offered one to Hump. Because he was hungry, he accepted, only wishing that it had been a ham sandwich.

Maud remained in the studio evaluating the nude drawings of her son. At one o'clock, Hump was summoned back to the platform. The second time wasn't as traumatic for him. He still refused to make eye contact with any of the painters in the room, not even knowing whether they were men or women.

He was called back for a final session at three o'clock, and at exactly four o'clock, the day's work ended.

Fully dressed, he waited outside on the street for Maud. When she appeared, he was embarrassed to look into her face. "Now that wasn't so bad," she said. "You're to come back with me four more days this week. The good news is that you're going to get fifty dollars for your work. Imagine that. Fifty dollars, the most money you've ever seen at one time in your life."

She told him that he'd have to go home alone, as she had to visit a sick friend. She was obviously going to meet her new friend, Duane.

Hump stood watching Maud go up the street to her next rendezvous. A militant suffragette, she passed out pamphlets as she made her way along the crowded boulevard, calling on passers-by to give the vote to the women of America.

His parents' names had appeared regularly in Dau's New York Blue Book since 1907, but Belmont constantly attacked his wife for "trying to climb the social ladder." The son of a saloon keeper, he couldn't care less about the opinions of New York society.

Every night at their New York home, their arguments were virtually the same. "When you're not social climbing, you're driven by your career like some God damn maniac," he'd shout at her when drunk.

Matching him drink for drink, Maud always stood up to him. She constantly reminded him that her profession brought in more than twice as much money as his did.

She claimed that she was known among the very upper crust of New York society, and enjoyed a national reputation as an illustrator, whereas he "consorted with river rats."

Instead of accepting invitations into some of the finest homes of New York, Belmont preferred the company of saloon keepers, mechanics, janitors, and truck drivers. He'd frequent the taverns of blue-collar laborers, preferring those saloons along New York's waterfront where he'd find "men of the sea." If he'd had enough to drink, he'd invite sailors back to his home to spend a night or even a weekend.

That had led to some of Maud's most brutal fights with her husband. "These bums aren't coming into my living room," she'd shout at her husband in front of the Bogart children. She'd demand that the doctor take his newly acquired sailor friend up to the fourth-floor bedroom, which was usually assigned to a servant. "You can sleep up there with him," she'd said. "Don't come to my bed tonight."

That had seemed like a strange remark to Hump, because Belmont, at least to his knowledge, hadn't entered Maud's bed in years.

She had also insisted that this "waterfront trash" eat in the kitchen with the Irish servants. To defy her, Belmont would also take his meals in the kitchen with the object of that evening's fascination.

Usually, a "river rat" would visit the Bogart home only once. Belmont's interest in these uneducated specimens he would pick up rarely lasted more than two or three days.

The exception had been a handsome, ruggedly masculine, and well-built "man of the sea," Lars Schmidt. Depending on what day of the week you asked him, Lars claimed to be Norwegian, Swedish, or Danish, and during one particularly frank dialogue, German.

Because he spoke six languages, had incredible good looks, and always dressed nicely, Maud had at first been attracted to his charm and personality. Even Hump had been fascinated with Lars. He'd entertain the boy with tales of all the shipwrecks he'd survived. The most fascinating adventure, as he'd related, was when his merchant ship had almost collided with another in the middle of the Atlantic. This ghost ship had seemingly come out of nowhere, appearing mysteriously in the fog.

"It was definitely a Swedish man-of-war from the 17th century," Lars had claimed. "Our crew could actually see seventeen sailors standing on deck as the ship passed us by. They were as lifelike as you are sitting across from me. We were awe struck as we watched the vessel drift away into the dawn. I've never seen anything like that before or since."

Whenever Lars came to the port of New York, he always arrived unannounced at the Bogart home. His parents' explosion over Lars had come one hot, blistering August day as the entire city was melting under a record-breaking heat wave.

It was so hot that when Lars had to walk outside his bedroom to go to the bathroom on the second floor, he'd wandered down the stairs stark naked. One of the Bogart daughters, Frances, had seen him nude in the hall and had run to her mother in her studio to report on this.

Maud had been furious and had climbed to the top floor to see what was going on. The door to the bedroom where her husband had slept the night before with Lars was wide open. She'd looked inside and found Lars in the middle of the bed playing with himself. He'd invited her in to join him.

She'd screamed and had run downstairs.

That night when Belmont came home after a day's work at the local hospital, she confronted him. "Lars is not a man," she shouted in front of the children and the servants. "He's a freak of nature. That is no penis that belongs on a man. A horse maybe. Frances will be ruined for life having seen such a thing. For all that poor girl knows, all men are built like that. Because of this, she'll never marry, and if she does, she'll be afraid to go to bed with her husband."

That night had led to a Bogart family drinking marathon and more violent arguments. Maud threatened that, "If Lars darkens this door again, I'm packing up, moving out, and taking the children with me."

Despite the enormous pressure, that drunken night didn't end Belmont's friendship with Lars. Whenever the sailor came to New York, the doctor packed a suitcase and checked into the Hotel Marseilles with Lars. A then-fashionable address, it lay across the street from the Bogart home, which was at 245 West 103rd Street.

Like any hotel, it operated like a world unto itself. The beer kings, the Rheingold brothers, called it home, as did Sara Delano Roosevelt, mother of Franklin.

When Mrs. Roosevelt learned of Belmont's rescue of her son during the nearly fatal drowning incident at the lake, she sent a servant across the street with an invitation for Dr. and Mrs. Bogart and their young son, Humphrey. She may not have known about the existence of the two Bogart sisters.

As Maud rarely accepted any social invitation and attended almost no parties, she tore up the invitation without telling her husband. Maud was offended by the politics of Theodore Roosevelt and didn't want to seek any more intimate contact with the Roosevelts after she'd reluctantly sheltered Franklin for one night at her summer home.

When Lars had some time off from sailing, he would go with Belmont on a train to Canada. Up there at an address never revealed to his family, the doctor and Lars would stay at a rustic hunting lodge owned by Belmont. Sometimes for weeks at a time, Belmont would neglect his medical practice, coming back to New York only when his supply of morphine had run out.

On one particularly long trip, Maud had talked to Hump. "There are men like your father who don't have natural instincts. He'd rather be socializing with riff-raff than in a good clean bed with his own wife. We stay together but only for the sake of you children. In time you'll understand what a loveless marriage is. Perhaps you'll even have one or two of your own."

At one school dance during his early teen years, Hump asked Leonore Strunsky—nicknamed Lee—to be his date. It was the beginning of a friendship that would last for the rest of his life, because Lee in time would become famously married to another Bogie friend, the lyricist Ira Gershwin.

At the dance, just before Lee excused herself to go to the ladies' room, she'd asked for a glass of punch. While he was getting it for her, two older students in their senior year had deliberately bumped into Hump. "Still dressing like a girl?" one of them had taunted him.

Instead of trying to defend himself, Hump had escaped and fled to his school locker. Once there, he'd removed the Daisy Air Rifle his father had given him six weeks before. Belmont was a superb wing shot, and he wanted to pass his skill on to his son.

Running outside of the school hall, he'd taken the rifle and aimed it at all the red lanterns lighting up the night. He hit every one of them before the school custodian had found him, chasing him from the grounds.

He'd later walked in Central Park arm in arm with Lee, rather proud of his accomplishment. He'd known he couldn't take the boys on in combat, but in some way had felt he'd gotten revenge.

On a bench in Central Park, they'd indulged in some heavy necking. Lee not only let him kiss her, but told him that, "It'll feel much better if you stick your tongue in my mouth."

He'd done just that. She didn't object when he reached inside her dress and felt the firmness of her breasts. But she did not let him do any exploring below her beltline. "That's only for when we're married," Lee told him.

When he'd gotten home, after kissing Lee good night, he felt like a real man.

The moment he walked into the Bogart's living room, he knew that something was wrong. His father was there waiting for him, and he'd been drinking heavily. Maybe the doctor had also been drugged.

The principal from the school had already contacted Belmont about the lantern shoot-out. Coming up to his son, his father seemed to tower above his teenage boy.

Without warning, Belmont delivered several chopping blows to his son's face, loosening two front teeth and smashing his upper lip repeatedly until part of it was torn from the boy's face.

As he'd stood back, realizing the damage he'd done, the doctor seemed to sober up. Maud rushed into the room. Seeing her son, she screamed before turning to confront her husband. "You touch him again, and so help me God I'll kill you."

When the male servant, Liam Mangam, came up from the rear, having been aroused from his bed with one of the Irish maids, Belmont ordered him to carry Hump upstairs to his office.

Once there, the doctor sewed up his son's lip, but he was too drunk to do an adequate job. He ordered Mangam to summon a cabbie to take them to the nearest hospital.

In the aftermath of the injury, Hump's upper lip never healed properly. As every close-up in nearly every movie house in the world later revealed, Bogie's upper lip throughout his adult life bore the scar of that awful night. His lip was to remain partly paralyzed, giving him a slight lisp.

After surgery on his lip for the second time in five hours, Hump had been told that he'd have to go to the family dentist in the morning to replace those two missing front teeth.

The attending doctor at the hospital, John Kells, also gave the teenage boy a thorough physical examination. He recorded that he was 5 feet, 9 inches, weighed 110 pounds, had brown eyes, a fair complexion and light brown hair, his chest measuring 33 inches.

Belmont reported to Kells that his son had had a severe case of the mumps two years ago and that they had "fallen." That most often led to a temporary enlargement of the testicles, followed by a massive shrinkage to a withered pea.

Dr. Kells examined Hump's testicles, finding that he'd escaped from this curse relatively intact, although noting a swelling of the spermatic vein on the left side of the boy's scrotum. Both doctors agreed that this was a "congenital condition" and would probably not affect Hump's ability to father children at some point in the future.

At midnight, Hump, accompanied by a chastised Belmont and Mangam, was released from the hospital to return to the dismal life at 103rd Street.

During his first week home, Hump made one trip to the dentist, accompanied by one of the Irish maids. The dentist replaced Hump's two front teeth. Hump insisted on having his teeth in place before "my best gal," Lee Strunsky, came to visit him at the family brownstone.

Having never had a girl friend before, Hump was excited when Lee called to tell him that she was coming over at three that afternoon.

Maud ushered Lee upstairs to Hump's bedroom, where he was convalescing. From the look on his mother's face, Hump knew that Maud disapproved of this visit.

It wasn't until an hour later, after Lee had gone, that Maud stormed into his bedroom. "Don't you ever invite that stinking little tramp into my house again," she yelled at her son.

"She's a very respectable girl, and very nice," Hump protested.

"She's a slimy Jew," Maud charged. "I don't want a son of mine going out with a Jewess. These money-changers are the anti-Christ. They have no appreciation of the finer things of life. They're all about greed and chicanery. They are the bottom-feeders of life."

"Jews are just as good as anybody else," Hump said. "No better, no worse."

"You're a moronic fool if you think that," Maud said, her temper flaring. "If you ever again invite a Jew into my house, boy or girl, I will personally shut the door in their face. Is that understood, young man?" She turned and left the room, leaving Hump in total bewilderment. Since he didn't plan to give Lee up, he'd sneak away and see her in private.

Maybe, when he finished school, he might even ask Lee to marry him. That would really piss off Maud.

As Hump saw it, there was one major problem in their courtship. Lee wanted to wait until they were married before doing it.

Hump decided the time for seduction was at hand. In the days ahead, he was going to figure out a way to charm the bloomers off that pretty girl.

The way he saw it, a Jewish pussy could be just as hot as a Gentile one. Maybe even more so. Time would attest to the accuracy of that perception.

In ways that anticipated the plots of some of the movies he'd eventually make in the 1930s for Warner Brothers, Hump did not get the girl in the final reel. He never knew exactly what happened to his budding relationship with Lee, but it ended almost as suddenly as it had begun.

All Hump found out later was that Maud had placed a telephone call to Lee. He never knew what his mother had said to his young girl friend, but Lee never saw him until decades later, and he did not press her for the answer.

He even went to her house, but a servant informed him that Lee was not at home, even though he suspected that she was upstairs hiding in her bedroom.

He would meet Lee later in life as a political ally and friend. He always referred to her as “my first girl friend,” even in front of her husband, Ira Gershwin.

A new friend had come into Hump’s life that made him forget all about Lee. William Brady Jr. was the son of the showman and promoter, William Brady Sr., whom Hump had met when this entrepreneur was a patient at his father’s office. Brady Sr. had promised an introduction to his son, who was Hump’s age, and in spite of the producer’s busy schedule, he remembered and set it up.

The moment he arrived at the Brady house and met Bill Jr., Hump almost overnight transferred his crush on Belmont to Bill. Bill was a handsome, precocious young man, filled with facile charm and a manly grace. He’d grown up in a world of famous names in both boxing and the theater, and he had a sophistication that Hump envied.

Many young girls were captivated by this dashing man, but once Bill met Hump Bill had no more time for the females in his life. The two young boys became fast friends. Soon after they met, they pledged loyalty to each other and a devoted friendship “for the rest of our lives.”

When Hump was finally invited into the Brady home for chocolate milk and cookies, he was dazzled by the opulence of the parlor. Although Maud decorated her house elegantly, it didn’t have the ostentation of the Brady home, which some guests had described as “a Victorian stage set.”

Not only was Bill’s father famous, but so were his mother and step-sister. Hump was especially intrigued by Bill’s mother, Grace George, a bigtime star of her day who had appeared in many of her husband’s films or Broadway productions.

A darling of Broadway’s theater critics, George had gone from triumph after theatrical triumph that included appearances in George Bernard Shaw’s Major Barbara, as well as Divorçons, The School for Scandal, and Kind Lady. She was also a major talent scout for her husband, encouraging him to offer breaks to such newcomers as Helen Hayes in What Every Woman Knows. She also picked out the then-relatively-unknown Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., from a cast of hopefuls, persuading her husband to cast him opposite her in Clothes, even though “he’s not good-looking.”

The daughter from Brady’s first marriage,& born in 1892, was Alice Brady, a rising star in her own right. Seven years older than Hump, beautiful, and educated during a period of her life in a convent in New Jersey, she captivated Hump with her talent and charm. She had abandoned a budding career as a singer in grand opera, preferring instead a career as a Broadway actress. She had been appearing on Broadway since her debut as an ingénue in The Balkan Princess in 1911. Having made a name for herself in several Gilbert and Sullivan revivals, she had been in dozens of her father’s silent films shot for World, his film company. She’d first appeared on screen in 1914 in a flick called As Ye Sow. When Hump met her, she’d just filmed The Gilded Cage.

The first time Hump appeared in her living room, Grace George was polite but distant, and soon excused herself to go and read a script sent over by her husband. Alice remained behind to have a cup of tea, but it quickly became obvious that she was not smitten with Bill's young friend the way Hump seemed to be with her.

As she recalled years later, "He was just too young for me when we first met. But when Humphrey came back from the Navy, he'd matured a lot. I became very interested in him despite the difference in our ages."

Brady Sr. always gave his son all the free passes he wanted to Broadway shows, both his own productions and those of his rivals. Bill's father had dreams of becoming a theatrical producer as well known and successful as David Belasco.

Paying a nickel fare, Hump and Bill rode to 42nd Street on the rickety Broadway trolley, headed for a vaudeville show at the Palace Theater. Hump had never been to a performance at a major Broadway theater before, and he was immediately captivated by the bright lights and bustle. The show they were headed for was noteworthy in that it included, on the same bill, both Sarah Bernhardt, the greatest dramatic actress of her day, and the comic actor, juggler, and drunk, W.C. Fields.

Decades later, Mae West, co-starring with Fields in My Little Chickadee, and herself a Broadway star at the time of Hump's introduction to the theater, dismissed the claim that "The Divine Sarah" and Fields appeared on the same bill. "I'm sure Madame Bernhardt has other things to do than appear on stage with a low-rent, drunken comedian," West claimed. "If Fields thinks Bernhardt was there, he'd had too many drinks, as usual."

But despite Mae West's denials, Bogie maintained through the rest of his life that he'd seen Bernhardt on the same playbill with Fields.

When Bernhardt was rolled onto the stage in a wheelchair, Hump was shocked. He'd expected to see some tall and statuesque figure of glamour and intrigue. Instead he saw a pale and very frail hospital patient in her 70s, with frizzy red hair. In an accident in France, she'd slipped and had fallen, breaking her leg. Gangrene had set in, and her doctors had to amputate her leg. For her first U.S. performance, she had turned that tragedy into an advantage. Wearing a poilu (the uniform French soldiers wore at the time), she'd appeared in New York playing a French soldier who had lost a leg. She'd held a battered flag in her hand while standing unsupported on her still-remaining good leg. Hollow cheeked and colorless, she emphasized her deadly whiteness with a dense coat of chalk-colored poudre-de-riz on her face. Looking like a consumptive wraith, she evoked the mummy of an Egyptian Pharaoh.

But when Bernhardt spoke lines from Dumas fils ' La Dame aux Camélias, her beautiful voice radiated magic. Even from her wheelchair, she moved her body with the lashing grace of a panther.

Spellbound, Hump sat with Bill throughout the performance in a state of rapture. At the end, Bernhardt received a standing ovation that lasted ten minutes. Of her voix d'or, the writer, Maurice Baring, rhapsodized, calling her sound, "A symphony of golden flutes and muted strings, a silver dawn lit by lambent lightnings, soft stars and a clear-cut crescent moon."

After that day, Hump became addicted to the theater the way an addict is to heroin. He couldn't get enough of Broadway shows.

Back home that night, Hump poured out his enthusiasm for the world of the Bradys and his love of the theater. Maud was not impressed. "Not only are they in show business, they are Jews." Hump didn't care.

As days drifted into weeks, Bill Brady was becoming more possessive of Hump, who no longer planned his own life but allowed his best friend to do it for him. At plays or at the cinema, Bill took to holding Hump's hand. Hump never objected to this and enjoyed the camaraderie. Even when Bill put his arm around him and walked along the streets of Manhattan or Brooklyn, Hump did not object. A lot of schoolboys in those days did that.

The word "homosexual" was just coming into vogue in avant-garde circles, but in the minds of most people, if such a thing existed at all, it was never spoken about. Many indulgent parents, especially those as sophisticated as Belmont and Maud, assumed that a young boy went through periods of infatuation with another boy his own age.

Even if extreme affection was displayed, it was taken for granted that this was just a “stage” a young man went through before meeting the girl of his dreams and settling down.

In spite of the domestic horror surrounding the shooting incident at school, and the subsequent injury to his lip, Hump had not lost interest in his Daisy Air Rifle. Nor had it been taken away from him by his father. The future actor, who would one day become a famous icon in a trench coat carrying a gun, spent hours in his room dismantling his gun and reassembling it.

He even carried it in the leg of his trousers and took it with him whenever he went with Bill to the theater. After a show let out, they would find nearly deserted streets where no cop could be seen, then shoot out the globes of gas lamps before scampering off into the darkness of an alleyway to hide if anyone tried to chase after them.

One late summer afternoon, Hump tired of his air rifle and wanted something more lethal. Before going over to Bill’s house, Hump went into the basement of the Bogart home and removed a .22 caliber pistol from his father’s collection which he kept there.

Über-divas
Alla Nazimova

and Sarah Bernhardt

Bill had been given tickets to see a performance that evening by Alla Nazimova. This Russian-born stage actress and silent film star was famous for her interpretations of works by the Norwegian playwright Henrik Ibsen. Hump was anxious to see her in the flesh, having read much press on her at Brady Sr.’s theatrical offices. It could not have been imagined by Hump at the time that he would one day live at the Garden of Allah in Hollywood which, as “the Garden of Alla,” had been Nazimova’s home before it was turned into a hotel and colony of bungalows.

But it wasn’t a work by Ibsen that Nazimova was performing that night. She was starring in Bella Donna, a frothy lust-and-revenge melodrama. Hump would have preferred a more classical introduction to her repertoire. After all, this was the electrifying actress who had brought Chekhov and Stanislavsky to the American theater.

Hump found the diminutive star “shatteringly powerful” and marveled at her “foreign sophistication.” This exotic actress would, in fact, pave the way for the likes of silent screen vamp Pola Negri and, in time, Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich. In just a few years Nazimova would& select Rudolph Valentino as her co-star in the film Camille before stealing his wife, the stunningly beautiful Natacha Rambova, as part of a well-publicized and notorious lesbian tryst.

After seeing Bella Donna, Bill and Hump headed for a Broadway diner for a plate of ham and eggs for Hump and a hamburger for Bill. His friend told Hump, "Don't go falling for Nazimova. She likes to have sex with women— not men."

This was the first knowledge Hump had of lesbianism, although he would in the 30s and 40s appear with more lesbian stars than any other leading male actor in Hollywood.

He'd heard that boys fooled around together, and had late at night wondered if his own father might have some sort of "unnatural attachment" to the sailor riff-raff he brought to their home. Like Queen Victoria, he'd never given lesbianism a thought.

Bill claimed that Nazimova had fallen in love with his mother, Grace George, and had ardently pursued her, sending her roses every day, even expensive gifts, until Nazimova had tired of Grace's lack of response. By then, Nazimova had moved on, having fallen in love with another actress, Eva Le Gallienne.

Later, Bill promised to invite Hump up to his bedroom where he claimed he would show him some "dirty French postcards" he'd stolen from his father's files. Hump eagerly accepted that invitation. He'd never seen a picture of a man and a woman having sex together.

After a snack, Bill asked Hump to go with him to Coney Island to ride the Ferris wheel. Later the boys planned to shoot out some more bright lights.

On the fast-spinning wheel, something went wrong. The pistol Hump had concealed in his trousers blasted off. The bullet missed his chest, which could have killed him, but blasted into his right wrist. At first Bill thought that Hump was screaming at the thrill of the ride until Hump held up his wrist in agony as the blood gushed out.

Nothing could be done until the end of the ride. Knowing they would have to seek help from the police, Bill took the gun from Hump and tossed it into the night.

At the end of the ride, the manager saw that young Hump had been injured and immediately called the police. Hump, with Bill in attendance, was rushed to the hospital where a doctor discovered that it was a bullet wound. Until then, the police believed that somehow he'd been cut, perhaps by one of the moving parts on the Ferris wheel.

Hump lied to the police and to the doctor, claiming that during the ride a sniper had shot at them, missing Bill but hitting him. The police bought that unlikely story.

When the police drove Hump back home to Manhattan that night, Maud and Belmont were in the foyer waiting for him. After thanking the cops for their assistance, an angry Belmont didn't strike his son in the face this time. What he did do was to forbid him to carry guns any more. He said that he'd gone to his son's room and removed the beloved Daisy Air Rifle.

"It's time to ship you off to the Phillips Academy at Andover to prepare you for Yale," Belmont said.

"And I absolutely forbid you to see that Brady boy again," Maud said. "You were a good boy until you took up with the likes of that Jew."

"I'll go to the academy," Hump said to his parents. "But there's no way in hell I'll give up my friendship with the Bradys." He stormed upstairs to his bedroom, slamming the door behind him.

With a bandaged wrist, Hump accepted Bill's invitation to visit his bedroom at the Brady house to view a collection of pornographic French postcards. They had been collected by his father on a visit to Paris and smuggled through U.S. Customs, as was the way in those days of heavy censorship.

Today, in an era when pre-adolescents routinely watch porno on television, it's difficult to imagine the effect back then of a "dirty picture" on young boys at the height of their sexual potency.

Hump was fascinated by the sepia-toned photographs, one showing a young man with a large erection standing up while two bare-breasted women kneeled to service him. Another depicted the same man bedding one of the women. Yet another pictured him plunging down on a woman in the act of cunnilingus.

Bill became so excited by the pictures that he whipped out his penis and began masturbating, urging Hump to do the same. Reluctantly Hump pulled out his penis and he too masturbated to climax.

After putting the postcards back into their folder, Bill asked Hump to kiss him since he hadn't touched him during their sex together.

Hump agreed, providing Bill would swear not to tell anybody. "It's okay," Bill told him. "I've done this to other guys. All the guys at school do it."

Hump kissed him back. As he was to recall years later to his friend, Truman Capote, "It wasn't at all bad. It felt kinda nice. I didn't think anybody in the world loved me at the time, and it was good to know that Bill did. At first I kissed him because I felt I owed him a favor. After we kissed, I liked it a lot. It was the beginning of many kisses we'd exchange over the years. Our relationship never developed much beyond that. Kissing and playing with each other was as far as I was willing to go. I knew Bill wanted to do some of the things in those pictures, but I could never bring myself to it. I loved the guy, though."

The marriage between Phillips Academy at Andover, Massachusetts, some twenty miles north of Boston, and Humphrey Bogart was doomed from the beginning, when he arrived there a week late for classes during an unseasonably cool September in 1917. Founded by Calvinists during the American Revolution, it was the finest prep school in the country. One of its stated purposes was to guard young men "against the first dawnings of depraved nature."

The Academy could name-drop like no other school, having historical ties with John Hancock, Paul Revere, John Adams (its fourth principal), George Washington (who gave an address there), and, in time, Judge Oliver Wendell Holmes and, much later, President George Bush Sr.

Belmont had graduated with the class of 1888, having excelled in baseball and football. He'd written his former schoolmate, Alfred Stearns, now headmaster, asking him to admit his son in spite of his poor grades at Trinity.

On the train to Andover, Hump read Stove at Yale, Owen Johnson's popular novel which painted a romanticized version of what college life was really like. To Hump, the novel read like a saccharine-laced fantasy. He'd also bought a newspaper that morning, as he always read the front page news carefully. The United States had entered the war on the side of the Allies on April 6, 1917. Before leaving New York, Belmont had told him that many of the students at Andover, along with some faculty members, had temporarily resigned or left the Academy to join the forces on the Western Front in Europe, battling the Kaiser's armies.

Assigned a spartan-looking cell, Number Five, at Taylor Hall, Hump felt that his steel cot evoked a prison cell. Up to now, he'd lived in grand comfort.

Next to Hump's room was the bathroom, shared by twelve other young men on the floor. A previous occupant of Hump's cell must have had an interest in boys taking a shower, because he'd carved a hole about the size of a baseball between Hump's room and the shower.

The marriage between Phillips Academy (above) and teenaged Hump was doomed from the beginning

Hump discovered that hole in the wall on his second day there when he went to remove the reproduction of an antique map of Massachusetts. Looking through the hole, he could have a perfect view of the genitalia of the young men showering. Fortunately, no one was in the shower room when he peeked in, or else he would have been embarrassed.

Lonely and sad to be away from Bill and the bright lights of Broadway, the seventeen-year-old Hump found himself facing a Puritan regime that was launched at 7:30 every morning at chapel.

Classes were boring and he wanted to drop out of Phillips Academy after the first semester until he met schoolmate Floyd Furlow, who also lived in Manhattan. The son of the president of Otis Elevator Company, Floyd was a fun-loving guy full of wicked humor.

Although only eighteen years old at the time, Floyd claimed to have had ten affairs with women, three of whom were married to some of his father's best friends. He also stashed away booze in his room and would invite his "favorites" on the floor to come and join him.

Floyd and his friends seemed to know much about the world. All of them had been to Europe and one of them, Philip Burton, had once been taken to Africa on a safari with his father.

Hump couldn't match these adventures, as he'd never been taken even to Canada on one of Belmont's hunting trips.

Frederick Boyce, the stern headmaster of Hump's dormitory, was also a physics teacher. With his white mop of hair, he stuck his eagle's beak into everybody's business. Boyce was known for raining hell and damnation onto anyone who violated house rules.

With his wife, Betty, and their three children, Boyce lived on the dormitory's main floor so he could observe the coming and going of all "my boys." Students were forbidden to use the entrance in the rear.

The only boy on the floor who Hump disliked intensely was a nerd who wore thick wire-rimmed glasses, Charles Yardley Chittick. Chittick wanted to study law at either Harvard or Yale. Hump suspected that he was a spy, reporting every infraction to Boyce.

Charles had the single cell directly opposite Hump's. Whenever they would meet in the hallway, neither spoke to each other. If they encountered each other in the shower room, Hump would turn his back to Charlie and conceal his genitals.

Charles had told Floyd that he considered Hump a spoiled brat, secretly resenting that Hump was invited to Floyd's drinking parties and that he was excluded. Both Floyd and Hump referred to Charles as "a bookworm."

Hump eagerly awaited the Christmas vacation when he could return to Manhattan and take in some Broadway entertainment and resume his friendship with Bill.

Ten days before Hump's anticipated return to New York, Dr. Stearns had written Belmont a bad report. "Your son appears bored in class, his mind dreaming dreams of God only knows what. He is indifferent to the school curriculum. He doesn't participate in sports or any school activities. He doesn't even try to maintain a respectable gentleman's C average. Although we are allowing him to return after the holidays, I must withdraw all off-campus privileges. He will be confined to his room, the library, the dining room, and his classrooms. Despite your earlier assurances to the contrary, I fear that your son is definitely not Andover material. Unless he improves in the upcoming semester, I fear for the continuation of his academic career."

That Christmas, a few days before his eighteenth birthday, Hump was certain of only one thing: he didn't want to be a surgeon like his father, and he didn't want to go to Yale or Harvard.

Home from Andover for the holidays, Hump endured the criticism of his parents and listened to how disappointed they were over his academic record. He promised them he'd buckle down during the second term and make them proud of him, although secretly he had no intention of changing any of his behavior at the academy. None of the teachers inspired him, and their boring recitations of dates and historical events conveyed no drama for him.

On the first night of his return, Hump couldn't wait for the end of his reunion with his parents, so he could sneak out of the house to see Bill Brady. While at the Phillips Academy, Bill had written him almost daily, and Hump had answered every letter. At times Bill's letters were all that kept Hump from wanting to commit suicide.

At the Brady home, Hump was welcomed more lovingly by this Jewish family than by his own dysfunctional and coldhearted parents. Brady Sr. seemed genuinely interested in him, and Grace George and Alice Brady filled him in on all the news of their latest theatrical successes. Hump was particularly intrigued by the silent screen flickers Alice was making, although Grace George considered the movies a passing fancy and not worthy of the attention of a serious actor.

Once alone with Hump in his upstairs bedroom, Bill hugged Hump in a tender embrace and kissed him on the lips. "You're still my best buddy or did you mate with some other person up at Andover?"

"I'm still your best friend," Hump said. "For always. I'm pretty much a loner at school."

In spite of this pledge of devotion, Bill regaled Hump with tales of his recent sexual exploits. Hump was surprised that Bill had never mentioned this in any of his letters. "I met this girl," Bill said. "Priscilla Davenport. I know. A real dumb name. But she was terrific. She let me get into her bloomers any time I wanted. Those secret sessions you and I had together were just kid's stuff. I got the real thing and it was terrific."

"I can't match your record," Hump said. "I pursued a few gals at Andover but nothing happened. A harmless date here and there. Maybe a kiss. Nothing heavy. I'd like to meet this gal of yours."

"Too late for that," Bill said. "She moved to California with her family. Her dad's in the movie business. He thinks Hollywood will one day be the center of films. My dad knows a lot more about flickers than Priscilla's old man. Dad says the heart of the film colony will still be New York and New Jersey."

Hump had mixed feelings about Bill's relationship with Priscilla. He was both happy about his friend's scoring with a woman, yet jealous at the same time. For some reason he resented Bill's intimacy with someone else.

Those feelings of resentment disappeared later that afternoon when Alice Brady introduced Hump to her new beau.

Only slightly younger than Hump, Stuart Rose was the best-looking and most dashing teenager Hump had ever met. In his case, Alice didn't seem to mind that Stuart was younger than herself. She'd treated Hump like a kid, but related to the even younger Stuart like a man of the world.

Doughboy pizzazz: Hump's brother-in-law Stuart Rose

Precocious for his age, Stuart was a cavalryman in the U.S. Army and was home on leave. The Rose family lived on Riverside Drive, only a ten-minute walk from the Bogart home.

Alice had met Stuart when he'd come backstage to congratulate her for her appearance in the revival of Little Women, in which she played Meg, a role she'd first performed on Broadway in 1912.

"Since that first meeting, we've seen each other every day," she told Hump, as she took Stuart's hand and gazed into his eyes.

Caught up as they were in the theatrical productions of Brady, Sr., each member of the Brady family was preoccupied with his newest film, Love Eternal, being produced on a sound stage in Queens. Even the dignified Grace George, despite her oft-expressed disdain for "the flickers," was about to appear in her husband's movie, having agreed at the last minute to replace the film's original star, actress Beatrice Lane, who had suddenly fallen ill with pneumonia. Grace was co-starring in the movie with her stepdaughter, Alice Brady, who played the role of the naïve ingénue, and young Bill was working as the assistant director to his father.

One evening, when every member of the Brady family was caught up in some aspect of the film's production, Stuart Rose found himself alone for the evening. In the same position, Hump immediately invited him to dinner at Luchow's, the long-established German restaurant on 14th Street so beloved by his father, Belmont.

Throughout the evening, Hump became enthralled with Stuart, who entertained him with stories of his life as a cavalryman. "Women really go for a man in uniform."

Hump was amazed that a teenager even younger than himself had had so many exploits with women. Hump always remembered his introduction to Stuart as "one of the most memorable evenings of my life. With Bill I felt like I was a boy talking to another boy. With Stuart, I felt we were talking man to man. My blossoming friendship with him became a rite of passage into manhood."

When Bill called the next day to invite Hump to a Broadway play, Hump had to turn him down. He'd already accepted an invitation for horseback riding with Stuart, who had a lot of free time because Alice "was shooting some stupid movie during the day and appearing as Meg in Little Women at night."

Bill seemed disappointed that Hump had made a "new best friend" so suddenly. Nonetheless, to show what a good sport he was, he invited both Stuart and Hump to a Broadway musical to which his father had given him free tickets. But during the performance, Bill felt a little left out and neglected, as Hump devoted all his attention to Stuart, exaggerating his hell-raising exploits at Andover and his conquests of campus beauties.

Shortly before Stuart had to report back to military service, he came to the Bogart home to retrieve Hump for another afternoon of horseback riding.

Frances (Pat) Bogart was in the living room, and Hump introduced the good-looking Army man to his sister. Frances was almost the same height as her brother and had a shapely figure even then. When Stuart learned that she didn't have an escort for the school dance the following night, he volunteered his services.

Stuart was so captivated with Frances that he asked Hump if he could postpone their horseback ride for another time. He invited Frances to go for a stroll with him in Central Park.

After Hump returned to Andover, Frances wrote to him from St. Mary's School in Peekskill, New York. She informed him that she received a letter from Stuart almost every day. Hump wrote several letters to Stuart himself, but only a brief postcard every now and then came in reply.

Before his departure for Phillips Academy, he hadn't even bothered to call Bill to tell him good-bye and to thank him for his hospitality. But confronted anew with the loneliness of Andover, Hump started writing Bill again. Hump's temporarily deserted friend responded with enthusiastic letters, and their friendship resumed with only slightly less intensity than before.

After his third week back at Andover, Hump's dormitory maniacally celebrated the end of a winning football game. Even the stern headmaster, Boyce, temporarily relaxed his iron-fisted rules and allowed the young men to celebrate the school's victory. Having no interest in sports, Hump had stayed in his room trying to study, hoping for some passing grades.

Some of the men on Hump's floor had slipped beer upstairs and were having a wild party, running up and down the corridor. When this party overflowed into the shower room, it appeared that some of the men were pouring beer over the heads of the others, as they showered.

Anxious to see what was going on, Hump turned off the lamp in his room, removed the antique map, and peered through the hole in the wall at the naked boys in the shower.

That was a big mistake. Somehow Charles Yardley Chittick, even without his horn-rimmed glasses, happened to notice a hole in the wall to the shower room. He detected someone spying on them.

Poking his fingers through the hole in the wall, Chittick encountered the framed map, which had fallen back into position as Hump had jumped back. The wire holding the map came unhooked, the print falling to the floor, its glass frame breaking. Terrified at having been caught peeking, Hump concealed himself in the corner of the darkened room.

"We've got a live one, guys," Chittick yelled to the other boys. "Bogart's spying on our dicks."

As Hump cringed in his darkened room, he heard catcalls and cries of "Sissy, sissy." One of the young men shouted inside the hole, "Look at mine if you want to see a big dick. I'll let you be my gal, Nancy boy."

The next day, humiliated, Hump darted in and out of his classes, hoping not to encounter any of his dorm mates. When he returned to his dormitory, Boyce was waiting for him and asked him to step inside the library. There Boyce appeared to be under reasonable control but his eyes avoided Hump's when he spoke. "Many young men go through certain periods of adjustment in their lives," Boyce said, like a professor giving a physics lecture. "These are natural things. It doesn't mean that these same boys can't grow up to become responsible citizens and loving fathers with a good wife and healthy children. I think you'll grow out of your present behavior. It will take time, though. In the meantime, you're confined to your room after classes let out for the day. You're to leave this building only to go to the dining hall. As for your new room assignment, there is a small one right next to my apartment. It used to belong to a janitor who worked here. You're to take that room. I've had your stuff moved downstairs. Your room upstairs will be assigned to someone else next term. Needless to say, that hole carved in the wall will be sealed up. I'll write Dr. Bogart and bill him for damages. To spare you, I won't tell him why you damaged the wall."

“But I didn’t…” Hump stammered in protest but soon realized that it was useless. He’d already been tried and convicted.

After the shower incident, the other young men in Hump’s dormitory avoided him, all except one, Floyd Furlow. Catching up with Hump after class one day, Floyd told him that he didn’t believe all the stories being spread. “If anyone’s a fucking sissy, it’s Chittick himself. I wouldn’t take a shower with him.”

Over a cup of coffee and a hamburger at a local café, Floyd told Hump that the only way he could salvage his reputation at the Phillips Academy was to have an affair. “I’ve been seeing this older woman regularly. Her name’s Medora Falkenstein, and she loves young men. She even likes to do nude drawings of them. I can set up a meeting. When the guys learn you’re seeing Medora, they’ll forget all about Chittick’s dumb gossip.”

At first Hump had raised a number of protests, including that he was confined to his room after class. “I’m not even supposed to be here right now,” Hump said, looking around the café. “I’ll tell Boyce I was studying at the library.”

“The Boyce family is sound asleep by ten o’clock every night,” Floyd said. “All the guys know that. Your new room is on the ground floor. All you have to do is open your window and slip out after the Boyces are snoring.”

Slipping out the next night, Hump was shaking a bit as he knocked on the door of Medora Falkenstein. He was a bit disappointed when she answered the door. A shade past forty, she was garishly made up and wore an artist’s smock. He wasn’t certain what her body looked like under that ill-fitting garment. But even if he wasn’t immediately smitten with her, Medora was enthralled with Hump.

She invited him in and gave him a large glass of Scotch. She also filled him with compliments about “what a beauty you are, far more so than Floyd, although I love that boy dearly.”

Hump later told Floyd that he fully expected to get laid that afternoon, and had wanted to get it over with, so he could slip back into the dormitory, letting Floyd spread the word the next day of his conquest.

Medora had her own ideas about sex and how she liked it. On his third drink, when Hump’s head was reeling, she showed him nude sketches she’d done of several boys on the campus, especially three of Floyd himself. She claimed that she’d moved to Andover just to be close to campus and “its never-ending supply of good-looking men.”

“Who buys this stuff?” Hump asked her.

“I deal exclusively with a private art dealer in Boston,” she said. “He has clients all over the country.”

“You mean women buy this?” Hump asked.

“Heavens no,” she said. “Men who like to be discreet. They pay top prices to see nude sketches of some of the country’s most beautiful young men in their prime. Perhaps you’ll pose for me one day.”

“I couldn’t do that,” Hump said, no doubt thinking of the time he’d posed nude for Maud’s art class.

“There’s a hundred dollars in it for you,” she said.

He was amazed at being offered that amount of money. It sounded like a fantastic sum. “I’ll think about it.”

“You don’t have something you’re ashamed of?” Medora asked, reaching to unbutton Hump’s fly. With deft fingers, she removed his penis. “My, oh my, what a big boy you are. Much bigger than Floyd and he’s not bad.” Before Hump truly comprehended what was happening, Medora skinned back the cap of his penis and descended on him, as he immediately hardened.

In later life Bogie would tell friends that Medora got him addicted to blow-jobs. “She was the first person who ever gave me one, and she was also the best. A suction pump. She never allowed herself to be penetrated so she had developed her technique of the blow-job to absolute perfection since that was her only thing.” Medora would masturbate herself as she performed fellatio on young men from Phillips Academy who ventured into her studio.

Afternoon visits to Medora became a ritual for Hump, who would go and see her right after his last class of the day. He managed to convince Boyce that he was spending the time in the academy library.

Eventually, since she always plied him with "hooch," as she called it, she didn't have much trouble persuading Hump to pose nude for her. After all, he didn't have anything to hide from her prying eyes that she hadn't seen in intimate close-up. Even buck-naked, he was completely relaxed in her studio, unlike his time in front of Maud's class when he'd been so nervous that he felt he'd shrunk a lot.

That was not his problem with Medora. Sometimes her sketching of him was interrupted when he'd get hard. She'd abandon her drawing and fellate him.

His sessions with Medora continued for nearly a month until one Saturday she invited him to come over around eleven in the evening. "My time with you is too brief. I want to make a night of it. Give you an around-the-world. It drives the boys crazy."

He wasn't certain what an around the world meant, but was intrigued at the prospect. That night a heavy snowstorm descended on Andover, and, anticipating his visit, Hump borrowed a pair of skis from the school athletic room and stored them in his tiny bedroom.

When the Boyces seemed to be deep into their nightmares and snores, he raised his window and slipped out of the dorm, attaching his skis and gliding his way to Medora's studio.

That night there were no nude sketches. Hump quickly learned that Medora's talented tongue could not only tame a hardened penis, but knew how to explore every crevice of a male body.

Regrettably when returning to the dormitory in the pre-dawn hours, Hump was greeted by Boyce who caught him trying to sneak back into his window with the skis. The two men wrestled in the snow. Boyce's coat was ripped, his head injured.

The next morning, Headmaster Stearns called Hump into his office, informing him that he was expelled and was to check out of the dormitory that day, taking the train back to New York. "You are not worthy of the Academy," Stearns told him. "I predict you'll be a miserable failure in life, and have so informed Dr. Bogart."

By three o'clock on that snowy day in 1918, Hump had told Floyd goodbye and was on the train to Boston where he'd catch a larger train bound for New York.

Fearing the wrath of his parents, he decided that before he reached Manhattan he would take charge of his own life. He was going to make some bold career move and announce it the moment he came into the Bogart living room.

Before the train neared the outskirts of New York, Hump had made up his mind. The United States had already joined with the Allies to fight Germany in World War I. He'd join the fray.

Beginning tomorrow morning he was going to enlist in the U.S. Navy and would write his friend, Franklin D. Roosevelt, of his decision. The date was May 28, 1918.

If his parents had been cold and distant when he joined the Navy in the closing weeks of World War I, the Brady family was just the opposite. Brady Sr., Alice, Grace, and especially Bill Jr. were saddened to see him go. Each family member, promising to be on shore to welcome him home whenever his discharge might eventually arrive, had hugged and kissed him.

At the Bogart home, Maud would surely have dismissed such a farewell "as cheap theatrics common among Jews." She had given Hump a handshake, as had Belmont. His sisters, Frances and Catherine, had each kissed his cheek and wished him a safe return.

On June 19, 1918, a doctor at the Brooklyn Naval Base found that Hump was free of both syphilis and gonorrhea. In the event of Hump's death while overseas, he was told that his father would collect $35.90 per month for six months.

If he thought life was regimented at Andover, Hump was hardly prepared for the severe discipline of basic training which began July 2 at the Pelham Park Reserve in New York.

By November 9, about four months later, he was pronounced fit for duty and assigned to the USS Leviathan, a transport ship with a trio of gigantic funnels and zebra-like camouflage stripes. He came aboard as a helmsman, but even before the ship sailed from Hoboken, New Jersey, news reached the crew of the armistice. Germany had surrendered on& November 11, 1918, and World War I was at an end.

US Navy Seaman

There was still a job for the crew of the Leviathan, however. Ironically, it had originally been commissioned as the Vaterland and assigned to transport the Kaiser's forces. However, when the United States and Germany declared war, the Vaterland was in Hoboken and was seized by the United States Treasury Department. After some repairs and alterations, it was rechristened the Leviathan. Capable of carrying 14,500 men, it was the largest transport ship in the U.S. Navy.

Although he'd never seen active duty, Seaman No.1123062 put on his sailor's dress uniform with its knotted cravat and white puttees for a victory parade in Brooklyn. The next morning he sailed for Liverpool.

The vessel had been assigned for the next six months to haul U.S. servicemen back from France and England. En route to England, a junior officer, Robert Browne, demanded that Hump carry away some coffee cups and dirty dishes that had been left on deck by the officers. "Not my detail," Hump informed Browne. The officer kicked him in the face, bloodying his nose. "When an officer speaks to you and issues a command, you obey orders, boy."

"Yes, sir," Hump answered. There is no further record of Hump showing insubordination to an officer. Quickly learning that the U.S. Navy was not a democracy, he was a dutiful sailor until his term of duty came to an end.

All those stories, many made up by Bogie himself or his biographers, about the action he saw in World War I were inspired more by the bottle than real life. Bogie was a lot tougher on screen in his trench coat, carrying a gun, than he was in his Navy bell bottoms. Before heading overseas, he was widely quoted as proclaiming, "I'm not afraid of death."

He had no reason to be. The naval historian, Richard Wright, in a report filed with the State Department, wrote, "No troopship coming to the coast of France or England by an American escort was successfully attacked. The U.S. Navy transported two-million troops without losing a single man."

That didn't mean that Hump was freed of all the horrors of war. He was forever scarred by what he'd witnessed when returning soldiers were brought aboard his vessel. The young and the healthy came back from the battlefields "without a scratch." But other, sadder men had lost legs or arms on the battlefields of Eastern France. Some soldiers who'd been the victim of mustard gas were permanently wrecked. "When I saw the suffering of these men, and even though I was just a teenager, the terror of war struck my heart," Bogie was later to say. "War no longer seemed the grand adventure it had when I first sailed."

In later years, it was widely publicized that Bogie had received the famous injury to his upper lip when the Leviathan came under German shelling. That was just a fanciful tale conjured up in Hollywood long after the war was over, the U-boat menace itself something for the history pages. In later years, Bogie was embarrassed by his lack of action in World War I, and often invented stories to impress his cronies.

Over the years, Bogie also took particular delight in describing shore leave when he'd take the train from whichever French port where the Leviathan had docked, heading for Paris and "all those French dames." Bogie described in detail to John Huston and others how he visited the city's famous maisons de tolerance —a graceful term for "whorehouse." Bogie later claimed that he'd spent an entire week at one bordello on the Left Bank, venturing out only for meals. "Everything I learned about sex I learned in that house with about a dozen French-speaking prostitutes including some from Siam and Africa."

The biggest problem with that story is that the crew of the Leviathan was never granted shore leave to visit Paris during Hump's entire tour of duty aboard the vessel. He did, however, dock in Southampton, England, and visited the Red Lion Pub which staged drag acts so popular with the English.

Bogie never liked to talk about the most dramatic event of his military career. In February of 1919, he was transferred from the Leviathan to the USS Santa Olivia, which would be sailing from Hoboken, New Jersey, to Brest, France.

For a final night of fun, he'd gone to The Gilded Cage, a notorious bar in Hoboken that catered to lonely sailors, relieving them of their money and their misery with "some of the most beautiful girls in Jersey."

The bar was run by a German-born lesbian, "Isak Smith," who claimed to be Swedish because of anti-German sentiment in the United States at the time. Apparently her real name was Isak but she changed her last name to Smith because it sounded American. Isak was said to have "auditioned" all the girls who worked in her bar before turning them loose to hustle sailors.

The Gilded Cage was famous for pushing drinks. Each working girl got a commission for every glass of overpriced booze she pushed onto a sailor. By the time many sailors reached a prostitute's bed, they were too drunk to perform although they were charged ten dollars anyway.

Hump had one-hundred dollars in his pocket, and he'd demanded the best-looking woman in the bar. When he left with a beautiful boozy blonde for a room in a nearby hotel, he was falling down drunk.

He had to report to duty at five that morning. As he later remembered it, his new-found girl friend had agreed to wake him up in time. The next morning her clock revealed that it was ten o'clock. The Olivia had sailed at seven that morning.

Putting on his trousers, Hump rushed to Naval Headquarters in Hoboken where he turned himself in. He was officially placed in the brig and fed a diet of only bread and water.

Branded a deserter, he very cleverly decided to call in a favor from none other than Franklin Roosevelt, then assistant secretary of the Navy. He wrote Roosevelt, recalling their meeting and their night together at Seneca Point. True to his word and eager to return a kindness, Roosevelt intervened and got Hump's offense changed from deserter to "absent without leave."

Because of Roosevelt's intervention, Hump—despite his status as a deserter—received an honorable discharge at the Brooklyn Naval Yard on June 18, 1919, with a ranking as seaman second class—not the rank of quartermaster that he had hoped for. All that he had to show for his time in the service was twelve dollars in his pocket and a Victory Medal—an award that was routinely given to every serviceman who had completed a term of duty in the Armed Forces.

At the Bogart home on his first evening back, he found the atmosphere even chillier than when he'd left. His sisters were away at school, and all Maud could manage was another handshake. Belmont was away working as a ship's doctor on a cruise to Florida.

"We can't help you at all," Maud told Hump. Their rich life with a house full of servants was over. "There is no more money, only debts." He learned that the summer home at Seneca Point had finally been sold, the profit having gone to pay off mounting debts. Belmont had invested the family money in a get-rich-quick scheme in Michigan timberland and had lost every penny.

Because of his severe drug abuse, his once-flourishing medical practice had fallen off severely as patients drifted away. That's why he took assignments as a ship's doctor aboard cruises for long periods of time.

Wandering alone on the streets of New York, Hump found himself in the same situation as many returning veterans. He was out of work, relatively uneducated, and not qualified for most professions.

He longed for that overdue reunion with the Bradys, knowing that loving and supportive family might help him decide what to do with his life. He especially missed Bill. But all of the Bradys, including Grace and Alice, were out of town touring with a roadshow.

Hump wrote Bill in Philadelphia. "Hurry back to New York and be my best pal once again. I miss you something awful. My life's a waste. I'm a failure."

In desperation and out of cash, Hump tried to find a job. He was hired to work in the mail department of the National Biscuit Company for $25 a week. After a month, and after showing up late for work four times in only two weeks, he was fired. An entire month went by before he found a job with the Pennsylvania Tug and Literage Company, where he was hired to trace shipments reported lost. Part of this job involved inspecting tugboats. Hump had distorted his Navy service record, and had claimed during his job interview that he was qualified as a boat inspector, which he wasn't. After sending in a number of reports that his boss called "nonsensical," Hump was fired.

Out of work and unable to find another job, Hump asked Belmont for help. Belmont's ill-fated investments were handled by the Wall Street firm of S.W. Strauss & Co. Belmont's longtime friend and investment broker, Wilbur Jenkins, was a vice president of the company. After Belmont appealed to Jenkins, the company hired Hump as a "runner" for $30 a week. He was charged with delivering securities and stock certificates to brokerage houses and banks.

When Bill Jr. returned to New York, Hump told him that he "was going to start out like Horatio Alger and work my way up to becoming president one day." Although Hump hated the runner's job, he held onto the position because he needed the money to party with his friends. The post-war era had arrived, and Hump expressed his desire "to become a Jazz Age baby."

As much as he hated his temporary jobs, Hump loved the rediscovery of his old friend. Although both men actively pursued girls, Hump and Bill Brady seemed more bonded than ever. Their boy/boy sexual flirtation with each other was about to enter a new phase. Although Hump was still considered very good looking in an unconventional way, Bill had grown into a remarkably handsome man, eagerly pursued by both girls and older women.

The dashing Stuart Rose had returned from military duty and had resumed his friendships with both Hump and Bill. He spent most of his time dating Frances. When Frances was at school, Stuart joined Bill and Hump on their jaunts to the Playhouse, a theater that William Brady Sr. operated on West 48th Street.

Sometimes, Stuart invited Hump and Bill to one of his equestrian classes at the Squadron A Armory. Originally Hump had been afraid of horses, but he trusted Stuart and responded to his teaching. Stuart pronounced him the best pupil he'd ever had.

Bill was much more interested in “the theater and girls,” although he still joined in the rides. On Sunday rides in Central Park, they would sometimes be joined by John Cromwell, the director.

The only problem was that Maud insisted on dressing Hump in fashionable riding gear that she’d seen in English sporting magazines. Hump stood out as a bit of a dandy and terribly overdressed.

It was a time for making new friends and going to social gatherings in Greenwich Village. Bill and Hump learned to love parties in the village where they felt a part of bohemian life for the first time. If given a chance, Hump would sing at these parties. He had made another friend, Kenneth Mielziner, who was an actor using the name “Kenneth MacKenna.” Although he could not have known it at the time, Kenneth was to become one of Bogie’s closest confidants during his first attempt at a film career in Hollywood. Kenneth shared a brownstone on Waverly Place in Greenwich Village with his brother, “Jo” Mielziner, who was slated for future fame as one of America’s leading stage designers.

Kenneth later recalled that he and Hump “liked the same type of woman,” although the breed was never specified, since Kenneth’s taste ranged from blondes to redheads, from tall, skinny girls to shorter, more fully rounded ones. “When I was through with a girl, I would pass her on to Hump. My attention span with women was short at the time, and I quickly became bored. I picked up girls with greater ease than Hump who was still a bit shy around the fairer sex. He was all too eager to date my discards.”

By 1938, the situation would reverse itself when Kenneth married one of Bogie’s “discards,” his second wife, Mary Philips.

Hump was finding it harder and harder to report to work as a runner on Wall Street. Nights were for frequenting speakeasies, listening to jazz, smoking, drinking bootleg hooch, and chasing after pretty women. Stuart remained faithful to Frances, but partly because of their promiscuity, Kenneth, Hump, John Cromwell, and Bill nicknamed themselves “the pussy posse.”

If a woman had a choice of these men, she usually opted for Bill Jr., since he possessed great charm and personality. If a girl couldn’t get Bill, she settled for one of the other young men. Perhaps because he was smaller and less dynamic around women, Hump was often the last to get picked for a date.

For a very brief time, a young actor, James Cagney, joined the pussy posse. Hump and Bill felt uncomfortable around Cagney but Kenneth insisted on inviting him. Unlike Hump’s “sissy” upbringing, Cagney, a man of the streets, had joined gangs as a kid and had learned to use his fists. He was the tough city kid, actually living the role that Hump would play at Warner Brothers when he often vied for the same parts that Cagney garnered, or else co-starred with him. Cagney told Hump that he could not make up his mind: he wanted to be either a song-and-dance man or else a farmer.

Although Cagney exuded masculinity, when he first met Hump he was appearing as a “showgal” in a revival of a production called Every Sailor. Originally conceived as a morale-booster for members of the Navy far from home, its cast included many recently discharged sailors. As in the original, all the female parts were played by men. When one of the cast members got sick, a friend introduced Cagney to the producer, Phil Dunning, who hired him on the spot, providing he’d appear in drag.

"Listen, for $35 a week, I'll come out nude if they want me to," Cagney told Hump. Cagney claimed that he looked great as a gal, especially when he painted his mouth in scarlet red in a "sort of bee sting," like screen goddess Mae Murray. Hump couldn't believe that Cagney could transform himself into a gorgeous dame. Cagney said that he'd show up for their next night on the town in full drag. "The men will flock around me like moths to the flame."

Indeed Cagney showed up two nights later dressed as a woman, and the pussy posse was stunned. Bill claimed that he would have asked Cagney for a date if he didn't know he had a dick under that gown.

Cagney demonstrated his skill as a vamp by capturing the attention of the handsomest man at the speakeasy. On a dare, Cagney disappeared two hours later with a young Wall Street broker. What happened later that night remains unknown. Cagney never told the pussy posse how the evening ended, and in his authorized biography, James Cagney, he makes no mention of having known Hump in their early days.

The next morning, hung over from an all-night party, Hump showed up late for work and was severely chastised by his boss on Wall Street. He was given documents to deliver to a firm ten blocks away. On the way there, he recalled having a splitting headache. Deep into his hangover, and barely able to continue down the block, he opted for breakfast at a coffee shop, hoping that would cure his pain. Shortly thereafter, three blocks from the scene of his ham and eggs breakfast, he realized with horror that he'd left the valuable documents in a briefcase perched on the coffee shop's coat rack. He hurried back, only to discover that the briefcase had been stolen.

"Knowing I was going to get fired when I returned to the office, I decided not to go back," Hump later recalled.

On an impulse and having given it no thought beforehand, he rode the subway to the theatrical offices of William Brady, Sr. Hump felt that he should have checked with Bill before asking his father for a job but there was no time for that.

William Sr. welcomed Hump into his office as he had remained a family favorite. Telling the elder showman of his plight, Hump found him most sympathetic. “I just happen to have an opening,” Brady said. “As an office boy. The pay’s $35 a week.”

Hump eagerly took the job and was thrilled to be making that much money in 1920. “As you know, sir, Bill and I both love the theater. To be a part of it in some way would make me very happy.”

“Cut out all of this I-love-the-theater crap,” Brady said. “The Broadway stage is just fine, and I guess it’ll go on forever. But the future of mass entertainment lies in the flickers. From now on, I’m a movie producer.”

Hump found his new job as an office boy exciting, as he would relate to an attractive brunette, Ruth Rankin, who he was dating at the time. He’d given her a handsome picture of himself in his full dress Navy uniform, and she kept the photograph by her bedside, which was always there to greet him during his frequent visits to that much-used bed.

Although Hump humped her frequently, he confessed to Bill that, “I don’t really love her.” Bill chided him, “You don’t have to love a gal to fuck her.”

After working for Brady for only a month, Hump was promoted to production manager of the Brady film studio at Fort Lee, New Jersey, his pay raised to $50 a week. His duties included renting props and paying off the actors in cash.

When Brady Sr. saw the first rushes of a film, Life, that he’d commissioned, he fired the director, Travers Vale, and assigned Hump to take over the job.

Knowing nothing about acting or directing, Hump found a beret and a pair of black boots in the wardrobe department and showed up the next day, thinking himself a budding Erich von Stroheim or Cecil B. DeMille. The stars of the film were Arline Pretty, Nita Naldi, and Rod La Rocque.

When Bill Brady Jr. visited the set on the second day of Hump’s tenure as director, he immediately fell in love with Arline Pretty, launching a hot, torrid affair that lasted exactly three days, until Nita Naldi reported for work. Bill immediately dumped Arline and chased after Naldi. Hump called his friend a “lovesick pup,” while denying that he was attracted to Naldi himself. Actually he wanted her and was jealous of Bill for capturing her so soon.

The witty and glamorous Naldi was Hump’s first experience with a screen vamp. Ironically, like Alice Brady herself, Naldi had been raised in a convent in New Jersey, where the Mother Superior happened to be her great-aunt. For someone with such a sheltered background, Hump thought Naldi had “street smarts.” On the first day of shooting, Naldi informed her young director, “Even though I’m supposed to be a vamp in this pisser of a flick, I don’t want to be photographed looking like Theda Bara buried for two-thousand years and just dug up.”

After five days of filming, Bill invited Hump to join him after work at a speakeasy in Fort Lee for a private conversation. “I’m in love with Nita and she’s in love with herself. I’m having the time of my life, but she says we can’t go on unless you get involved.”

"What in hell does that mean?" Hump asked.

"She wants you to join us in bed. Otherwise, it's no dice."

"You've got to be kidding," Hump said.

"C'mon," Bill urged. "It's not like we haven't known each other real intimate like. We already know that both of us are made of sugar and spice."

Hump didn't hesitate for long. A few drinks of bootleg gin lowered his inhibitions. He desperately wanted to seduce Naldi. Figuring if this was his only chance, and considering that Bill was such a close friend, he agreed to meet that night in Naldi's hotel room.

For the next ten days, shooting on Life slowed down considerably, as Bill, Naldi, and Hump spent as much as two hours a day in her makeshift dressing room. For reasons of her own, Naldi could no longer see either man at night.

She'd later confess to her Hollywood comrade and sometimes lover, Natacha Rambova, the second wife of Rudolph Valentino, that she'd let Bill get on her first before allowing Hump to mount her. "I wouldn't let either of them stay on long. When they started getting too excited, I'd make one get off and the other get on. I'd string this out for a long time before letting them have their well-earned climaxes. No woman in New York was more sexually fulfilled than I was."

Born Donna Dooley in New York City two years before Hump, Nita Naldi was the first of many screen vamps Hump would seduce. Fresh from the convent, she'd acquired an immediate job as a clothes model at $15 a week before joining the chorus line at the Winter Garden's Century Roof.

Hump might have fallen for Naldi, but the male star of the film, Rod La Rocque, had fallen for his director.

Born in Chicago of an Irish mother and a French father, Rod had played mainly "boy parts," often at a dollar a performance, before Brady Sr. cast him in Life. At the time he met Hump, he was living at a local YMCA with another aspiring actor, Ralph Graves. A closeted homosexual, known for his good looks, elegant profile, and—years later—for a real-estate fortune he developed by buying up then-undesirable California real estate, Rod quickly became a factor in young Hump's life. La Rocque had already appeared in a Brady theatrical production, Up the Ladder, with Brady's daughter, Alice. The play had bombed, but Brady Sr. was sufficiently impressed with the actor to give him a chance on film.

As Hump tried to direct Rod, the male star of the film had eyes only for Hump and not the camera. Rod even suggested that Hump direct him privately so he'd know how to play his love scenes with Nita Naldi. "I can play Naldi's part and you can be me in the love scenes."

Fellow sailors during his military duty had put the make on Hump, but he'd never been pursued by a homosexual as aggressively as he was chased by La Rocque.

“The fucker even sends me roses and buys me chocolates,” Hump confessed to Bill. “Like I’m his best dame or something. He begs me to go out with him. I’m too nice a guy to punch him out. Besides, he’s the star of my picture, and I don’t want to mess up his face.”

Hump didn’t become La Rocque’s lover but offered some good professional advice when the actor came to him to discuss screen billings. “Here is my choice of names,” La Rocque said. He’d written down suggestions for screen credit on a piece of paper which he handed to Hump.

Roderick La Rock. Rodney La Rock. Roderick La Rocque. Rodney LaRocque or Rod LaRocque. Hump studied the sheet, then wrote, “None of the above. Make it Rod La Rocque. It’s catchy.”

When Brady Sr. back in New York saw the first footage of Life directed by Hump, he was horrified. In several scenes, the drunken cameraman had actually put Hump into the frame, frantically directing his players. “The fucking director is being photographed directing,” Brady screamed out in his office.

The news that came in that day was even worse. Two of Life’s bit players filmed in a speeding car were supposed to be fighting for control of the steering wheel as the vehicle raced toward a stone wall. Hump had instructed the actors, Betty Furnall and Adolf Brunnen, to wait for a signal from him, at which point they were to swerve the car out of harm’s way, avoiding the wall. Hump miscalculated.

When he finally signaled, the car had gone beyond the point of no return. It crashed into the wall, and an ambulance was summoned to take the two victims to a hospital. Although injured, they survived the crash and lived to send Brady their medical bills.

The next day Brady drove over to Fort Lee and personally fired Hump, taking over as director himself.

That same day, Nita Naldi informed both Bill and Hump that she couldn’t see them any more. While dancing at the Winter Garden in the chorus, she’d been spotted by none other than John Barrymore. She claimed that he had fallen in love with her and was going to cast her opposite him in his flicker, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

Sorry to see her go, Hump and Bill agreed that Naldi would be one of the many chorus girls that The Great Profile would pick up and discard. In this rare instance, however, Barrymore did indeed cast her in the role, and Nita Naldi went on to become one of the reigning screen vamps of the Twenties. Her biggest break came in Cecil B. DeMille’s The Ten Commandments, where she played the Eurasian temptress, Sally Lung, who contracts leprosy as a “wages-of-sin” payment for her evil ways. Her co-star? None other than Rod La Rocque himself.

Brady Sr. went on to salvage Life, eventually selling it to Adolph Zukor for $100,000. After he’d purchased the film, Zukor looked at it carefully, deciding it wasn’t worth releasing. He assigned it to storage where it managed to disappear.

When Bogie in later life learned there were no more copies left, he said, “Thank the Devil for that.”

Out of work, Hump spent the next three weeks writing a scenario for a gory film, Blood and Death. He wrote the script at the 21 Club, then one of New York’s most famous speakeasies. Thinking that such a costume made him look more like a writer, he wore a tweed jacket and smoked a pipe.

Even though he’d been fired by Brady, Hump showed up at his office with his completed film script. Fearing rejection, Hump was surprised when “Mr. Showman” himself thought the script “could play.” He sent it over to a trio of producers he knew, Jesse L. Lasky, Samuel Goldfish (later Goldwyn), and Cecil B. DeMille. All three producers were too busy to read it, and they turned the script over to an office assistant, Walter Wanger. He skimmed it before tossing it into a wastepaper basket.

In later life, when Wanger had become one of Hollywood’s biggest producers and Bogie one of its biggest male stars, Wanger always claimed that “Bogart used to write for me.”

Wanger went on to produce such classics as Greta Garbo's Queen Christina in 1933, John Ford's Stagecoach in 1939, and even the ill-fated Cleopatra in 1963, co-starring Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton.

Walter Wanger with Joan Bennett in 1943

Following a night of tabloid scandal in 1951, Bogie visited Wanger in jail. The previous evening in a fit of jealous rage, Wanger had shot a well-known Hollywood agent, Jennings Lang, in the groin. The agent managed the career of the then famous actress, Joan Bennett. "I was aiming for the fucker's balls," Wanger told Bogie, "but I missed." Bogie's reply: "So what in hell was the matter with my screenplay?"

By 1937, Wanger agreed to cast Bogie in Stand-In with his friends, Leslie Howard and Joan Blondell.

Hump wasn't off the Brady payroll for long. Brady Sr. claimed he had no peace at home, because his wife, Grace George, his daughter, Alice, and his son, Bill, kept urging him to give Hump another chance. Brady rehired Hump at $50 a week and sent him on tour as the stage manager for Grace's play, The Ruined Lady.

He toured with Grace for six months in East Coast cities, including Philadelphia and Boston. He did not fall for Grace, who remained faithful to her husband, but she later recalled that he always managed to find a female companion in the seedy hotels her husband had booked them in. Mostly they stayed in fleabags that accepted traveling actors. Many hotels in those days refused to accommodate actors because they gave loud, drunken parties late at night, tore up the furniture, and usually skipped town without paying the bill.

Bogie in later life would view that tour of The Ruined Lady as the most sexually liberating period of his life. "Everything I learned about women, I learned then. I'd had sexual experiences with the likes of Nita Naldi and others, but on the road I met all sorts of women—all shapes, sizes, whatever. I learned that some gals will do things to a man that respectable women never do. After that road show, I found a return to New York restrictive."

Co-starring beside Grace was a handsome young actor, Neil Hamilton, playing the ingénu lead. Although Hamilton was headed for a big career in Hollywood where he would become one of its most durable actors, Hump as stage manager wasn't impressed with him. He called Hamilton "the stuffed shirt model," because the actor had posed for so many shirt ads in magazines. Hamilton countered by calling Hump "Baby Food." Behind Hump's back, he referred to him as "Baby Shit."

On tour with Hamilton, Hump needled him for "having such a soft job. All you have to do is show up every night, mouth some writer's words, and get your paycheck." Hamilton always protested that there was more to acting than that.

Neil Hamilton

Before sending him out on the road, Brady had insisted that Hump understudy all the male parts in case one of the actors got sick. Before the final performance of The Ruined Lady, Hamilton developed the flu and called in to cancel.

The cast assembled that Saturday afternoon for a dry run with Hump as the male lead. He'd memorized all the parts, having heard them week after week. But facing the seats of the empty theater, he was paralyzed and couldn't remember one line of dialogue.

Fortunately for Hump, Grace also developed a fever, perhaps having caught the flu germs from Hamilton during their love scenes. When members of the prospective audience showed up that night, their money was refunded at the box office.

In spite of what Hump would later call "the disaster that never was," the ever-faithful Brady family continued to believe in his acting talent. In May of 1921, Alice Brady offered him a walk-on part in her play, Drifting. It was going to have try-outs in Brooklyn in hope of obtaining backers for a Broadway production.

Its director was John Cromwell, Hump's close friend who was also a stage performer himself. In time, he would become one of Hollywood's leading directors, known for turning out such classics as Of Human Bondage in 1934, Algiers in 1938, Abe Lincoln in Illinois in 1940, and Anna and the King of Siam in 1946.

For Hump's stage debut in Drifting at Brooklyn's Fulton Theater, he invited everyone he knew. Maud chose not to go see her son on stage, still disapproving of his preferred choice of a profession. But the ever-faithful Bill Brady Jr. showed up, bringing with him Belmont and Stuart Rose. Stuart was still dating Frances. Hump's sister had just seen her husband-to-be march in the Memorial Day parade. All three were eager to see Hump on the stage, hoping it would be a triumph for him.

To Stuart's horror, he discovered that Hump was spectacularly miscast in the role of a Japanese butler. Alice played a femme fatale, an archetype that would be perfected by Marlene Dietrich in films of the 30s. In later life, Hump called her role "early Sadie Thompson." Kicked out of her home by her Puritan father, Alice's character ended up in Singapore "drifting" into a life of depravity before being rescued by a handsome American soldier who falls in love with her.

Director John Cromwell

Bogie made his brief appearance carrying a tray of pink gin fizzes. Trying to imitate a Japanese accent, he uttered the words, “Drinks for my lady and for her most honored guests.” Frances and Stuart slid down in their seats in embarrassment, although Belmont later said that he thought his son “did a right fair job.”

After he became a star, Bogie always derided the role as “the dumb Jap butler part,” as if anticipating the words of Erich von Stroheim who called his role in Sunset Blvd. opposite Gloria Swanson “the dumb butler part.” Von Stroheim made the role the greatest butler part of all time, whereas Bogie’s stage debut hardly merits a footnote in theatrical history.

Somewhere between the time the tryouts were held and the play’s Broadway opening, Hump and the slightly older Alice began a quiet affair, even though she had married James Crane.

“It’s a cordial romance,” Hump told Bill, who didn’t seem at all horrified that his best friend was sexually involved with his married stepsister. As Hump related to Bill, “We talk theater half the night and then get into bed together. Fortunately, Crane is out of town a lot. I get on top of her, do my job, then roll over and go to sleep,”

It wasn’t love, but it was sex. Actually it evolved more into friendship than anything else. Until her death, Hump would remain her steadfast friend.

Drifting did make it to Broadway and ran for sixty-three performances, even though Alan Dale, theater critic for the New York American, called the play “strangely protuberant.” Its Broadway run at an end, Brady sent Alice and Hump on the road with Drifting.

Two months into the run of Drifting, Alice announced to Hump that she was pregnant and was going to leave the cast. At first he was petrified, thinking that he might be the father. Alice assured him that the father was her husband.

After she bowed out of the show, she never resumed her affair with Hump, later referring to it as “that brief fling that often happens between actors.” For Hump, it would become the role model for a future series of involvements with actresses with whom he appeared on stage or in films.

Brady hired a fast-emerging young star of her day, Helen Menken, to replace his daughter. Arriving at the theater, Helen spotted Hump backstage. She told the theater manager, Glenn Wilson, “Daddy I want a taste of that.”

A slender, beautiful actress, Helen Menken—because of her temper tantrums—was known as “the Irish Menk” in theatrical circles. She had moppish hair, a sort of auburn red, and her cupid’s-bow mouth was just as expressive as her hands, which Richard Schnel, a theater critic, had called “the most expressive on Broadway.”

She looked at the world through liquid dark brown eyes that sometimes left the impression that she was misty-eyed. Her face was thin and pale, made even more so by her excessive use of rice powder. She kept her figure because of an extraordinary diet of two boiled eggs a day and perhaps a leaf of lettuce. That dietary advice had been given to her by the stage actress, Nazimova, who recommended it to all aspiring actresses as a guaranteed way of keeping one's figure. Nazimova, as Hump was to learn later, had introduced young Helen to the delights of lesbian love.

When Helen met Hump, she was already an established star, although not yet at the height of her fame. She'd appeared in Victoria Herbert's play, The Red Mill, to critical acclaim.

She'd also scored a success in 1918 in Three Wise Fools, a play by Austin Strong. Before her steady employment in the theater, she sold women's hats and also did some clothes modeling at department stores. Prospective employers always commented on her "narrow shoulders," preferring, even then, the more broad-shouldered look that in just a few more years would be popularized by Joan Crawford.

Helen had made her theatrical debut at the age of six when she'd walked out nude in a production of Midsummer Night's Dream. It is said that the circumstances that surrounded Helen's true-life stage debut at the age of six inspired the creation of the fictional career of the character of Margo Channing in the 1950 film, All About Eve, starring Bette Davis.

Poorly educated and born into poverty, Helen had acquired a gloss of sophistication because of all her years in the theater. Born in New York City, she was the oldest of three children. For some reason of her own, Helen was proud to be a direct descendant of John Wilkes Booth.

Two views of Helen Menken

Hump was intrigued by her upbringing, which she called "my world of silence." Both of her parents were deaf mutes, although Helen had been born with perfect hearing. She learned to communicate with them in sign language. Whenever her parents would get into an argument, one of them would turn off the lights, ending a fight since they could no longer see each other to communicate.

Helen's mother earned $3.50 a week sewing identification badges for business conventions, but her father had never held down a job for very long. Helen herself had come from a rough-and-tumble background of acting in road shows and sleeping in seedy rooms above drunken saloons.

She remembered when one of these fleabag hotels near Trenton, New Jersey, had caught fire. "I climbed down from the second-floor window since the fire was raging up the only stairway. I raced out into the night and was standing out on the highway before I realized I was stark naked. It was twenty degrees that night."

For years she'd supported her family and had even managed to send one of her brothers to college. Helen herself had had only one and a half years of grade school. She didn't enroll in school until she was twelve years old.

Hump disliked Helen on sight. Because of Alice's sudden withdrawal from the play, he had only twenty-four hours to teach her her lines. He might not have liked her personally but was amazed at how fast she learned the script. Before the curtain went up the following night, she was letter perfect.

Unfortunately the play called for a series of eight complicated set changes. Deep into the second act, Hump and the stagehands in their haste had not secured the props. In the middle of Helen's big scene, the wall of a set collapsed on her, burying her in front of the audience. Hump had to pull the curtain before Helen, who had not been hurt, could resume her theatrics.

Helen tried to recoup her dignity but many customers walked out, demanding a refund on their tickets, claiming that they had purchased them to see Alice Brady.

Enraged, Helen rushed backstage to confront Hump. "You asshole!" she shrieked at him. "You little shit."

Because of the abuse suffered at the hands of Maud's ill-mannered and ill-tempered servants, Hump could not stand being called little shit. He kicked her in the rump, sending her sprawling onto the wooden floor. Jumping up, she aimed her sharply pointed high-heel shoe at his groin, scoring a bull's-eye assault on his testicles. Falling to the floor, he doubled over in pain, which is where she left him as she stalked off to her dressing room.

It was the beginning of a beautiful friendship.

Within six weeks Helen was professing her love for Hump. That love was not reciprocated, although he later told his friend Bill that "she's great in the sack." She invited him to come and live with her at her flat at 43 East 25th Street in New York but only for four nights each week. The other three nights of her week, Helen enjoyed the "wild side" of New York with her newly discovered companion, Tallulah Bankhead.

Tallulah was a gorgeous and outrageous Alabama belle, living at the Algonquin Hotel on $50 a week sent to her by her daddy. Her stated ambition for coming to New York was: (1) to become the biggest Broadway star of all time; (2) to seduce John Barrymore, and (3) to "fuck Ethel Barrymore."

Hump had moved in with Helen without knowing much about her. In the first month or so, she kept him like a "toy boy," not introducing him to her friends or making him part of her glittering Broadway world. It was as if she couldn't decide what role he was going to play in her life.

Day by day Hump learned more about his new girl friend. A high strung, nervous woman with a bizarre (perhaps anorexic) diet and a tendency to drink heavily, she worried and fretted most of the day. She read Broadway news with a certain fury, often bursting into violent rages when a rival actress received a part that she felt she was "destined to play."

Although bitterly resentful of the success of other actresses, she encouraged Hump with his theatrical ambitions. "After all, you're no competition to me, darling. Be an actor out in front of the lights, not some God damn prop man. As a stagehand, you stink." She constantly ribbed Hump for that opening night when the scenery fell on her.

Helen had some peculiarities. Long before the world ever heard of Imelda Marcos, Helen spent a good part of her salary buying expensive shoes, even it if meant going without some of life's essentials. She adored her tiny feet, which to Hump evoked memories of Maud's small feet.

The only difference was that Helen demanded that Hump spend as much time in bed kissing, licking, and biting her feet, as well as sucking her toes, as he did in attacking other parts of her body. Helen would spend hours washing, bathing, and caring for her feet, with endless pedicures. She would fret over the right nail polish to use for her dainty toes.

In spite of her lack of schooling, she spoke perfect English. She said she'd learned to speak properly listening to other actresses on the stage, beginning with the star Annie Russell in Midsummer Night's Dream. Helen's voice sounded slightly husky, something like that of the future actress, Barbara Stanwyck, Bogie's 1947 co-star in The Two Mrs. Carrolls.

Helen was much the same off-stage as she was on, which was very flam-boyant. She called everybody "darling," an appellation soon picked up by her protégée, Tallulah.

Almost overnight, Helen became the toast of Broadway. Austin Strong had "loved" her performance in his play, Three Wise Fools, and campaigned for her to be cast as Diane in his latest play, Seventh Heaven, which opened on Broadway in 1922 and became an immediate hit.

Hump himself was in the opening night audience and was dazzled by her performance. In the role, she played a street urchin in Paris. Her most memorable scene was when she took a bullwhip, and in her rage and despair, drove her mean sister out of the house.

Before meeting Helen, Hump had dated an aspiring young actress, Katharine Alexander. Briefly smitten with her, Hump pursued Katharine for a week or two. He'd never known anyone who'd been born and reared in Alaska, and was fascinated to learn of her experiences in the cold north. "I can take the chill off you," he promised Katharine. She never gave him a chance to prove that.

In spite of her sexual rejection of him, Hump and Katharine would become lifelong friends. She told him that she had never wanted to be an actress, but had studied to be a concerte artiste. For some strange reason, she seemed to take the greatest pride in her heritage. She was one-eighth Cherokee Indian.

"I've never had a squaw woman before," he jokingly suggested to her.

"Many conquests are better off dreamed than experienced in real life," Katharine told him. "I'll see you in your dreams."

When he introduced Katharine to the handsomer, taller, richer, better built, and more successful Bill Brady Jr., Hump's romance with Katharine came to an abrupt end. She fell at once for Bill. Hump showed little jealousy, and even suggested at one point that "we should share her," evoking their brief fling with Nita Naldi.

Tallulah Bankhead

After the third week, Bill would stand for no more talk like that. He'd fallen madly in love with Katharine, and planned to make her "my exclusive property." Within six weeks of meeting Katharine, Bill invited Hump to be his best man at their wedding. Hump asked Helen to accompany him.

Attending the wedding of Katharine and Bill must have given Helen an idea. Within weeks, she was urging Hump to marry her. She was proposing to him as if he were the prospective bride and she the groom. Hump didn't turn her down but didn't accept her proposal either.

He turned to his friend Bill for advice. "If I marry Helen," he said, "I'll be repeating Maud's pattern with Belmont. Strong woman, the bread earner, supporting weak husband."

"Forget about that," Bill said. "Marry the bitch. She's a friend of all the critics and knows all the big-name producers. She'll advance your career. Trust me on this one. If you scorn Helen, she'll cut off your balls. She's already kicked them. You may never work on Broadway again."

Hump remained uncertain and confused. At Helen's urging, he went to secure a marriage license, which he would carry around in his wallet for the next four years. In an interview on April 5, 1922, Hump told The New York Times, "I plan to marry Helen Menken." Because of Helen's prominence as a Broadway star, the paper gave it a headline.

Suddenly, all of Broadway became aware of the struggling actor, Humphrey Bogart. He hadn't even married her yet, and already Bill's advice was proving to be true. Almost overnight, producers started offering Hump parts, no doubt with a little urging from Helen herself.

With the Times announcing her engagement, Helen no longer had any reason to keep Hump a secret in the closet. Her toy boy (although men weren't called that then) could emerge into the full theatricality of her glittering world. He would meet for the first time Miss Tallulah Bankhead, whom he had confided in Bill was "Helen's other boyfriend."

CHAPTER TWO

Instead of being threatened or offended by Helen's sexual involvement with Tallulah, Hump was intrigued. He pointedly asked his friend Bill, "Just what do women do in bed together? I understand the kissing part, but the plumbing doesn't seem quite right."

In detail, the more worldly Bill tried to explain lesbian love and how it worked. Even so, Hump didn't quite get it.

That evening, Bill invited him to Harlem's Red Garter, a notorious nightclub that flourished briefly and illegally in the early 1920s until the police shut it down. Patronized only by male customers, the club specialized in presenting live sex acts on its small stage but only between women performers.

The lesbian black actress, Hattie McDaniel, was said to be a frequent patron of the club and was even rumored to have been a performer. Hattie would go on to greater fame playing Mammy to Scarlett O'Hara in Gone With the Wind. As a further irony, she was to become the lover of Tallulah Bankhead, as Tallulah in her declining years would readily admit to her homosexual "cunties," as she called her all-male entourage.

It was a wiser and more experienced Humphrey Bogart, man of the world, who escorted Helen to the 21 Club to meet Tallulah.

When Hump was introduced, her hair looked badly combed, yet it was radiant. Her mouse-brown dress, however, should long ago have been sent to the cleaners. "Forgive my appearance, darling," she said, aping Helen's habit of calling everybody darling. "I've just gone down on John Barrymore and haven't had time to make myself into a lady again."

"You look beautiful," Hump assured her. Actually he didn't know what to make of this Alabama bombshell, although he could understand Helen's fascination with her.

"I must ask a tiny favor," she said. "To catch the streetcar home, I need one tiny, little, small penny as I have only four cents in my purse, hardly enough for the five-cent fare."

"I don't understand why you're always broke," Helen said, ordering a martini from the waiter at 21. "You employ a French maid."

"I know, darling," Tallulah said. "Daddy sends me $50 a week, and I have to give the maid half of that. That means I'm penniless for three days a week."

"Fire the maid," Hump said. "My mother did when the family fortune disappeared."

"Perish the thought, darling," Tallulah said. "No respectable lady could live in New York without a French maid. It's simply not done."

Helen was the more established star, but Tallulah dominated the night. Hump concluded that Tallulah was the "man" in her relationship with Helen, his girlfriend the submissive female.

"You must meet my sister, Eugenia," Tallulah said to Hump, reaching over to caress his hand. "She's not a classic beauty like me, but one hell of a woman. Those stories about her being a lesbian are exaggerated. She lives in an apartment next door to Zelda and Scott Fitzgerald. They've been anxious to meet the two of you since the êw York Times referred to your coupling as a union of two Jazz Age Babies. Scott views himself as the world's expert on Jazz Age babies."

Since Tallulah didn't have any money, Helen invited her to join them for dinner at Sam's Vanity, a popular little restaurant that flourished for three months until its owner, Sam Martin, was fatally shot by his estranged wife.

At table, Tallulah stuffed herself, while claiming that Sam didn't know how to cook Southern fried chicken. After dinner Tallulah invited them for “drinks and drugs” at the apartment of her friend, Napier George Henry Stuart Alington, the third Baron of Alington.” She called him “Naps” and claimed a passionate involvement. “John Barrymore for sex,” she said, “Ethel Barrymore if I can get her, but for true love, it’s Naps. That is, if he isn’t too busy fucking Noël Coward.”

Naps welcomed them into a plushy furnished Victorian apartment. In his mid-20s, he had a small delicate build, crowned by a mop of blond hair. His most sensuous physically was in his thick lips. He had a nervous habit of constantly licking the roof of his mouth, as if he were tasting honey.

Ushered into the living room, Helen, Hump, and Tallulah were served martinis by an English butler. Spread out on Naps’ glass-topped coffee table was a virtual shopping cart of drugs, including cocaine, heroin, and morphine, the substance so beloved by Maud and Belmont Bogart.

The heroin came in little vanity boxes, lined in red silk, evocative of Tiffany jewel boxes. Small hypodermic needles were arranged moonlike around the heroin boxes. For his drug of choice, Hump selected morphine, hoping to understand his parents’ infatuation with the drug.

Tallulah claimed that she found morphine boring and chided Hump for not selecting cocaine, which she said was the drug of the moment. Cocaine was enjoying the same type of popularity among New York’s jazz babies in the early Twenties as marijuana did among the hippies of the late Sixties. Instead of masquerade balls, “snow balls” were all the rage, and Tallulah said she attended two every week of her life.

The next day, when Hump related the drama of the previous night to Bill, Hump was a little vague on details, not that he was holding back information. He honestly claimed he couldn’t remember. “That morphine sent me into another world.”

All he recalled was that Tallulah and Helen started kissing on the sofa. “It was like a white girls’ show at the Red Garter.”

At one point Naps appeared nude in the living room and invited all of them into his bedroom.

“I don’t remember anything after that,” Hump claimed. “I think I have deliberately blotted out what happened next. I just don’t want to recall it.”

Somewhere before dawn, Helen and Hump had dropped Tallulah off at some mysterious apartment on West 51st Street, and Helen directed the cabbie to head for her own apartment.

Before stumbling out of the taxi, Tallulah extended an invitation to them for the following evening to meet the reigning literary darlings of the 1920s, novelist F. Scott Fitzgerald and his wife, Zelda.

“I guess I got a real introduction to your world,” Hump said to Helen in the taxi.

“Darling,” Helen said, “Until tonight I didn’t think you were sophisticated enough to handle it. You’re a city boy but still a bit provincial.”

“Perhaps,” he said, “but after that Alabama hurricane and that fucking Naps, I was really initiated. It’s a night to remember. Better yet, it’s a night to forget.”

She reached over and kissed his cheek. “It’s only the beginning, my love. Our marriage will be perfect. A shared marriage.”

“This ‘country boy’ has never heard of a shared marriage.” “

We must not be selfish,” Helen said. “You’re a gorgeous man and I’m a devastating female. We’ll have to share our marriage with others.”

“You mean, carry on like we did tonight?” he asked.

“There will be others, so many others we can invite into our marriage bed. Variety, that’s the only way to guarantee that a marriage will stay vital and not become a bloody bore. We’ll ask Zelda and Scott tomorrow night what they think about that.”

The following evening, Helen had to excuse herself because she’d been asked at the last minute to meet with a producer about a change of casting in her play.

Hump was the first to arrive at the Algonquin Hotel where he asked the receptionist to call up to Tallulah’s room. She claimed that she’d be down in the lobby quicker than it would take “Ethel Barrymore to slap my gorgeous face.” Hump had heard that Ms. Barrymore had slapped Tallulah’s face when the grand actress had walked into a party and caught Tallulah doing a devastating impression of her.

He was into his second drink when Tallulah showed up in the lobby in a fur coat borrowed from her much older friend, Estelle Winwood. Hump sat in a corner table. She walked over and kissed him on the lips. “Sorry Helen couldn’t make it tonight. I was hoping to be the meat in a sandwich between the two of you.”

As Tallulah started to launch into one of her many stories about the men and women pursuing her in New York, she was interrupted by the arrival of Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald, the darlings of the New York tabloids and the embodiment of the Jazz Age. The romantic couple was already deep into a bottle of gin which Scott carried in a pocket of his raccoon coat. In contrast, Zelda wore a thin red woolen coat.

Tallulah jumped up and kissed each of the Fitzgeralds on the lips before introducing them to Hump.

Scott had already written his novel, This Side of Paradise, recounting the adventures, romantic and otherwise, of a Princeton man. He’d also published Flappers and Philosophers.

Standing in front of Scott and Zelda in the flesh, Hump sensed that they were trying to become public manifestations of the flappers and “sheiks” he had described in his writing.

Shaking Scott’s hand, Hump found him rather effeminate. A woman newspaper columnist, Rena Willson, had only recently written a feature story about him. She had claimed that “Scott’s face dances between pretty boy and handsome, and his long-lipped mouth virtually cries out for lipstick and belongs more on a girl than a young man.”

F. Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald

As Zelda and Tallulah excused themselves to go to the powder room, Scott settled onto the banquette opposite Hump. Watching the women go, he expressed his disappointment that he wouldn’t have a chance to meet Helen tonight. “I’ve seen her latest play and thought she gave a brilliant performance.”

“I’ll convey that to her,” Hump said.

“Before the ladies get back, I’ve got to ask you something,” Scott said. “I read in the papers that you and Helen are getting married. Forgive me, but have you slept with her yet, or are you waiting until the wedding?”

Ever the kidder, Hump startled Scott by looking at him with a deadpan expression and saying, “In all honesty, I can say that I don’t recall.”

Scott weighed that for a moment then burst into laughter, putting his arm around Hump. “You’re my kind of man.”

With this trio, Hump hardly could slip in even the smallest observation. Scott, Zelda, and Tallulah had opinions about everything and everybody, and expressed them in such a candid manner as to shock society.

Tallulah went to the reception desk and placed a call upstairs to the room where John Barrymore was temporarily staying. She rushed over to Scott. “I tried to get John to come down and join us, but he’s entertaining some lucky gal. But he’ll speak to you on the phone.”

As Tallulah and Scott departed for their phone dialogue with Barrymore, Zelda slid closer to Hump. “Tallulah claims you’re a most satisfying lover, and I’m envious. Scott can’t satisfy me sexually. His equipment is too small.”

Hump had never heard a woman, much less a wife, make such an observation about her husband.

He studied her face carefully. Her dark honey-blonde hair had been given the world’s worst permanent. Her skin was pink and white, a delicate porcelain look. She had a sensual and alluring mouth and deep blue eyes that reflected a sparkling deviltry. If she had any imperfection at all, it was her sharp nose that was a bit beaky.

“The real reason Scott wants to talk to John Barrymore is that he has a crush on him,” she said. “Scott’s a fairy, you know. I’ll prove it.” She reached into her purse and produced a photograph, which she said she always carried around to parties.

Staring back at Hump was a stunning looking dame in an off-the-shoulder gown and black high heels.

“It was snapped for The Triangle Club at Princeton,” Zelda said. “Scott appeared in a play this way in drag, and his picture was circulated all over campus. He was hailed as the Princeton Play Girl.”

“Since there are no women undergraduates at Princeton,” Hump said, “men play the female parts. I know this actor, Jimmy Cagney, who launched himself in show business doing drag.”

“That may be true, but why was Scott chosen to play the beautiful show-girl?” Zelda asked.

Before he could answer, Scott and Tallulah returned. He seemed thrilled at having talked to The Great Profile himself.

The waiter kept the quinine water flowing to their table, and Scott kept lacing their drinks with gin. Hump was amazed that Zelda seemed to be encouraging Scott to drink. As Scott was engrossed in conversation with Tallulah, Hump leaned over to Zelda. “If you get him too drunk, he won’t be able to write in the morning.”

“That’s fine with me,” she said with a smirk on her face.

“But he’s a writer. Writers have to write.”

“Are you suggesting that I’m jealous of his work and want to keep him from writing?” she asked. “I have no reason to be jealous. In time I’m going to write fiction myself. The world can judge who is the better novelist.”

Drunk and out on the street again, Scott dared them to race toward the theater district. With Hump reluctantly trailing behind, Zelda, Scott, and Tallulah darted down the crowded sidewalk, not caring if they bumped into someone. They were like crazed young things without a care in the world.

Even though he ran to keep up with them, Hump felt that all of them were like some incorrigible undergraduates he’d known at Andover. With the wind blowing through his hair, Scott led them right into the dense traffic along Seventh Avenue. “We’ll defy death,” he shouted back at them.

Shortly after their arrival at a popular dance club, Montmartre, plenty of bootleg hooch suddenly became available. Both Tallulah and Zelda found the patrons “sluggish.” Zelda suggested that she and Tallulah take to the dance floor and enliven the joint.

As the orchestra struck up an inappropriate Highland Fling, Zelda whirled around the suddenly emptied dance floor turning cartwheels for the amusement of the crowd. Right on her heels was Tallulah, equally adept at turning cartwheels herself. The only difference between the two performers was that Tallulah had forgotten to put on her bloomers.

At Scott's suggestion, the party moved to the Plaza Hotel. In those days newspaper photographers were always posted in the lobby, hoping to take pictures of celebrities coming and going.

Seeing the cameramen, Scott did a handstand in the lobby, as his picture was snapped. Getting to his feet again, he told Hump. "I'm sure to get my picture in the papers in the morning. I haven't been mentioned for an entire week, so I had to do something."

Zelda suggested to Tallulah that she and Hump join Scott and her in one of their favorite games on the elevator. Once inside the cage, she said that they were to ride up and down. When the door opened to let on new passengers, they were to shock the hotel guests by having Zelda kiss Tallulah on the mouth and Scott kiss Hump on the mouth. Hump didn't much like the idea of the game, but didn't want to live up to Helen's accusation of him as a country boy.

For about fifteen minutes that night, they rode up and down in the elevator with Zelda kissing Tallulah and Scott kissing Hump. And indeed the hotel guests were shocked, many expressing their disapproval with outrageous indignation.

Back in the lobby, one of the photographers approached Scott, telling him that he'd run out of film after the handstand photograph was snapped. He asked Scott to do it again.

"I've got a better idea," Scott said, grabbing Zelda's hand and racing toward the door. Followed by Tallulah and Hump, he ran over to the fountain, dropping his fur coat. "Let's go for a midnight bath," he shouted. "Last one in is an ugly duckling."

Scott jumped into the fountain and began splashing about, as Zelda and then Tallulah followed. Feeling like a fool, Hump jumped in with them as two shutterbugs snapped their pictures for tomorrow's tabloids.

Out of the fountain, cold and dripping wet, Scott raced toward a cab parked in front of the hotel with Zelda trailing him. When she reached it, Zelda turned and kissed both Tallulah and Hump on the lips.

Scott leaned out the window of the cab. "Remember," he said to both Tallulah and Hump. "You two pretty things should know that Oscar Wilde got it right. The only thing worse than being talked about is being forgotten." Zelda jumped in the back seat of the taxi with him, as they headed off into the night.

Still soaked from the fountain, Tallulah screeched for a second cab. "Since Helen and Naps are tied up with other engagements this evening," she said, "I guess that means you're stuck with me as your fuck buddy."

Scripts were frequently offered to Hump by Brady Sr. Bill Jr. remained Hump's steadfast friend, and promoted Hump as an actor to his father, despite telling his stepsister, Alice, that Hump "really has no talent." Bill also confessed to her that the only reason he hyped roles for Hump was that he wanted him to have a weekly paycheck. "I'm tired of always picking up the bill at speakeasies."

Brady Sr. had revived Up the Ladder, a four-act play presented at The Playhouse on March 6, 1922. Originally, George Le Guere played the part of Stanley Grant. After a respectable run, when Le Guere opted to move on to other venues, Bill talked his father into giving the role to Hump. The play starred Nannette Comstock and George Farren. The original production had featured Rod La Rocque, who still wrote Hump letters, claiming that, "I'm mad about the boy," predating the Noël Coward lyrics.

Farren had starred in the 1917 screen version of The Cinderella Man. During rehearsals, Farren was always forgetting his lines. "No wonder," Hump later told Bill. "He was born before the Civil War."

It was during his appearance in Up the Ladder that Hump befriended the actor, Paul Kelly, who was also appearing in the play, but in a minor role.

When Up the Ladder closed, a play called Swifty followed. Brady Sr. offered Hump the role of the juvenile lead, Tom Proctor, described by playwrights John Peter Toohey and W.C. Percival as "a young sprig of the aristocracy." John Cromwell, a member of Hump's "pussy posse," was signed on as the director.

The male star was Hale Hamilton, not the more famous Neil Hamilton as many biographers have reported. Throughout their professional lives, the two actors were often confused because of their name similarity. Hump had worked with Neil Hamilton during the ill-fated production of The Ruined Lady with Grace George.

The female lead in Up the Ladder was played by Frances Howard, and Hump was immediately attracted to her. A flapper, Frances was hailed as one of the great beauties of Broadway. She'd already appeared in The Intimate& Stranger, starring Alfred Lunt and Billie Burke.

Frances Howard

Hale Hamilton

Frances was slender and well-proportioned with big dark eyes. Her features were so exquisitely chiseled, Hump called her a "fragile doll." Under bobbed raven-colored hair, she had a true peaches-and-cream complexion.

In spite of her strict Catholic upbringing, her years in show business had toughened her. Bill was the first to have an affair with her, calling her a "sexual predator in bed." When Hump pressed him for more details, he said, "You'll have to find that out for yourself."

Frances told Hump that she'd learned "all there was to know about men" when at the age of fifteen she toured with her sister, Connie, in an act billed as "The Howard Sisters." In between stage jobs, Frances doubled as both a fashion model and a chorus girl.

Hump was eager to fill in those three lonely nights a week when Helen was out with Tallulah and a pack of actresses called "the girls." Without telling Frances that he was engaged to Helen, he actively pursued Frances who kept turning him down.

Rehearsals on Swifty were going poorly. Brady Sr. wasn't pleased with Cromwell's direction, and had virtually taken over as "co-director." Brady placed himself in the back seat of the theater. During rehearsals, every time Hump uttered a line, Brady would shout, "What? Louder! LOUDER! " Handicapped by his lisp, Hump was mumbling some of his lines.

Growing increasingly despondent with what he saw on the stage, Brady brought in Ring Lardner as play doctor to save Swifty. But even such a writing talent could not do the job.

In his role in the play as that "young sprig of the aristocracy," Hump was said to have "deflowered" a girl in an Adirondack cabin and then deserted her.

In the play, Hump made his first appearance with a gun, a pose that would eventually become legendary for him. He was directed to rush toward Hale Hamilton, shouting, “I’ll kill you! I’ll kill you! I’ll kill you!”

Moving down to a front row seat for the final rehearsal, Brady had ordered Hump to repeat his big moment in the play a total of twenty times.

When Brady ordered Hump to do the scene yet another time, Hump was exhausted and near tears. Consumed with rage, he gave the role his all. When he’d finished, he looked over the pit at Brady in the front row. The showman was asleep or at least feigning sleep.

Screaming in rage, Hump ran off the stage and tried to attack Brady, but was restrained by both Hale and Bill Jr. The men took Hump into an alley and cooled him down, Bill offering a cigarette and Hale producing some brandy from a hip flask.

Opening night could proceed. What a disaster it was. Hale and Frances were trained professionals, and did the best they could. But Hump’s mouth became so dry he disappeared from the stage to get a glass of water, leaving Hale to “vamp till ready.” Hale at that point didn’t know if Hump would come back on stage or not. Finally, he did and the play proceeded to its dull ending, receiving very weak and only scattered applause.

The only blessing that came out of that night was that Hale wanted to go to a party and not accompany Frances back to her hotel room as she’d requested. Remembering that Hump had been repeatedly asking her out for a date, she agreed to go to the 21 Club with him. She told him, “I hope your performance later in the evening will be better than what you did on stage.”

After midnight, Frances invited him back to her hotel room, where he discovered what his friend Bill had already learned. Frances might look like a fragile doll but in bed she was a steel magnolia. “She taught me a trick or two,” Hump told Bill Jr. the next day.

When Hump woke up the following morning, Frances was already getting dressed. “You’re good,” she said. “Almost as good as Bill. But last night was our one and only time.”

“What’s the matter?” Hump asked. “Last night I had you crying out for more.”

“Occasionally I do it for fun,” she said, messing with her hair. “I waste few favors on struggling actors, especially bad struggling actors. I’ll never get ahead fucking the penniless. I’m determined to go to Hollywood where I’m gonna marry some bigtime producer or director. He’ll not only make me a star but I’ll become the wife of a millionaire.”

To Hump, Frances’ ambitions sounded like just so much morning after pillow talk. That’s why he was eventually astonished to read on April 23, 1925 that Frances had married her “dream man” in Jersey City.

She had found the perfect role for herself, a part that she would play for almost fifty years. She’d persuaded Samuel Goldwyn to marry her.

When he arrived at the Bogart home the morning after, Maud was waiting with the newspapers and his reviews.

Alexander Woollcott, the leading theater critic of his day, wrote of Swifty : “The young man who embodied the aforesaid sprig was what might mercifully be described as inadequate.” Bogie would carry around Woollcott’s review in his wallet for the rest of his life.

Only Helen Menken urged him to keep trying to become a successful Broadway actor. One day she altered that vision of his future profession. “I’ve decided you should be on the silver screen.”

Helen was always vague, even to her husband-to-be, about how she had met Lillian Gish. Tallulah later claimed that she was the one who introduced Helen to Lillian, presenting Helen as “my discard” in the lobby of the Hotel Algonquin.

Discard or not, Helen seemed to mesmerize Miss Gish, who suggested that “a beauty like yourself should also appear in flickers. You’d look lovely in close-ups.” Coming from Lillian, the D.W. Griffith star who invented closeups, that was high praise indeed.

Through her close relationship with the more famous of the Gish sisters, Lillian herself, Helen arranged for a screen test for Hump in Lillian’s upcoming film, The White Sister.

The film script had been written by F. Marion Crawford and Walter Hackett. It had opened in September 27, 1909 at Daly’s Theatre in New York, having only a short run before it closed November 6. Lillian and Henry King hoped to resurrect this tired vehicle, as indeed they would one day as a film.

Two days later, in a barnlike studio in Astoria, Queens, Hump was introduced to the already legendary Lillian, who told him that in her upcoming film she hoped to capture a “spiritual fragility.”

Hump remembered that she maintained several quirky “little conceits,” which included referring to her Canadian friend as Gladys Smith, even though Gladys was known to the world at large as Mary Pickford. “Griffith used to pay Dorothy and me five dollars a day,” Lillian said. “Henry King and I hope to pay you considerably more.”

Dorothy, of course, was the other Gish sister, and was also famous as an actress.

King, the director, introduced himself to Hump just before his screen test and explained in rough outline the plot for The White Sister. Lillian was to play Angela Chiaromonte, the daughter of a rich Italian count killed in a fall from his horse. Lillian is cheated out of her estate by her older half-sister and is thrown into poverty. She’s saved by her engagement to a dashing officer, Captain Giovanni Severini, but he is captured by Arabs in an expedition to Africa. She dedicates her life to her lover’s memory by becoming a nun. She’s not aware that her lover has escaped and returned to Italy. The climax takes place against a backdrop of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius.

“Just my kind of part,” Hump told King, who apparently did not catch the sarcasm in the actor’s voice. Hump thought the script ridiculous but agreed to film the final close-up with Lillian minus the volcanic eruption.

He never saw the screen test but felt that he was very wooden with Lillian. “We had all the screen chemistry of yesterday’s bathwater.” To Hump’s surprise, both King and Lillian complimented him on his performance, claiming that they felt he had “real screen presence.”

Hump was asked to stay at the studio until after lunch. King was considering asking him to film one more segment of The White Sister, depicting when the captain first meets the woman who will become the love of his life.

When Hump returned from lunch, another actor was waiting in the reception room. An Englishman named Ronald Colman was eight years older than Hump. He appeared suave and debonair with a soft cultured voice that contrasted with Hump’s lisp. Hump, thinking the role was his, was upset to learn that Colman was also testing for the part. He not only “spoke pretty,” as Hump later recalled, “but he was also God damn good looking.” Colman, in fact, would in a decade be voted “the handsomest man on the screen.” Both King and Lillian had seen Colman appearing in a Ruth Chatterton play and had been impressed with his performance.

Hump and Colman were interrupted when King came into the studio. With Colman’s permission, King penciled in a mustache on the clean-shaven actor, a tonsorial touch that would remain with the star for the rest of his life.

Even before the more polished Colman went before the cameras, Hump knew that the British actor had the part. He suspected that King and Lillian had tested him only as a favor to Helen. King called Colman into the studio and dismissed Hump, claiming it wasn’t necessary to stick around for that second scene.

Colman not only won the part of the tragic soldier hero in The White Sister, he went on to become one of Hollywood’s greatest film stars, pioneering a band of “gentleman heroes” on the screen. As Hump went from one “dumb comedy to another,” he watched Colman’s meteoric rise to film fame.

For the rest of his life, Bogie would refer to Colman as “that limey bum,” blaming the British actor for sabotaging Hump’s own screen career in silent pictures.

One evening Bill Brady Jr. invited Hump to the opening night of his father’s 1923 Broadway production, The Mad Honeymoon. They sat next to George M. Cohan.

At the time, any aspiring actor was in awe of Cohan, “the man who owned Broadway.” The song-and-dance man of all song-and-dance men, Cohan was celebrated for his hit song, “Over There,” for which Franklin Roosevelt would one day award him the Congressional Medal of Honor. Cohan would go on to write such hits as “Give My Regards to Broadway,” “You’re a Grand Old Flag,” and “I’m a Yankee Doodle Dandy.” Ironically, Hump’s future film rival at Warner Brothers, James Cagney, would win an Academy Award for his impersonation of Cohan in the 1943 film hit, Yankee Doodle Dandy.

Fifteen minutes into The Mad Honeymoon, both Bill and Hump knew that the show would be a disaster. The only saving grace of the play was when a teenage actress, Mayo Methot, walked onstage as the maid. She had only five lines of dialogue, but brought momentary life to the dying play.

In their front row seats, Hump remembered being intrigued by her cupid’s-bow mouth and mass of blonde curls inspired by the MGM screen goddess, Mae Murray. Mayo had big, soulful eyes that looked out across the stage lights, seeming to make direct contact with the audience.

When the curtain went down, Cohan had nothing to say about the play. It received only scattered applause and was lambasted the next morning by all the leading critics of the day.

With his sharp eye for good theater, Cohan said nothing to Bill about his father’s opening night disaster, but asked to be taken backstage to meet the maid. “I have just discovered the next Lillian Gish.”

Hump was surprised, thinking that a comparison to Mae Murray—not Gish—would have been more apt.

When word spread that Cohan had come backstage, the stars of the play expected that Mr. Showman had come to greet them. They were startled at having been ignored. Cohan sought out Mayo and told her that she was terrific in the role. Mayo reached over with her cupid’s bow mouth and kissed Cohan right on his lips.

She shook hands with Bill and Hump but her eyes remained focused on Cohan. That very night he offered her the role of Leola Lane opposite him in his new production, The Song and Dance Man. Without even knowing what the role entailed, she accepted on the spot.

Hump remembered Mayo as a cute little blonde, and Bill and he would like to have dated her, even though Bill was married and Hump engaged. But it was obvious that Cohan had seen her first and had a lot more to offer her.

Mayo Methot (top photo) and George M.Cohan

Years later, Mayo recalled her first meeting with Cohan “which changed my life.” She also recollected meeting Bill Brady Jr., the son of the producer of The Mad Honeymoon. She had “no memory whatsoever” of being introduced to Hump. She later told an interviewer, “If someone had told me then that I would one day become the third Mrs. Bogart, I would have fallen on my cute ass.”

Hump went back to working as a stage manager for Brady Sr. At night he frequented the speakeasies, spending every dollar he made. Sometimes Helen accompanied him, and often he was joined by Bill and his new wife, the always competent but never exciting actress, Katharine Alexander, who was forging ahead with her career playing wronged wives, society snobs, and respectable women. John Barrymore was in hot pursuit of her, but she claimed she was still faithful toBill.

Sometimes the director, John Cromwell, would also join the crowd as it made its way from such mob joints in Harlem as the Cotton Club over to Connie’s Inn. When they had more money, Hump’s party showed up at The Dover Club.

With Stuart Rose, Hump continued to go horseback riding in Central Park. Stuart and Hump also took up ice skating, usually with Hump’s sister, Frances. Stuart and Frances were still “an item,” as they called it.

Smoking his Andover pipe, Hump went sailing off Long Island whenever he was free from Broadway. He was seen frequently at Mayfair, an actors club, when he wasn’t at the Lambs Club, another hangout for actors. Often he took Helen dancing at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, and the 21 Club remained his favorite watering hole. He was also becoming known for his expert chess playing.

When a year went by and Hump wasn’t offered another role, he felt his career as an actor had come to an end. Unexpectedly, Rosalie Stewart, a producer, sent him a script, Meet the Wife, a comedy starring Mary Boland and Clifton Webb. Hump was offered the role of a young, fresh-faced reporter, Gregory Brown, in this three-act comedy by Lynn Starling, an up-and-coming playwright of her day.

Mary Boland was already an established stage star when Hump first met her. Born in Philadelphia in 1880, she’d begun her career at the age of fifteen, following the death of her actor father, W.A. Boland. Her film debut in 1914 was in The Edge of the Abyss. She’d become a star in 1919 playing the stately scatterbrain, Mrs. Wheeler, in Booth Tarkington’s Clarence opposite Alfred Lunt.

From the first day they met, Hump was fascinated by the male co-star of Meet the Wife. Clifton Webb and Bogie would become friends and remain so for the rest of their lives together. They were an odd couple. Webb was an immaculate dresser and had impeccable manners, but this young dancer turned actor was known along Broadway as “Miss Priss.” Born in Indianapolis in 1891, he changed his name from Webb Parmallee Hollenbeck to Clifton Webb. Hump both affectionately and jokingly called him Parmallee.

Mary Boland

Known as “the Irritable Bachelor,” Clifton even then was a notorious homosexual, specializing in seducing young juvenile leads who appeared with him. The still handsome Hump became his chief target during rehearsals for Meet the Wife. Hump felt as ardently pursued by Clifton as he had been by Rod La Rocque when he’d directed that actor in the film, Life.

One night at a Harlem night spot, Hump decided to confront Clifton. “I’m not going to become your boy, and if you come on to me again I’ll punch you out,” Hump told him. “But I will be your friend. I like you a hell of a lot. I don’t take it up the ass.”

“Don’t worry, my dear fellow,” Clifton said. “I’m a famous bottom.” Clifton bent over the table and affectionately kissed Hump on the nose. Somehow this impulsive act endeared Clifton all the more to Hump. Never again did seduction rear its head.

Webb marked the beginning of a series of friendships—not love relationships—that Bogie would have with homosexuals, including the closeted Spencer Tracy and the not-so-closeted Noël Coward and Truman Capote.

Meet the Wife opened at New York’s Klaw Theater and would run for 232 performances, with Hump drawing a weekly paycheck of $150, which he spent immediately. A critic for Theêw York World gave Hump the first good notice of his career, referring to the role he played as that of “a handsome and nicely mannered reporter, which is refreshing.”

Two nights before the play closed, Hump had been up all night partying in the hot spots of Harlem. When he showed up the next day to perform in Meet the Wife, he was hung over and had had no sleep.

On stage during a pivotal scene, he forgot his lines and stood looking glazed against the scenery. Boland was forced to frantically ad lib and even had to feed him some of his lines, hoping he would pick up the rhythm of the play. When the curtain was pulled, she walked backstage and slapped his face real hard. “I’ll see to it that you never work again on Broadway.”

The next night, at the closing performance, he knew all his lines. However, after Act Two, as if determined to& sabotage his career, he disappeared into a dive& across the street, claiming he was starved and wanted a plate of ham and eggs. Somehow he completely forgot that he had to stick around to deliver four lines in Act Three.

Clifton Webb

When he did remember, he raced toward the theater door, just in time to hear the applause as the curtain went down. The stage manager, Bert French, who was also producing the play with Rosalie Stewart, slugged Hump, who struck back, hitting French in the nose just as Boland and Webb were taking their final bows.

Chiming in with Boland, French also threatened to end Hump's Broadway days. But Hump was heartened that Maud, without Belmont, showed up that night and praised his acting skill. Being Maud, she had to add a warning. "An actor will spend most of his life starving between parts, and you could have done so much more with your life."

His spirits were lifted when an out-of-town reviewer, Peggy Hill, of Atlanta, saw the play and informed her readers that "Humphrey Bogart is more manly and a lot handsomer than Rudolph Valentino. If I had to be carried away to a Sheik's tent in the desert, I'd much rather be in Bogart's arms than prissy Valentino's."

Hump couldn't take Boland's threat to destroy his stage career too seriously. Bill Brady was producing a Broadway play with a part in it just right for Hump. Once again, when all else failed, he could count on the dependable, reliable, and steadfast Brady family.

Less than one month after Meet the Wife closed, Hump was offered his biggest role to date, the meaty part of an aviator in a play, Nerves, which was being both directed and produced by Bill Brady Jr. The play had been written by Stephen Vincent Benét and John Farrar, and contained only two acts, unusually short for that day. The first act takes place at a Yale house party where several couples, all on the same night, commit themselves to be engaged. The second act occurs in the officers' mess of a squadron of American aviators based in France during World War I. The wartime experience shatters the nerves of one of the aviators—hence, the title of the play.

The star of the show was the now largely forgotten Marie Curtis, who had just completed a run on Broadway in the play, Time. Earlier, her attempts at a career in silent films had bombed after she'd appeared as "Lady Dolly" in Her Greatest Love.

She played opposite Paul Kelly, only years before his international notoriety and jail term as a convicted man slaughterer.

Bill angered Hump by casting their longtime friend, Kenneth MacKenna, in the third lead over Hump's own fourth billing. Although they would eventually become bitter rivals over the affections of Mary Philips, Kenneth at the time was still a close friend of Hump's, and a faithful member of the coterie that still referred to itself as "the pussy posse," a group that included John Cromwell and Bill Brady, Jr.

Although not officially a member of the posse, Kenneth's brother, Jo Mielziner, signed on as stage designer. It was during rehearsals for Nerves that Hump realized for the first time what an immense talent Jo was. Born in Paris two years after Hump, Jo, like Kenneth, was the son of a Jewish and Irish marriage.

The same year Jo designed the sets for Nerves, he also created sets for The Guardsman. Written by Ferenc Molnar, it was an early Theatre Guild production that brought Jo to the attentions of the moguls of Broadway.

Before his death in 1976, Jo would go on to design the sets for at least 270 stage and film productions. His most memorable stage work included such classics as Strange Interlude; Death of a Salesman; Carousel; The King and I; South Pacific; Look Homeward, Angel; Tea and Sympathy, Picnic, and The Emperor Jones.

The young actress Mary Philips was cast as one of the supporting players in Nerves. Three years younger than Hump, Mary was born in New London and educated in a convent in New Haven. "In those days," as Bogie later recalled, describing his stage career, "I was always deflowering maidens fresh from some God damn convent." Mary characterized herself as a "staunch New Englander but with Irish wit and temperament." When she first met Hump, she later declared, she detected a strong Puritan streak in him.

She'd made her debut as a chorus girl showing off her bosom and her legs in the Follies Revue of 1919. It was what playwright James Kirkwood Jr. decades later in A Chorus Line would call a "tits and ass" part.

Mary would go on to appear in such productions as Two Girls Wanted and The Old Soak, which did good business but would hardly merit a footnote in theatrical histories of the 20s.

Humphrey Bogart with Mary Philips

She had a pretty face with penetrating gray-blue eyes. She would often be compared, to her detriment, to the more successful actress, Ina Claire.

By today's standards of beauty, Mary had a long nose. Hump kidded her, calling it "the beak." "Where do you put that nose when you go to kiss a man?" he asked her during rehearsals. "That's for me to know and for you to find out," Mary told him.

Except for that nose, she had the most perfectly formed lips of all of Bogie's future wives. Her hands were her most attractive feature, and critics often wrote that they were "porcelain like and delicate."

Mary was short and rather small. "Just my type," Hump told Kenneth. She was understanding, sympathetic, and attractive but not flashy, as opposed to the more self-centered and narcissistic Helen. And in definite contrast to Hump's mother, Maud, she was supportive of, rather than critical of, men.

Mary's appearance as a fragile doll was deceiving. She was actually a sports-loving outdoor girl who excelled in tennis and golf. Her Irish temper matched that of Helen's.

During rehearsals, Mary infuriated Hump. In his big scene, when he was to be left alone on the stage, Mary walked toward the wings. "That was what she was supposed to do," Bogie later recalled. "But it was the damn way she walked off. I would have to wait until I saw Marilyn Monroe in the 1951 movie, Niagara, before I'd see a walk like that again. I confronted her back stage and accused her of upstaging me. That seemed to piss her off. She slapped my face and told me that she'd walk any way she damn well pleased, and there wasn't anything I could do about it. I wanted to punch her out. I'd hit ladies before and would again. But somehow that slap turned me on. I felt I could really fall for this gal."

The more he worked with Mary, the more intrigued Hump became. Mary told him that she could hold her liquor better than he did. Back then, Hump always said, "I don't trust women who don't drink. They'll betray you every time."

Kenneth was also growing increasingly intrigued by Mary. He even warned Hump to "lay off Mary. She's gonna become my gal, and besides you're engaged to Helen."

"Helen knows I see women on the side," Hump said. "Fuck you, asshole. Helen herself sees women on the side. Maybe I'll take Mary back to Helen's apartment. We could share her."

Kenneth punched him in the mouth. Before a major fight could break out, Bill Brady, Jr. separated the two actors. "You're like two fucking roosters fighting over the prize hen in the barnyard. Don't you guys know there are more than enough women on Broadway to go around? There are at least three showgals for every single male since at least half the men in the theater are fairies. Enjoy! Enjoy! As for Mary, I've taken director's privilege. She got hired on the casting couch. For the duration of the play, she's my private piece and don't tell Katharine."

Both Kenneth and Hump were shocked to learn that Mary was having an affair with Bill. At the Hotsy Totsy that night, Kenneth and Hump repaired their friendship over several tall gin fizzes. "Let's don't let a woman come between us," Kenneth said. "If Bill is fucking Mary, that makes her a slut. We can pick up any slut we want in this club in five minutes. Wanta bet?"

Hump didn't take him up on the bet, knowing that what Kenneth said was true. Midnight found the two men, along with "two sluts," checking into the Hotel Baltimore. They seduced the women on the same double bed, switching partners around two o'clock.

Years later, Mary would rank the sexual performances of the three leading members of the pussy posse in this order: Number one, Bill Brady Jr. "because of his incredible technique"; number two, Kenneth McKenna because "of the sincerity in his eyes when he got on top of you," and, number three, Humphrey Bogart "because he always had a far and distant look in his eyes when he was making love to you, enough so that you always suspected that his mind was somewhere else."

Both Hump and Kenneth feared that Bill was jeopardizing his marriage to Katharine by going out to the speakeasies every night with Mary. "Never fear," Bill assured them. "Katherine specializes in wronged wife parts. I'm just giving her first-hand experience so she'll be a better actress."

One night Bill called Hump to tell him that he'd just bailed Mary out of jail. They had been caught staggering drunk from the speakeasy, Hotsy Totsy. When a cop tried to arrest Mary, she bit his finger down to the bone. She was hauled off to the pokey. Bill had had far more to drink than Mary, but he was not arrested. Brady Sr. posted a five-hundred dollar bail, securing her release.

Nerves opened at the Comedy Theater on September 1, 1924, a date that roughly coincided with the opening of What Price Glory?. Glory became the biggest hit of any play addressing the issues of World War I, and audiences and critics alike flocked to it instead of Nerves. Nerves would run for only sixteen performances, as critics ridiculed it and audiences stayed away in droves. Brady, Sr. denounced his son for producing such a flop.

Ironically, Hump received respectable reviews for his role in the play, enough—in Mary's opinion—to give him a "swelled head." Even Hump's nemesis, the critic, Alexander Woollcott, who'd denounced him as the "inadequate sprig" wrote, "Those words are hereby eaten."

Theatrical, venomous, and bitchy: Alexander Woollcott

Another prominent critic of the day was Heywood Broun, a well-known sports writer and columnist for New York newspapers, and also a leading member of the Socialist Party until he was expelled in 1933. Broun found Hump's performance "most effective." Hump couldn't help but be delighted when Broun faulted co-actor Kenneth's performance, claiming that the actor "suffers from trying too hard to make a feeble play take on the breath of life."

At the play's closing, Helen was preparing to take her own Broadway success, Seventh Heaven, to Los Angeles, leaving Hump at her apartment. Before departing, she told Hump that she would marry him but was too busy to fit a wedding into her busy schedule. "I'm at the height of my stardom," she told him, "and I can't let a little thing like marriage stand in my way. Some stars like Bernhardt will last forever. In my case, I fear I will burn terribly bright, then flicker out." Unlike Hump, she spoke in highly dramatic terms, unusual for a person with so little formal education.

As Helen boarded the train to Los Angeles, going via Chicago, she told Hump that he didn't necessarily have to be lonely when she was away in spite of their engagement. She gave him the telephone number of "a young and very beautiful actress that I've been dating. Call her. She's very amusing. She and I are going nowhere fast in our relationship. Women, I fear, are mere playthings for her. She really prefers men. Besides no one can replace Tallulah — that whore—in my life."

Bidding Helen good-bye, Hump returned to the empty apartment. After three hours and drunk on gin, he dialed the number of Helen's actress friend. He was determined to find out the degree to which this mystery woman liked men.

On the other end of the line, a haunting, dramatic voice picked up the receiver. "Hello, this is Louise Brooks. Who's this?"

After one night with her, Hump was so mesmerized by Louise Brooks that he told Bill Brady that he wanted to break off his engagement with Helen and propose to "Brooksie" instead. He claimed that she was the best sex he'd ever had with any woman. "She's one earthy broad," Hump said. "We did things I've never even heard of before."

Bill was disdainful of Louise. "She's nothing but a teenage prostitute. She's shacked up with that high roller, A.C. Blumenthal, who's taking over for Ziegfeld. Brooks is a real casting-couch climber. I also hear she's a lesbian."

On their first date together, Hump had shown up at her hotel dressed for dinner, as she'd accepted his invitation to go to a supper club. When she opened the door to her room, she wore a sheer white nightgown with nothing on underneath it. "Come on in, handsome," she said, reaching for his hand. "We'll have room service send us a hamburger. That way, we'll have more time in the sack, as I have to get up early in the morning."

Hump was immediately taken with this "Kansas sunflower," a former Ziegfeld Follies dancer who'd also appeared in George White's Scandals. Her raven-black hair was radiant, and she'd styled it in a way that had already led to her reputation as "the girl in the black helmet." She wore it closely cropped in an exaggerated page-boy style.

As she invited him in and offered him some whiskey, he felt that he was encountering the Jazz Age flapper supreme, perhaps someone not real but a creation of F. Scott Fitzgerald.

"Helen tells me you're not rich but I agreed to see you anyway," Louise said. "I have this friend, Peggy Fears, who& dances in the Follies. She has a strict rule about& dating, 'No ice, no dice.' She thinks I should go out only with rich stage-door Johnnies. But I& also like to get plowed, and these old guys are too worn out for my tastes. That's why I turn to& guys like you. Trinkets are nice but getting plowed for fun is one of the joys of life, and I& want it all."

Two views of Louise Brooks

“I hope I won’t disappoint,” Hump said.

“I’m sure you won’t,” Louise said. “Helen has already given me a critique. I asked Helen if you were a redhead. She assured me you were brunette.”

“What have you got against redheaded men?”

“I absolutely refuse to go to bed with them,” she said. “Based on my experience, I have found that their pricks are always tiny and even misshapen, usually bent to the left and most unappetizing.”

“You’ve lost me there,” he said, downing the rest of his whiskey. “I’ve never done a survey.”

“Take my word for it,” she said, going over to him and kissing him on the lips as he sat in her sole armchair. When she finally broke away, she said, “You have the most beautiful lips I’ve ever seen in any man.”

“Thanks.”

“You’ve got this little scar on your upper lip. It adds character to your face. I especially like this quilted piece that hangs down in a tiny scallop.” She ran her tongue along it. “It’s an imperfection I find terribly appealing.”

“Hell,” he said, drawing back slightly, not at all comfortable with the conversation. “I should have it surgically removed.”

“I disapprove of surgically removing skin from men,” she said. “I hope you’re not circumcised because I delight in men with foreskins.”

“I’m all there,” he said, as she reached to fondle him.

“I like the feel of it,” she said. “You see I’m a basket-watcher. That’s why I spend a lot of time at the ballet watching men in form-fitting leotards. I hate most men’s trousers. Except for a few sailors who wear tight pants, they’re usually far too baggy.”

“You’re some gal,” he said, “I never heard a woman talk like you.”

“Don’t get me wrong,” Louise said. “An average size prick can offer some satisfaction to a woman but they always leave one unfulfilled. There are three things I like done to me, and only a big prick can do the job.”

“Just three?” he said.

As Hump would later relate to Bill, “It was the wildest ride I’ve ever had in my life. If Brooksie had a hole somewhere, she wanted it plugged.”

After their time together in bed, both Bogie and Louise cleaned themselves up. While he put back on his trousers, she slipped into a red dress. “I’ve got this fabulous idea,” she said. “Get dressed. I want you to walk along Broadway with me. We’ll look at all the names up in lights and imagine that one day the names of Louise Brooks and Humphrey Bogart will be up there for all the world to see.”

As he was reaching for his trousers, she challenged him. “Edmund Goulding told me that all actresses should be compared to a flower. I can’t decide what flower to be? You decide for me.”

He looked her over carefully from her tiny feet to her helmet hairdo. “An exotic black orchid.”

Like many actors of the 20s, including Gary Cooper, Hump went through a period where he tried to model himself after America’s reigning heartthrob of the screen, Rudolph Valentino, who had electrified audiences, especially women, with his performances in The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse and The Sheik.

Although the men did not really look alike, Broadway writers often cited the physical resemblance between Valentino and Hump. Typical of the comments was an interview written by Elita Miller Lenz in 1924. “Humphrey Bogart is one of the few young actors along Broadway that can be classed as a Valentino type in color, which should help much in the matter of future popularity.”

Just for fun, Helen acquired a Sheik costume for Hump, which he wore to a masquerade ball at the Plaza Hotel. Helen herself appeared disguised as Agnes Ayres, who had starred opposite Valentino in The Sheik. Their photograph ended up in the New York papers.

Helen had even gone so far as to purchase pink silk underwear for Hump, after reading in a fan magazine that Natacha Rambova, Valentino’s second wife, insisted that her husband appear “only in pink bloomers.”

Whenever Hump pulled off his trousers in the bedroom of many a chorus girl, his partner for the evening often laughed at his “pink powder puff” underwear. However, when Hump slipped off what he called “those sissy drawers,” the laughter stopped as he went about his sexual maneuvering for the evening.

As 1924 drew to a close, producer and playwright Barry Connors offered Hump the role of the male lead in a three-act comedy directed by John Hayden. The play was Hell’s Bells, and it starred two women, the established Broadway actress, Olive May, and also Shirley Booth making her debut at the dawn of a stage and film career that would bring her international fame.

Connors described Jimmy Todhunter, the character Hump would play, as “a regular fellow of twenty-seven, well-educated, ambitious, self-reliant, and industrious.” The role would launch Hump into a series of juvenile parts, each of which required the standard costume for an ingénu of that era—white duck trousers and a blue blazer. Each of these early roles was radically more wholesome than some of the gangster and tough guy roles (among them Duke Mantee, Sam Spade, Charlie Allnut, and Captain Queeg) that Hump would later play.& But at least in the 1920s, Hump became known for playing “young sprigs.”

Shirley Booth

Hell's Bells would hardly be remembered except for one immortal line, which Hump delivered and which would forever haunt him, becoming part of the national vocabulary.

The director, Hayden, needed a device to move some actors off the stage to make way for a scene that focused only on his two leading actresses, Shirley Booth and Olive May. He devised a setup whereby Hump appeared on stage carrying a tennis racquet. Surveying the male actors, he asked of them, "Tennis anyone?" Even today, Casablanca's Rick is ridiculed for playing such a tooth-some juvenile with such a jejune image.

Although admitting that he had at one time or another delivered some of the most ridiculous lines ever written for the Broadway stage, Hump in later life repeatedly denied that he had come on stage and said, "Tennis, anyone?" in Hell's Bells or any other play. Hump claimed the line was, "It's forty-love outside. Anyone care to watch?"

However, Richard Watts Jr., longtime theater critic for The New York Post, claimed that he reviewed the opening night of Hell's Bells and that indeed Bogart did say that line. "I made a note of it but didn't publish it in my review."

When an attempt at a revival of the play was made in 1934 for a road show tour, Hayden's original script was discovered. The line about it being "forty-love outside" was indeed in the script as Bogie later claimed. But before opening night, Hayden had crossed over the line and written, "Tennis anyone?"

In later life Bogie often spoke bitterly of his early career on the stage. "With my hair slicked back, I'd appear in white flannels with pale blue knit sweaters, always carrying a tennis racquet. Those early parts made me feel silly and girlish. The god damn director would have me come out modeling the latest pinch-back sports coat with pansy neck cloths and a swishy new hairdo."

The star of Hell's Bells, Olive May, had been appearing on Broadway since Hump was one year old, introducing herself to audiences in The Surprises of Love on January 22, 1900.

During rehearsals Hump met and became briefly attached to Shirley Booth, who was one year older than he was. Those who know her today only as the irrepressible maid on the television series, Hazel, which ran from 1961 to 1966, may not understand the physical allure that Shirley had during her youth. In 1925 she was a lovely, gracious, and even beautiful woman. Born Thelma Booth Ford in New York City, she had had an even more miserable childhood than Hump. Her mother, Virginia Wright, was terminally ill, and her father, business executive, Albert J. Ford, was a brutal, stern father. Over her father's objections and at the age of fourteen, Shirley dropped out of school, determined to be an actress on stage.

Interviewed years later at her saltbox house in North Chatham, Massachusetts, she was reluctant to talk about her involvement with Bogie.

"I wouldn't call our first meeting an affair, more like a weekend together," she said. "He was a real gentleman, very polite and respectful of women, although I'd heard that he had a run-in or two with the star, Olive May. We were two frightened kids trying to make our way on Broadway, and we sensed a soulmate in each other, and perhaps turned to each other for a little comfort. I don't have much to say about that. On the few occasions we talked later in life, we both sympathized with each other about how long it took each of us to become a star."

Hell's Bells opened at the Wallack Theatre on the night of January 26, 1925. It was a flop, running for only fifteen performances. The only consolation for Hump was a claim by Alan Dale, critic for The New York American, that "Bogart gorgeously acted his role."

“I don’t know how it happened,” Bogie later said. “Maybe it was because I’d appeared in three comedies on Broadway, Swifty, Meet the Wife, and Hell’s Bells. All of a sudden I was typecast as a comedy actor on stage. The next few years would offer me nothing but a series of three-act comedies, most of them not funny.”

Helen was a friend of Woollcott. She felt that Hump’s career would be advanced if he actually met some of the critics who would one day review his future plays.

He escorted her to a speakeasy, Tony’s, which was patronized by hard-drinking actors and writers. There Hump met the owner, Tony Soma, who loved artists and who welcomed him with great enthusiasm. That welcome would continue for years even when Hump went as long as three months without paying his large and forever mounting bar tabs.

Tony’s was the kind of watering hole where Dorothy Parker and Robert Benchley would go with Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald to celebrate Jack Dempsey’s four-round victory over Georges Carpentier. When Hump first saw all the celebrated patrons of Tony’s, he felt that it was another branch of the famous Algonquin Roundtable. One by one he met all of them.

He was first introduced to Robert Sherwood, who would one day write The Petrified Forest which would be Bogie’s last stage play, and also his best, and would be made into a film with Bogie and Bette Davis that would become the biggest break of his movie career in the 1930s.

Helen decided she had “to work the room.” Before she had finished making the rounds, she introduced Hump to the newspaper reporter, Mark Hellinger, who invited him for a drink at the bar. Even though he couldn’t afford it in those days, Mark was known for picking up everyone’s bar tabs. Hump and Mark liked each other at once, having no inkling, of course, what important roles they would play in each other’s future life.

Tony put his arm around Hump and invited him to frequent his bar and “make it your favorite. You’re always welcome here. In return, I want you to marry that Helen. She’s one good-looking woman, and I’m afraid some man is going to snare her if you don’t tie the knot.”

“I’ll think about it,” Hump said, although he showed up at Tony’s the following night without his bride-to-be.

After only two nights, Hump became a regular at Tony’s, often dropping in alone and continuing to meet and talk to some of the fabulous personalities of New York in the 1920s.

On nights when Hump drank too much, he’d become quite caustic. One night he insulted Gentlemen Jim Corbett, the boxing champ. He grabbed Hump by the back of the neck and tossed him out onto the rainy street.

Six months went by before Hump dared enter Tony’s again. When he did, he always sent a friend ahead of him to see if Gentleman Jim was among the patrons that night.

When the newspaper reporter, Mark Hellinger, finally got around to inviting Hump for that night on the town, he made up for lost time. Mark’s world, then known as “gay Broadway,” was comprised of a square mile of real estate between 40th and 50th streets, bounded by 6th and 8th Avenue. If it wasn’t the world’s most glamorous mile, it was the most exciting, a district of dime-a-dance joints, speakeasies, chop-suey outlets, cabarets, theaters, movie houses, plush apartments for kept women, panhandlers, Minsky’s Burlesque, the Palace Theater, and even Spinrad’s Barbershop.

The barbershop was pointed out to Hump by Mark who suggested he should go in there tomorrow and ask for George. “If you’re going to be a big Broadway star, you’ve got to get your hair cut right,” Mark said. He also promised Hump to introduce him to his tailor. “The Jimmy Walker cut is the way to go.” Hump had heard about the political aspirations of this fancy dresser, whose career had included stints as a Broadway actor. He was also a talented musician, having written such songs as “Will You Love Me in December As You Do in May?” Rising through the ranks of Tammany Hall, Jimmy Walker was entering the mayor’s race.

Mark Hellinger

Hellinger was on a first-name basis with Jack Dempsey, Clarence Darrow, Theodore Dreiser, Ethel Barrymore, Florenz Ziegfeld, W.C. Fields, Eddie Cantor, Jeanne Eagles, Bobby Jones, and even Eleanora Duse and Aimee Semple McPherson. He spent his nights in some of New York's five-thousand speakeasies devoted to drinking "Staten Island or New Jersey champagne" at $35 a bottle or unreliable Bahamian Scotch at $20 a fifth.

During his rounds, Mark was accompanied by another reporter, columnist Walter Winchell. Hellinger eventually evolved into the world's first Broadway reporter, Winchell the first of the Broadway gossip columnists. The two men were seen together practically every night of the week, so much so that they were rumored to be lovers.

Disdaining Winchell's show biz gossip, Mark preferred heart-rending sob stories, filled with laughter and tears, with an O'Henry ending. Mark called his reporting "short stories about the people of Broadway," ranging from the long-legged Ziegfeld girls to the Irish immigrant cop on the block with a nightstick, to the little Sicilian hood who dreamed that he might one day take over Al Capone's crime empire.

Mark had invited Hump to El Fey club, run by bootlegger Larry Fay. (The club was named after him but spelled slightly differently.) Rumor had it that Fay didn't know how to spell his name. The club's hostess was the fabulous Texas Guinan, whose own club had recently been closed by the police for selling bootleg hooch.

Hump was eager to meet Guinan, a name known all over Broadway. The flamboyant show-biz personality and actress was born in Texas in 1884 as Mary Louise Cecilia Guinan. The robust Irish lass grew up on a small ranch near Waco where she became an accomplished horseback rider and roper. She went from there into live Wild West dramas, and in time ended up in the chorus line in such Chicago comedies as The Gay Musician.

In Hollywood, cast as the gun-girl heroine in a silent screen western, The Wildcat in 1917, this pistol-packing, barrel-riding queen of the West became America's first movie cowgirl long before the likes of Dale Evans. She went on to appear as a gunslinger in The Gun Woman in 1918 and Little Miss Deputy in 1919 before being lured by the aura of New York in the Roaring Twenties.

Texas Guinan

When Hump entered the bar with Mark, Guinan called out, "Hello, suckers! Come on in and leave your wallet on the bar." On meeting her, Hump liked her free-wheeling, devil-may-care aura. "I'm hanging out at Larry's dump," she said, "because the cops have padlocked my place. I don't have to worry about an automobile ride in New York. Taxpayers foot the bill. Unfortunately, my free ride from the city is always to jail. I've fucked Jimmy Walker six times. He owes me plenty of favors. When he becomes mayor, the cops will get off my back except when they come around to fuck me in the ass."

"You're my kind of gal," Hump said to Texas as Mark lost himself in the bowels of the club.

"I've got some special entertainment planned for you tonight in more ways than one," Texas said.

She ordered Hump a drink, although she always denied that alcohol was sold in her speakeasies. When his drink was served, she told Hump where Fay had stolen the booze. “The other night some of Fay’s hoods armed themselves with pistols, sawed-off shotguns, and Tommy guns,” she said. “They piled into a large boat and sailed ten miles out to sea where they hijacked a French freighter like a team of God damn pirates. They made off with five-hundred cases of whiskey, wine, champagne, and brandy. Fay didn’t go out on the raid himself. He was waiting on shore and paid a measly one-hundred bucks for the whole thing. He’ll make thousands off the stuff, especially when my brother, Tommy, waters it down at the bar.”

Surveying the club, she said, “I’m not doing too bad. When I was a movie star in Hollywood, I earned fifty dollars a week—those asshole cheats out there. Before the year is out in New York, I expect to earn $700,000.”

As the night progressed, she told him that a producer was here tonight, considering casting her in the appropriately titled Broadway review Padlocks of 1925. It took a while for the revue to be produced, and the title had to be changed to Padlocks of 1927.

“I’m gonna die young,” Texas told him. “But I’m gonna have a hell of a lot of fun along the way. What about you, Bogart?”

“I’m gonna die young too but I’m gonna have more fun than you,” he said.

“I’ll race you to the finish line, sucker,” she said before getting up to announce the star act of the evening.

In another one of the strange coincidences in Hump’s life, the act being introduced by Texas that night at El Fey was a dance routine by George Raft.

This was the same George Raft that would become the legendary Broadway dancer, the Hollywood tough guy, the gambler, and Don Juan himself with a life-long courtship with the underworld. Hump had read in Winchell’s column that Raft had taught the Charleston to Edward, Prince of Wales, later King Edward VIII, and later, the Duke of Windsor.

In his early reviews, Hump was called the Valentino of Broadway. But in Hollywood it was George Raft who’d be billed as Paramount’s “replacement” for the long-dead Valentino.

To Hump’s regret in the 30s, Warner Brothers eventually signed Raft to a stable of cinema tough guys that included Edward G. Robinson and James Cagney. Hump would often find that whenever he was competing for a choice film role, Raft got the part instead.

Future movie stardom was hardly on Hump’s mind as he sat mesmerized, watching Raft dance to an audience of patrons consisting of millionaires and bluebloods mingling with nattily dressed hoodlums.

After introducing Raft, the brassy, shoot-’em-up gal, Texas herself, rejoined Hump at table. “Raft is the weirdest, maddest dancer you’ve ever seen,” Texas said in her tough, deep voice. She quickly waved at a couple entering to see Raft dance. “Fuck, I’m starting to attract the literati.” Hump recognized Robert Sherwood escorting Dorothy Parker.

“Raft mesmerizes my customers,” Texas said. “All eyes shine on Raft as he whirls faster and faster. Every night he stops the show. He’s taking in a thousand big ones a week.”

Hump didn’t need this running dance critique from Texas. He watched in fascination as Raft performed his mongrel dance, called “the Peabody.” It was a fantastic speed dance with all kinds of interpolations, a choreography strangely known as “cake-eating.” The dance was filled with dozens of twists, turns, and jerks.

The owner of the club, Fay, joined Texas and Hump at table. It was obvious that he’d been quarreling with Texas. Texas was attracting an upper-crust crowd of the Whitneys, the Vanderbilts, and the Astors, whereas Fay was inviting his hoodlum friends from Brooklyn. There was no place with such a mixed clientele in all of New York. An aristocrat like Vincent Astor could be spotted at the bar drinking with five guntoting and trigger-happy desperados.

George Raft, dancing..... in this case, with Carole Lombard

Hump was equally fascinated by Raft's incredible speed dance and by Fay himself. Bootlegger Fay looked like a tough hood from Brooklyn, perhaps an unruly labor organizer, more than the owner of a swank night club. Hump later claimed that he used Fay as his role model when he first had to impersonate a gangster in films.

After his performance, Texas brought Raft over to the table to meet Hump. "Here's the actor who's gonna marry Helen Menken." And although they were later to become bitter rivals for the same film roles, Hump liked Raft at once. The young dancer was actually the character that latter-day film fans thought Bogie was, even though his background and character were almost the complete opposite of Raft's.

Raft had slicked down his black hair with what appeared to be a whole jar of Vaseline, a hairstyle that had become known as the patent-leather look. Unlike the baggy suits of the day, he wore tight, form-fitting trousers and jackets, along with three diamond rings, one on his pinkie.

He spoke with such brutal honesty and candor about who he was and what he did that Hump was mildly surprised that he'd been so confessional to a stranger. "Listen, unless you're going to fuck Texas tonight, I can get you a hot date," Raft said. "I'll give you the phone number of this go-to-hell pussy, Grayce Mulrooney. She's my wife."

At first Hump thought that Raft was joking until he realized that the dancer was perfectly serious.

"She's alone every night." Raft pointed to a cute little brunette dancing in the chorus line. "That's Ruby Keeler, She's only fourteen and working for Texas and Fay illegally. I'm going to go for her tonight. I'm gonna make the big play. Sometimes I fuck young."

Two men in their twenties passed by their table en route to the men's room. In their tuxedos, each one looked like a twin of Rudolph Valentino. "Everybody's trying to get in on the Valentino act," Raft said contemptuously. "I've even read that about you."

"I don't think I'm going to become another Valentino," Hump said. "We're too different. Besides, I don't look that good in Arab drag."

Raft laughed. "There's talk that I'll be the screen's next Valentino, although it seems like Ramon Novarro has beat me out. I know Rudy very well. We once shared a room together when we were going through rough days back in our taxi-dancing times, long before America knew what a Sheik was."

"I heard he was a gigolo," Hump said.

"You might call it that," Raft said, downing a whiskey. "We were both gigolos, hiring ourselves out on the dance floor for a buck. Rudy's first wife, Jean Acker, keeps writing me to go on the road with her in a dance act, imitating the act that Natacha Rambova and Rudy toured in. Acker wants the billing to read, 'Mrs. Rudolph Valentino and George Raft.' No way. I'm gonna be a star without any help from the Valentino name."

Raft told Hump that after work, and while still dressed in his tuxedo, he ran beer convoys. "I work not just for Fay but for Dutch Schultz and 'Legs' Diamond," Raft said. "Mostly I work for a guy called Big Frenchy. Sometimes we make heists when we raid our competition's booze being trucked into New York. You might think I'm a fantastic dancer, but I'm even better as a truck driver. I can cut corners on two wheels. Turn a truck on a dime and hold the fucker steady going eighty miles an hour, all the time ducking some trigger-happy fool."

He wasn't making this up, although it sounded like a script for one of the films both men would later make at Warner Brothers. Raft also wasn't lying about his driving skills. Because of his expertise learned on illegal booze heists in New York in the Twenties, he would one day save Bogie's life when the brakes gave out on a truck Raft was driving on the set of a film.

Texas returned to the table to warn Raft that she was about to introduce him for his second show of the evening. When Raft excused himself, Texas told Hump that since he had seen Raft dance, she had more entertainment planned for him. "But for the grand finale, you're coming to bed with me," Texas said, leaning over to kiss his lips.

One of the waiters ushered Hump into one of the backrooms where the focused beam of a movie projector revealed a room filled with a blue haze from the heavy smoking of the other male patrons. When the film went on, Hump could understand why these were called blue movies. The star of tonight's porn movie was a dancer who'd been a hit in stag movies and a star at private smokers before going on to Hollywood.

As the actress on film danced the Charleston in the nude, the cameraman told Hump her name was Lucille LeSueur.

Fast forward: It is 1954, and Hump, the "King of Hollywood," is escorting the "Queen of Hollywood" to the Academy Awards ceremony.

More than a decade after Louis B. Mayer had kicked Hump's date for the evening off the MGM lot, she'd bounced back to regain her throne as queen, although not for long.

With a mink stole draped across her shoulder and around her wrinkled neck, Bogie was taking out Joan Crawford, once known as Lucille LeSueur.

The Broadway season was ripe for Bogie's women-to-be in 1925, carrying through the spring of 1926. Wife-to-be number one, Helen Menken, was appearing in Makropoulos Secret. Wife number two, Mary Philips, was a star in The Wisdom Tooth, and wife number three, Mayo Methot, was appearing in Alias the Deacon. Wife number four? The one-year old Betty Bacall was in a Bronx nursery in her diapers.

The actress, Mary Boland, had threatened to destroy Hump's stage career because of his unprofessional conduct when he'd appeared with her in Meet the Wife. When no suitable young actor could be found for her new three-act comedy, she reluctantly said, "Okay, get Bogart."

as a gigolo in their plot.

Cradle Snatchers was written by Norma Mitchell and Russell Medcraft and directed by Sam Forrest. It was a raucous and bawdy farce about three society women who sneak away with three handsome college men hired as gigolos. The plot thickens when the husbands show up at the same hideaway, thinking that it's a high-class bordello.

It was well-cast, especially with the enormously comical actress Edna May Oliver in a co-starring role. Hump played a minor role, that of Jose Vallejo. Also appearing in a minor role was another actor, Raymond Guion, whom Hump befriended.

Like Rod La Rocque, Raymond wasn't pleased with his name. After several drunken talks in speakeasies, he won Hump's approval for his new stage name. As Gene Raymond, Broadway's so-called "nearly perfect juvenile" would go on to be a successful film career as a handsome, blond-haired actor with a well-toned body.

His greatest fame came on June 16, 1937 when he married MGM's golden singing sensation, Jeanette MacDonald.

Back in 1925, both Raymond and Hump thought they'd found steady employment in Cradle Snatchers. Woollcott found Hump's performance "competent," but a visiting theater critic from Chicago, Amy Leslie, was more enthusiastic. She claimed Bogart was "as handsome as Valentino and as graceful as any of our best romantic actors." Opening on September 7, 1925, at the Music Box, Cradle Snatchers would run for 332 performances, the hit of the season.

For Hump, the highlight of the play's run was the night Louise Brooks showed up with her new boy friend, Charlie Chaplin. Hump's only regret was that no one in the audience actually watched the play that night, as all eyes were focused on Chaplin. He was, after all, the most famous man on earth. As one stagehand claimed, "I don't know who the president of the United States is, but I sure know who The Little Tramp is."

Louise had taken Charlie to see Helen perform that previous evening, and had even gone with the film star backstage to meet Helen. Louise later claimed that Charlie and she were bitterly disappointed in Helen's performance both on and off the stage. "It's the same show whether the curtain is up or whether she's in her dressing room taking off her makeup," Louise said. "She's so histrionic, so t-h-e-a-t-e-r. Her white, thin face is always ecstatically lifted up to her vision of The Drama. I never heard her talk about anything except the art of the theater. She ignored me and was trying to impress Charlie. It didn't work. He couldn't wait to escape from her clutches."

Like an awestruck fan, Hump was delighted to meet Charlie after his performance and even more pleased when Louise invited him to join Charlie, her sometimes girl friend, Peggy Fears, and herself for a tour of some East Side speakeasies. The Little Tramp had developed a fondness for gypsy musicians newly arrived from Budapest. At the final speakeasy visit of the night, Charlie sat enraptured listening to a wild Hungarian violinist, Bela Varga, with an Albert Einstein coiffure, playing nostalgic music left over from the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Invited back to Charlie's suite, the entertainment continued as Charlie did his impressions, the most brilliant being that of John Barrymore reciting the most famous soliloquy of Hamlet as he picked his nose. He then rushed into his bedroom and emerged in quick drag, impersonating Isadora Duncan dancing barefoot in a storm of toilet paper. His most comedic impression was left for last—that of how Lillian Gish would achieve orgasm if she ever went to bed with anyone but her sister, Dorothy.

Charlie Chaplin:
"A tramp"

Tired of performing, Charlie offered Louise and Peggy Fears five-hundred dollars if they would strip naked and perform lesbian love on the sofa in front of his eager eyes. Without hesitation, both women stripped down and got on the sofa, where Charlie, only twelve inches from the scene, played director. The performance must have excited him, as he disappeared inside the bedroom and emerged later totally nude.

Hump was shocked to see that Charlie had coated his monstrous erection with iodine. He proceeded to chase both Peggy and Louise around the living room, finally capturing Louise. As he disappeared inside his bedroom with her, shutting the door behind him, he invited Hump to enjoy Peggy Fears for the night.

After they'd gone, Peggy plopped down on the sofa. "Okay, big boy, show time! Strip down for action. Louise has already told me about you. For a change, I'm gonna lay you for free."

Four years after taking out the marriage license—it was still valid—Humphrey Bogart wed Helen Menken on May 20, 1926. The wedding took place at Helen's apartment at 52 Gramercy Place.

Two views of Helen Menken

Hump selected his brother-in-law, Stuart Rose, as his best man. He'd wed Hump's sister Frances two years before. Many of Helen's friends, a regular Who's Who in the Theater, showed up. Some one-hundred and thirty guests crammed into the apartment.

Hump invited the Bradys, including Jr. and Sr., Grace George, and Alice Brady. His fellow pussy posse member, Kenneth MacKenna, was also a guest, as was Maud Bogart. Hump's father was at sea at the time.

Stuart was later to recall that the ceremony "was macabre, almost obscene." John Kent, a pastor at St. Ann's Church for Deaf Mutes, conducted the ceremony. He was deaf himself and had been asked to perform the marriage because both of Helen's parents, who were attending the wedding, were also deaf.

Unlike Helen's parents, the reverend had learned to read the service in a kind of warped guttural speech, a sing-song way of talking evocative of Helen Keller. Kent both spoke the words of the ceremony and performed in sign language.

The pastor couldn't hear Hump's "I do," although Helen delivered her "I do" in sign language. After the ceremony, Helen rushed over to Mary Boland where she gushed, "I've been so frightfully busy on Broadway and other stages, I just haven't found time to marry in all these four years, even though Humphrey urged me to do so every day."

When newsmen showed up with photographers, Helen became unstrung. She burst into hysterics. As Louise Brooks would later satirically observe, "For Helen, that wasn't hard to do. She did that every night on stage whether the part called for it or not."

Maud Bogart, Frances, and Helen's mother helped the just-married actress to her bedroom. One of the guests, Dr. Nathan Blomenthal, was summoned to sedate her. Hump did not bother to go into the bedroom to check on the condition of his new bride.

When they'd gone, he turned to Bill Jr. and Stuart. "I think I've made a dreadful mistake."

The marriage with Helen Menken began with violence. There was no honeymoon, other than a dinner at Luchow's and a night alone in the apartment. Helen had a fat Cocker Spaniel named "Sam." She insisted on feeding the dog caviar, claiming, "It's his favorite food."

Hump countered that the mutt ate only caviar because there was nothing else in his bowl. Awakening early after their first night as a married couple, Hump went and got the dog a bowl of chopped meat. The animal was in the act of gobbling down the red meat when Helen came into the kitchen. She screamed at her new husband for feeding the dog hamburger and claimed it would give him worms. The fight accelerated until she slapped him severely.

Enraged, he punched her in the face and sent her sprawling on the floor. She couldn't appear on the street for two weeks, and Hump spent the time as a houseguest of Bill Jr. and Katharine Alexander.

When Hump and Helen finally spoke, it was by telephone, when she called to tell him that she was going to appear in a play called The Captive.

"What's the plot?" he asked sarcastically. "Do you get kidnapped by African cannibals?"

"Nothing like that," she said. "It's a play about lesbianism."

"Type casting," he kidded her.

"If that God damn drag queen, Mae West, can play a nymphomaniac in some shitty play called Sex, then I can play a lesbian in The Captive —and if you and the public don't like it, you can all go fuck yourselves." She slammed down the phone.

True to her word, Helen began rehearsals for what would be one of the most controversial plays in the history of Broadway of the 1920s. Deciding to make up with Helen, Hump attended rehearsals.

At the theater, he met the actor, Basil Rathbone, who was seven years older than him. Rathbone had been cast as the male lead in The Captive. Rathbone had been born in Johannesburg, South Africa, where his family had to flee to escape the Boers because Rathbone's father, Edgar Philip Rathbone, a mining engineer, had been accused of being a British spy.

He had married Ouida Bergère in April of 1926. His union with this scriptwriter would last until Rathbone's death in 1967, although he told Hump that, "You are and I are destined to love many different women." When he said that, he, of course, was perfectly aware of Hump's marriage to Helen. He also told Hump that, "Helen has told me that she has had many real experiences as a lesbian, so she feels perfectly qualified in the role. When we open, though, I fear the revenge of the bluenoses, who are perfectly capable of tarring us, feathering us, and riding us out of town on a rail."

When The Captive, starring Helen Menken, opened on September 29, 1926, it shocked and disgusted Broadway audiences. Only Mae West, in her play Sex, was generating more newspaper publicity. Unlike Helen, Miss West was enjoying the publicity and notoriety surrounding Sex. She was virtually rewriting the script every night, coming up with new and different double entendres. Eighty percent of her audience was male, and many of them were returning for a second, third, or even fourth viewing. Because West played it with different nuances and with different scripts and different ad libs every night, it was as if the audience was seeing a different play every time.

As West tried to lure more women into her audiences, Helen wanted more males to attend The Captive. Her audiences were nearly eighty percent female. Lesbians from as far away as London and San Francisco flocked to see The Captive, the first play on Broadway to deal with the subject of female homosexuality.

New York's district attorney, Joab Banton, was coming under increasing pressure from John Sumner's Society for the Prevention of Vice. Banton made frequent statements to the press, claiming that Broadway wasn't going to become as scandal-ridden as Hollywood. He cited the murder in Hollywood of the director, William Desmond Taylor, and the scandal involving the trial of screen comedian, Fatty Arbuckle, accused of raping the minor actress Virginia Rappé, causing her death.

Banton found no support from New York's playboy mayor, Jimmy Walker. Walker had attended both plays and claimed he liked them very much. "They're not family entertainment," Walker said, "but there's nothing wrong with having plays for mature audiences." Involved in a torrid affair with his mistress, Betty Compton, Walker was hardly a champion of morality.

When Walker departed for Havana in February of 1927 for a vacation, the acting mayor, Joseph B. McKee—known as "Holy Joe"—seized his opportunity to punish Broadway. He ordered Banton to "banish nudity and obscenity" from the Broadway stage.

An order went out on February 5 to have plainclothesmen from the vice squad monitor the productions of both The Captive and Sex. On February 9, Holy Joe had his evidence, and he issued orders to have the casts of both plays arrested and charged with offending public morals.

Basil Rathbone and Helen were in the middle of their play's second act when armed policemen stormed directly onto the stage and arrested both of them, along with the rest of the cast. The entire troupe was herded into a Black Maria (an armored paddy wagon used at the time for rounding up, among others, drunks and vagrants) waiting outside the theater. To her shock and surprise, Helen encountered West and some of the cast members of Sex within the same Black Maria.

Members of both casts were boiling mad. Each production had been jealous of the other play for the publicity and audiences it was generating. Suddenly, being herded together like cattle and thrown into the smelly, hot Black Maria for a bouncy ride to the police station had the effect of lighting a fuse.

Arguments broke out between the two casts. West felt that she had to defend "my boys," and Helen took it upon herself to champion the cause of the cast of The Captive. "We're at least normal," West announced to Helen. "I'm not the one who's up on stage appearing nightly as a sexual deviate."

Helen Menken, Broadway star and Captive, as she's led off to jail for her appearance in a lesbian-themed play

Unable to withstand such verbal assault, the already infuriated Helen moved toward West, grabbing her by her blonde hair. It was a wig. As the hairpiece fell to the floor, Helen stomped on it. West's own hair was matted down with a protective veil. Fearing she'd have to face newspaper photographers at the jail, West shoved Helen, sending her sprawling down onto the floor of the Black Maria, as West picked up her wig and began to make emergency repairs to it.

Rathbone graciously lifted Helen from the floor and dusted her off. Helen at this point was furious enough with West to attack her again, but Rathbone restrained her. "I hear you're not a real woman at all," Helen shouted at West. "I hear you're a female impersonator."

"You ugly bitch," West screamed. "If I could get to you, I'd tear every dyed hair out of your ugly head."

At the Jefferson Market Women's Prison, both Helen and West were booked. Hump arrived and rushed to Helen, taking her in his arms. With him were two attorneys from Charles Frohman Productions, Inc.

Before the night was out, the attorneys for The Captive had worked out an agreement with the district attorney's office. Helen and the rest of the cast and the producers would accept a proposal of "implied immunity" if they would withdraw The Captive from the Broadway stage.

West chose to go the opposite route, preferring to continue with her play Sex. Her attorneys would get an injunction from the Supreme Court, barring police shutdown until a trial was held.

The trial itself became a fashion parade for West, who appeared in a different, outrageous, and gorgeous gown for every court appearance. She often wore black satin, some outfits with bugle beads, others with georgette tops. West eventually was convicted for producing Sex and sentenced to a ten-day jail term and a fine of $500. She would serve only eight days of her sentence at Welfare Island, getting off for good behavior.

Alone with Hump, Helen remained in seclusion at her apartment, refusing to see anyone and turning down all interviews. In desperation, Hump called Bill Jr. "You know how high strung she is. The arrest has done her in. She's having a nervous breakdown, and I don't know what to do."

"For Christ's sake, call Belmont," Bill advised. "He can shoot her up with morphine, and everything will be okay."

When she'd recovered, Helen secured an audition for Hump with the noted director, Guthrie McClintic, to test for the three-act comedy, Saturday's Children by Maxwell Anderson. Ironically, Hump knew that the part of Rims O'Neil was up for grabs because he'd already been called by his pussy posse cohort and the play's set designer, Jo Mielziner. Originally the actor, Roger Pryor, had created the role but he had dropped out of the competition after being hospitalized for bleeding ulcers.

McClintic liked Hump's audition and gave him the part. He had only hours to learn the role. Back at Helen's apartment she stayed up all night rehearsing him.

The star of the play, Ruth Hammond, virtually ignored Hump. All she'd said to him backstage was, "Mary Boland has already warned me about you." He thought that Hammond was unprofessional because she upstaged all the other actors.

Hump did not get along with the male star of the comedy either. The Hoosier actor, Richard Barbee, like F. Scott Fitzgerald, had gone to Princeton. Hump felt that Barbee too closely modeled himself after one of Fitzgerald's fictional characters and was not particularly convincing on stage.

Hump struck out with the stars of the play, but was befriended by two members of the supporting cast, Ruth Gordon and Beulah Bondi, both of whom would go on to become celebrated in the theater and in films.

If Hump was known as a kidder and a needler, he met his match when the director introduced him to Ruth Gordon, who was playing a minor role in Saturday's Children. Three years older than Hump, she was witty and urbane, known for making such remarks as, "The rich have no friends. They merely know a lot of people."

Despite her ribbings, he was immediately attracted to this daughter of a ship's captain. Their affair, launched the week after their initial meeting, lasted about as long as his romance with Shirley Booth. Gordon later said, "It was over before it even began. I think we had sex. But who remembers so far back, and what difference would it make if I did remember? He's got Betty now, and I've got Garson."

At the time she met Hump, Gordon didn't have playwright Garson Kanin, sixteen years her junior. She was married to actor Gregory Kelly, who would die in 1927.

Before heading for a prolonged run in Chicago, Saturday's Children would last for 310 performances on Broadway at& the Booth Theatre. The play was not all that Hump& was headed for, as his short-term marriage to Helen was rapidly coming to its predictable end.

Newspapers were still comparing Hump's look to that of Valentino, but actually he more closely resembled the newspaper columnist, Ed Sullivan, who at the time wrote a Broadway gossip column for the Daily News. A rock-faced Irishman with a hot temper, Sullivan also had a painful shyness and a disdain for phonies.

Sullivan would later achieve international fame on CBS's variety program, Toast of the Town (1948-55), later called The Ed Sullivan Show (1955-71). The show became a national institution, introducing to American audiences such talents as Elvis Presley (Sullivan refused to allow cameramen to photograph him below the hips) and later the sensational appearance of the Beatles.

As he made his rounds across the scope of the Broadway speakeasies, Hump often had gossips come over to him, giving him hot tips for Sullivan's column tomorrow. Since Hump liked to put people on, he never revealed to them that he was an actor, not the newspaper journalist, Ed Sullivan. With a perverted and not altogether kind sense of humor, Hump would often confide some very indiscreet gossip to these strangers. That gossip in most cases got back to its target. Sullivan in the late Twenties found himself in a number of feuds with show biz personalities, never knowing the reason why.

One night, Hump wandered alone into the Mayfair Supper Club, since some of New York's prettiest and most available showgirls frequented the place. He was free to go out on the town because Helen was in Boston. She claimed it was on business, but Hump suspected that it was an off-the-record sexual tryst.

At a red leather banquette and at the best table in the club, New York's handsome and newly elected mayor, Jimmy Walker, was in the company of two long-legged showgirls, one blonde, one a redhead.

Walker was a dapper dresser, though not as flamboyant in attire as Gentleman Jim. Unlike the champ, who preferred to date drag queens, Walker preferred Ziegfeld showgirls when he was not occupied with his mistress.

The notorious Jimmy Walker, Jazz-Age Mayor (1926-1932) of New York City

“Hi, Ed,” the mayor called out to Hump. “Loved your column today. C’mon over.”

Hump thought that his ultimate coup would be to allow New York’s mayor to mistake him for Ed Sullivan. He came over to the mayor’s table and was introduced to the two “ladies” of the evening. Hump joined the party not only for dinner but for a round of drinking. Even though booze was prohibited, Walker always said that that law didn’t apply to New York’s mayor or his guests.

Still impersonating Sullivan, Hump entertained the mayor and his guests with racy stories about Broadway personalities, gossip so hot it couldn’t be printed in his column.

Later he joined the mayor heading for the men’s room and pissed beside him at one of the club’s porcelain urinals. The men did the obligatory pecker-checking, which caused the well-hung mayor to whisper, “Looks like you can take on one of the gals tonight as well as I can.” Shaking himself dry, Walker said, “I had planned to sneak away with both of them. But I’ve had a bad day. I’ve got a hell of a meeting tomorrow at City Hall. Some farthole is accusing me of being on the take. So please, my good boy, Ed, take one of the bitches off my hands for the night.”

“I’d be happy to oblige your Lordship,” Hump said.

Back at table, Hump had assumed that the mayor would select the blonde over the redhead, because Walker was well known for liking blondes. Surprisingly, he chose the redheaded stripper, Rhonda Miles, who billed her act—for some strange reason—as “Ringworm.” Into her second bottle of Staten Island champagne, Rhonda giggled. “When I first met Jimmy, he told me he only went for blonde fluff. I went and got myself dyed down there, and Jimmy is anxious to see the results. Tomorrow he’s gonna pay to have my whole head dyed blonde.”

Since he was ordered to do so by the mayor himself, Hump disappeared into the evening with the blonde stripper, who billed herself as Mabel Norman, perhaps in the hope that her audience would equate her stage name with the famous silent screen comedienne, Mabel Normand.

Without ever knowing why, Ed Sullivan found himself uncharacteristically thought of as a stud in the weeks ahead. Mabel Norman, thinking Hump was Ed, had given Hump’s performance in bed a rave review.

Sullivan never found out the reason for his sudden popularity with Broadway showgirls.

Producer John Turek’s decision in 1927 to revive that tired old chestnut, a three-act farce, Baby Mine, was a move he’d regret. Turek had seen Saturday’s Children, and had been impressed with Hump’s performance, considering him ideal for the role of the straight-laced juvenile husband, Alfred Hardy, in Margaret Mayo’s successful play, which had run for 287 performances when it had originally opened back in 1910.

It was a great year on Broadway and Turek faced stiff competition from other shows, notably Sydney Howard’s oedipal melodrama, The Silver Cord ; Philip Barry’s witty Paris Bound, and Eugene O’Neill’s innovative The Great God Brown.

That 320-pound mass of blubber, Roscoe (Fatty) Arbuckle had signed to star as Jimmy Jenks in Baby Mine. The screen comedian had arrived in New York hoping for a comeback, following his acquittal on charges of raping and killing Virginia Rappé in a San Francisco hotel suite several years previously.

His once flourishing multi-million-dollar screen career was at an end, as his movies were boycotted in spite of his acquittal. In three trials for manslaughter, all the witnesses and even the district attorney had lied, frequently changing their stories. The first two juries could not reach a verdict but the third acquitted Arbuckle.

From their first meeting, Hump was antagonistic toward Arbuckle. Hump told Turek, "Frankly, I think whale blubber killed that slut, Virginia Rappé. But even sluts deserve to live. I heard Arbuckle is impotent. Can't get a rise out of his little dickie. That's probably why he had to use a milk bottle."

At first, rumors were spread that Arbuckle had raped Rappé with a jagged piece of ice. Later the rumor was changed, the jagged ice story giving way to a milk bottle. The bottle was said to have ruptured Rappé's bladder, causing her eventual death.

On the first day of rehearsals, and to show his contempt, Hump asked the stage manager to deliver an empty milk bottle to Arbuckle's dressing room. Hump had penned a note and attached it to the bottle: "Either call me in to handle your next piece of tail or use this on her."

After that, the fat comedian never spoke to Hump throughout the short duration of the play, except on stage when he had to.

Although Hump detested the star of Baby Mine, he told Bill Brady Jr. that he had fallen "madly in love" with the young actress playing the juvenile female lead in the show. She was the very lovely Lee Patrick, a smallish young woman with fair hair, which she wore bobbed like a flapper. Most directors found her face "kind instead of sexy."

Still very young, Patrick had not developed the persona of the brash, sassy blonde she would play in many of her upcoming sixty-five films. She is remembered today for playing the ditsy Henrietta Topper in the Topper television series. She also appeared in a number of film classics, playing second fiddle to Bette Davis in the 1942 Now, Voyager ; the 1945 Mildred Pierce with Joan Crawford, and the 1948 The Snake Pit with Olivia de Havilland. Ironically, one of her most remembered roles was as Effie Perrine, the secretary and confidante in the 1941 The Maltese Falcon opposite none other than Bogie himself.

Roscoe (Fatty) Arbuckle Baby Mine

Hump found that his role of a priggish young husband in Baby Mine was silly and not convincing. Patrick played the role of his wife, an addictive flirt who maneuvers her way into a lunch alone with Hump's best friend. When he learns of this "transgression," Hump's character walks out on his wife. As part of the intricately contrived plot, Patrick "rents" three babies for an afternoon and, in a dramatic presentation, claims to Hump that all of them belong to her. Finally, Hump learns the truth about these ridiculous episodes, interprets them as minor but adorable quirks of his flirtatious wife's personality, and agrees to let her return to his home and hearth.

Hump's very Victorian role lacked style, grace, and humor, and he was forced to deliver such lines as, "My wife had the effrontery, the bad taste, the idiocy to lunch in a public restaurant with that blackguard." The blackguard referred to was supposed to be Hump's best friend in the play.

Throughout the early rehearsals Hump avidly pursued Patrick, giving her candies and flowers. She repeatedly turned down his overtures until the second week when she agreed to have dinner with him at The 21 Club. After a few drinks, he propositioned her, and she turned him down once again. Finally, she said, "I'll go to bed with you on one condition."

"And that is?" he asked.

"That you'll marry me. I know you're already married to Helen. But everybody on Broadway knows it's not a real marriage. The reason I insist on marriage is that I long ago decided that when I go to bed with a man, it's going to be forever."

Startled, Hump almost left her alone in 21 and fled into the night until his hormones won the battle. He took her back to a hotel room where he seduced her "in the missionary position," as he later confided to Bill Brady Jr. "None of that Louise Brooks kinky stuff—not with a virgin."

After they'd had sex, Patrick cried for what was left of the night. In between sobs, she told Hump that she had fallen in love with him and that there would never be another man in her life but him.

The next day at rehearsals, she confided to him that she had disliked the sex intensely and that it had hurt her. "A friend of mine told me yesterday that the first time always& hurts, but it gets better the second and third time until a woman starts to enjoy it."

Lee Patrick

Hump told her that was true, and round two and round three—each played out in the same hotel bed—soon followed. But by the time the play opened, he was already losing interest in Patrick. As he confided to Brady, "It's too much like fucking a nun."

Baby Mine opened on the night of June 7, and the house was packed. Hump felt that audiences were more interested in seeing Arbuckle in the flesh than they were in going to the play. At the close of the final curtain on opening night, Arbuckle appeared before the audience, pleading with them not to believe all the bad press he'd received. He urged them to return again to his play and to bring their friends and relatives.

When Hump from the wings saw the fat comedian shedding tears in front of the audience, he found the act "pathetic." Audiences dwindled during the following nights, and Turek closed the show after only twelve performances.

Hump not only left the play at Chanin's Forty-Sixth Street Playhouse, he also told Patrick that their relationship was over. In her dressing room, she broke down and cried, threatening suicide. He didn't take that threat seriously.

Patrick went on to prove her claim that at heart she was a one-man woman and was "the true blue type." In time she met the writer, Thomas Wood, and married him, their union lasting for forty-five years.

After the closing of Baby Mine, Hump was out of work for only a week. A sudden call from Chicago and he was asked to get on the next train leaving New York. An actor had taken ill, and the producers wanted Hump to repeat his role in Saturday's Children in which he'd appeared with Ruth Hammond and had had that brief affair with actress Ruth Gordon.

Out of work and glad to get another role, Hump agreed to go to Chicago and take over the part. At her apartment, he asked Helen if she'd go with him to Chicago since she, too, was out of work. She flatly refused, claiming she was negotiating to reprise her role in Seventh Heaven on the London stage.

Already in London and a sensation over there, Tallulah had written to assure Helen that, “The audiences will adore you, darling. Perhaps you won’t create the hysteria I do when I appear in my fancy lingerie, but you’ll go over just swell.”

Helen’s refusal to go to Chicago led to the biggest fight yet between the Bogarts, signaling the final deterioration of their shaky marriage.

“Me, go to Chicago?” Helen shouted at him. “I’m an actress, not a housewife, God damn you if you haven’t noticed that. A real actress, not some dumb little actor playing silly walk-ons with a tennis racquet for the mindless. Why in hell do you think I would want to sit in some fleabag Chicago hotel waiting for you to come home at night when the curtain goes down? Why indeed, when I could be the toast of London?”

“Say it like it is,” Hump yelled back at her. “What you mean is, you’d rather be licking Tallulah’s pussy than getting fucked by me.”

“You bastard!” She picked up a vase of flowers and hurled it at him, narrowly missing his face.

“You fucking lez,” he yelled at her, as she picked up another object, a silver platter her mother had given her. Before she could hurl this metal missile at him, he grabbed her wrist and forced her to drop it. As a final goodbye, he punched her hard in the face, scoring a bull’s eye. The impact was so forceful that he injured his own hand. She fell to the floor as he stormed out of the apartment.

That night in a speakeasy, he told Bill Brady Jr., “I hit her harder than I’ve ever hit anyone before. At the moment I struck her, I hated all women. I hated the power they’ve had over me. When I plowed my fist into her face, I was striking back at all women. Even Maud who made me pose nude in that art class. I was hitting every woman who has ever attacked me.”

“Maybe you’re not the marrying kind,” Bill said.

“Maybe I’m not.” He looked at Bill, knowing that he had cheated on his wife as many times as Hump had. “You can play the game. Lie to your wife. But I want to be free of any woman. That way I can’t be accused of infidelity.”

Over a few more drinks, Bill agreed with his friend that a Menken/Bogart divorce was inevitable. “You were completely mismatched,” Bill said. “Besides, Helen doesn’t need a husband. She needs a string of young and admiring actresses around her, some of whom she will seduce.”

“You’re right,” Hump agreed. “If she’d wanted a real man in her life, she would have stuck it out with me even though I’m not perfect.”

Bill’s wife, Katharine Alexander, was out of town for the weekend, and he invited Hump to spend the night with him until he was ready to catch the train for Chicago in the morning.

Five hours later at Grand Central Station, Bill had a strange, forlorn look on his face as he embraced Hump in a goodbye. Hump would remember that hangdog expression all the way to Chicago as he rode the rails.

Her face badly swollen, Helen was treated at a clinic in mid-Manhattan. Taking a taxi back to her apartment, she tried to conceal her large black eye from the doorman. She could make no more appearances until her wound healed.

Before signing the contract to go to London to appear in Seventh Heaven, she filed for divorce, waiving alimony but demanding that Hump return $2,500 which he’d borrowed from her and had never repaid.

She lied to reporters, claiming that she had been willing to give up her career and “make a real home” for Hump, but had suffered nothing but mental and physical abuse from him. “Sometimes he’d be gone for days at a time, and I never knew where he was or with whom. To him his stage career meant everything. A wife meant nothing to him other than a sometimes convenience.”

She found that the press was sympathetic to her fantasies. If anybody valued her stage career more than her home life, it was Helen M herself. She officially charged Hump with “desertion, cruelty, and abuse.”

His upcoming divorce was splashed all over the New York newspapers because the names of Helen Menken and, to a lesser extent, Humphrey Bogart, were well known on Broadway. In Chicago neither actor was known.

Fearing that Helen had permanently damaged his professional reputation, Hump wrote Bill Brady Jr. “All this crap that Helen has been tossing at me in the press is going to smell up my career on Broadway. I fear there will be no roles waiting for me when I come back. I’ll be blacklisted.”

Bill wrote back that Hump need not worry. “What are friends for?” he asked in a letter. “Between Dad, Alice, or me, a job will be waiting for you on Broadway. We’ll see to that.”

To forget Helen and the divorce mess swirling around him, Hump drank even more heavily than before—and that was a lot. After the curtain went down every night, he headed for the speakeasies of Chicago. He’d never realized it before, but Chicago seemed to have as many good-looking and available chorus girls as New York.

After the first week of making the rounds, he wrote Bill of his conquests. “So far, I’ve been having auditions nightly. On some occasions, two or three auditions a night. Want to know what I’ve concluded? There is not one single virgin in Chicago. If I find one, I’ll take care of that problem.”

When Hump returned from Chicago, he continued to make the rounds of the speakeasies with Bill Brady and Kenneth MacKenna. MacKenna wasn’t playing around very much, as he was steadily dating that cute little blonde, Mary Philips, who had appeared with Hump and him in Nerves.

Married or not, Bill seemed to be free every night after the show to join Hump in a tour of the speakeasies, hitting clubs like Hotsy-Totsy, Chez Flo, the Bandbox, and the Clamhouse.

Hump was staring thirty in the face, and in between booze and chorus girls, he expressed fears about his future to Bill. “How long can I go on playing juveniles? Already I’m getting a little long in the tooth for the roles I’m cast into, some of which would be more suited to a nineteen-year old.”

“You need a real meaty part,” Bill said, “and I’m sorry I haven’t been able to offer you one.”

“I’m grateful for the work you’ve given me,” Hump said. “Don’t get me wrong. But I need something juicier.”

“Have you considered films?” Bill asked.

“What could I play?” Hump asked. “Scarface? This fucking lip of mine would look great blown up on the silver screen.”

“Get it operated on,” Bill advised. “You’ll never remove the scar but you could get rid of that scallop.”

“Maybe you’re right,” he said. “I’ll talk to my dad about it. After all, he was the one who gave it to me.”

When Hump visited his parents the following day, he found them separated. He hadn’t seen either Maud or Belmont for several months, nor had he called them. Belmont had become increasingly addicted to morphine, and had lost their elegant town house because of bad investments. He was forced to move into a small apartment in the East 40s.

Facing failing health and a declining medical practice, Belmont still went out on call as a ship’s doctor. When not at sea, he spent most of his time in bed. Maud lived in an apartment next door, and money from her art work supported not only her but took care of most of Belmont’s ever-growing number of bills.

Hump was saddened to see both parents in severe decline after having known such prestige and prosperity when they were listed in Dau’s New York Blue Book.

Hump called on Maud first. Her face was drawn into bitter lines, and she looked dissipated and filled with despair. “I go next door and cook his breakfast every morning. I also go over and see that he has a decent dinner—that is, when I can get him to eat anything. He has these attacks at times, and I have to hire nurses for him, paying out money I can ill afford."

"What kind of attacks?" Hump asked.

"Attacks," she said, dismissing the question. "You always want to know everything."

"Are you guys going to get a divorce?" he asked.

"I have no intention of doing that," she said. "But your father's getting too weak to travel on ships any more. I fear he's going to be bedridden for the few years that remain to him."

"Are you still taking morphine too?" he asked.

"Why don't you go see your father and let me alone this morning?" she said. "I have a job. Not a well-paying assignment but a job, and I need to devote all my time to it—not to your questions."

"I love you," he protested. "I want to know."

"Do I interfere in your life?" she asked, her fury reflected in her stern face. "Did I ask you why you married a lesbian? Why you lay out drunk every night in speakeasies, picking up floozies like your father used to bring home sailor riffraff from the wharves? Do I interrogate you about why you continue in an illicit friendship with that Jew, Bill Brady? The stories spread about him."

"Bill is my friend, and he's going to stay my friend."

"Please leave," she said. "Just leave. My nerves are shattered."

Next door, Hump found Belmont in unusually good spirits, or else he was putting on a brave show for his son. The doctor carefully avoided talk of his failed marriage, his declining career, and his reduced circumstances in life. Unlike Maud, Belmont seemed eager to hear about his son's many "triumphs" in the theater, and Hump exaggerated his achievements and praise.

"The one thing I can't understand," Belmont said, "is why you're always compared to Valentino when there's a write-up about you in the press. I just don't see the resemblance. Besides, he's long dead."

"I don't get it either," Hump said. "There are worse comparisons, though. At least they don't think I look like that rapist, Fatty Arbuckle."

Hump told him that Bill Brady Jr. had suggested a possible career for him in films. He was hesitant to bring up his lip disfigurement since Belmont was to blame for that.

Without ever excusing what he'd done to his son, Belmont said, "I can't remove the scar, but I can do minor surgery and get rid of that scallop. After all, when you become a big-time movie star, and the camera moves in for a close-up, you don't need all that extra skin blown up to giant size on the silver screen. I'll operate this morning."

"You mean, right now?" Hump asked, wondering if Belmont was in any condition to operate on him and fearing that the surgery might lead to greater disfigurement.

"I didn't raise a sissy for a son," Belmont said, rising slowly from his bed. "Go into my clinic down the hall and take off your shirt. We might as well get this over with if you're planning to go to Hollywood one day. Since Valentino died early in life, and no other actor has replaced him, it might as well be my son, Humphrey Bogart. But you'll have to come up with a less sissy name than Humphrey for the marquee."

Taking Bill's challenge of going to Hollywood seriously, Hump went alone to see The Jazz Singer, that partially talking picture starring Al Jolson. The word reaching New York was that in a year or two recorded human voices would be heard in all future films. Since many stars in Hollywood had awful voices, there was going to be a demand for Broadway actors trained in speaking parts.

Hump still had his slight lisp, but at least he no longer had that scallop on his lip thanks to Belmont.

The Jazz Singer had been running for several months before Hump got around to seeing it, and he was impressed, trying to imagine his face on the silver screen. He'd also heard that the pay in Hollywood was much better than it was in the New York theater.

After seeing the film, he went a few blocks down the street to a Manhattan theater where the actress, Mary Halliday, was appearing in a play. On October 26, 1925, Helen had taken him to the opening of Halliday's play, Easy Come, Easy Go, and he'd liked the actress and wanted to call on her and wish her luck. He had learned that actresses like Grace George might occasionally recommend him for future roles in their plays, so he felt it was important to keep in touch with some of the many theatrical celebrities he'd met through Helen.

Backstage on the way to see Halliday, he encountered another Mary. Mary Philips, the actress with whom he'd appeared with his "second best friend," Kenneth MacKenna, in the 1924 play, Nerves. He'd all but forgotten Mary, but remembered that he'd objected to the sexy way that she'd walked offstage, upstaging his best scene in the play.

To his surprise, Hump saw Kenneth emerging from the men's room, walking toward them. Kenneth approached Mary and kissed her on the mouth, possessively putting his arm around her as if to signal his fellow pussy posse member to back off in case he had any designs on Mary.

After the actors paid their respects to Halliday, Hump invited Mary and Kenneth to join him for "drinks, fun, and maybe a little dinner" at Sardi's.

Over drinks, Mary told Hump how sorry she was to learn of the breakup of his marriage to Helen. "Frankly," Mary said, after a few drinks, "I was surprised she wanted to marry any man. The rumor along Broadway was that you and Helen kept a scoreboard every week to see how many young actresses each of you could seduce. In spite of your reputation as a ladies' man, I was told that Helen beats your score virtually every weekend."

Instead of making him boil, Hump laughed and ordered another drink. What Mary had just said to him was what he might have said to someone. It seemed she liked to kid and needle people as much as he did.

Kenneth remained aloof from their conversation. The more they drank and the more fun they seemed to be having, the more Kenneth resented it. He reminded Hump several times that he and Mary were seriously considering marriage. Although Kenneth could drink as much as Hump could, he ordered only bottled club soda. "Someone's got to keep a clear head. Otherwise the two of you will never find your way home."

When Kenneth got up to go to the men's room again, Mary slipped Hump her phone number and gave him a kiss on the cheek. "Mae West is always telling stage-door johnnies to come up and see her some time. I can't think of a better way to say it."

"Invitation accepted." Then, as he was to tell Brady Jr., Mary did something that shocked him. She reached under the table and placed her delicate hand in his crotch, fondling him.

Kenneth was so anxious to return to table that he came back into the dining room still zipping up. Mary discreetly removed her hand from Hump's crotch. She was giving him a hard-on.

She had come a long way since her days in that New Haven convent. Hump was determined to seduce Mary, even though he knew that his friend, Brady, and obviously Kenneth had sampled the honeypot long before he'd get a taste.

Two views of Bogie's second wife, Mary Philips

In the weeks ahead, Hump got to know Mary very well. She visited him three or four times a week at his apartment. Since she was unofficially engaged to Kenneth, she didn't want to be seen at any of the Broadway dives with Hump. Sometimes she would arrive a bit disheveled at Hump's apartment, and he knew that she'd just risen from Kenneth's bed. "It's sloppy seconds for me again today," he'd kid her.

Although she didn't have the professional stature of Helen, Mary was an established Broadway star when she met Hump. From that very first night at Sardi's, Hump realized that, especially when a total of five fans stopped by their table to ask for her autograph. Although they were also established actors on Broadway, neither Hump nor Kenneth attracted autograph seekers.

Hump later told Bill that he wasn't even considering marriage, "and if I do it will to be a Roaming in the Gloaming type. And if I marry anybody, it will be Mary Philips. New England and Irish, the perfect combination for me."

"If you do marry Mary, I can vouch that your future wife's not bad in the sack. That's one hot little number."

That provocative remark didn't make Hump mad because he already knew of the affair Bill had had with Mary. He sipped his drink and cast a steely glance at Bill. "Your wife's not bad in the sack either. Dear Katherine. I did have to teach her a few tricks, though."

"Kenneth has officially proposed," Mary said one morning when rising from Hump's bed after a night of passionate lovemaking. "He's even bought the ring."

"Did you accept?" Hump asked, rubbing sleep from his eyes.

"I've asked him to give me a month to make up my mind." Completely nude, she towered over Hump who remained in bed. "At the end of the month, if I don't have an official proposal of marriage—engagement ring and everything—from one Humphrey Bogart, I'm marrying Kenneth." With that remark, she turned and walked toward his bathroom to repair the damages of the night.

The next few days were agonizing ones for Hump. At speakeasies, he had long, drunken talks with Bill about what he should do. "For God's sake, marry her," Bill advised.

"What about Kenneth?" Hump asked. "He is one of my best friends. I think if I take Mary from him, it will break his heart."

“There are a lot of beautiful women on Broadway who will mend Kenneth’s heart,” Bill said. “He’s one handsome guy. Most women think he’s far better looking than we are. He’s wildly popular with the gals. A month after your marriage, he will have forgotten all about Mary.”

The next night at Tony’s, it was painful for Hump to listen to Kenneth’s plans for his future life with Mary. “We’re not even married yet, and already we’re having fights.”

“What kind of fights?” Hump asked, more than curious.

“Stuart thinks I’m Hollywood material, and I’m planning to go to the coast.”

Hump’s brother-in-law, Stuart Rose, had become the East Coast story editor for the Fox Film Corporation.

“When do you think you’ll go?” Hump asked.

“As soon as Mary and I get married. I’m taking her to LA with me. A woman’s place is beside her husband wherever he goes. Mary believes that the theater is the only true calling for an actor. She thinks movies are for ridiculous types like the late Valentino or that daffy blonde, Mae Murray. Or larger-than-life types like Gloria Swanson or Erich von Stroheim.”

“You’ve got a problem, guy,” Hump said. “Don’t get Mary’s Irish up. That’s one determined broad.”

“So she thinks,” Kenneth said. “I’m more stubborn than she is. Within two years, I predict, I’m going to become the biggest male star in motion pictures. When I come home at night, Mary’s going to have a pot of Irish stew bubbling on the stove and my slippers waiting at the door.”

“Dream on,” Hump said, realizing how little Kenneth understood Mary’s fierce determination to succeed on the stage.

Exactly one day before Hump’s marriage proposal deadline with Mary ran out, he asked her to become his second wife. Remembering his four-year engagement to Helen, he told her he wanted to get married as soon as they could get a license and a minister.

Mary accepted and kissed him long, hard, and passionately. Even so, he was in for a surprise. It would be the beginning of many surprises in their years together. “I want to go and sleep with Kenneth tonight,” she said. “A night of grand love-making. I feel I owe him that.”

“Fuck that!” Hump protested. “You’ll do nothing of the sort. You’re my broad now. I’ve staked my claim.”

“What do you think I am?” she asked. “Some Broadway cow you own in your stable? A big tit bovine you’ve branded with a hot iron? When I agreed to marry you, I didn’t say I’d swear off other men. No marriage can work unless a husband and wife are free to have sex with others.”

Echoes of his recently failed marital arrangement with Helen resounded in his head. Did all Broadway actresses believe in an open marriage? Not wanting to repeat the mistakes he’d made with Helen, he turned on Mary. “What crap!” he yelled at her. “Many married couples are faithful to each other. Have you ever heard of the vow, forsaking all others?”

“I suppose the next thing you’ll throw at me is the perfect marriage of your parents. It was idyllic all right, just so long as Belmont could cruise the waterfront and bring home sailors. Or that Maud could have a discreet affair or two on the side. You told me that yourself.”

“My own parents are hardly an example I would want to follow,” he said.

“What about your marriage to Menken?” she demanded to know. “Everybody up and down Broadway knows that the two of you slept with everything that had two legs and could spread them.”

“My marriage with Helen failed,” he said. “I don’t want that to happen to us!”

“Maybe there’s going to be no God damn marriage,” she said. “What are you, some fucking Puritan? I’m not going to agree to marry you unless you let me continue to sleep with Kenneth. And maybe some other good-looking guys I meet. My only promise to you is that these guys will always be actors. That way, we’ll keep it in our Broadway family.”

“That is the sickest talk I’ve ever heard,” he said, turning from her in disgust.

“Yeah,” she said, confronting him. “But it sounds healthy to me. A lot healthier than those three-ways you and Helen had with Tallulah Bankhead. That cozy arrangement had all of Broadway talking. I’ve heard that you’ve even had three-ways with Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald.”

“That’s a God damn lie.”

“You were seen kissing Fitzgerald in the elevator of the Plaza Hotel.”

“That was just some drunken game we were playing that night,” he said.

“When I fuck Kenneth tonight, I’ll make sure we’re drunk and that it’s all a game,” she said defiantly. “I don’t care what you say. I’m going to do what I God damn please.” She stormed out of his living room, heading for the door.

“Forget I ever proposed to a whore like you,” he shouted to her departing back. Even when stalking out of the apartment, she still had that same sexy walk she’d used on the stage in Nerves. “I wouldn’t marry you if you were the last blonde slut on Broadway, which you aren’t. Your type is a dime a dozen.”

Her answer to that was the loudest slamming of a door he’d ever heard.

It was in Hartford, Connecticut on April 3, 1928, that the minor Broadway actor, Humphrey Bogart, aged 28, married Miss Mary Philips, the Broadway star. Whatever differences they had, they had momentarily suppressed them. They’d hardly worked them out.

Arriving two hours before the wedding, Kenneth had gone into seclusion with Mary, pleading with her to, “Marry me, not Hump.” Mary had wavered back and forth between the two men, deciding first on Kenneth, then on Hump. Years later, she would sigh and say, “I was really pissed off. Why can’t a woman have two husbands? I wanted to marry both of them.”

In time, she would.

Kissing Kenneth good-bye and telling him to leave Hartford, Mary turned down his proposal of marriage. She held out a promise to him. “When I get back to New York, I’ll still be your wife, but only on certain nights of the week.”

Bill Brady Jr. was Hump’s best man. The wedding was to take place at the home of Mary’s mother, Anne, at 24 Hopkins Street, an apartment in a building across from the old Hartford Public High School.

Only ten minutes before the wedding, Hump told Bill, “I’m a fool to go through with this marriage. It has all the earmarks of a disaster—just like my marriage to Helen. History is repeating itself. She’ll probably throw Kenneth a mercy fuck a few minutes before she walks in here to say ‘I do.’”

“Maybe the line should be changed to, ‘I just did,’” Bill said, joking with Hump and hoping to cheer him up.

After a tearful embrace, Mary finally appeared in front of the justice of the peace, her guilty eyes avoiding Hump’s. The couple exchanged marriage vows, even a promise to forsake all others, although Hump knew that was a meaningless promise.

After the ceremony, when he’d put a ring on Mary’s finger and kissed her, Hump stood in front of a bowl of punch with the justice of the peace. “We know what a fine star Miss Philips is. Or should I say Mrs. Bogart? But what kind of actor are you?”

“They call me a ‘white pants Willy,’” he said.

“What does that mean? I’m afraid I’m not familiar with show business terms.”

“A handsome but callow young man who is a staple in many drawing-room comedies.”

As they were at the train station heading back to New York, Hump and Mary got caught up in a torchlight parade for Hartford’s newest mayor, “Batty” Batterson, who’d just been narrowly elected despite widespread allegations of vote fraud.

After a one-night stopover in Manhattan, during which Mary was gone for two hours for drinks with Kenneth, Mary and Bogart headed for a two-week honeymoon in Atlantic City. “It was the beginning of ten years of deepening misery for me,” Bogie in the years to come would say in recalling his New Jersey honeymoon.

When the honeymooners returned to New York, Mary immediately called Kenneth who told her that he was leaving in the morning on a train bound for Los Angeles. He was going to break into the movies and had been promised a “really big part.”

Mary kissed Hump good-bye and told him, “I just have to spend this final night with Kenneth. I’m sure you’ll understand. After all, I’ve been with you for two entire weeks.”

He wished her a good time. He’d just read in a Broadway column that Helen had returned from her engagement in London. He called her apartment. After receiving her congratulations on his new marriage, he asked her if he could come over and spend the night.

“You’re always welcome,” she said.

After putting down the receiver, he headed for the shower. He wanted to look handsome and well-groomed for Helen.

That would mark the beginning of an affair with his first wife that would last for the entire duration of his marriage to his second wife, Mary Philips.

The next week Hump went to the theatrical agents, Charles Frohman Productions, and signed on with them, telling them he wanted to break into the movies. As Helen’s representative, Frohman had secured lawyers for Helen and gotten her out of trouble when she was arrested for appearing in the lesbian play, The Captive. Even so, Hump wasn’t very cooperative, but one of the staff members, Sheila Crystal, took a liking to Hump and felt that he might photograph well. She’d already seen two plays in which he’d appeared. She was also aware that Broadway columnists still compared his looks to the dead actor, Valentino.

Hump left the agency thinking nothing would come of his signing on. In two weeks, Sheila called him. Even without a screen test, she’d secured him the male lead in a two-reeler, The Dancing Town. “The star will be Helen Hayes,” Sheila said. “That’s Helen Hayes with an s, not Helen Haye. Everybody gets those two gals mixed up.”

That night on his tour of the speakeasies with Mary, Hump was thrilled at the offer. He was disappointed in Mary’s reaction. “Films are just a novelty,” she said. “I think in a few years there will be no films. The theater is the only place for an actor. I told Kenneth that, but the fool wouldn’t listen. He’s dreaming of seeing himself up on that silver screen.”

“You’ve got it ass backwards,” he said. “All the big Broadway stars today will be forgotten a hundred years from now. Films like that crap Valentino made will still be shown.”

The day he went to meet Helen Hayes, Hump was excited to be working with her. He’d never met her, but another Helen, his first wife, knew her well. Both of them had gone to see Hayes in the Broadway play, To the Ladies, in which she’d appeared from 1922 to 1924. She’d had great success in Oliver Goldsmith’s ribald 18th-century comedy, She& Stoops to Conquer, and she’d followed that by playing Cleopatra in George Bernard Shaw’s&

Caesar and Cleopatra.

Helen Hayes

Hayes had married the same year that Hump had wed Mary Philips. Her husband was the very handsome Charles MacArthur, whom Hump knew casually from their long nights spent drinking at Tony's saloon. Hump was surprised that the demure and ever so elegant Hayes would marry a hard-drinking, hard-living playwright like Charles MacArthur, who was having his big Broadway success with his memorable play, The Front Page.

When Hump had first met MacArthur, he was having affairs with both Dorothy Parker and Ned Sheldon, the playwright with whom he had collaborated on the 1926 play, Lulu Belle. Hump knew that MacArthur swung both ways, but he didn't know if Miss Hayes knew that, and it wasn't his job to tell her. Bill Brady Jr. always claimed that, "MacArthur will drop his trousers for anybody, male or female, if he's drunk enough." Like his own marriage, Hump didn't give the Hayes/MacArthur union much of a chance.

Hayes was hardly the First Lady of the American Theater the day Hump met her at a studio in Queens. But she was every bit a lady. She was so tiny she made him feel tall. If modern generations have an image of Helen at all, it is of a grandmotherly looking woman with gray hair. But when Hump met her, Helen was "the serpent of the Nile," and she'd appeared in a number of flapper roles, although he felt that she was "too pure" to have any real sex appeal.

Over coffee, and waiting for the cameras to be set up, Helen confessed that she was planning to accompany her husband to Hollywood where he wanted to become a screenwriter for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. "Now that the flickers have learned to talk, maybe I'll consider a film career as well. Heaven only knows, I'm no sex pot who can do bathtub scenes like Gloria Swanson."

"I think you're a very sexy lady, and within the hour I expect to be making mad, passionate love to you."

"Heavens," she said, "I'm flattered. You're very handsome, not as much so as my Charles, but a very good-looking man. I'm faithful to my husband, though, even if he isn't to me."

Apparently, she already knew about her husband's extramarital affairs. "I wasn't making a proposition," Hump said. "I've read the script. It calls for us to make mad, passionate love."

"Oh, I see." She looked embarrassed. "It's in the script?"

"I suggest we at least do some heavy kissing before the cameras are turned on us," he suggested. "After all, if you and I are going to become movie stars, we don't want to appear like limp dish rags when we embrace on screen."

"You're probably right," she said. "Lillian Gish has always warned me that the camera—unlike the stage—picks up every facial nuance."

His lips already moist, he wetted them again as he went over to her in her dressing room and took her in his arms. He gently pressed his mouth down on hers. At first she resisted but soon gave in, reaching to put her small arms around him.

The kissing scene was going so well that he inserted his tongue ever so gently into her mouth, not knowing what she'd think of this French kissing. He seemed to be getting to her.

Although it was hardly called for in the script, he placed his hand on her thigh and started moving to the North Pole. He'd never know what might have happened because suddenly there was a rude knock on the door. The director wanted both of them on the set.

Hump would later recall that their love-making on the silver screen never matched their warm-up in Helen's dressing room.

Regrettably, there are no known copies of this two-reeler today, which starred two of the most famous actors of the 20th century, Helen Hayes and Humphrey Bogart.

"I'm impotent." Hump walked with Stuart Rose along a serene lake near Fairfield, Connecticut where Mary and he were renting a house next to his brother-in-law and his sister, Frances.

"It'll pass," Stuart assured him. "Just give it time."

He took hold of Stuart's arm and confronted him. "Has it ever happened to you and Frances?"

"Can't say that it has, but it happens to a lot of men," Stuart said. "More than they'll tell you. My own father was impotent for two years before he got it back again."

"If only Mary didn't make it worse," Hump said. "When I can't get it up, she mocks me and ridicules me. I should never have married her."

Stuart looked deeply into Hump's eyes. "What's the real problem?"

"It's the kind of marriage we have," Hump said. "I think she's still in love with Kenneth. She sleeps around and tells me about it. She says that what she can't get at home she finds somewhere else. She claims most men don't have my problem."

"Where's Mary now?" Stuart asked.

"She's gone back to New York," Hump said. "We'll probably get a divorce. My reputation will be ruined on Broadway. No gal will want to sleep with me ever again."

The marriage was saved by a three-act comedy, The Skyrocket, that was set to open January 11, 1929 at the Lyceum Theatre. It was produced and directed by Guthrie McClintic, who had hired Kenneth's brother, Jo Mielziner, as the set designer.

Mary was cast as the star, with Humphrey playing her husband. After reading the script, he told Jo, "It's another one of those sprig parts. But I need work so I'll take it."

It was like a Broadway homecoming for Hump. Guthrie had directed Saturday's Children two years earlier, with Jo doing the sets. The script was one of those rags-to-riches-to-rags stories. Couple strikes it rich but money makes them unhappy. They go broke again and find true love and happiness in their poverty.

Hump's role as "Rims" in Saturday's Children had been minor, and he hadn't really gotten to know its director as he'd filled in for another actor after the show was blocked. Both Mary and he were eager to work with the director, Guthrie McClintic.

In their daydreams, Mary and Hump fantasized with each other about becoming the "second Guthrie McClintic and Katharine Cornell." And whereas Woollcott hadn't been impressed with Hump's stage "sprig," he was overwhelmed by Guthrie's wife, Katharine, calling her "The First Lady of the Theater." Helen Hayes claimed that position for herself as well, as did Lynn Fontanne, Cornell's two chief rivals for glory.

Even without Woollcott's usual hyperbole, Cornell was indisputably the reigning Broadway star of the second quarter of the 20th century. When she'd made her debut in 1921 in Nice People, her future husband, then a young casting director, saw her performance and recorded in his notebook. "Interesting. Monotonous. Watch."

By the autumn of that year, he'd married her, forming a theatrical union that lasted forty years until his death in 1961, in spite of the fact that she was a lesbian and he was a homosexual. At the time of his death she abandoned the stage. “I can’t go on without Guthrie,” she told the press.

When Guthrie told his two stars, Mary and Hump, that his wife was going to visit for the final rehearsal, they were thrilled and were glad to have been warned. They planned to give their best performances during the rehearsal even if it left them drained for opening night.

Guthrie had also told them that Cornell, following such great theatrical successes as W. Somerset Maugham’s The Letter and Edith Wharton’s The Age of Innocence, planned to manage her own productions in the future. Mary told Hump that if Cornell were impressed with them, she might hire them for one of her shows.

Divas and grande dames
Guthrie McClintic and his wife, Katharine Cornell

On the day of the final run-through, Guthrie delayed The Skyrocket for one hour, waiting for his wife. Cornell finally showed up. In a beautifully tailored suit, she took a seat in the final row of the theater. Like an imperial grande dame, she signaled her husband that the show could begin.

At the end of the performance, the curtain was pulled shut. When it was opened again, Mary and Hump stepped forward, hoping to hear the applause of Cornell. Guthrie told them that she’d left the theater but had written a note for them. It was addressed to “Mr. and Mrs. Humphrey Bogart.”

Dear Aspirant Thespians,

Although you struggled, and I’m sure performed, to the best of your ability, this Skyrocket will never make it to heaven. Actually, the two of you are not to blame. The playwright, Mark Reed, deserves full responsibility. His mother should have smothered him at birth.

All good wishes,

Katharine Cornell

Somewhere during rehearsals, Hump had regained his confidence and his sexual prowess and was once again sleeping with Mary. The attack from Cornell destroyed his confidence once again. On opening night he was jittery and explosive.

To compound his fears of an impending disaster, Mary chose that horrendously inappropriate moment to confess to an infidelity that had been going on right before his eyes, even though he hadn’t seen it.

“I’ve been having an affair with Jo,” she said. “I guess I missed Kenneth now that he’s gone Hollywood. They say if a gal goes for one brother, she can go for another. Actually I find Jo better in bed than Kenneth. Brothers don’t make love the same way.”

Hump wanted to slap her, even belt her a good one, but was told that the curtain was going up. He was understandably nervous on opening night, especially after Mary’s revelations. Critics pronounced Skyrocket a “showy counterfeit.” One called it “spurious.” Mr. and Mrs. Humphrey Bogart received only faint praise.

An out-of-town critic from Hartford, John Davenport, wrote, “It’s surprising that the two stars, Mary Philips and Humphrey Bogart, are in fact newlyweds. There is absolutely no chemistry between them on stage at all.”

Of all the critics that night, Davenport was the only one who got it right. Skyrocket quickly closed, and both Mary and Hump found themselves out of work once again.

His bouts of impotence continued on and off for several months. He told Bill that his marriage was a “sometimes thing.” Mary seemed more excited to get a letter from Kenneth in Hollywood than she did in going out to the speakeasies with her new husband. Sometimes she’d disappear for a week at a time and never tell Hump where she’d been or with whom. “When I’m gone, feel free to date other women,” she told him.

No other woman interested him. It wasn’t that he wanted only Mary. He didn’t want any woman. One night when he’d been alone and drinking heavily in his apartment for three days, Bill Brady Jr. arrived unexpectedly, finding Hump unbathed, unshaven, and almost suicidal.

“I finally figured out what’s the matter with me,” Hump said, heading to the kitchen to pour himself another drink. “I’ve decided I’m a homosexual.”

“We all go through periods like that,” Bill said. “Our own relationship is a perfect example of that.”

“It’s worse than you think,” Hump said. “The other night I was trying to jack off. I willed my mind to think of Mary, but the thing that did it for me— the image that made me pop off—was thinking of what Stuart looked like naked.”

“I’m jealous,” was all Bill said. “Now come on, big boy, we’re going to give you a bath, sober you up a bit, and take you out on the town. Stuart will have to be put on the backburner. You’re my date for tonight.” Bill winked at him.

As the weeks went by, Hump continued to be filled with loathing of himself and self-doubt about his manhood. It was one of the most morbidly depressing periods of his life, and at times he contemplated suicide. He later told Bill, “I never get beyond the thinking stage of it. I just can’t see myself taking a razor to my throat.” Bill tried his best to cheer him up and break his mood.

Alone in his apartment on one of the blackest days of his life, Hump saw no future for himself, certainly no career in the theater. His marriage to Mary was rapidly deteriorating, in ways that evoked the earlier collapse of his marriage to Helen.

But ironically, he had resumed seeing Helen again whenever Mary was away. With Helen, he didn’t experience impotence, only with Mary. Helen always made him feel like a man.

One night at a speakeasy, when he’d been battling with Mary, he told her, “On those rare occasions with you when I can get it up—that is, when you’re not trying to take a razor to my balls—I feel you’re thinking about getting plugged by Kenneth and not by me.”

“A lady is entitled to her fantasies,” Mary had said, rising from her chair and staggering toward the bar to order another drink.

On that dark, rainy afternoon, as he drank alone and grew more despondent in his bleak apartment, the phone rang. Thinking it was Bill, he picked it up to discover Sheila Crystal on the line. His theatrical agent had gotten him another film job.

The great singing star of the Twenties, Ruth Etting, had seen Hump’s performance in the short-lived Skyrocket, and had told her backers that she thought “Bogart would be ideal as my leading man” in a ten-minute short she’d contracted to film for Warner Brothers’ Vitaphone Corporation.

Once again and without ever setting foot in Hollywood, Hump found himself cast in a movie opposite a famous woman star.

Like Katharine Cornell, the songbird, Ruth Etting, was late on the first day of rehearsals for their film short. She’d been rehearsing for her upcoming Broadway show, Whoopee! She was Hump’s favorite recording star, and he always proclaimed that she had a “gorgeous voice.” He’d seen many pictures of her in the tabloids and had found her a& “great beauty.”

Two views of Broadway singing sensation Ruth Etting, alone and (bottom photo) with Humphrey Bogart

Etting lived up to her billing. When she finally did show up, Hump was dazzled by the sultry torch singer known as "America's sweetheart of song." Only two years older than Hump, Etting had been born in Nebraska. But, as he later told Bill Brady, Jr. "She looked like no cow gal I've ever seen." When introduced to him, he shook her gloved hand. She reached over to kiss him gently on the lips. "It's good for me to see you in the flesh and up close," she said, still holding his hand. "I found you very sexy and commanding in Skyrocket even if the critics didn't."

He looked into her eyes. He'd later say, "I never saw a woman's eyes dance before I met Ruth. We clicked from the very first. After only an hour together, we were confessing intimate secrets. She even told him that her secret ambition was to design clothing. "I design some of my outfits on Broadway," she said.

Later, when the film script called for him to come on to her, he found that his impotence had been miraculously cured. Fortunately they were seated at a table. Otherwise, the camera might have recorded one of his biggest erections.

Although he wanted to, Hump didn't put the make on Etting the first day. She gave him several opportunities and seemed to actively encourage him. Hump was afraid—not of Etting, but of her husband. She was married to the Chicago gangster, Martin Snyder, nicknamed "The Gimp" because of a lame left leg. He was promoting her singing career by throwing his weight around Broadway, using tactics he'd learned from a life on the streets in Chicago's underworld.

As work on the short film began, Etting confessed that she'd left "The Gimp" and planned to dump him. She also told Hump that she'd had a very brief affair with showman Florenz Ziegfeld when she'd starred in the Ziegfeld Follies of 1927, singing Irving Berlin's "Shaking the Blues Away."

When Hump didn't invite her out that night, she asked him to go on tour of the speakeasies. After a few drinks, she confessed that she was having an affair with the young singer, Bing Crosby. "The Gimp" was supposed to be fanatically jealous, but she seemed to be screwing around a lot, even when she was living with the gangster.

Shortly before midnight, Etting invited Hump back to her apartment. "I thought you'd never ask," he said.

Once in the apartment, she put on a record of one of her songs. She stood in front of her record player and told him to turn off the lights. Not knowing what was about to happen, he turned off the sole light in the room. "Lights," she called out after less than a minute.

When he turned on the light bulb again, Etting was standing nude in front of her record player. She sang "Love Me Or Leave Me" to him. As she sang, he removed his clothing. At the wrap of her song, he moved toward her, his erection guiding his way.

In one of the many ironies of Hump's life, that was not the last time "Love Me Or Leave Me" would figure into his career. Nearing the end of Bogie's life in 1954, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer considered him for their upcoming picture, Love Me Or Leave Me conceived as a vehicle for Doris Day. The studio felt that Hump would be ideal cast as Etting's gangster lover, "The Gimp." Feeling the film was too much a star part for Day, he turned down the role, which eventually went to James Cagney, his longtime rival for gangster roles at Warner Brothers in the 1930s.

As it had with so many other women, his affair with Ruth Etting ended almost before it began. "The Gimp" arrived back in New York and had a reconciliation with Etting. Bill Brady Jr. told Hump that "The Gimp" often assigned hit men "to beat up or kill any man who moves in on his lady love." Even with the dangerous gangster back in her life, Etting placed three more calls, hoping to arrange a private assignation with Hump. He was too afraid to return her calls.

Still sleeping with Mary, he had managed a one-night stand with a beautiful actress who had had a brief walk-on in the Vitaphone short, Broadway's Like That, in which he co-starred with Etting. Her name was Joan Blondell and her nickname was "Rosebud." To him, she was a blonde bombshell from Texas, and he'd been captivated by her youthful exuberance, expressive face, and popped-out eyes that seemed to devour whatever man they focused on.

Like Kenneth MacKenna, she was heading for Hollywood to star in a picture, Sinners' Holiday, with James Cagney.

After their one night of passion, Joan made him promise to "look me up if you ever come to Hollywood." She gave him a phone number where she could be reached in Los Angeles. He wrote it down but didn't expect to see her again.

As he said goodbye to Joan when he went down to see her off at Grand Central, little did he know that this would be "the beginning of a beautiful friendship," and that he would one day be co-starring with her in motion pictures. Not only that, their one-night stand would mark the beginning of one of the most enduring and long-running affairs of his life.

Work came in the form of another three-act Broadway comedy, this one a superficial comedy by Laurence E. Johnson, produced and directed by David Belasco at the Belasco Theatre. It's a Wise Child was slated to open on August 6, 1929, starring Helen Lowell, Olga Krolow, Leila Bennett, Mildred McCoy, and George Walcott. No longer a co-star as he had been in The Skyrocket, with Mary, Hump got fifth billing in yet another juvenile part.

In spite of the many drawbacks of both the play and his role within it, Hump got to work with some of the biggest names on Broadway. First, Guthrie McClintic had been his director. Now, he was being directed by David Belasco, an influential powerhouse sometimes known as "The Bishop of Broadway." The theater, constructed in 1907, in which their play was to open, was even named after Belasco, who had emerged as one of the most influential men in the entertainment industry at the time. He had seemingly done everything in the theater, including the writing of a smash hit, The Heart of Maryland, about the Civil War. He had even selected the name "Mary Pickford" for the film actress who would eventually become "America's Sweetheart."

During the first week of rehearsals, Hump had been disappointed that Belasco, as director, spent so little time coaching him in his role of Roger Baldwin, a part he loathed. The comedy concerned a woman who falls for a young bank clerk as played by Hump. Already saddled with an elderly fiancé, she tells him she's pregnant with another man's child. Hump's role was conceived as that of a "transitional beau," and his character was described as "not one of those silly dancing and drinking men" but as "one of the best-looking men you were likely to ever meet, with the profile of a Greek God." In the final act, the beautiful heroine irrationally dismisses Hump as "just a foolish kid" when he tells her that he cares more about his job than he does about her.

Not particularly attracted to the aging star of the play, Helen Lowell, Hump made a play instead for the enchantingly lovely second female lead, Mildred McCoy, considering her "twice as beautiful as Mary." Mildred seemed fascinated with Hump and invited his amorous attention, even though she constantly refused to go out with him.

Word of Hump's flirtation with Mildred must have reached her beau. As rehearsals began one Monday morning, the stage manager came backstage to tell him that Mildred's lover was sitting alone out front. He was none other than Chief Buffalo Child Long Lance, the most famous "Indian" in America. Hump was even wearing a pair of canvas running shoes, "Long Lance Sport Shoes," named after him.

Long Lance was a darling of the tabloids, which exploited his alleged adventures as an athlete. He was said to have been trained by the legendary Olympic athlete Jim Thorpe and in addition, he was a war hero. He was also a journalist, biographer, public lecturer, pilot, Indian rights advocate, and was heading to Hollywood to become a movie star. Not only that, he was a boxer, having claimed that he had knocked out Jack Dempsey during a sparring match.

In the glittering world of New York society of the 1920s, hostesses vied in sending out invitations to this so-called full-blooded Blackfoot chief, who had captured the imagination of North America with the story of his life and the plight of downtrodden Indians. As a special dispensation, Woodrow Wilson had even appointed Long Lance to West Point.

Not everybody bought his story. There were rumors that he was not a Cherokee from Oklahoma at all. He'd become such a famous fixture on the American landscape that reporters were investigating rumors about his true identity. Reports were turning up from western North Carolina that Long Lance was descended from African slaves. He was dark skinned but not black skinned so he was able to pass as an Indian. Other rumors suggested that his actual father might have been a tobacco planter from England, who had moved to the Winston-Salem area and conceived Lance with a local woman of color, which would account for Long Lance's skin tone.

After the rehearsals, Long Lance went backstage to meet Belasco and other actors. In front of Hump, he kissed Mildred on the lips, asserting his territorial rights. He was an imposing figure towering over Hump. From that day on, Long Lance attended every rehearsal, always coming backstage to rescue Mildred.

After a few days, Long Lance's hostility toward Hump ended as he'd come to view him as no competition for& Mildred's affections. "What would she want with that little runt when she's got me?" he& asked Belasco one day, "After all, they don't call me Long Lance for nothing."

He even invited Hump to join Mildred and him on a round of the city's speakeasies, where Long Lance dominated the conversation with tall tales of his exploits. Hump listened attentively and seemed enthralled, although later telling Belasco that he too believed that Long Lance was an imposter. "An imposter," Hump said, "but a glorious one."

As he got to know Long Lance better, Hump came to believe that he was indeed black but had assumed the Indian identity to escape the restrictive segregationist policies of the South. Long Lance viewed himself as following in the tradition of what he said was his "remote maternal relative," Kit Carson, and was filled with fascinating tales of his experiences which allegedly ranged from being a rider in a Wild West show to fighting bravely as a Canadian soldier who'd won the Italian War Cross and the French Croix de guerre.

One day, Long Lance didn't show up for rehearsals, but cornered Hump when he was leaving the theater in the late afternoon. There was a look of desperation on Long Lance's face. Hump led Lance across the street as a means of talking to him privately. "You can have Mildred," Long Lance said. "She's all yours. In fact, I want you to take her off my hands."

"What's going on here?" Hump asked.

"One of America's most famous women has fallen madly in love with me."

"You mean, the very, very rich Anita Baldwin?"

"Anita and I are through," Long Lance said. "It's someone else. She's big. I can't tell you her name. But I've got to get rid of Mildred. You go after her. Maybe she'll fall for you. If not, she might fuck up this new thing I have going."

Hump said he'd always found Mildred sexy and appealing, and he'd do his best to lure her away from him.

"You're a swell guy, Bogart," he said.

That didn't sound like Cherokee talk to Hump. The two men talked for an hour, pledging eternal friendship to each other. Long Lance even promised to make Hump an honorary Cherokee.

Having been dumped by Long Lance, Mildred finally agreed to go out with Hump after the opening night curtain fell on It's a Wise Child. They were in a mood to celebrate when they hit Tony's. Many of the critics also descended on Tony's that night, having already filed their reviews of It's a Wise Child. Hump was eager to ask them what they had written but knew that that wasn't proper Broadway protocol.

Mildred and Hump waited for the reviews, which were lukewarm. She was disappointed that only three reviews even listed her, with no comment about her acting. Woollcott wrote that Hump played his role with "more than his usual vigor and sincerity."

Feeling despondent and wanting to be cheered up, Mildred invited Hump back to her hotel room.

The next morning he got one of the worst reviews of his young life. Over coffee downstairs in the breakfast room, Mildred confessed to him. "You and I have no future," she told him. "After enjoying the embrace of Long Lance for many weeks, I realize that you are that inadequate sprig reviewers are always citing."

During the run of the play, the Wall Street crash of October, 1929 came tumbling down on the worldwide economy. Miraculously, the play survived the drop-off in business. Many other theaters shut their doors. At first Hump and Mary were unaware of how thoroughly Broadway would eventually be impacted by America's financial crisis. "In bad times, people need to be entertained," Mary told him. "They'll flock to the theater for escapism."

"Yeah," Hump said. "But how in the fuck are they going to afford the tickets?"

Even in the midst of the disaster, Hollywood agents had descended on New York, hoping to find "actors who know how to talk." Out on the West Coast the unattractive voices of many silent-screen greats were repositioning them into the dustbin of film history.

Stuart Rose had become good friends with the former Broadway producer, Al Lewis, who ran the New York office for Fox in which Stuart worked. Stuart's job involved reading plays, hoping to find one suitable to be filmed. He managed to persuade Lewis to give his brother-in-law a chance at a screen test. Stuart took Lewis to see It's a Wise

Child, and Lewis reluctantly agreed, although he wasn't impressed with the scar on Hump's upper lip.

Hump didn't think much would come of yet another screen test for him, but he performed a ten-minute segment from The Man Who Came Back.

When Lewis sent Hump's test to Fox in Hollywood, the studio wired him to sign Bogart for $750 a week. If he did well, an option called for his paycheck to go up to $1,000 a week, a virtual fortune at the beginning of the Depression.

Without checking with Mary, Hump signed with Fox. In their apartment that night, he tried to persuade Mary to drop out of The Tavern, a play in which she was starring on Broadway. He asked her to go on the train with him to Los Angeles. She refused, and violently so, leading to one of their biggest fights.

"You want to become a big-time movie star," Mary shouted at him. "Well, I want to become a big-time Broadway star. Bigger than your lez wife, Helen Menken."

"You're not talented enough to carry the train of Helen's gown on stage," he yelled back at her. "She's a bigger star than you'll ever be. I thought you'd jump at the chance to go to Hollywood. That way you could fuck Kenneth one night, me the next."

She stormed out of their apartment and didn't come back all night. Even if she had returned, Hump wouldn't have been there.

After having farewell drinks with Bill and Stuart at Tony's, Hump called Helen Menken and asked her if he could spend the night with her. She agreed, inviting him to come over right away. With his suitcase already packed, he hugged and kissed both Stuart and Bill good-bye, and took a taxi to Helen's apartment.

Waking up the next morning, he smelled breakfast cooking. Helen was freshly made up and had his favorite bacon and eggs on the table. It was Helen, not Mary, who accompanied him to Grand Central where he caught a train that would take him to Chicago and on to Los Angeles.

On the way to Chicago, drinking heavily, he mixed freely with the passengers, and, like a little boy, even showed some doubters his newly signed contract with Fox. After a few drinks, he told one Kansas City cattleman, who'd never heard of Humphrey Bogart, that those Broadway screen writers were right on the mark. "That screen fob, Valentino, is going to be replaced by me. I'm going to become the biggest movie star Hollywood's ever seen."

Humphrey Bogart

CHAPTER THREE

When the train pulled into Los Angeles, photographers rushed to snap pictures of the most famous passengers. In the confusion, Hump was ignored until he saw Kenneth MacKenna rushing to embrace him at the station. “Welcome to Hollywood,” Kenneth said. “Old buddy, old pal.”

Hump embraced him warmly. It was good to see someone from New York.

“My apartment’s waiting for you,” Kenneth said. “I even washed the toilet seat.”

Later, Hump read about the death of Long Lance. In 1932 he was found shot dead in the Arcadia, California home of Anita Baldwin. A pistol was by his side. A statement released to the press said that Long Lance, Chief Buffalo Child, had “absented himself from this harsh world by a pistol shot.”

But despite the “official” report, up until the day of his death, Hump claimed that Baldwin had killed her black lover, “the great Indian impostor.”

En route in a taxi to Kenneth’s apartment, Hump looked for signs of resentment or hostility from Kenneth, finding none. Even though he’d been in love with Mary and had proposed to her first, he seemed to have forgiven Hump for marrying her instead.

Hump was candid with him, admitting that he and Mary were seeing other people and that the marriage had indeed been a mistake. Hump could have let it go at that, but he was the constant provocateur. He confessed Mary’s secret to Kenneth: that she was having an affair with Kenneth’s brother, Jo Mielziner. This news seemed to hurt Kenneth, and the moment Hump told his friend that, he regretted the confession.

Even when they got to the apartment, Kenneth didn’t say much as he showed Hump around. There wasn’t much to see. It was a sparsely furnished one-bedroom apartment—the two men, both lovers of Mary, would be sharing the same bed.

Kenneth was eager to talk about work, not Mary. He said he’d made a film, Men Without Women, co-starring Frank Albertson and Paul Page. The 70-minute film depicted the saga of 14 sailors trapped in a sunken submarine with not enough escape gear to go around. It was directed by John Ford.

“That Ford is one tough bastard,” Kenneth said. “His first words to me were, ‘I run a tight ship. I’m the officer in command and don’t forget it!’” He paused to light a cigarette. “I hope you never work with this Ford asshole. He nearly killed all of us.”

Eager to share news about his own success in films, Hump told Kenneth that Fox Studios had brought him out as a candidate for the leading role in The Man Who Came Back. Kenneth laughed when he heard the news. “You’re the fifth actor they’ve brought out as a candidate for that role. I was the first. None of us is going to get the role. It’s going to Charles Farrell, and he’s still stuck in the methodologies of the Silent Screen. He can’t even talk right.”

Hump felt that Kenneth had seemed a little too gleeful in informing him of this, no doubt paying him back for the revelation about Mary having an affair with his brother Jo.

The next day Hump got up early and reported to work at Fox Studios as a contract player. To his painful regret, he learned that Kenneth was right. Not only was silent screen star Charles Farrell already signed to play the lead in The Man Who Came Back, Hump had been assigned the job of giving him diction lessons.

Farrell became a big star just as the screen learned to talk, and he’d been famously teamed with Janet Gaynor, especially in their big hit in the 1927 version of Seventh Heaven. Ironically, Seventh Heaven had been Helen Menken’s most successful play a few years previously.

Only a year younger than Hump, Charles Farrell was the Brad Pitt of his day, and with his well-developed physique, had been doing half-clothed scenes on film back in the silent era. When Hump met the hunk in 1930, Farrell was decades away from his future role as mayor of Palm Springs, a position he was elected to in the late Forties.

Hump had seen the film, Seventh Heaven, and felt it represented the sappy peak of silent screen romanticism, a gauzy, idyllic romance combined with wholesome vitality. Farrell was wholesome all right, and, in fact, was one of the handsomest actors Hump had ever known. Hump was quickly learning that film actors were required to be more beautiful and photogenic than stage actors.

Even though Hump was forced to work with Charles for six weeks, he took an instant dislike to the star. “I hope you don’t teach me your fucking lisp,” Farrell said. “You sound like a fairy.”

Hump wanted to belt him one, but he feared that Farrell with his athletic physique might flatten him.

On the third day of voice coaching, Farrell became so angry at Hump that he crushed his cigarette out in Hump’s palm. Hump winced in pain and rushed into the bathroom to run cold water over his wound. “You fucking conceited bastard,” Hump said. “Fox contract or no Fox contract, I’m going to lick you for that.”

“I’m sorry,” Farrell said. “I didn’t mean to do it. I’m mad at Raoul Walsh for making me take diction lessons from some lisping New York actor.”

His hand still stinging from the cigarette burn, Hump came out of the bathroom. “You’ve gone too far.”

“I’m really sorry,” Farrell said. “I don’t know what came over me. When I did that cigarette number on you, I wasn’t trying to hurt you. I was standing up for all silent-screen actors who are losing their jobs to Broadway thespians.”

“Listen, I need this job, and I want it to work out for me,” Hump said. “Let’s get on with it. God knows someone should teach you to speak English.”

Farrell said, “I still feel sorry about that cigarette thing. The third lead, the juvenile role, hasn’t been cast yet. I think you’d be ideal. I know you wanted the lead, but third billing in the latest Gaynor/Farrell film ain’t bad.”

“You’d put in a plug for me?”

When Hump got back to Kenneth’s apartment that night, his actor friend was jubilant. “I just got a call from Raoul Walsh. He’s cast me in The Man Who Came Back after all.”

The news stunned Hump. “You mean Farrell’s out of the flick?”

“Not at all,” Kenneth said, his face radiant. “I’ve been cast in the supporting part of the juvenile lead.”

At long last Hump was freed from having to give diction lessons to Farrell. Fox gave him his first major film role, a picture called A Devil With Women, based on a novel, Dust and Sun by Clements Ripley. It was to star Victor McLaglen and Mona Maris.

Charles Farrell

His brother-in-law, Stuart Rose, was on a train to Hollywood, bringing with him a series of plays and novels from the New York office, with recommendations of each of them as a possible film scenario. Kenneth had invited Stuart to stay at his apartment, with Hump agreeing to sleep on the sofa.

When Hump met Stuart at the railway station in Los Angeles, he was eager for news from New York. Stuart, though seemingly glad to see Hump, was not forthcoming with much information, as if deliberately concealing what he knew about what was going on back East.

Stuart and Frances had not visited the Bogarts in weeks and didn't know how they were doing. He'd not seen Mary Philips either. Since coming to Hollywood, Hump had written his wife only two letters, neither of which was answered.

In a taxi en route to Kenneth's apartment, Hump detected that something had gone seriously wrong in Stuart's marriage to his sister, Frances. It wasn't anything that Stuart specifically said. That he said almost nothing about Frances left the lingering suspicion that the marriage was on the rocks.

Finally, Hump decided to press the issue. "God damn it," he said. "I want to know. How are my sisters?"

Anger flashed across Stuart's face. "Okay, if you must know. Catherine has become a hopeless alcoholic and is sleeping with every guy in town. As for Frances, she grows more mentally unstable every month. The last time I talked to your dad about it, he held out the possibility that we might have to put her in an asylum."

"My God," Hump said.

"I don't want to talk about it now with Kenneth," Stuart said. "It's too painful. Before I go back east, I'll let you know everything. I figured you had enough on your mind trying to launch yourself at Fox."

Once upstairs, Kenneth and Stuart warmly embraced. Each man's face lit up at the sight of the other. Up to that point, Hump never knew that Stuart and Kenneth were any more than casual acquaintances. But they related to each other like two best friends bonded at the hip.

As if suddenly aware of Hump in the living room, Stuart turned to Hump. "I bet our boy Kenneth has to fight off the beautiful gals out here in Hollywood."

His eyes downcast, Hump headed for the kitchen to get himself a beer. "Something like that."

He heard the phone ring. When he returned from the kitchen, Kenneth told him that he had to report back to the set of The Man Who Came Back to re-shoot a scene.

After he'd dressed, Kenneth again embraced Stuart warmly and agreed to meet back at the apartment later when all three of them would go out on the town.

After Stuart showered and dressed, he came into the kitchen and joined Hump at the table, accepting a can of beer. “The publicity department at Fox called me, and they want to begin your buildup. Since the scar on your lip can’t be concealed on screen, we’ve got to invent a cover-up story.”

“I got it.” Hump said. “But we don’t want to implicate Belmont in this.”

“No we don’t,” Stuart said. “The Fox publicist I talked to thinks we can claim that you were injured by a flying wooden splinter from a bursting shell when your naval vessel, Leviathan, came under fire from a German U-boat.”

“Neat story,” Hump said. “If anybody checked, though, I saw no action in the war. The Leviathan never came under fire. You’re good at embellishing. Can’t you come up with a better story, one that can’t be checked?”

Stuart excused himself and made some business calls to Fox Studios. When he came back, he said, “I think I’ve got it. We’ll have you stationed in Portsmouth. The Navy had assigned you to take a handcuffed prisoner—let’s call him Johnny Ireland—from the naval station to a military prison forty miles away. Ireland, let’s say, had been arrested in Boston and charged with desertion. At one point as you’re changing trains, let’s have Ireland ask you for a cigarette. As you go to light it for him, Ireland raises up his handcuffed hands, smashing you in the face, damaging your lip. We’ll then say that Ireland made a run for it. With some skin on your upper lip hanging by a thread, you take out a .45 and shoot the man in his left buttock, grounding him. We’ll have some Navy doctor sewing up your lip. Badly.”

“That’s kinda cute,” Hump said. “I like the ring of it. Let’s go for it.”

That fantasy, conceived by Stuart late one afternoon in a small Hollywood apartment, became, in time, a Hollywood legend.

It was Friday night and all of Hollywood seemed to be having a good time except Hump. Mary had said that during their separation he was free to date. So far, he’d met no one.

Joan Blondell

He then remembered that bouncy blonde bombshell, Joan Blondell, with whom he’d appeared in that Ruth Etting flick, Broadway’s Like That. He searched through his papers until he found her number.

Feeling a bit shy, he went to the phone. It was probably a useless gesture. A woman as sexy as Joan probably had guys lining up at her door, especially on a big date night like Friday in Hollywood. “What the hell,” he said, deciding to ring her up anyway.

“Say hello to Miss Dallas, honey,” the expressive face with the pop eyes said to Hump as she pulled up in front of his apartment house to find him already waiting on the sidewalk. “Miss Dallas, Texas, and I’ve got the pictures to prove it.”

“Good to see you out here in Hollywood,” Hump said, leaning in to kiss Joan on the lips. “Here we are: Two stars of tomorrow.”

“Get in, handsome.” Her big smile and big blue eyes lured him into the passenger seat of her secondhand 1927&

Dodge, with its dented fenders and ripped canvas hood tied down with a rope to keep it from flapping. “As you can see, this ain’t no Gloria Swanson limousine,” Joan said.

She drove toward Santa Monica, where she knew a small and charming Italian restaurant where they could dine quietly. On the way there, he brought her up to date on what was happening—or not happening—to his career at Fox.

With a youthful exuberance lighting up her kewpie doll face, she told him about her own career. “I’ve been out here long enough to know that Warners has got me pegged as a brassy, gum-chewing, wisecracking blonde floozy. Better that than no work at all.”

“I hear that back East a lot of us thespian hacks are out of work,” he said. “They call it a depression.”

“Jimmy Cagney and me are going to try to make the world forget its troubles,” she said. “They signed us both to five-year contracts. He gets the big bills. I get the small change. But it’s a job. I’ll take any part they want me to play. The only thing I’m fighting is my name change.”

“I think Joan Blondell is a great name for a movie star,” he said. “What did the Warner friars come up with?”

He burst into laughter and reached for a cigarette, offering her one.

“Don’t laugh too loud,” she said. “You don’t think Fox is going to let you keep Humphrey, do you? Bogart is okay, but Humphrey. I’m sure they’re going to change it to something like Dale or maybe Cary. What about Brad?”

“Hell with that,” he said. “It’s going to be Humphrey Bogart or nothing. Don’t let them rename you Inez Holmes. Warners will take enough from you. Hold onto that name, girl.”

Over dinner he got to know her for the first time, as they’d hardly gotten acquainted in New York. Before the spaghetti was served, he’d learned that her father, Ed Blondell, had been one of the original Katzenjammer Kids. Joan was a true “born in a trunk” show biz woman, reared on vaudeville stages, having made her first appearance at the age of three months when she was brought out before the lights as a “carry-on” in the play, The Greatest Love.

“I grew up on the stage,” she said. “I’ve taken more baths in train station toilets than anyone.”

“How did you get the nickname, Rosebud?” he asked.

“We toured everywhere,” she said. “Ed even took the Blondells to China. My big number was called ‘In a Rosebud Garden of Girls.’ Since then, only my intimates are allowed to call me Rosebud. But before the night is out, I hope you’ll be calling me that.”

She leaned over and planted a light kiss on his lips.

“Before this night is over, I hope your rosebud and I are on intimate terms,” he said.

“Now, now,” she said. “No need to get vulgar. Let’s keep it clean.”

The waiter arrived with the veal parmigiana just as she was telling him how she came to be teamed with Cagney. Hump had told her that he’d known Cagney in New York. “He was a drag queen appearing in cabaret revues back then,” he said.

She seemed startled to hear that, and Hump deliberately didn’t tell her how Cagney was offered a drag role.

“That big cheese, George Kelly, spotted Jimmy and me trying out this dance number,” she said. “He cast us in Maggie the Magnificent. Kelly thought Jimmy looked like a fresh mutt, and I, of course, the blonde hooker with the heart of gold.”

“I’m hearing real good things about the two of you,” he said, reaching for her hand. “I’m just a little bit jealous. Are you guys shacking up?”

“So?” she said, smiling. “Do we really know what Mary Philips is doing in New York tonight?”

“ Touché!”&

After dinner they went for a walk along the Santa Monica pier, noticing the boats rocking from side to side as the water was choppy. He spotted a drunk throwing up over a rail.

Bogart as a second-tier actor romancing Mona Maris in a movie that almost ended his career, A Devil With Women

“I’m living with Kenneth MacKenna,” he said.

“And I’m living with three broads and sharing the rent,” she said. “But there are ways.”

“What do you mean?” he asked.

“Have you ever tried it in the back seat of a broken down Dodge?”

On the Fox lot Hump encountered his director for A Devil with Women, Irving Cummings, for the first time. Hump was startled to learn that if A Devil With Women became a hit, the studio planned to co-star him in an ongoing series of adventure stories with the film’s big-name star, Victor McLaglen. Cummings seemed very excited at this prospect but Hump managed only a faint smile.

The idea of playing second fiddle to McLaglen, or to any other actor, in an ongoing series of B pictures wasn’t part of Hump’s dream before he came to Hollywood. He found the prospect so dismal, and the plot line so inane, that secretly he hoped that the picture would fail. Ironically, if the film had been successful, its success would probably have typecast Hump into the& kind of marginal bit player whose consequences might have haunted him for the rest of his career.

Cummings put his arm around Hump and walked him over to McLaglen’s dressing room. “You might as well meet the star of the picture. If my gut instinct is right, you’ll appear with him in at least twelve films, and I’ll direct every one of them. The McLaglen/Bogart films will be my old-age pension.”

When Cummings introduced Hump to the British actor, McLaglen had just emerged dripping wet from the shower. At that point an aide summoned Cummings to the set, leaving Hump standing alone with a jaybird naked McLaglen.

“Fix yourself a whiskey, kid,” McLaglen said, reaching for a thick towel. “Pour one for me too, letting it fall from the bottle into the glass like a horse pisses."

Hump poured the actor a drink and said, "I'm happy to be working with you Mr. Mack-loff-len."

"That's Muh-clog-len," he said. "Since you can't pronounce my name, just call me Victor."

During their two-hour wait before they were due on the set, Hump got acquainted with this famous and rambunctious star who stood six feet, three inches. His hair was jet-black, and he had a twinkle in his blue-gray eyes. Hump became more comfortable after McLaglen put on his drawers.

The son of the Right Reverend Andrew McLaglen, a Protestant clergyman in South Africa, the young Victor was the eldest of eight brothers. He tried to fight in the Boer War by joining the Life Guards, but the Reverend McLaglen tracked him down and, drawing on his persuasive powers and his political connections, secured his release.

Heading for Canada, he worked only temporarily on a farm devoted mainly to turnips before running off to become a professional prizefighter. That was followed by a tour in circuses, vaudeville shows, and Wild West shows. In these shows, he was billed as a fighter who would take on all comers in the audience. Any young man who could last three rounds with McLaglen was paid $25. He toured with these shows from America to Australia. In Sydney he fought heavyweight champion Jack Johnson, the champ knocking McLaglen out after six rounds.

When World War I broke out, McLaglen signed up with the Irish Fusiliers and was sent to the Middle East. Eventually he became the Provost& Marshal for the city of Baghdad, responsible for the military police.

With his pugnacious nature, he had hoped to resume his boxing career after the war but ended up being cast in the Call of the Road in 1920. From that day on, he became a popular leading man in English silents.

By 1924 he'd been lured to Hollywood to appear in The Beloved Brute. One role followed another, from Women and Diamonds, also in 1924, to Beau Geste in 1926. His own glory came to him when he played Captain Flagg in What Price Glory ? in 1926.

Described as a "British-born Wallace Beery," McLaglen was a two-fisted man of action. Under Raoul Walsh's direction, McLaglen's appearance in the antiwar film was a smash hit at the box office. Audiences delighted in the ribald, gregarious interplay between Flagg and his sergeant, Quirt, as played by Edmund Lowe. Little did Hump know on that first meeting with McLaglen that Raoul Walsh, in about a year, would team McLaglen as Flagg and Edmund Lowe as Sergeant Quirt in a derivative flicker loosely inspired by What Price Glory?, Women of All Nations.

Hump himself would appear in that movie. No longer viewed as a candidate for a costarring role opposite McLaglen, Hump suffered ninth billing in the screen credits.

In A Devil With Women, McLaglen was cast in the role of Jerry Maxton, a soldier-of-fortune at large in a banana republic in Central America. He played a womanizer, romancing "anything in skirts," especially the fair señorita, Rosita Fernandez, as interpreted by Mona Maris.

In contrast, Hump played a supporting role of the clean-cut but wastrelly rich nephew of the country's wealthiest man.

In the film, McLaglen's job involves ending the reign of terror of the notorious bandito, Morloff, who is terrorizing the countryside. McLaglen falls for a woman gun smuggler. Alone with Hump's character, he's lured into the enemy camp, where the two men narrowly escape a firing squad. Maris's character of Rosita provides a refuge for them. The bandits are enticed inside Maris's hacienda where one by one McLaglen, the former prizefighter, knocks them out in a series of one-punch fights.

Director Irving Cummings

At the end of the film, McLaglen is ready to claim Rosita as his girl, but she tells him that her heart belongs to Tom Standish, the role played by Bogart. Hump in his first major film gets the girl in the final reel.

Today it appears amazing that Hump was ever cast in another movie after the release of A Devil with Women. A financial and artistic failure, with a stupid plot and mismatched actors, it should have ended his career. Fox executives wisely decided not to continue pairing McLaglen with Bogart, abandoning forever the notion of continuing their original idea about the ongoing series of adventure films. Later in life Bogie threatened to buy up all copies of the film and have them destroyed.

The director, Irving Cummings, was particularly brutal to the neophyte film actor. "McLaglen is biting off your balls and chewing them up on screen. You come off like some rich little twerp repeating one of your Broadway 'Tennis, anyone?' parts."

"God damn it, that's what the role calls for," Hump protested.

"We've got to come up with some business to make your character real," Cummings said.

The director probably gave Hump the worst advice he could. A stage actor unaware of how the camera picked up the tiniest facial nuance, Hump set out to match the almost constant ear-to-ear grin of the burly looking, battered, and brutish British actor.

The writer, Robert Sklar, in reviewing the film, said it best: "Bogart plays a coltish fool, tossing his head, slapping his knees, and laughing with his mouth open so wide you can almost see his tonsils. He looks like an actor who is uncomfortable not only with his part, but also with his body. He employs a few stock gestures that he repeats again and again: arms awkwardly held in front of his body; then pushing back his jacket; then fists at the belt; then into his pockets; then back to the belt, arms akimbo. Smiles, arch delivery of lines, more smiles."

Mona Maris with her superb deep-throat technique was taking such good care of Hump on the set that he hardly had enough left for Joan Blondell in the evening. Joan wasn't free every night, only when Cagney could escape from the clutches of his "Willie."

Stuart Rose had left Kenneth MacKenna's apartment to return to the Fox New York office and his unhappy bed with Frances. Hump sensed that Kenneth wanted him out of the apartment so he could conduct his private life with greater secrecy.

When the apartment next door became available, Hump eagerly signed a lease and set out to buy some secondhand furniture. He didn't want to purchase anything too expensive, because he feared that his days as a Fox movie star were about to come to an end.

Kenneth was supportive, but Hump sensed that his host was relieved to see him go. When a phone was finally installed in his own name, he called Joan, only to learn that she was seeing Cagney that night.

"Don't worry," she said. "I ran into an old friend of yours from New York. I gave her your number. You definitely won't be lonely tonight."

"Who is it?"

"And spoil the surprise?" she said. "Have fun, duckie." She put down the receiver.

About an hour later, the phone rang. With some reluctance, he picked up the receiver.

"This is Barbara Stanwyck," the voice said. "Could this be the one and only Humphrey Bogart?"

"Miss Stanwyck," he stammered, fearing at first someone was pulling a trick on him. "I'm honored that you'd call me."

"Joan gave me your number," Stanwyck said.

"She said you were an old friend of mine," he said. "We've never met. Of course, I'd be honored to take you out."

"Never met!" Stanwyck said, mocking him. "In Brooklyn where I come from, when a man fucks a woman, he's met her."

"You and I…" Hump was totally confused.

"I'm Ruby Stevens," Stanwyck said. "That hot Jazz Baby from the chorus line. You told me I was the greatest fuck of your life."

No longer the tough-talking little chorus girl from Brooklyn, Ruby Stevens—a.k.a. Barbara Stanwyck—was now a take-charge movie star. Within two hours of her call, Hump found himself dressing in his best suit.

Stanwyck had shown up at the apartment house as the driver of her own sleek new car. "I know you struggling actors drive around in junk-heaps, and I have my image to think of," she'd said on the phone.

When he opened the door and a stunningly beautiful and elegantly dressed Stanwyck was standing there, he searched for some telltale clue in her face that this ravishing beauty, who was aspiring to become the new queen of Hollywood, was the same chorus girl he'd allegedly bedded. He found none but enjoyed it when she hugged him and kissed him succulently on the lips. He was certain that if he'd ever gone to bed with a dame like this, he would never forget her.

In his apartment, he went into the kitchen to make a drink for both of them. Coming back into the living room, she gulped it down. "C'mon, let's go."

On the way downstairs, she claimed she'd met him one night when he'd stumbled drunk from Texas Guinan's place. "I was working the honky-tonk next door."

Barbara Stanwyck in 1930

Something jolted in his brain, but he wasn't certain. He vaguely recalled picking up some thin girl. Unlike the other ladies in the chorus line, she had few curves and her legs were less well-developed than the others. In years to come, no one could accuse Barbara Stanwyck of competing with the gams of Marlene Dietrich or Betty Grable. With her pretty auburn hair and her blue eyes, he had been attracted to her but he still didn't remember bedding her. Fortunately, there was no motorcycle patrolman on duty that night. She made it to the Cock & Bull for dinner in record time.

Before the first course arrived, she announced,& "I'm the biggest star in this whole fucking room."

"You're sure as hell a bigger star than me," he said. "I'm not even a starlet."

They ordered steaks from a handsome blond-haired waiter, who was more beautiful than either of them. With his eyes, he made it clear to each of them that, if asked, he would easily be their bed partner for the night.

Stanwyck gave the most "manly" order. "Just sweep it over the brush fire lightly," she told the waiter.

It was one o'clock before they staggered out of the tavern. Although technically, she was too drunk to drive, Stanwyck took control of the wheels of her car anyway. Without anybody saying anything, it was just assumed that she was heading back to his apartment building.

Hump fumbled drunkenly with the key at his own apartment door. "Once again I'm going to get to fuck Ruby Stevens, and I'm drunk as a skunk for the second time."

"When aren't you drunk?" she said with a touch of hostility in her voice. She took the key from him and opened the door right away, entering the apartment before he did.

When he staggered inside, she slammed the door and locked it. "Let's get one thing straight, Bogart. I've got to warn you. When I take you to bed, I run the fuck."

In Hump's apartment, it was three o'clock in the morning. Stanwyck was right: she ran the fuck. Twice she'd mounted him. Both times he'd lain on his back as she did her gymnastics over him. He wanted more of that kind of loving, although he didn't plan to abandon his missionary position with Joan Blondell.

Stanwyck stood at his soot-streaked window clad only in a brassière, not bloomers, and looked out into the night, although his view opened onto a brick wall. The room was dark. Propped up in bed, he could only make out the glow of her fiery hot cigarette. She smoked like she acted in movies—with gusto.

Until he would meet Joan Crawford, Stanwyck was the most ambitious actress he'd ever known. It made stars he'd appeared with on Broadway, including Mary Boland and Shirley Booth, look like gentle ladies-in-waiting at the court of some dowager queen.

As Bogie would say later in life, "Ruby Stevens was one tough, sassy broad, but she had class. She was hard-boiled yet soft and vulnerable, a free-spirited woman who took no crap from any man. She was also one of the sexiest women I've ever known."

Yet, even though she'd seduce many men in her life, including William Holden, Robert Wagner, Glenn Ford, and

Gary Cooper, Hump suspected that in her heart she was a lesbian. It didn't appear that passion drove her to men. Stanwyck once told him, "I save my real loving, my gentle side, for women.& With men, things immediately revolve around power games."

He bolted up in bed, "My God, I must be sobering up. It's come back to me. I remember you when you were dancing at the Strand."

"Great!" she said in a harsh voice. "So, you aren't a retard. That proves that even as a teenager I can make a lasting impression on a drunk."

"You were one of the Keep Kool Cuties," he said. "You did that number with Johnny Dooley. 'A Room Adjoining a Boudoir,' if memory serves."

"Finally, you know who I am," she said, "even though I had to fuck you twice to jar that pickled brain of yours."

"I miss the Twenties back in New York," he said when she crushed out her cigarette and returned to bed for some pillow talk. "Speakeasies, dirty dances, bootleg hooch, plunging necklines, red hot jazz, flapper clothes."

"And big-dicked New York men," she chimed in. "Don't forget those."

"I didn't know too many of those," he said. "None at all, as a matter of fact."

Since she couldn't sleep, she decided to keep him up too. "It was Mae Clarke who taught me the joy of lesbian love. But, as you also know from tonight, I'm not completely weaned from men either. I don't want to deny myself any pleasure. Too much was denied me as a girl. As a woman, I'll go after what I want. If I want to get fucked by a man, you know I can go for that the way I bagged you tonight. If I want a woman, I'll chase her down and get her. I've already set my sights on that blonde German bitch, Dietrich. Who knows? Marlene, and me might become a thing."

"Invite me over," Hump said. "From what I've seen of Dietrich I'd go for her in a minute. I saw Mae Clarke in Nix on Dames. I'd go for her too. You've got good taste. You and Mae still an item?"

"We still are," Stanwyck said. "Me and Mae saw you on Broadway in It's a Wise Child. She thought you were kinda cute."

"I'll take you up on that invitation for a three-way," he said.

"You've got a date," she said. "Now let's get some God damn sleep. You'll talk my head off and keep me up all night. I've got to look gorgeous on camera tomorrow."

"I heard you taught Farrell how to talk. How about teaching me how to shit? I'm constipated."

Bogie with Spencer Tracy in Up the River

Those unlikely remarks launched a friendship that would last to the grave between Humphrey Bogart and Spencer Tracy.

Hump reached to shake the actor's hand on the Fox set of Up the River. "Call me Hump."

"What kind of nickname is that?" Tracy asked. "From now on and henceforth forever more you'll be known as Bogie."

Stocky, round-faced and not particularly handsome, Tracy was hardly a Hollywood hunk like Farrell. A former Jesuit prep-school student who once wanted to be a priest, the Milwaukee-born actor was Bogie's age and, like Bogie, had joined the Navy in the final days of World War I.

Tracy had captured director John Ford's attention on Broadway playing Killer Mears, a convicted murderer in an all-male cast. Tracy was waiting on Death Row in the play The Last Mile. Ford thought that he'd be ideal in the role of a character called "St. Louis" in the 1930 prison drama, Up the River, opposite the Ziegfeld beauty, Claire Luce.

Bogie was cast as the fourth lead, playing Steve. He'd never met Ford but the director had seen him in a matinee performance of The Skyrocket and had decided Hump would be suitable for a role in Up the River. Ford later told Bogie in Hollywood that, "I know your wife was the star of that play. But you have the talent. Mary Philips is no actress." Hump decided to use Ford's assessment of her talent in his next big fight with his wife.

On the set, Tracy put his arm around Bogie and led him toward his dressing room. "Ford's in the front office this morning. So in the meantime, let's you and me go have some whiskey. You are a drinking man, aren't you?"

He smiled at Tracy. "I've been known to put away a few."

After the first drink, Tracy delivered the bad news. "There may be no picture. Ford is meeting right now with Winfield Sheehan. In case you're that green around here, Sheehan runs this joint."

"What's the matter?" Bogie protested. "We have contracts. They brought us out from New York."

"That doesn't matter to those fuckers," Tracy said. "Sheehan's been looking at the gross over at MGM on the The Big House."

"I saw it," Bogie said. "Great picture. Bob Montgomery and Wallace Beery did a fine job."

"Don't forget my old pal, Chester Morris," Tracy said. "He was in it too. Trouble is, they did too fine a job. Sheehan knows our script isn't half as good. Reviewers would unfavorably compare our picture with The Big House. Also, Sheehan has seen screen tests of both of us. And he doesn't want us in the picture, even if he decides to go ahead with it."

"Fuck this!" Bogie said. "I should go back to New York. I'm spinning my wheels out here in this palm pasture."

"Have another drink," Tracy said.

In spite of the bad news he reported, Bogie relaxed in Tracy's presence. The actor had a soothing effect on him. To Bogie, he seemed like a sports loving man's man, with a big head and a boar neck. It was Tracy's well-modulated voice that drew Bogie to him.

As the morning wore on and Ford still hadn't shown up, Tracy and Bogie used the opportunity to drink more whiskey and to get to know each other. Each actor seemed fascinated by the other. There was a restlessness—even a self-destructiveness—about Tracy that intrigued Bogie. He would later claim, "Spence carried around a lot of that Catholic guilt crap."

At that stage in their friendship, Bogie didn't have a clue as to what Tracy had to feel guilt about, but he was determined to find out. Surely it wasn't something as simple as cheating on your wife. All men in Hollywood did that. With all the temptation out here, how could they resist?

Earlier he'd learned that Tracy had been married to a minor Broadway actress, Louise Treadwell, for seven years. "It was love at first sight," Tracy said. Bogie also learned that she'd given birth to a deaf son named John. "His deafness makes me suffer a lot," Tracy said. "Somehow I blame myself. Good, healthy, Irish boy sperm isn't supposed to create a child with birth defects."

"It's not your fault," Bogie assured him as he accepted another whiskey. He feared that if they kept drinking like this, and Ford did show up, having saved the picture from Sheehan, neither of them would be sober enough to appear on camera.

“I was the terror of Milwaukee,” Tracy said. “A tough Irish kid. I got into at least three fistfights a day, taking on the Sauerkrauts, the Pollack sausages, and the Dago pizza pies. I was in and out of fifteen—make that eighteen—different schools before I finished the eighth grade.”

“You got me beat on that count,” Bogie said. “But I was kicked out of Andover. My father wanted me to be a doctor.”

“Welcome to the club,” Tracy said. “My old man wanted me to be a priest. I still think about it. I used to dream of myself as Monsignor Tracy, Cardinal Tracy, Bishop Tracy. Get this: Archbishop Tracy. Every time I think of what I might have been, I get goose bumps. Of course, I could never have been celibate. Not me. If there’s a whorehouse in town, I quickly become the best customer.”

Ironically, although Tracy obviously never became a priest, he ended up playing one in four memorable performances— San Francisco in 1936 with Clark Gable; Boy’s Town in 1938, Men of Boy’s& Town in 1941, and a final appearance, The Devil at Four O’Clock in 1961.

Spencer Tracy

“Before I agreed to do this picture with you, I saw a rough cut of A Devil With Women,” Tracy said. “I know you used to do some stupid juvenile roles on Broadway. But I never caught your ‘Tennis, anyone?’ act. Of course, that fascist, McLaglen, steals the picture from you and that cocksucker, Mona Maris. You bullshit your way through the film. One hammy disguise after another. Some clowns call that acting. I don’t. If our damn flick ever gets made, watch how I do it. Don’t let the camera see you running around like a chicken with its head cut off. Underplay. That’s the way to do it.”

As insulted as he was by Tracy’s advice, Bogie listened to it. He’d never overplay a character again. “There’s at least one thing I like about the script. I get the girl.”

“So you do,” Tracy said, pouring himself another drink. “On the screen you do. In real life, I’ve already got Claire. She’s about to show up here any minute. The moment I introduce the two of you, I want you to get the hell out of here. I’m horny this morning, and that Ziegfeld cutie is one mighty fine piece of tail.”

As if on cue, there was a knock on the door. Tracy signaled Bogie to open it.

Standing on the stoop was a stunningly attractive woman, Claire Luce. He recognized her from her photographs. “Can a lady darken these chambers? Or is it strictly a stag party?”

“Come on in. I’m Humphrey Bogart.”

“Call him Bogie,” Tracy chimed in. “Everybody does.”

Bogie stepped back to make way for her.

“Haul that cute ass over here,” Tracy said to Luce. “Give your daddy a kiss. I’m in the mood for a big, wet, sloppy one.”

Excusing himself, Bogie left the dressing room, shutting the door tightly behind him. Walking toward the set, he encountered for the first time an angry John Ford, the blood vessels on his head looking as if they were about to pop.

“I’ve just got back from the front office,” John Ford said to Bogie. “C’mon, let’s go for a drive. I’ve got to clear my head.”

As Bogie headed for the studio parking lot with the director, Ford didn’t say a word but looked like doom and gloom had cascaded down around him.& Bogie suspected that he and Tracy had been fired from the cast and had been replaced with two other actors.

Director John Ford

“Get in,” Ford commanded when they reached his car. He drove out of the studio and headed up into the hills. Back in those relatively traffic-free days, you could actually drive in Los Angeles.

As Ford floored the accelerator and took dangerous curves, almost missing them, Bogie was terrified, his eyes popping out almost as much as Joan Blondell’s. Ford kept his eyes glued on the curvy highway. Bogie wondered if Sheehan had fired him too. He even flashed on the possibility that he was playing a secondary role in a suicide run, with Ford planning to take the car, Bogie, and himself over the mountain. That would be like a& real life version of Thelma and Louise decades before that film was eventually shot.

“For God’s sake, man, look out!” Bogie shouted at him. He figured he didn’t want to plunge to his death without putting up some protest.

Ford braked the car suddenly, coming to an abrupt stop at a belvedere. When Bogie got out of the car, he noticed that if Ford hadn’t applied that brake in time he would indeed have destroyed the car. Ford had allowed himself only a foot of land. Bogie looked back at him. “I’d call that a close shave.”

“I’m a bit of a daredevil when it comes to driving,” Ford said.

“Could have fooled me,” Bogie said, still shaken from the experience. He figured that it would be safer to walk back down that mountain than to get into the car again.

Ford got out of the car and stood next to a still-unnerved Bogie. “I always come up here to clear my head. It’s the most beautiful view in Los Angeles.”

This was the first time Bogie had looked at the view. It was indeed panoramic. The director had a keen eye for locale.

“I’ve got a cast and crew waiting back at Fox, but no script,” Ford said.

“But I’ve read the script,” Bogie said.

“It’s been junked,” Ford said, sucking in the fresh morning air. “Fox Studios has decided that we can’t compete with The Big House. I’ve been ordered to turn our film into a prison comedy.”

“That’s a novel idea,” Bogie said.

“Get this,” Ford said. “I start shooting tomorrow morning.”

“Without a script?” Bogie asked, dumbfounded.

“I’ll stay up late every night and come into the studio with enough pages written to shoot for the day,” Ford said. “The God damn film is only ninety minutes long. I can do it. You’ll see.”

“From what I’ve read, it’s a pretty grim story to turn into a comedy,” Bogie said.

“In its present shape, it’s a piece of junk,” Ford said, “but I can convert it into a convict comedy. Slapstick and sentiment, that’s the way to go. Instead of hardened criminals, you guys can just be naughty boys. It’ll be artlessly disarming.”

Bogie wasn’t convinced.

“Right now I’m writing a scene in my head,” Ford said. “In the new version some prisoners stage a theatrical production for the chain gang. In this all-male cast, some of the prisoners can dress in drag. I’ll get some discarded gowns from Mae West. Right now I can see Tracy and that actor, Warren Hymer—or is it Hymen?—dressing up like women. They’ll make a break for it dressed like gals. Run off to New England to thwart the evil villain’s plan. When that mission is accomplished, they’ll voluntarily come back to prison and turn themselves in, in time to win the annual baseball game.”

“Sounds like a laugh riot,” Bogie said.

“Let’s go for it,” Ford said. “But first I’ve got to ask you a question. Do you have a pair of balls on you?”

“I’d call them that,” Bogie said, “although I’m sure there are a lot of guys in Hollywood with a bigger pair.”

“What I mean is, do you like to fuck women?” Ford said. “Most of those Broadway sissies they send over from New York, guys like Kenneth MacKenna, had rather water the pansies in their garden than fuck women.”

“I do my share of fucking,” Bogie said. “Maybe more than most men.”

“I’m glad to hear it,” Ford said. “I’m taking you to Louise’s. It’s the best little whorehouse in the West. All the Hollywood stars go there. Louise has her pick of the most beautiful women in America. All the cute little milkmaids who get off the train here wanting to be stars end up as whores, and the best of them end up with Louise.”

“I could always use a good piece of ass,” Bogie said.

“Get in the car,” Ford said. “We’re off.”

Committing his life into Ford’s hands once again, Bogie reluctantly got in. Ford drove even worse and more recklessly down the mountain than he did going up it. But, finally, they arrived alive at Louise’s, a surprisingly elegant bordello.

Louise appeared to be over fifty but it was obvious that she’d been a beauty in her day. She kissed Ford on the mouth. “John and I go way back,” she said. “He’s one cowboy who sure knows how to take care of a lady.” She paused. “If memory serves.”

“Meet Humphrey Bogart,” Ford said. “He’s an actor out of New York. Who knows? He might become one of your best customers.”

“I hope so,” she said, looking Bogie up and down. “I’d take you on for free.”

“He wants something young and cute today, dearie,” Ford interjected.

“Maybe some other time,” Bogie said, kissing the aging madam on the cheek.

“Okay, boys,” she said. “I hope you like blondes, though. Last night I had a large group of clients from Argentina. Those horny bastards wanted only blondes. I had to order every gal in my joint to dye her hair both on top and down below.”

Dawn Night, aka
Glenda Farrell

“Blondes will be just fine,” Ford said.

Within thirty minutes, Bogie found himself entering a small cubicle of a room. It was dimly lit. But there was enough illumination to accentuate the curves of a very voluptuous blonde lying nude on the bed, wearing only a pair of black stockings and emerald-green high heels. “Come on in, good looking, and lock the door.”

“I think I’ve died and gone to heaven,” Bogie said, feasting his eyes on her luscious body.

She introduced herself as Dawn Night.

“That sounds like a real good name,” he said, as he unbuckled his trousers.

After their lovemaking, she became confidential. “My name is not really Dawn Night,” she confessed. “I just made that one up. I’m keeping my real name a secret for screen billing. I’m going to become the biggest female star ever to set foot in Hollywood.”

He’d certainly heard that line a lot from his previous encounters with chorus gals, except in New York the women always said “Broadway” instead of “Hollywood.” “What’s your real name? I won’t tell. That way, when I see your name up on the marquee, I’ll know to go in to see your picture.”

“Okay.” She giggled again. “If you promise not to tell.”

“Trust me, I won’t tell.”

“Not so fast,” she said. “Are you sure I can trust you? I mean, you’re an actor and everything.”

“Sure I know how to keep my lip zipped,” Bogie said. “I sorta dig you, and I’d like to see you again.”

“But not in this place. I won’t be working here much longer. I’ve appeared on Broadway. I’m just picking up some quick cash. I’m not really a whore.”

“Coming from some other gal I’d doubt that. But I believe you.”

“I’ve already made one film,” she said. “It was just a small part and I went unbilled. But I’ve got this great friend. She’s an actress and she’s gonna be real big. She’s helping me break into Hollywood.”

“What’s your friend’s name?” he asked. “Maybe I’ve heard of her.”

He was startled but said nothing, masking his shock.

“Only the other day, Mervyn LeRoy was in here with me,” she said. “You know, the director? He’s promised to put me in a big gangster film. He said it’s going to be the biggest film of the year. It’s going to star Edward G. Robinson, and it’s going to be called Little Caesar. Robinson is going to play Rico Bandello, a two-bit hoodlum. Even if he is a star, you can have Robinson. When LeRoy casts me in the movie, I’m going to chase after the co-star.

That handsome hunk, Doug Fairbanks Jr., is going to play Tony Massara, Rico's best friend. Before the filming is over, I'm going to take Doug boy away from that whore, Joan Crawford."

"I think a lot of women—maybe a lot of men, too—would like to take that stud away from Crawford. Now tell me your name."

"Glenda Farrell," she blurted out. "Remember that name. Me and you will no doubt appear in some pictures together. You see, I'm going to become Queen of Warner Brothers."

On the set of Up the River that morning, Bogie sat having bitter black coffee with his co-star, Claire Luce. Even though she was Tracy's temporary mistress, Bogie was plotting to see if he could take Luce away from his newly acquired friend. It was the beginning of a one-upmanship that would last until Bogie's death.

In the film, Luce played "Judy," an innocent young girl who was framed by a crooked stock salesman and sent "up the river."

Many chroniclers of Bogie's life have confused Claire Luce with Clare Boothe Luce, (1903-87), the talented, wealthy, beautiful, and controversial New Yorker, best remembered as a congresswoman (1942-46) and playwright who penned The Women. She was the first female American ambassador when Dwight Eisenhower appointed her to her post in Italy in 1952. The "Luce" was added to her name when she married magazine tycoon, Henry R. Luce, of Time-Life-Fortune.

A much more modest achiever, Claire Luce, the actress sitting across from Bogie, launched herself as a cigarette girl in Rochester, New York, and worked her way to Broadway as a chorus girl. She ended up having an affair with Flo Ziegfeld who cast her in The Follies of 1927.

As they sat idly by, Luce told Bogie that she'd fallen madly in love with Tracy and that he had promised to divorce his wife and marry her. Even though Bogie had just launched his friendship with the actor, he suspected that Tracy had used the same line on many a chorus gal.

From where he sat talking to Luce, Bogie spotted John Ford striding onto the set. Bogie would later claim that John Wayne learned his distinctive walk on screen by imitating John Ford.

Ford looked angry and hung over, as he'd been up all night trying to turn "this fucker of a prison drama into a God damn comedy."

Both Bogie and Luce were relieved to learn that they wouldn't have to face Ford's ire that day. Ford's assistant, Tom Hubbard, had told them that they weren't scheduled to go on camera. Nevertheless, Hubbard said that they had to appear at the Fox studio early every morning throughout the entire shoot in case Ford decided to use them.

Ziegfeld's "Folly"
Claire Luce with Humphrey Bogart

"As long as I get paid," Bogie said.

After a brief conference with Ford, Hubbard approached Bogie and Luce with a concerned look on his face. Always the curious one, Bogie wanted to know what was the matter. Hubbard called Bogie aside, as he didn't want to speak in front of Luce.

“The first scene involves Tracy,” Hubbard said, once he was out of earshot of Luce. “And he hasn’t shown up this morning. We know where he lives. The front office has a phone number for him. The phone rings off the wall. Ford said that if Tracy doesn’t& show up on the set by three o’clock at the latest, he’s casting Jimmy Cagney in the part. It seems that Cagney is free for two weeks and can play the role.”

“God damn it,” Bogie said. “This is Spence’s first starring role in a feature film. If he fucks this up, he’s finished in Hollywood. Word will spread like wildfire. I know he drinks a lot.”

“Would you believe that if the Pacific Ocean were alcohol, Spence would have it drained dry in a weekend?”

“Maybe I’d better try to find him,” Bogie responded.

Back in those days of lax security, all one had to do was arrive at a hotel’s reception desk, ask for a patron’s room number, take the elevator upstairs, and knock on the door. That is exactly what Bogie did when he arrived in the lobby of the Hollywood Plaza.

At room 401, Bogie pounded on the door. At first there was no answer. He pounded again. Finally, the door was opened just a bit as it was still bolted to a link chain.

“I’m Humphrey Bogart,” he said. “I’ve got to get in touch with Spencer Tracy. I’ve come over from Fox.”

Although he couldn’t see too well, it sounded like a young man behind the door. “Oh,” he said. “I’ve heard of you. You’re co-starring with Spence in his movie.”

“Let me in,” Bogie demanded in his most forceful voice.

“I guess it’s okay,” the young man said.

“I’m his friend,” Bogie said. “Here to help him.”

The young man unfastened the latch and let Bogie into the dark room. The light switch came on. Before Bogie stood one of the most beautiful young men he’d ever seen in his life. He was definitely movie star material himself. He wore only a pair of white boxer shorts, revealing his trim athletic build.

“I’m Lew Ayres,” the semi-nude man said. Suddenly, Bogie realized who this boyishly handsome man was. Everyone in Hollywood was talking about his success in the role of Paul Baumer in All Quiet on the Western Front, Lewis Milestone’s World War I masterpiece based on Erich Maria Remarque’s novel detailing the horrors of war and its devastating effect on fighting men.

Lew Ayres

There was talk that the part, his third appearance on camera, might win him the Academy Award for poignantly portraying a young schoolboy thrown into the frenzy of war. In the film he was supposed to be bewildered by his loss of innocence. Bogie wondered how innocent Ayres could possibly be after a night with Tracy.

Without knowing the details, the evidence against Tracy was enough to convict. His new friend was a bisexual. Like all the great “womanizers” of Hollywood that Bogie knew or would know& in the future, from George Raft to Errol Flynn, these Romeos seemed to go for boys on the side.

Ayres headed across the suite’s living room and put on his trousers and an undershirt. Barefoot, he came back over to Bogie. “Spence was doing fine last night,” he said, “but as the night wore on, he drank more and more. He’s in the bedroom there sprawled out totally drunk. I've been unable to get him up to go to work. I know he's due on Ford's set."

Bogie crossed the living room and looked into the small, almost alcove-like bedroom. There with the morning light streaming in, Spence lay sprawled nude near the edge of the bed, his mouth open. He was breathing heavily and his head fell over the edge of the mattress and seemed to hang in midair.

"Lew, my good man," Bogie said, turning around to confront Ayres. "Call room service for a big pot of strong black coffee. This here movie star, Mr. Spencer Tracy, and his juvenile lead are heading for the shower. I'm going to wake this drunken sod up if it kills me."

"You think you can?" a hesitant Ayres asked. "I've tried everything already."

"It won't be just the cold shower and the bitter black coffee," Bogie said. "My father's a doctor in New York. I drink a lot myself, and I've stumbled in at five o'clock in the morning when I was due somewhere at eight-thirty. Dad has these pills."

"What kind of pills?" Ayres asked.

"You know I'm not sure they have a name, and I have no idea what's in them. All I know is that when I force Spence here to swallow two of these little mother-fuckers, we're going to have him bouncing on John Ford's set with more energy than those two dancing fools, George Raft and Jimmy Cagney, combined."

When Bogie finally returned to his dressing room after a lengthy ordeal associated with awkening Tracy and hauling him back, in time for his scene, to the set, he spotted Ford's assistant walking purposefully toward him. "The front office has got another script for you," Hubbard said. "You're to start work as soon as Ford is finished with you."

Body and Soul
Humphrey Bogart with Charles Farrell

"What picture?" Bogie asked.

"The thing is called Body and Soul."

"Who's got the lead?" Bogie asked. "And what's my billing?"

"You'll get fourth billing," Hubbard said. "The star is Charles Farrell."

Long before Vanity Fair "outed" Spencer Tracy in the post-millennium, and years before his homosexual dalliances became privately known to the likes of such gossip mavens as Hedda Hopper and Louella Parsons, Bogie was privy to his close friend's darkest secrets.

After the first day's shoot of Up the River, Tracy and Ayres invited Bogie to their suite for drinks, to be followed by dinner. From the first, Bogie took an enlightened view about their relationship. He didn't exactly encourage it but he didn't condemn it either. "I say if it feels good, go for it," Bogie told both men as he downed some of their whiskey. "It's no one's God damn business but your own."

"But there's the matter of my faith, my beliefs," Ayres protested. "I don't even like to look myself in the mirror in the morning."

“That’s a crock of ….” Bogie hesitated, searching for a word. He detested the use of the word “shit.” “That’s bull. Frankly, you guys are no different from anybody else I’ve met in Hollywood. Take myself, for instance. Nobody likes a broad better than I do. I’ve even had thoughts about taking Claire Luce from you.” He smiled at Tracy to indicate he wasn’t really serious. “But I’ve done some weird stuff on occasion. Name an actor on Broadway or in Hollywood who hasn’t.”

Tracy leaned back, his face and demeanor radiating calm in spite of any inner turmoil. “Bogie, unless you were born Catholic, unless you seriously wanted to be a priest, you can’t understand Catholic guilt.”

“Whatever the fuck that is,” Bogie said.

“I understand it,” the youthful Ayres chimed in. “It’s our faith that drew me to Spence. We actually met in church, not some bar.”

Bogie looked at Ayres with that keen eye he used to appraise someone he was meeting for the first time. “I must say, Spence old boy, you sure know how to pick ‘em. Lew here is prettier than most gals I know. Put some lipstick on him and a dress and I’d go for him myself.”

“All of this seems like one big joke to you,” Ayres said, confronting him.

“I didn’t mean to get your feathers ruffled,” Bogie said. “But I wish you guys would lighten up. I’m just trying to be a supportive friend to the both of you.”

Although Bogie’s friendship with Tracy would remain steadfast, even when they were fighting over a potential screen billing in a co-starring venture that never happened, or when they were up for the same coveted role, their love for each other never wavered, jealousy or not.

It was two weeks later on the set of his next picture for Fox, Body and Soul, that the director, Alfred Santell, introduced him to the film’s two leading ladies, each of them gorgeous, charming, and at least in his opinion, available.

They were Elissa Landi and Myrna Loy. He didn’t know which woman to look at first: the screen vamp Myrna Loy or the scion of the Habsburg Empire, Elissa Landi. The problem was solved for him, when Santell called Loy to the set for a scene with the picture’s star, Charles Farrell. Bogie hoped that Farrell would remember some of his speech training, but seriously doubted if he would.

Landi, in Loy’s absence, wanted to discuss the characters they’d be playing, Bogie was struck by her regal bearing, cultured voice, and aristocratic beauty.

Rumor had it that Landi was the secret granddaughter of “Sissi,” the Empress Elizabeth of Austria, the beautiful but strong-willed Bavarian-born wife of Emperor Franz Josef, who presided over the final years of the Austro-Hungarian empire.

“How should you be addressed?” Bogie asked, being a little provocative with her because he didn’t believe in aristocratic titles.

Landi took him seriously. “Countess would be fine.” As he was to learn later, the actress wasn’t a real countess. She’d just assumed the title from her mother’s second marriage to an Italian nobleman, Count Carlo Zanardi-Landi.

Known for having made a number of British silent films, Landi came to the attention of Fox when she’d appeared on Broadway in A Farewell to Arms.

“Just between you and me, I think this flicker we’re making is nothing but an old-fashioned hack melodrama,” Landi said. In addition to being an actress, Landi was also an acute critic and would go on to write several novels. Together, they tried to make sense out of some dumb, ill-conceived plot by Jules Furthman based on an unproduced and unpublished play called Squadron.

After reading the script, another tiresome piece about “The Great War,”& Bogie told Landi, “At least I know why the play was never staged."

"As I read it, I'm thought to be this German spy named Pom-Pom, but it turns out that Myrna is the real German spy."

"It doesn't really matter," he said. "I understand that Fox is going to open it with a Mickey Mouse cartoon, a Fox Movietone, even a Hearst Metrotone newsreel, and a Mickey Mouse stage act. After all that, no one will notice what a stinker it really is."

"In the script, you're married to me for only four days before sailing, always wearing your aviator uniform, to France, where you pursue other women," Landi said. "If you were married to me in real life, you'd get such a workout you'd have no time for other women."

"Promises, promises," he said. "Since we're married—it says so right here in the& script—I guess that gives me conjugal rights."

"Perhaps," she said enigmatically. "You're rather cute." Getting up, she kissed him and excused herself, heading for her dressing room.

Later, when Farrell invited Bogie to lunch in the Fox commissary, Bogie accepted reluctantly and only because the actor was the star of the picture. There was no mention that Farrell had double-crossed him and pushed Kenneth for the juvenile lead in The Man Who Came Back. Perhaps Farrell had forgotten all about it.

As he was leaving Farrell's table, Bogie spotted Elissa Landi coming toward him. "I was told I could find you here," she said. "At 7:30 tonight, I'm giving a dinner party. Black tie. There's been a last-minute cancellation from Chaplin. Please, please fill in for him. I have to have another man to make my dinner party work. Would you pick up Myrna Loy?"

"Sure," he said, wondering where he could come up with a tuxedo on such short notice. "I didn't have anything planned for tonight."

She gave him addresses and some instructions, then hurried off. He was a bit excited to be attending his first formal dinner party in Hollywood.

After renting a well-worn tux for three dollars on Hollywood Boulevard, he drove back to his apartment house.

As Bogie drove to pick up Loy to take her to Landi's formal dinner, he fantasized about all the big names who'd be there. Loy was beautifully dressed and waiting out on her front porch when Bogie pulled up at her house. She scanned the sky. "I think it's going to rain tonight."

"That wasn't the forecast," he said.

Noting an ominous cloud rising in the distance, she said, "We Montana belles don't need a radio forecast to tell us when a storm is coming."

In her black velvet gown, she looked lovelier than she did in the movies where she was most often cast as an Asian vamp. She was dressed with a high collar, although he suspected that most of the other women at the dinner would be in plunging décolletage.

Noting that he was observing her high-button neckline, she said. “I have to wear this. The other night at a party, Clark Gable and his wife, Ria, offered me a ride home. Clark walked me to my door. As I was fumbling for my key, he gave me a monkey bite. His teeth marks are still on me. Our director, Santell, was furious when he saw that I had been branded like a Montana cow. Naturally, my first appearance on screen called for me to appear in a low-cut gown.”

“I hear that when Gable walks into a room,” Bogie said, “It isn’t a question of if a woman will go to bed with him. It’s a question of which one he’ll choose for the night.”

“Something like that,” she said.

As he drove toward Landi’s home, he said, “I’m real honored that you’re going out with me. If I can believe everything that Louella Parsons writes, I’ll be part of a long lineup of distinguished beaux. Let me see. Rudolph Valentino, John Barrymore, Gary Cooper.”

“I know all those men, of course, but there’s no romance,” she said.

“I heard that you and Cooper grew up on the same street together back in Helena,” he said.

“We did indeed.”

“Surely you must have played doctor,” he said.

“Not that,” she said. “But I did sneak off with him one late afternoon into the cellar at our house. We didn’t conduct any medical examination, however. We were looking for Mother’s last jar of apple jelly.”

As he drove and talked to her, he found that she was a witty, intelligent, and also beautiful woman. If anything, directors hid her true beauty on the screen with gaudy makeup, usually trying to turn her into an Oriental temptress.

“You look as American as blueberry pie,” he said. “Why do they always make you Chinese?”

“Beats me,” she said. “I’m just a Montana cowgal. Up against Anna May Wong in that flick, The Crimson City, I looked about as Chinese as Raggedy Ann. I’ve played Burmese, Chinese, a couple of Tijuana vamps, an islander from the South Pacific, and a hot-blooded Creole. The beat goes on. Darryl Zanuck just can’t believe that I can play a straight part, and I don’t know why.”

As he pulled into the driveway of Landi’s home, he was amazed at the parade of big and expensive black cars. His battered vehicle looked pathetic. Loy seemed unconcerned with such trivia. She was not a woman of pretensions.

In the golden light from Landi’s porch, he was awed by Loy’s copper-haired beauty and her delicate, porcelain-white skin. “Once we get inside that party, we’ll probably have no more chance to talk,” she said in her marvelous voice, which sounded like a hoarse flute.

Her sleek, sassy nose captured his attention. He’d never seen a nose like that, and he thought it was the cutest thing. Impulsively he leaned over and kissed her on the nose.

Little could he have known that in just a few short years, hordes of women across America would be going to the offices of plastic surgeons with pictures of the star, demanding that a “Myrna Loy nose” be carved for them as well.

The party was in full swing when Bogie escorted Loy into the foyer where Landi was waiting to give each of them a kiss on their lips and welcome them to her home. She wore a stunning example of Parisian haute couture, an emerald-colored silk gown with a large emerald necklace, no doubt looted from the royal treasury of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

As predicted, Loy was swept away, talking to various people she knew. The graceful hostess, Landi introduced Bogie to a circle of her friends clustered around William Randolph Hearst and his mistress, Marion Davies. In front of the other guests, Hearst chastised Marion for ordering another drink. She ignored his command.

The press tycoon returned to relating stories about his annual tour of European spas and was telling the group that while in Germany he'd attacked the Treaty of Versailles in an interview he gave to the Frankfurter Zeitung. "I claimed it subjected the Teutonic peoples to the domination of non-German European powers, especially France. If there is one country I loathe above all others, it's France." He looked cautiously around the room. "I hope there are no Frenchman here tonight."

As Bogie made eyes at Davies and the blonde courtesan/actress winked at him, Hearst was reporting on yet another trip he'd made.

Finding Hearst a little too pompous for his tastes, Bogie puckered his mouth in a false kiss to Marion, but only when the media baron wasn't looking.

Some members of the English colony living in Hollywood were at the party. One of them was Basil Rathbone, whom Bogie had met during his appearance with Helen in the lesbian play, The Captive.

The two actors reflected briefly, with a tinge of bitterness, on how the New York police had shut down this play because of its strong lesbian theme. "God, if we'd been allowed to continue in that play, we would have been a cause célèbre all over America. Every paper in the country featured our predicament. We would have been sold out for months."

"Helen certainly did a lot for the lesbians of America," Bogie said. "The last I heard, Helen was still getting letters from the Sappho crowd from everywhere. Young women still send her slave bracelets. And most ironic of all— and probably missing the point completely— the deans of several women's colleges wrote thanking her for warning their students about 'the dangers of a reprehensible attachment.'"

"I was the one who suggested that Helen wear that ghastly white makeup," Rathbone said. "I thought it would convey the severe physical toll a woman must pay for having such 'perverse' thoughts about other women."

Both men laughed at that. "And the violets?" Bogie asked. "Throughout the play, we never saw Helen's pursuer, Madame d'Aiguines. But Helen's character was always getting nosegays of violets."

"We did some research on that," Rathbone said. "Sappho wrote about 'diadems of violets' on the Isle of Lesbos in the Seventh Century B.C."

"I hear The Captive and those damn violets have started a fad," Bogie said. "It's the fashion now for women in New York and Hollywood – I'm assuming there are no lesbians in the Middle West – to send violets to each other as a sign of their love." To his dismay, Bogie suddenly spotted the approach of an English actor he'd rather avoid.

Bogie was a bit chilly when introduced a second time to Ronald Colman,& remembering with bitterness how his screen test was compared unfavorably to that of the English actor's when they both competed for the male lead opposite Lillian Gish in The White Sister.

The talk was of the latest news about George Bernard Shaw, Cornelia Otis Skinner, Grace Moore, Irene Castle, Elsa Maxwell, and Daisy Fellowes. Knowing none of these people, except by their reputation, Bogie grew bored and wandered off.

In a city famed for grand entrances, the latest arriving guest was creating a sensation. All eyes in the room focused on the foyer. Dressed in a man's tuxedo, a blonde goddess stood under Landi's Viennese crystal chandelier, being welcomed by Landi, who kissed her on the mouth.

Right then and there Bogie decided that he was going to divorce Mary and propose marriage to this sultry, alluring Venus de Milo. Her escort was some foreign-looking man, perhaps German.

Bogie's fantasy woman was heading across the room in his direction. He virtually stood in her pathway.

Coming up only two feet from him, she smelled of the most exotic perfume. The scent wasn't overpowering but had great subtlety, a sensation for the nostrils.

He was convinced that her smile was the most provocative since the dawn of time.

"I'm told that God has a talent for creating exceptional women," he said, staring into eyes bluer than any alpine lake on a summer day.

"H-e-l-l-o," she said in her German-accented voice. "You are in my way. Do I have to kiss you or fuck you to make you move?"

"For now, I'll settle for a kiss," he said, standing up to her with more bravado than he actually possessed. His knees were shaking.

"Your wish is granted," she said, leaning in to give him a quick kiss on the lips. The four wettest lips in Hollywood, male and female, exchanged body fluids. He felt the flicker of her tongue. "Since the entire room is watching, including my very jealous director, that is all for now. Catch me later." She nodded her head at some people she knew across the big room and headed in their direction.

Marlene Dietrich

As he passed by, Josef von Sternberg glared at Bogie. Bogie felt that he'd just blown his chance to get cast opposite the star in any of her future movies.

Before stepping down into the sunken living room, she paused and looked back at him. "Not bad," she said, her tongue darting out ever so slightly as if to taste his kiss, which still lingered on her lips.& "What is your name?"

"Humphrey Bogart," he said.

"Your studio will change that," she predicted. "And, of course, you know who I am. Marlene Dietrich. I could be no one else but me."

He watched her go, as von Sternberg followed. Bogie's heart was beating faster, as he'd just fallen in love. He feared that he'd have to join a long line of suitors, both male and female, forming on her left and right.

At 1pm on the afternoon of the following day, seated with Myrna Loy and his hostess of the night before, Bogie ordered a plate of ham and eggs in the Fox commissary. Both Loy and Bogie had thanked Landi profusely for inviting them to her dinner party the previous evening.

He'd learned that Landi was an avid equestrian. He told her that "second to sailing," he preferred horseback riding better than anything. After saying that, he smiled awkwardly, looking first at Landi, then at Loy, deciding they were two of the most beautiful women in Hollywood. "Of course, there is something I like even better than horseback riding or sailing."

Both women laughed. Loy affectionately stroked his cheek. It was just a flash, and it was quickly concealed, but Landi shot Loy a look that Bogie definitely interpreted as jealousy.

For the second time that morning, he was flattered by a female appraisal of him. Not knowing which woman to ask out first, the issue was solved when Loy went to the powder room to take the shine off Hollywood's cutest nose. After she'd gone, Landi said, "I'm going riding in the morning. If you want to drop by my house at six o'clock, we'll head over to the stables."

"That's a bit early," he said, smiling at her, his eyes twinkling in anticipation, "but I'll be there. Maybe a little hung over. Bleary-eyed or not, I'm ready to race you."

She got up from the table to report back to the set. "You'll find, Mr. Bogart, that your horse can easily overtake mine."

Bogie spotted Loy returning from the powder room. This woman of quick wit showed her acute sensitivity when she looked first at Landi, then at him. "I'm afraid I might have intruded on something."

High in the Hollywood Hills, Bogie and Landi brought their horses to rest at a shady spot beside a stream. It was one of those idyllic places that makes a New Yorker glad that he's moved to the West Coast.

Later, they were to learn from a stable hand that they'd stopped at the same spot where the Sheik, Valentino, used to take the screen vamp, Gloria Swanson, to make love to her.

On that far-away morning, as he got to know Landi, he decided then and there she was like no actress he'd ever met on Broadway, in Chicago, or in Hollywood.

Since she was illegitimate, he didn't think she wanted to talk about her relationship with Elizabeth, the Empress of Austria and the Queen of Hungary. To his surprise, he found that was about all she wanted to talk about. After all, "Sissi," as the queen was called, was one of history's most fascinating women, and Landi used her constantly as a role model.

"Sissi is something to aspire to," she said. "A fairy-tale princess and a liberated woman at the same time. Liberated I am, as you'll soon discover. Becoming a princess is not out of my reach."

"How do you plan to go about that?" he asked a little skeptically. "The Habsburg dynasty ended after World War I. There's no empire left—not even a throne."

"Oh, I won't have an empire to preside over like my grandmother, but I will become the biggest star in Hollywood. When that happens, I think many princes around the world will request my hand in marriage. It is not inconceivable for a Hollywood star to marry royalty and become a princess herself."

"A bit far-fetched," he said, "but I could see that happening."

"Sissi was always a dieting fanatic and an expert equestrian," she said. "You've seen this morning when I beat you in our race what a horsewoman I am. As far as the diet is concerned, I follow Sissi's regime, but I don't go on hunger diets like she did trying to obtain that elusive sixteen-inch waist. I eat exactly as Sissi did: a moderate portion of raw steak daily, a glass of milk, and a glass of freshly squeezed orange juice."

"I'll have to try that," he said. "Or else convert you to my diet of ham and eggs."

"How grotesque," she said. "All that animal fat. Sissi also wanted to be a poet modeling herself after Heinrich Heine, whose work she adored. I too will write a great book and win many literary honors. Like Sissi, I too will become an inveterate traveler and see the world, attracting adoring crowds wherever I go. Everyone will want to see the beautiful princess, don't you agree?"

"I'm enjoying seeing the beautiful princess right now, even before she's crowned."

She obviously liked the sound of that, and her porcelain-like arms reached out for him.

"I've never been particularly intimate with royalty before," he said.

"As you seduce me," she said, "I'm going to imagine that I am the young Elizabeth hauled to the bedchamber of the emperor, Franz Josef, I am only sixteen. He is much older. He rapes me on our wedding night. I'm a virgin."

"I've played a few parts in my day," he said. "But never a rapist emperor." He hugged her closer to him. "I think it's a role I can get into."

In Landi, Bogie found a woman who was spectacularly satisfying, thereby inspiring thoughts that he should divorce Mary Philips and become deeply involved with Landi, despite the fact that he couldn't give her the fairy kingdom she wanted to reign over as queen. Before four o'clock came on Sunday morning, in her lavish bed, he'd promised her a different kingdom, based on the possibility of their joint reign as the King and Queen of Hollywood.

Although she'd remained tactful, responding passionately to his lovemaking, his comment provoked her first put-down. "It's in my destiny that I'm going to reign as the queen of Hollywood, I just know it. But I've heard from our director, Santell, that the future king of Hollywood won't be our star, Charlie Farrell, or even George O'Brien. I think they carry the stigma of the Twenties with them. John Gilbert is through. Santell claims it'll be one of these up-and-coming rugged he-man types like Gary Cooper or Clark Gable."

Her comments immediately diminished his erection. He turned over with his back to this empress wannabe and fell into a deep sleep.

When he awakened at eleven o'clock Sunday morning, he found her gone without a note. Her fat German maid with a Brunhilde bosom told Bogie, "Miss Landi has gone for a Sunday drive down to Laguna with Mr. Basil Rathbone. She said I should offer you breakfast before I sent you on your way. She made it clear that she doesn't want you here when she gets back."

"Tell Princess Landi thanks for a good time," he said, storming out the door in anger although the ham and eggs the maid was cooking smelled mighty good.

Back at his apartment, a call came in from George Raft, who told him he'd arrived in town and was staying at the Mark Twain Hotel on Wilcox Avenue. He wanted Bogie to meet him in the lobby at eight that night

"It'll be good to see someone from New York," Bogie said. "I'm homesick."

Raft was one Yankee dancer/actor who hadn't gone Hollywood. In black tie he was sitting in an armchair by a potted palm in the lobby of the Mark Twain Hotel, waiting for Bogie to pick him up. The beltline of his trousers seemed to come up to his armpits. He looked like he belonged, not on Wilcox Avenue, but on the corner of Broadway and 42nd Street, waiting for a blonde babe to show up.

Bogie too was in black tie, having never returned the tux he'd rented for the Landi dinner party. He figured he'd go into the shop tomorrow and buy the damn thing.

Raft jumped up from his chair and rushed to greet him. He seemed genuinely glad to see a familiar face from back East. "The prospect of a steak dinner with you brought joy to my heart."

"You're looking good, George," Bogie said.

"So are you, Hump, bigtime movie star."

"Out here they call me Bogie."

"So be it. Out here and back East they still call me George Raft. The one and only."

He glanced at his watch. "We've still got time before dinner. "Let's go up to my room for a drink."

Taking the elevator to the top floor, Bogie was ushered into Raft's cluttered room, which smelled of stale cigarette butts and booze.

“Don’t let these sharp clothes fool you,” Raft said. “I came out here with a big bank roll. Lost all of it at the track. I ain’t got but five bucks in my pocket. Can you lend me something till I get back on top again?”

“Sure thing, old pal,” Bogie said. “I just got paid today. Seven-hundred and fifty bucks. I’ll split it with you for old time’s sake.”

“Thanks, big guy,” Raft said. “I’ll owe you one for this. George Raft never forgets when someone does him a favor.”

“If you’ve got no money, how are you eating?”

“An old friend of mine, Ben Lieberman, owns the Angelus Drugstore downtown. He’s letting me run up a tab until my luck gets better. I’m getting fucking tired of BLTs.”

“That steak you mentioned will make up for it tonight.” He accepted the drink from Raft, bolting it down straight, as Raft poured him another whiskey. “So, good looking, how’s your love life?”

“A lot of gorgeous dames out here, even more than in New York,” Raft said. “They’re throwing themselves at me every night. I had this fling with Molly O’Day. I’m trying to drop her but she’s a clinging vine.”

“Great looking dame,” Bogie said.

“She was a looker,” Raft said. “But she got fat and…”

When Raft offered him a third whiskey, he turned it down, remembering that he’d promised Stanwyck he was going to ball her sober for a change.

“I saw that movie, Patent Leather, ten times,” Raft said. “I want to star in the talkie version of that film. I can just see myself as a cocky prizefighter who learns humility when he’s crippled at the end of the picture and can’t go to war like he wants. He’s a real hero. That scene at the end where he forces himself to struggle out of his wheelchair and stands up to salute the American flag as the band strikes up the national anthem, that’s the kind of role I want to play. I’ve got to get rid of this New York gangster image. Let Edward G. Robinson and James Cagney play the gangsters. From now on, George Raft is going to be playing all-American heroes.”

George Raft

“Hell, I’d love to play a gangster,” Bogie said. “I’m tired of these juvenile roles. I’m thirty years old, for Christ’s sake.”

“Tennis, anyone?” Raft said, bursting into laughter at Bogie’s expense, but only after he’d gotten his part of Bogie’s paycheck. He looked at his watch again. “By the way, have you fucked with Stanwyck yet?”

“Yeah, first as Ruby Stevens back in New& York although I was too drunk to remember it.”

“I haven’t fucked Stanwyck as Stanwyck, but Ruby Stevens and I sure got it on. I’ve also had Mae Clarke. She’s one hot piece. Clarke and Stanwyck will fuck anybody out here, male or female. If it’s on the hoof and moving, those two broads will go for it.”

“My impression is that everybody out here will fuck anybody, in any known combination,” Bogie said. “Of course, New York isn’t the sticks either.”

“Hell, I could be a bigtime movie star right now if I’d put out,” Raft said. “Take Rowland Brown, for example. He used to be this hotshot newspaper guy in Detroit. Now he’s the hottest young director in Hollywood. I went to the fights the other night and was having dinner at the Brown Derby with my pal, Owney Madden, and some other cronies. I get up to go to the men’s room. Brown follows me in. There are five empty urinals. He takes the one next to me as I whip out Blacksnake. He comes on real strong, and I’m about ready to belt him one. Then he tells me he’s Rowland Brown, that he saw me dance at this honky-tonk in Detroit, and wants to offer me the second lead in his new film, Quick Millions. In New York, only the blonde belles have to be experts on the casting couch. Out here in Hollywood almost as many guys have to shuck their bloomers.”

He tried to get Bogie to have another drink but was turned down. “Tell me, hot shot, if you’d been as broke as I am, would you drop your trousers for this cocksucker Brown?”

“Maybe,” Bogie said. “I’d certainly consider it. Getting a blowjob is no big deal. All you have to do is whip it out, close your eyes, and let some fag do all the work. While they’re at it, you can be dreaming of some beautiful blonde like Molly O’Day.”

“I guess you’re right,” Raft said. “Getting your dick sucked is no big deal. It’s not like you’re a fag yourself. Maybe I’d better call up Brown and reconsider his offer.”

“Maybe you had,” Bogie said, “because that’s the last paycheck you’re getting from me.”

“Not even if you saw me panhandling on the street?” Raft said.

“I’m a softie,” Bogie said. “I’d let you move into my apartment and sleep on the sofa. I wouldn’t let you starve.”

“I may have to take you up on that offer the way things are going.” There was a loud rap on his door, and he walked over to open it, revealing two large police officers. “You George Raft?” a tall, blond-haired cop asked.

“Yeah,” Raft said cockily. “What’s it to you?”

Without being invited, both of the policemen walked into the bedroom. “Who’s this guy?” the red-haired and equally tall cop asked, looking Bogie up and down. “One of your New York accomplices?”

“Accomplice in what?” Raft demanded to know.

“We’ll come clean with you,” the blond said. “We’ve arrested this stick-up artist. Another George like you except he claims his name is George Roberts. He’s being grilled at headquarters right now and is singing like a canary. He’s already admitted to a dozen robberies, and claims he had accomplices.”

“I’m not a stickup guy,” Raft said. “Look at me. Do I look like a guy who would stick somebody up? Look at my clothing—and the way I’m dressed.”

“When Roberts was searched, your name was found sewed on to his inner pocket, and he was well dressed too,” the blond said. “Real fancy tailor.”

“I can explain that,” Raft said. “I sold him that suit yesterday for thirty bucks to pay my rent here. I’m an actor. Temporarily out of work. I was forced to sell my suit because I was three weeks behind on my hotel bill.”

“You’re not fooling me,” the redhead said. “The Los Angeles police department has already been alerted to your coming out here. You’re a friend of Dutch Schultz.”

“Not exactly a friend,” Raft said. “He used to come into the club where I danced for Texas Guinan, but I never met him personally.”

Bogie knew that Raft was lying, having already been introduced to Dutch Schultz by Raft.

“What about the bootlegger, Owney Madden?” the blond cop asked.

“Owney and I go way back,” Raft said. “We grew up on the streets of Hell’s Kitchen together. He’s a good guy.”

“Yeah,” the redhead said. “Spent ten years in prison for being such a good guy. I think we’re gonna run you in for questioning.”

At this point, the manager of the hotel, Robert Parrish, came into the room since the door had been left wide open. “What’s going on here? We run a respectable hotel—no drunks, no whores.”

Raft looked desperate. “Tell them, Parrish. I sold you my ring last week. I’m having to sell my stuff from New York to raise money.”

“He’s telling the truth,” Parrish said, holding up what looked like a ruby ring encrusted with diamonds. “I’ve had it appraised. It’s worth five-hundred bucks.”

“I can vouch for George here,” Bogie said. “Squeaky clean, a real good guy. Just because this Roberts guy was caught in his secondhand suit doesn’t make George guilty.”

“Okay,” the redhead said. He turned to Raft. “Let this be a warning to you. We heard about you before you even hit town. This is not New York or Chicago, but Los Angeles, a clean-living town. If you think you gangsters can come out here and take over this town, you’ve got another thought coming.”

“I don’t like the look of you,” the blond said to Raft. “And I hate those pants of yours. I really hate your guts. We’ve had another complaint about you. At first we weren’t sure about it and our sergeant wanted to drop it, but I’m going back to the station to look into the case personally. Reopen it, so to speak.”

“You’ve got nothing on me!” Raft said. “What sort of complaint? It’s a lie.”

After some more questions and a few threats, the two policemen left the bedroom. Parrish stayed behind, shaking a finger at Raft. “You have until tomorrow to move out. We don’t want your type here. I think I’m going to post a sign in the lobby, ‘No New Yorkers allowed.’”

After he’d shut the door, Raft turned to Bogie. “I’d better go for that movie role and quick no matter what Brown wants me to do. It’ll look good with the police if I’m a bona-fide film star. I’ll do anything but take it up the ass. George Raft doesn’t get fucked by anybody. I’m the fucker, not the fuckee.” Raft looked at his watch again. “Hell, we’re running late.”

In a taxi on the way to the Roosevelt, Bogie quizzed Raft again about Quick Millions.

Raft said that it was the story of a truck driver who’d become a ruthless gangster. “That’s the star part,” Raft said. “I play his bodyguard.”

“What do you think Brown would say if I tried out for the role of the ruthless gangster?” Bogie asked. “I’d let him suck me off.”

“Too late. The lead’s already cast.”

“Fuck!” Bogie said. “What meathead got the part?”

“This new guy over at Fox,” Raft said. “Spencer Tracy.”

After dinner with Raft, Bogie showed up the next day for the shoot of Body and Soul. A messenger brought him a note from Stanwyck. She wanted him to drive over to see her at Universal Studios, where she was starring in The Locked Door. Her message didn’t explain why she wanted to see him, but no one turned down Stanwyck. When his final scene was locked up, he drove over to Universal where Stanwyck had arranged an entrance pass for him at the gate. Even so, the security guards looked at him suspiciously before letting him drive onto the lot.

To his astonishment, the first person he encountered on the set was the picture's male star, Rod La Rocque. "The first and only actor I'll ever direct," Bogie said, embracing La Rocque warmly and not forgetting how the star had chased after him in New York. "Still got a crush on me?" he asked, teasing La Roque.

"Oh, that was so long ago, and I've gone through so many beaux since then. I gave my heart to Gary Cooper but he abandoned me for Lupe Velez. Not before I'd nicknamed him the Montana Mule."

"Sounds like you've been busy," Bogie said. "How's Miss Vilma Banky doing?"

"Talking pictures are not for her," La Rocque said. "Vilma and I make some joint appearances out here. As you might have guessed, ours is a somewhat unconventional marriage."

"I thought so," Bogie said. He noticed a handsome, blond-haired actor walking toward them.

"That's William Boyd," La Rocque said. "Even though he's got two inches less than Gary, he's all man. What a guy! He goes both ways. Barbara and I are sharing him during the filming of this stinker."

Bogie found himself shaking hands with this former favorite of the director, Cecil B. DeMille, who had cast Boyd as Simon of Cyrene in King of Kings in 1927. Before Bogie could become acquainted with America's future Hopalong Cassidy, a messenger came for him, summoning him to Stanwyck's dressing room.

In her dressing room, Stanwyck looked distraught. She told him that Raft had been picked up and arrested by the police "on some trumped up charge." She didn't explain what that charge was, but claimed she'd posted $1,000 bail for his release. "He's been kicked out of the Mark Twain," she said, "and he's got no place to go. He said you agreed to let him move in with you until he gets back on his feet."

"I guess so," Bogie said. "But that wasn't any writ-in-blood commitment."

"He needs our help," Stanwyck pleaded, "and I've got my own private life. I can't become his mother."

"Tell the fucker he can move in," Bogie said. "But I'm afraid I'm going to regret this."

"It'll be just fine," Stanwyck assured him.

Back at his apartment, as Bogie waited for Raft to show up broke but with expensive luggage and clothing, he received a series of phone calls. Far from being lonely and rejected as he had been when he'd first hit town, he suddenly felt like he'd been crowned King of Hollywood.

The first call was from Joan Blondell. Though still in tears at being dumped by Cagney who suddenly favored Mae Clarke, she was still upbeat and hopeful about the future. "He wouldn't be the first man who's dumped me."

Bogie immediately asked her out on a date for the following evening, and she readily accepted.

As he put down the phone, another call came in, this one from Hobart Henley, a director at Universal. Henley told him that since Fox didn't have any immediate roles for him, he'd been loaned out to Universal where Carl Laemmle Jr. had agreed to produce a remake of Booth Tarkington's The Flirt. Henley informed Bogie that he himself had already directed a previous version of The Flirt— in this case as a silent film back in 1913.

"What's the name of the newest version?" Bogie asked. "Still The Flirt? I know you guys retitle everything in the remakes."

" Gambling Daughters," he said.

"Which one of the daughters do I play?" Bogie asked. "Who's going to design my gowns?"

"An actor with a sense of humor," Henley said. "Some directors like that. I don't."

Joking aside, Bogie was hoping he'd been cast in the male lead but learned that part had gone to Conrad Nagel. He couldn't help but notice that Henley was delaying telling him exactly what role he'd be playing.

"We have a great cast. Sidney Fox, ZaSu Pitts, Slim Summerville. The second female lead hasn't been cast yet but I expect to get notice from Carl tomorrow."

"And my part?" Bogie asked, fearing the answer.

"You'll play Valentine Curliss," Henley said.

"My character's called Valentine?" It sounded very dubious to him. "And the billing?"

"You get eighth billing," Henley said, "but I assure you your role of Valentine is absolutely crucial to the film. You'll walk away with the picture."

"Yeah, right," he said, feeling despondent. So much for a career in films. After only two pictures, one of them not yet released, he felt that Hollywood stardom was fast eluding him. After assuring Henley he'd show up for work, he put down the phone.

"Valentine," he said out loud, cursing the name of his new character without even reading the script. He wondered whom Fox would cast as the other female lead. "I'll probably get to kiss Marie Dressler," he said to the empty walls of the apartment.

The phone rang again. He thought that in spite of his lack of stardom, he was getting more calls than any star.

It was "Dawn Night" (Glenda Farrell). He'd been meaning to ring her up for a date but had temporarily put her on hold. "You may—just may, I can't promise it—be getting the biggest break of your life."

"Tell me about it," he said. "Right at this moment I could sure use one."

"Mr. Edward G. Robinson—I don't know what the G stands for—has just walked out on Little Caesar and Mervyn LeRoy."

"You've got to be kidding," he said. "I hear that's the greatest role in town. What feather got stuck up Robinson's ass?"

"You won't believe this, but Mervyn told me that Robinson had insisted on a scene in which he gets to display his legs."

"His fucking legs? Is this some kind of joke? Does Robinson think he's Marlene Dietrich?"

"The ugly mutt is proud of his legs. He's got this picture of himself in the tights he wore when he played Ottaviano in The Firebrand. He hangs it in his dressing room and shows it off to anybody."

"You're putting me on."

"After Mervyn balled me last night, and we indulged in some pillow talk, I suggested you for the role even though he thinks Cagney would be ideal if he can get him."

"Hell, I'd love to play a gangster," he said. "A role like that would get me out of this aging juvenile crap."

"I'll tell Mervyn you're interested, and if he wants me to, I'll set up a meeting," Farrell said. "You've got to strike now before they offer the role to Paul Muni. A lot of other actors will be lining up for the part. I might as well tell you. Mervyn is also thinking about that New York hoofer, George Raft."

"Raft?" he said in astonishment. "The fucker is moving into my apartment. Maybe that's okay. I could drown him in the bathtub."

"Mervyn thinks Raft might be even better in the role than Robinson. After all, Raft is a New York gangster."

“I won’t mention it to Raft tonight,” he said. “Get me in to see LeRoy as soon as we can. Of course, I’ve got this deal with Fox, but they might lend me out to First National. I’m getting eighth billing to appear in Gambling Daughters. A real comedown after my first two pictures.”

“I’ll call you first thing tomorrow,” she said, blowing kisses into the phone.

After he’d gone to the kitchen and had two beers, Raft still hadn’t shown up. There were many things he’d like to be doing tonight other than waiting around the apartment for Raft. The phone rang again. It was Kenneth wanting him to come over. Bogie explained that he was waiting for Raft who was going to be staying with him temporarily.

“Sorry, I’d like to see you tonight,” Kenneth said. “Since you moved out, I don’t see much of you.”

No sooner had he put down the phone than it rang again. Bogie welcomed the now familiar voice of Spencer Tracy. But he seemed despondent. Bogie soon learned that Lew Ayres had stopped putting out.

“He still sees me almost every night, but he just wants to hold my hand and talk religion,” Tracy said. “I mean, I believe in the church as much as anyone, but I like to work Lew’s sweet cheeks when we’re not praying together.”

“Can’t help you on that score, Spence,” Bogie said. “Not my scene. So what are you doing?”

“I’m still going to keep seeing Lew,” Tracy said. “He’s got a changeable nature. He can’t last long with this religion shit. He’ll get real horny one night and he’ll be over begging for me to plug him.”

“What you doing in the meantime?” Bogie asked.

“I’ll be fucking every woman in town,” Tracy said. “The one I’m going after next is Loretta Young.”

“I hear her tits are as cold as the Arctic.”

“I’m the guy to warm them up.”

Raft didn’t show up until after midnight. Staggering drunk to his doorway clad only in his underwear. Bogie showed Raft in and pointed him to the sofa. “There’s a fresh towel for you in the bathroom and…welcome.”

“You look drunk, my friend,” Raft said. “I never touch the stuff.”

Raft wanted to stay up and talk but Bogie had to get some sleep. He staggered back to bed. After Raft had unpacked the two suitcases he’d brought with him, Bogie was only dimly aware that Raft was making some phone calls. He hoped that they weren’t to his gangster friends back East, as he feared that Raft would skip out and leave him with a big phone bill.

Bogie was of two minds about getting some beauty sleep. He knew the role of Rico was not meant for a pretty face. He wondered if when he met Mervyn LeRoy tomorrow he should show up looking a little rough around the edges. That way, he might stand a better chance of getting the part than if he appeared looking young, handsome, and well-groomed, ready for another one of those “Tennis, anyone?” parts.

When Bogie awakened the next morning, he noticed Raft sprawled out nude on the sofa, his blacksnake in semi-erection. Bogie thought that his friend must be having a wet dream.

The phone rang, and he picked it up on the first ring, not wanting to wake Raft. It was his director, Henley, calling again from Fox about his role in Gambling Daughters. “The co-star of the picture has been cast, and she wants to meet you. She’s seen you on the stage in New York and admires your work.”

“That’s just great,” Bogie said, hung over, his head pounding from the effects of last night’s booze.

After hanging up, Bogie quickly called Glenda Farrell. LeRoy had left her house at six that morning, and had agreed to meet with Bogie about the Little Caesar role that afternoon. “He’s not promising anything. I happen to know he’s testing Raft for the role at nine o’clock.”

“Does our friend know that?” Bogie asked.

“Of course, he does. Raft talked with Mervyn yesterday. Anyway, he’ll test you at two o’clock. I’m doing the test with Raft this morning. I’ll upstage him. Deliberately make him look bad so you’ll get the part.”

“Thanks, babe,” he said. “I’ll owe you a big favor for that.”

“See you at two, lover.”

After he’d hung up the phone, Bogie decided to pull a dirty trick on his new roomie. There was no way he was going to wake up Raft and get him to the studio by nine o’clock to test for the role of Rico.

“The part is mine,” Bogie whispered to himself in the shower. He was quiet as could be as he hurriedly dressed, having left the key and a note for Raft on the kitchen table.

At Fox he was anxious to meet the female co-star of Gambling Daughters, even though he viewed it as a nothing part. He had his heart set on Little Caesar.

Henley greeted him and asked him to be seated. “She’ll be here in a minute.” An assistant called Henley to the phone. Carl Laemmle Jr. himself wanted to speak to Henley.

Bogie was reading a newspaper but looked up when he heard footsteps walking across the sound stage. In a black and white polka dot dress, with wedge-heeled shoes, a blonde-haired young woman with a ridiculous hat was walking toward him. If he didn’t suspect that this was the star of the picture, he would have figured her to be a librarian from a small town in New England.

As he was to recall in years to come, it was a meeting that would forever change his life, both professional and personal.

She extended her hand to him. “I know who you are, Mr. Humphrey Bogart. Nice to meet a fellow actor from back East. I’m told you’re going to be one of my supporting players. I’m the star, of course. New England born and bred.” She extended her hand. “I’m Bette Davis.”

He took an instant dislike to Miss Bette Davis. As he was to tell Kenneth and later everybody else he knew, “This high-strung Yankee bitch needs a good fucking. Someone needs to go in there with a stick of dynamite and blast open that squeezed-tight little pussy of hers, and I’m the man to do it.”

“So each of us is going to be making our first film, Mr. Bogart,” Davis said.

“I’ve already got three pictures under my belt,” he said, slightly angry that she’d obviously not seen any of them and hadn’t heard of them either.

Despite his having re-educated Davis in the nuances of his film career, she persisted all her life in claiming that she and Bogie made a joint film debut. That bit of misinformation also appeared in her highly unreliable memoir, The Lonely Life.

Before he’d finished his coffee with Davis, the first of many cups to come, Bogie sensed her fierce jealousy of other actresses. “Have you read the script yet?” she asked.

“No one’s given me a copy.”

“It’s about two sisters—one good, one bad,” she said. “A story about Midwestern provincialism. At first I thought I’d been cast in the role of the hellion. Imagine my disappointment when Hobart Henley informed me that Sidney Fox is playing the bad sister. I'm ending up in the role of the timid mouse."

"I'm sure you'll be good in the part," he said. "Sometimes you can take a role that's not so flashy and run with it." His first impression of her was that she did look a bit mousy.

Bette Davis

But even at that early stage of her career, she was hardly timid. "Do you know how that whore Sidney Fox got the part?" She didn't wait for his answer. "Miss Foxy is sleeping with the producer, Carl Laemmle Jr. That's why. I'm quickly learning out here that it is who you sleep with that determines which role you get, not how talented you might be as an actress. The juicy parts go to sexual athletes like Joan Crawford. I heard from a very reliable source only the other day that any time Louis B. Mayer wants to be serviced, he calls in Crawford. Mayer sits in his chair, Crawford gets down on her knees and does her job. She's said to be an expert. From what I've been told, she's screwed every male animal in Hollywood except Rin-Tin-Tin, and I'm not so sure she hasn't had that dog too. I wouldn't& put it past her."

The only empathy Bogie felt for Davis on that long-ago morning evolved from their shared disillusionment with Hollywood. They both seemed to feel that they'd each made a serious career mistake in coming to Hollywood, and that they'd eventually fail out here and return to the legitimate theater in New York.

"My first assignment was absolutely unbelievable," she said. "It added a new meaning to the term, 'a casting couch.' In one day alone I had fifteen men lie on top of me, pretending to play a love scene with me. They arrived like wooden soldiers, one after the other, each whispering these lines, 'You gorgeous, divine darling, I adore you. I worship you. I must possess you.' Each actor's weight would then rest on my bosom as he kissed me passionately. The director would yell, 'Cut!' The next actor would then descend on me. Only Gilbert Roland had the sensitivity to see how shocked I was. Before he lowered his 170 pounds onto me, he said, 'Don't be upset. This is Hollywood. All actresses have to go through it.' He was the only actor that day who made me feel like a woman and not like some mannequin."

Davis was called away, but before the day ended, he'd meet each of the other actors starring in the film. From Tom Reed, one of the writers of the screenplay, he learned that the title had been changed from Gambling Daughters to Bad Sister.

Standing before him and measuring four feet, eleven inches tall, Sidney Fox, the film's other female star, might have captured the heart of the producer, Laemmle Jr., but she was way down the list on Bogie's chart of Hollywood femme fatales. Certainly she was no Stanwyck, Crawford, or Dietrich, although she looked mighty sexy when stacked up against the rather dull Bette Davis, whose cigarette smoke still lingered as he shook Fox's delicate hand. He'd call her "cute" instead of beautiful.

Ever the needler, he asked her, "Why do you have a man's name?"

Sidney Fox with Humphrey Bogart in Bad Sister

“Sure beats Humphrey,” she said.

“ Touché.”

She invited him to join her for lunch, and he accepted but told her he had a very important appointment in two hours. “It’ll have to be a short one.”

“Most men I’ve met out here promise me a long one but only deliver short.”

Over the lunch table, he looked startled. “You’re good.”

He liked her brassy way of talking and quickly learned that she was not your typical ingénue. She’d studied law at Columbia University before deciding to become an actress.

“So tell me about this guy, Laemmle,” Bogie& said. “Junior, that is. Is he going to make a big star out of you?”

“Carl’s okay but not all that great in the sack. The trouble with Carl is he can’t decide if he likes pussy or boy-ass. During the filming of All Quiet on the Western Front, he was pounding that cute little butt of Lew Ayres. I took Carl away from Ayres. Now I hear cute-stuff is getting it from your buddy, Spencer Tracy.”

“You’re a regular Louella Parsons,” Bogie said. “If this acting thing does-n’t work out for you, you can replace her with a column of your own. Does Carl have big things in store for you?”

“Not really, I fear, in spite of his promises,” she said. “Right now he believes that monster movies are going to take over Hollywood. He’s all into this Dracula and Frankenstein crap. Mama didn’t raise no monster.”

He laughed, but as he did he noticed the ominous approach of a messenger boy. Bogie was wanted on the phone. Excusing himself , he went to take the call.

It was Glenda Farrell. “Edward G. Robinson is back in the picture,” she said. “He’s made up with Mervyn. So you and Raft don’t have a chance. I’m sorry. I tried.”

He thanked her profusely, concealing his bitter disappointment. As he came back into the Universal commissary, he noticed that Laemmle Jr. had taken his place at Bogie’s table and had one arm wrapped around Sidney Fox. Bogie decided to let them eat in peace. He was outranked.

With his hope of playing Rico in Little Caesar now a distant dream, Bogie walked up the steps to his apartment house. He’d read the script, and focused on his minor part in Bad Sister. In it, he’d play the role of Valentine Corliss, a city slicker who comes to a small town to swindle local businessmen.

At first, he was tempted to knock on Kenneth’s door, but figured he’d better check in with his new roommate, Raft, instead. The prospect didn’t thrill him. After the debacle of the Little Caesar casting this morning, Bogie wondered if he’d be competing against Raft in future film roles. Maybe he would-n’t have to worry about that dismal prospect. After the release of Bad Sister, he doubted whether Sidney Fox would ever recommend him for another role.

By giving him eighth billing, movie executives had already spoken. Even the prospect of having a hot affair with one of his leading ladies appeared remote. Ms. Fox was already taken by the studio's big brass; and Davis had locked up her pussy and thrown away the key.

He wasn't going anywhere as a Hollywood film actor, but he was scoring with women and that was some compensation for a married man away from his New York wife. He wondered how Mary's own love life was doing. She was a good-looking woman with a charming personality, so he figured she was attracting a string of beaux, all of them actors no doubt.

As he came into his apartment, a man his own age was emerging from his bedroom. He looked startled to see Bogie but extended his hand. "Hi, I'm Rowland Brown."

"The director?" Bogie asked. "Well, tell me, old boy, did Raft get the part."

"He did indeed," Brown said, smiling. "Now I know why they call that handsome devil Blacksnake."

Disgusted with the way business was conducted in Hollywood—Davis had nailed it—Bogie impulsively took Brown's hand and pressed it into his own crotch, where the director took expert measurements. "What part do you have for me?" He pushed Brown's hand away and went to get himself a drink.

"Not bad, not bad at all," Brown said, searching for his pants on the far side of the room. " Quick Millions is already cast, but based on what I was just feeling, you're entitled to a role in one of my future pictures."

"Glad to hear that," Bogie said. After pouring his drink, he turned to Brown. "Now get the hell out of here, you faggot. This is where I live. I'm not running a God damn male bordello."

Without saying another word, Brown hurriedly dressed and left. After he'd gone, George Raft emerged from the bathroom stark naked, his black-snake in repose.

"That Rowland boy is not a bad cocksucker," Raft said. "I needed some relief after my disappointment today. For an hour or two yesterday, I thought I had the part of Rico in Little Caesar until I learned that ugly, fat, stumpydicked lumphead, Edward G. Robinson, was back in the role."

"You, play a gangster?" Bogie said mockingly. "You told me you wanted to be cast only as an American hero."

"What you want and what you get in life are two different things," Raft said. "I could play Rico in my sleep. Instead of that, I'm appearing opposite your pal, Spencer Tracy, in Quick Millions. Brown gave me the part. Sally Eilers is the leading lady. You've heard of her: Hoot Gibson's wife."

"Yeah, I've heard of her," Bogie said, turning from the sight of the naked Raft. "Why don't you put on some clothes? Your audition on the casting couch—or in this case, casting bed—is over."

Raft went into the bedroom and when he emerged, he was dressed as if ready to appear in the spotlight at Texas Guinan's club.

"I've got a date tonight," Raft said. "Jean Harlow. Eat your heart out, babycakes." He headed for the door.

On the set of Bad Sister, Bette Davis sharpened her nails on her bête noir, Sidney Fox, years before she dug into the much-abused flesh of her future rival, Joan Crawford. Even though only twenty-three years old and new to Hollywood, Davis flashed the kind of fierceness that would one day become legendary when she ruled as Queen of Warner Brothers.

Standing with Bogie to the side of the set, she said, "The director is totally insipid, the dialogue sucks. I should be playing the bad sister instead of the good one, and, to top it all, I have to wear this damn microphone in the shape of a corncob concealed in my breasts. They've got this large insulated wire attached to the wall. I virtually can't move in any direction. If I turn to face Conrad Nagel, my voice fades. I guess I'll have to speak all my lines to my stomach."

He laughed at that remark, finding that Davis both fascinated him but still annoyed him with all her whining. "You're taking home a paycheck, aren't you?"

"Christ," she said. "That's one way of looking at it if you care nothing about acting."

At the far corner of the set, Jack Pierce, head of studio makeup, along with two assistants, hovered around Sidney Fox. Barely able to control her fury, Davis said, "All Pierce did for me is to tell me that my eyelashes are far too short, my hair is nondescript, my mouth's too small, my neck's too long, and my face is as fat as a Flanders mare."

"That Pierce," Bogie said, finding that his assessment of Davis had been right on target. "He sure knows how to build up an actor's confidence."

"Instead of offering me some help with my makeup, he hovers around Fox," Davis said. "No doubt on orders from Laemmle. If only I were screwing the boss, things would be different. She's certainly the court favorite. You weren't here for her first scene this morning. Instead of the Hoosier accent the role calls for, her voice reeks of Mayfair. I could be so deliciously wanton and impudent as Marianne, the bad sister, instead of Laura, the good little Miss Two-Shoes." She picked up a copy of The Flirt. "Here's how Tarkington describes my character: 'A neutral tinted figure, taken for granted, obscured, and so near being nobody at all.'" She tossed the script down in her chair. "Ain't that a pip?"

Interrupting her diatribe, Bogie abruptly asked her. "I've got to know something. Are you still a virgin?"

She flashed her pop eyes at him. "First off, that's none of your damn business. But if you must know, I am and I'm proud of it. I've never even seen a set of male genitals—not even a picture of what they're like, and I don't intend to until I'm good and ready."

Ever the needler, Bogie came up with his practical joke of the day. He'd learned that in a scene to be shot that afternoon, Davis had to change a set of diapers on a baby rented for the day by Fox Studios.

Since Bogie was playing only a bit part and wasn't needed on the set, he got the permission of the director, Hobart Henley, to go to a local hospital to help the casting director find the right baby. "My father's a doctor," he told Henley. "I grew up with babies. I'll find one that will photograph perfectly and won't cry or take a crap when his diaper comes off."

The rather dim-witted Henley bought that. On the way to the hospital, Bogie told the casting director, Derrick Staunton, his plan. He was going to bribe a nurse to direct them to the baby with the largest genitals in the hospital.

"I thought all little boy babies have pee-pees about the same size," Staunton said.

"Not at all," Bogie said. "The dick on a baby can vary as much as the dick on a grown man. They come in all sizes."

After a fifty-dollar bribe, the nurse said there was a baby in the ward that was "truly remarkable," as she put it. "I can't wait for this kid to grow up. At his age, he's got more than my old man." He found that the blonde-haired nurse looked and acted amazingly like Joan Blondell.

Later, after obtaining the parents' written consent, and even arranging a signed contract stating the terms of the day's work with the child, Bogie drove Staunton and the mother of the baby back to the Fox lot. He hadn't actually seen the baby's genitals, preferring to take the nurse's words for it. To judge from the face of the mother, who sat in the back seat of the car, holding her child, she was right proud of her son.

That afternoon Bogie secretly assembled cast and crew for the unveiling. Henley ordered Davis onto the set and told her that she was to change the diaper of the baby. After being reassured that the diaper was clean, Davis proceeded with the scene, unfastening the safety pins and exposing the genitals of the baby.

A deep blush came over her face, but she was enough of a trouper to see the scene through to its end. Since red turns gray in a black and white film, her face came off as battleship gray when the film was later released.

As Bogie would later relate to Kenneth, "That kid had a set on him that would make some grown men envious."

At the end of the day's shoot with Baby Freddy, Davis stormed off the set where she encountered Bogie, who was laughing as if he'd pulled off the joke of the century. She immediately understood that he was behind the baby plot, and she would forever after refer to him as "that old heckler."

"If you want to see an even bigger one than that," he said to her, "try changing my diaper tonight."

"Mr. Bogart," she said, "you can keep your penis in your pants. You may have experienced the charms of every broad in Hollywood, but my name is not legs-apart Sidney Fox. Humphrey Bogart will never know Bette Davis in the Biblical sense."

"Yes, I will," he said. "Maybe not on this picture, maybe not even within the next few months. But at some time in our futures, Bette Davis is going to get intimately acquainted with Bogie Junior."

"That day will never come," Davis said before heading to her dressing room.

There was a hint of desperation in Tracy's voice when he'd called. He claimed that he could not talk on the phone. Bogie had never heard Tracy sounding so flustered. Perhaps his network of romantic liaisons had backfired in some way. In direct contrast to Raft, who attracted trouble like a blonde beauty walking nude onto a construction site, Tracy tended to be very discreet.

When he arrived on the set, Bogie learned that Rowland Brown had summoned all the major players for a night shoot. He spotted Tracy sitting on the far side of the set in a director's chair waiting to be called for his scene. He was talking to an older man. Tracy didn't look desperate the way he'd sounded on the phone. Bogie walked up to him.

Meeting Kenneth in the hallway of their apartment house, Bogie had a brief exchange with him. "Kay Francis wants to marry me," he blurted out.

"You guys would be crazy to get married," Bogie said.

"Would you rather I go back to New York, get Mary to charge you with desertion, help her get a divorce, and then marry me? I'm still in love with Mary."

"Perhaps you are," Bogie said. "In the meantime, Miss Kay Francis herself seems to be keeping you busy. No, I don't want you to take Mary away from me. Marry Kay then. It'll be a good cover for both of you. Two of the biggest tramps in Hollywood pretending to be a loving man and wife."

"I'll marry Kay on one condition," Kenneth had said. "That you'll agree to be my best man."

Bogie crushed out his cigarette and headed for the door. "You got yourself a deal, pal. Name the time and place, and I'll show up. I own a tuxedo now."

At a night club that same evening, he encountered Bette Davis on the arm of Gilbert Roland. The handsome, dashing Roland excused himself to go to the men's room, leaving Davis alone with Bogie at the table.

"You're doing very well," Bogie said. "Gilbert Roland, no less. I understand every horny woman in Hollywood—and at least half the men—are after him."

"He's mine," she said smugly, lighting up one of her interminable cigarettes. "Of all the men I auditioned that day for the kissing scene screen test, he kissed the best and was the gentlest with me."

"You've seen your first set of male genitalia," Bogie said, recalling that well-hung baby on the set of Bad Sister. "The question is, have you seen what a real man has hanging?"

"A real man is something you're not, Mr. Bogart," she said. "If you must know, I'm going to surrender my cherry tonight, and I've selected Mr. Roland as the man for the job."

“Happy to hear that,” he said. “You’re certainly old enough to be deflowered. Personally I think a girl should be broken in well before her sixteenth birthday.”

“You’re such a prankster and such a juvenile, at least to judge by your antics on the set, that I would think a teenager would be just about your speed, and the perfect date for you. However, I prefer a real man, and I think you’d agree that Gilbert Roland measures up in every way.”

“How would I know?” he asked.

“I know you want me for yourself, but you can dream on,” she said, smiling as Roland returned to the table.

“Three’s a crowd,” Roland said to him.

“See you around, pal,” Bogie said, hastily departing.

The persistent ringing of a telephone brought Bogie abruptly into his new day. His head was pounding, as he reached for the phone. It was Davis. At first he thought she might be calling to report on the loss of her virginity. That would come later.

“Ruthie has smashed up my car, and I need you to drive me to meet my new director, James Whale.”

Later that day he’d learn that “Ruthie” was Ruth Favor Davis, the mother of Bette and a former broad-shouldered girl from Ocean Park, Maine, who’d grown up as an incorrigible tomboy insisting that her family call her “Fred.”

“Forgive me,” he said. “I’d love to take you. But I have a headache from hell. I’ve got no work, so I plan to sleep all day.”

“Little wonder,” she said, considering how much you had to drink last night. “Whale is casting Waterloo Bridge, and I’m up for the lead. It’s the role of a prostitute. Before last night with Gilbert,I couldn’t have played the part. For him to get off, he likes to pretend that his girl is a Tijuana whore. In one night, I learned what it’s like to be a whore.”

“That’s good, but I’ve got to beg off,” he said, wanting to get her off the phone.

“The role of the Canadian soldier—the one who falls for me, not knowing I’m a prostitute—is also up for grabs. I’m asking Whale to let you test for the part. It’s not that Fox has rushed to offer you another role after Bad Sister.”

He suddenly perked up. A chance at a part— what every out-of-work actor wanted to hear. “Give me your God damn address, and I’m on my way.” He jumped out of bed in search of a pencil. “Fox doesn’t have a God damn thing for me. I’ll be over at your place in forty minutes.”

Heading for the shower, he noticed that Raft hadn’t come home last night.

Hoping that the cold morning shower would erase all memories of last night, he put his face up to the spout and cleansed himself. The day didn’t hold out too many good prospects—Bette Davis who’d been fucked by only one man in her entire life, and only the night before, and Director James Whale who no doubt had been fucked by a thousand men, maybe more.

Davis was nearly in tears, as Bogie picked her up and drove her over to Whale’s set. It wasn’t the loss of virginity that seemed to be bothering her. “Laemmle Jr. has seen Bad Sister,” she said. “I heard him tell someone that I had all the sex appeal of Slim Summerville.”

“I didn’t know he’d even seen the picture.” Bogie said. “Do you know what he thought of my acting?”

She reached for a cigarette and eyed him sharply. “I don’t think he even noticed you. He had eyes only for Sidney Fox.”

“Sorry to hear that,” he said, infuriated at actresses who could only talk about themselves.

“I’d be washed up if it weren’t for the cameraman, Karl Freund,” Davis said. “He said I had lovely eyes.” Thus, the film’s photographer became the first to discover “Bette Davis Eyes.” “They’ve got me doing a stinker called Seed, with this adorable John Boles. I could really go for him.”

“So soon after Gilbert Roland?” he teased her.

“Last night was the most memorable of my life,” she said, puffing furiously. “Gilbert is not a man. He’s descended directly from the gods. He told me he loved me. Even that he wanted to marry me. But this morning when I called his place, a woman answered the phone. I could swear it was Constance Bennett. Gilbert wouldn’t even come to the phone.”

“We men are no good,” he said with a slight self-mockery in his voice. “You’d better learn that sooner than later.”

“Believe you me, Bogart, I knew that before I got on the train to Hollywood.”

Davis quickly switched to how excited she was about the possibility of being cast as the lead in Waterloo Bridge, a play by Robert E. Sherwood that Bogie had heard about. Mary Philips herself had wanted to play the role on Broadway of the showgirl-turned-prostitute. It was a tragic story. The lead character feels that because she was once a whore she doesn’t have the right to her lover’s respect. The film ends with her suicide on Waterloo Bridge.

As Davis went to makeup, Bogie met James Whale. “Bette told me that the role of the soldier is still open,” Bogie said. “Fox doesn’t have anything for me to do and they’re paying me by the week. I’m sure they would be happy to lend me to you. Could I test for it?”

“Dear boy,” Whale said, patting him affectionately on the arm. “The part has just been cast. You know, it calls for a handsome leading man. The type women will swoon over. I don’t see you in such a part. Maybe character roles. A heavy perhaps.”

“They said that about Valentino in the old days,” Bogie said. “And look what happened.”

“My dear boy,” Whale said. “Trust me on this one. When it comes to casting, I’m never wrong. A natural instinct, I guess.”

A fey and vapidly handsome young man emerged from Whale’s office. The director introduced him to Bogie. “Meet the male lead in Waterloo Bridge. Humphrey Bogart, this is Kent Douglass.”

“I’m thinking of changing my name to Douglass Montgomery,” he said. “That’s Douglass with two Ss.”

“Why don’t you do that?” Bogie said, giving him a limp handshake. He was resentful of the actor, suspecting that he’d been sleeping with Whale as an incentive to getting the role.

“Would you gentlemen excuse me?” Whale said. “I think Bette Davis is ready for her test.” He turned back as if to seek reassurance from Bogie. “I don’t know what makeup did to her. But when you brought her onto the set, she looked mousy. Definitely unconvincing as a prostitute. After all, who would pay out good money to go to bed with Bette Davis?”

“Seems to me you’ve already made up your mind not to cast her,” Bogie said. “Why are you even bothering with the test?”

“I was ordered to,” Whale said. “You do what a studio boss tells you to do. Actually I saw Mae Clarke the other night opposite Cagney in The Public Enemy. Clarke has prostitute written all over her.” He turned and left, leaving Montgomery standing there awkwardly with Bogie.

As Bogie chatted with Montgomery, he realized that the young actor was making an assumption that he, Bogie, was also a homosexual. At the time, Montgomery was part of the growing influx of young homosexual actors arriving in Hollywood during the late Twenties and early Thirties at the birth of the Talkies. The list of gay, or at least bisexual hopefuls was growing by the day: Anderson Lawler, David Manners, Louis Mason, David Rollins, Richard Cromwell, Alexander Kirkland, Ross Alexander, John Darrow.

“When I came out here, I thought I’d be enjoying one handsome hunk after another,” Montgomery said. “It’s not been like that at all. I’ve been sleeping with creatures from the dark lagoon. Charles Laughton. I found him disgusting. When George Cukor’s fat lips worked me over, I closed my eyes and dreamed of God, mother, and country. William Haines and Eddie Goulding weren’t so bad.” He accepted a cigarette from Bogie. “I hear you’re a good buddy of Kenneth MacKenna. I certainly wouldn’t mind a date or two with him. How’s it been with you? What ghouls have you been sleeping with, if you don’t mind my asking?”

Eyeing him squarely, Bogie was eager to report this conversation to Kenneth later in the day. “I’ve decided on another route. For casting-couch advancement, I work the female circuit: Greta Garbo, Marlene Dietrich, Norma Shearer. Dietrich is perfect, but Garbo’s feet and especially that pussy of hers are too big. And Shearer has fat ankles. The most disgusting broad I’ve ever had to fuck? Would you believe Marie Dressler?”

At that point, Montgomery realized that Bogie was putting him on. He excused himself and walked away. It would not be the beginning of a beautiful friendship between the two men.

When her screen test was over, and Bogie had delivered Davis back to Ruthie, he hadn’t heard the last of her. For some reason, even though it was obvious that she held him in disdain, she’d found a kindred spirit in him and called him with frequent bulletins.

The following morning, Davis phoned him in all her rage and fury. “That God damn faggot, James Whale. Moby Dick, or so he thinks. I’m out of the lead. He’s cast me in some dull part as the sister. I’m repeating the part I played in Bad Sister. The mouse role. He cast Mae Clarke instead.”

“Your day will come.”

“Christ,” Davis screeched. “Now she’s fucking James Cagney. I guess it takes a whore to play a whore. In the film, I’m supposed to be nice to Clarke’s character. How can I be nice to her when I hate the bitch’s guts?”

“Because you’re an actress,” he said, “and a damn good one. If the part calls for it, you can do it.”

That seemed to please her. The next morning she was on the phone again as if she had to give him a daily bulletin. “Whale is out of his mind,” she charged. “There was a scene yesterday that called for a chamber pot to be placed under the bed. For realism, Whale insisted that the pot be half full of the real stuff. Christ, I hope they cut that scene out of the movie.”

“You getting on with Mae okay?” he asked.

“I guess,” she said. “I stand on the set watching her emote. I mouth her lines, saying them like they should be spoken and acted while she fucks up every scene.”

“I hear this Whale is a pretty good director,” he said, always wanting to take an opposing point of view.

“Whale is no director. He’s a traffic cop. He handles entrances and exits— and that’s it.”

The next morning, Davis had changed her opinion of Whale. He was not only brilliant, but “one of the greatest directors ever to hit Hollywood.”

“”What brought this on?” he asked.

“He wants me for the lead in Frankenstein.”

He laughed. “Now that’s a part you can play: The Bride of Frankenstein.”

“Remind me never to talk to you again, you son of a bitch.” She slammed down the phone.

Forgetting her promise never to speak to him again, she called the following week. “That God damn faggot said I came off horribly in my screen test for Frankenstein.” She seemed hysterical. “He said I’m totally wrong for the part. What a cocksucker he is. I’m off the picture.”

“Who’s getting the part?” he asked, genuinely curious.

“Christ, would you believe Mae Clarke? She’s so bad in Waterloo Bridge, he’s giving her Frankenstein. If he wasn’t a queer, I’d swear he was sleeping with the bitch. Whale can’t see talent if it were a roaring truck coming down the road about to run over the slime. Christ, I can’t stand queers.”

“Now, Bette,” he said, “You must learn to co-exist.”

“So I do,” she said. “But it’s God damn hard putting up with them. I dread the day when I’ll have to play a love scene with one of them and let them kiss me, considering where their mouths have been. Mae Clarke said that there are men who actually stick their tongues up men’s assholes. Have you ever heard of that?”

“Can’t say that I have,” he said archly.

“Oh, Bogart,” she said. “You’re such a kidder. You probably do that yourself.” For the second time in just a few days, she slammed down the phone on him.

But it wasn’t the last he’d hear of Bette Davis.

The tough, one-eyed director, Raoul Walsh, called Bogie the next morning, telling him he’d been cast in the new Fox picture, Women of All Nations. Bogie was hopeful until Walsh informed him that he was playing the “seventh lead,” in a film that would once again team Victor McLaglen with Edmund Lowe. They’d be reprising their roles of Flagg and Quirt which had brought them such acclaim in What Price Glory?, which had originally been filmed as a silent in 1926 with Walsh himself as director, Bogie remembered how the director of A Devil With Women, Irving Cummings, had hoped that the team of McLaglen/Bogart would prove so successful that they’d be cast together in several more films. No such luck. With box office revenues down because of the Depression, Fox was dipping into remakes of its past successes to sell tickets—hence, the cameras would be rolling once again on that rugged duo of McLaglen and Lowe.

“Who are the dames in the picture?” Bogie asked Walsh.

“Greta Nissen and Fifi D’Orsay,” the director said abruptly before ordering Bogie to report to wardrobe tomorrow at seven o'clock in the morning.

Bogie hoped that his role might have some possibilities. As a fringe benefit, he thought he might be able to seduce that Scandinavian beauty, Nissen, and perhaps that little French cutie, Fifi D'Orsay.

That afternoon he was still hopeful when Fox sent a messenger over to deliver the script to him. He was surprised to see that the screenplay had been written by a man he knew. Barry Conners had also written the three-act comedy, Hell's Bells, in which Bogie had appeared on Broadway with Olive May and Shirley Booth. With the latter, he'd performed both on and off the stage, as he so fondly recalled.

After reading the script—he was hardly able to find his part—Bogie was bitterly disappointed. There was virtually nothing for him to do. Any one of a thousand, even 10,000, actors—could have played the part, such as it was. Bogie felt that it was more of "a brief appearance" than a role. It was clearly a showcase for Lowe and McLaglen, but not for him.

"It's nothing but a stupid caper," Bogie told Kenneth when he went next door to have a drink with him. "My career at Fox is nose-diving by the minute.& They could get some actor to do this for $25 a week instead of $750."

Bogie's only good luck that day was when he returned to his apartment to find a personal letter waiting for him from New York. At first he thought it was from his Mary. The letter was from Helen instead, informing him that she was coming to Los Angeles where she'd booked a bungalow at the Garden of Allah.

Even though the lesbian play, The Captive, had been closed on a charge of "indecency" by the New York police, there was talk of mounting a production in Los Angeles. To Bogie's amazement, Samuel Goldwyn had expressed interest in acquiring the film rights, even though the Will Hays office had forbidden the depiction of any type of "perversion" on the screen.

The next morning after wardrobe had fitted Bogie into a crisp new marine uniform, he stared at his figure in the mirror, thinking he looked rather striking.

When he ran into the director, Walsh, he looked Bogie up and down. "You come off as queer bait—perfect for what I had in mind."

Bogie's part didn't even merit a dressing room. He was assigned a locker room with the rest of the cast, which included the grips and the assistant cameraman. Since his part was so small, Bogie didn't even know why he was needed on the set.

There weren't even any women to flirt with, as Greta Nissen and that cute little Fifi D'Orsay were nowhere to be seen. Perhaps Walsh had them lined up for his casting couch that day.

As Bogie stood idly by with nothing to do, and feeling like a jerk, one of the co-stars of the film, Bela Lugosi, came up to him and introduced himself. "I saw you and Tracy in Up the River, " Lugosi said. "You guys did a good job."

"Count Dracula himself, I presume," Bogie said. Since neither actor had any work to do that day, Lugosi invited Bogie to the commissary for some black coffee.

Bogie relaxed with this Hungarian actor, born Be'la Ferenc Dezso Blaski in 1882 in the small town—now Romanian—of Lugosi.

When Lugosi ordered coffee from the waiter, Bogie said, "Now you've spoiled my illusion. I thought you drank only blood."

As coffee was served, Lugosi confided in Bogie after he'd promised not to tell Louella Parsons, "I really wanted a career in operettas. I have a remarkable singing voice."

"Blood curdling, I bet," Bogie said, kidding him.

"Actually before I had success as a monster," Lugosi said, "I scored well portraying Jesus Christ. Would you believe

I was also a sensation playing Romeo in Budapest in 1911?"

"About you, I could believe anything," Bogie said. "You're a remarkable man. I caught you on Broadway back in '27. I don't care how many roles you've played, you're stuck with that vampire count bit. No one does it better than you."

"I know," he said. "It's both a blessing and my curse. I made up a will the other day. In my will, I left instructions that I be buried in my Count Dracula cape."

Bogie laughed. "That means you'll be back! No grave will hold you."

"Speaking of men who are vampires," Lugosi said, "here's one of the stars of the picture coming toward us. Edmund Lowe. I'll introduce you, but make sure your fly is buttoned."

"Don't you look the spiffy marine!" said the slick-haired, debonair screen star.

"Don't you look like something yourself?" Bogie said, pausing to take in the costume of a top-hatted, silk-caped magician.

"With that cape and that hat, are you trying to take over my role as Count Dracula?" Lugosi asked.

"Actually, I'm doing a wardrobe test for this upcoming film, The Spider, " Lowe said. "I'm being considered for the lead." Lowe would win the coveted role that very year, his character in The Spider inspiring the look of the comic-strip character, Mandrake the Magician. "Now I've got to get to my dressing room and slip into my marine drag."

"At least you have a dressing room," Bogie said. "Walsh has demoted me to the men's locker room."

"By all means, share my dressing room," Lowe said. "C'mon," I'm going there now."

The art director on the picture, David Hall, came over to ask Lowe something. He excused himself momentarily to speak to Hall.

"If you guys are going to share a dressing room, watch yourself around that one," Lugosi warned Bogie in a whisper.

"You've got to be kidding," Bogie said. "He's married to the most beautiful woman in Hollywood."

" Everybody in Hollywood has to watch himself or herself around Lilyan Tashman." With that enigmatic statement, Lugosi turned and headed& to his own dressing room.

When he'd finished his conversation with the art director, Lowe turned to Bogie. His fingers tightened around Bogie's arm. "Let's head for my dressing room now. I may even find some whiskey there."

“You’re my kind of guy,” Bogie said.

Lowe’s fingers tightened even firmer around Bogie’s arm. “And you’re my kind of guy too. I always believe that when you need a job done, call out the marines.”

Edmund Lowe was most solicitous.

After he’d dressed in his own marine uniform, he made a slight suggestion about how Bogie could artfully diminish the impact of his scarred lip with a clever use of makeup. “Believe me, I know more about makeup than Marlene Dietrich,” he said. “We actors have to do for ourselves.”

Lowe even invited Bogie to accompany him to the set. He said all the things that Bogie had been wanting to hear since leaving New York. “You are a marvelous screen presence. You could be a big star different from all others. It’s the directors who are stupid.”

“I guess they don’t like my ugly mug,” Bogie said.

“That’s nonsense,” Lowe said. “You are very, very handsome, and very, very sexy. I read somewhere that the New York critics considered you as handsome as Valentino.”

“They must have had George Raft in mind,” Bogie said modestly.

“Actually I don’t think Raft looks like Valentino at all,” Lowe said. “You’ve got sex appeal. A heavy dose.” He leaned over in a confidential whisper to Bogie. “And from what I hear, you’re packing a powerful weapon in that tight uniform of yours.”

Bogie was flattered but also a bit embarrassed. “Who in hell have you been talking to.”

“I have many credible sources,” Lowe said enigmatically. “You’ve just hit Hollywood and already some of the top stars have fallen for you.”

“I wouldn’t exactly call it ‘fallen,’” Bogie said. “More accurately, they’ve bedded me and then forgotten me.”

“I know Stanwyck went for you,” Lowe said, “But now she’s chasing after my darling Lilyan.”

“With a woman as gorgeous as Lilyan Tashman, I bet I know where you are at night,” Bogie said.

“You are a truly adorable, darling man,” Lowe said before being summoned to the set. “I’m going to try to get Walsh to make your part bigger on this picture.” Before heading off, he paused. “I’ve got one better. I want you to be the co-star of my next movie.”

“Make me your Spider Boy?” Bogie asked.

Lowe seemed amused. “No, not that. I have various roles in mind for you.& I think you can be developed into one of the screen’s most romantic leading men.”

“You mean, the type who gets the gal in the final reel?” Bogie asked.

“Exactly,” Lowe said. “Scar or not, you’ve got the most sensuous lips. I like the way you always keep them wet. Dietrich knows that trick too.”

“With me, it’s not deliberate,” Bogie said. “I salivate a lot.”

“It would be like dying and going to heaven to get worked over by that succulent mouth of yours.” As if catching himself, he quickly added. “It would be any girl’s dream, I’m sure.”

“I was feeling pretty low today until I met Mr. Lowe himself,” Bogie said. “I think I’ll call you ‘High’ instead.

You've made me feel real good. And thanks for letting me share your dressing room. I don't feel like a third-class citizen any more."

"I've never met an actor in Hollywood I liked instantly like I do you. I've got a great idea. If you're not busy tomorrow night, would you come over and have dinner with Lilyan and me? I know she'll find you as fascinating as I do."

"I'd love to," Bogie said. "Sounds like my kind of evening. No red-blooded man in his right mind would turn down an evening with Lilyan. She's beautiful."

"What about me?" Lowe asked. "Am I chopped liver?"

Marital bliss: Lilyan Tashman & Edmund Lowe

"Not at all," Bogie said, realizing that no vain actor liked to be slighted. "Not chopped liver at all. More like a juicy T-bone steak."

"You've got that right, baby cakes," Lowe said before heading out to face Walsh's direction.

In his grim and bleak apartment, Bogie found a note from Raft. He'd come into some money and was moving out. He thanked him for his hospitality.

Next day on the set of Women of All Nations, in their shared dressing room, Bogie felt uncomfortable stripping off his military uniform under the focused stares of Lowe. But after a few uncomfortable minutes, he decided "what the hell" and stripped down, as needed, anyway. He wasn't really an exhibitionist, but the actor in him appreciated the approval of an audience. Maybe all those stories about Lowe being a homosexual were true, and maybe they weren't. He was married to one of the most beautiful women in Hollywood, Lilyan Tashman.

Having gone through a marriage to Helen Menken, Bogie knew that a wedding band didn't mean a God damn thing in the theater or in Hollywood. After the dust had settled on his former marriage, Bogie was convinced that Helen preferred women. Even so, he fully expected to bed her when she reached Hollywood—no doubt at her bungalow at the Garden of Allah.

"Are you sure you don't want me to bring a date to your place tonight?" Bogie asked Lowe, as he buttoned up his fly.

"My Lilyan and I have already arranged a surprise date for you," Lowe said.

"I hope not some dog you're trying to push off on me," Bogie said, almost meaning it.

"Lilyan is a connoisseur not only of haute couture, but also of the world's most beautiful women," he said somewhat enigmatically. "Your date tonight one day will take her place alongside some of the world's most enchanting women. The likes of Cleopatra and Helen of Troy."

“You do like to tease a country boy from New York,” Bogie said. “I’m sure my date is Marie Dressler.”

“Time will tell, my dear, lovely boy,” Lowe said. He hovered near Bogie, who at first feared that the actor was going to kiss him. Instead Lowe took his hand and held it gently. “Until tonight, you adorable creature. Lilyan is dying to meet you. She’s going to wear her sexiest outfit, a little thing she picked up in Paris.”

“She’s your wife,” Bogie said. “Why would she wear something sexy for me? Even assuming your marriage is as open as mine, you said I already have a date.”

Lilyan Tashman

“Listen, pet, let’s don’t go into logistics right now,” Lowe said. “The night hasn’t even begun. We must go forward into that good night and welcome its surprises.” With that parting comment, he was out the door.

Bogie stood looking confused. He felt that he was heading for either the best or the most disastrous party of his Hollywood life. “Let the night unfold,” he said before checking his appearance in the mirror.

As he would confide in Kenneth the next day, he kissed his own image in the mirror. He felt that that kind of self-enchantment qualified him as a narcissist like every other actor in Hollywood. Giving himself a final smooch, he said, “Go for it, you good-looking mother-fucker.”

Even though it had been announced as just a small, intimate dinner party, Lowe greeted Bogie at the door in full evening dress.

In his dark suit, Bogie said, “I didn’t know it was black tie.”

“Come in, dear boy,” the slick-haired actor said, taking his hand and guiding him into the foyer. “Dressed, and especially undressed, you’re most welcome at the humble Tashman/Lowe abode.”

It was actually a Beverly Hills mansion they called “Lilowe.”

With the grace of a ballerina, Lilyan moved from her garden into the living room, crossing the parlor to greet Bogie. Her movements were so perfect that they gave the illusion of being choreographed. Even before she’d kissed him gently on the lips, he’d fallen madly in love with her.

“Welcome to our home,” she said. “For once Eddie didn’t lie about your beauty.”

“The only beauty in this room is standing before me,” Bogie graciously said. “I’m a regular looking guy.”

“Don’t be so modest,” she said, looking over at Lowe with a smirk. “I never thought I’d ever say that to an actor. I’ve read in the press that you’ve been compared to Valentino.” As she seated him on the sofa next to her, he was awed by her beauty. She was dressed a little too flamboyantly for his taste, but still exquisite in a Parisian white satin gown with four diamond clasps. When she noticed him checking out her jewelry, she said, “If I happen to wear real diamonds instead of paste, who is to object?”

“Not me,” Bogie said, “providing I didn’t have to pay for them.”

As the maid served drinks, Bogie was eager to learn anything he could about her. He virtually ignored Lowe. Born in New York the same year as himself, she had toiled for years in the Silents, knocking on doors of casting offices and dancing in Ziegfeld's Follies.

Eventually, she forged ahead in the Talkies, creating a niche playing sophisticated but sarcastic blondes. The night he met her, she was an acknowledged social leader in Hollywood, consistently cited as the town's best-dressed woman.

Her home was spectacular. "Who's your decorator?" he asked. "He needs to do something—anything—to my rattrap apartment."

"You're looking at him, " she said. "My hobby is interior decorating."

"She also claims she decorated our Malibu Beach home," Lowe said. "But it was Jetta Goudal."

"Would you shut up?" she said abruptly to her husband before softening her features again when she turned to face Bogie. "Goudal helped, but I did most of it myself." Lowe merely rolled his eyes sarcastically, looking up at the ceiling.

"Oh, I forgot," Bogie said. He reached into the pocket of his suit and removed a small gift package wrapped with red satin ribbon.

Taking the box from him, she deftly opened it, her eyes lighting up in delight. "Miniature hands," she said, fondling the porcelain gift. "Thank you, darling." She reached over and kissed him again on the lips. "I'll add this latest pair to my collection." Reaching for his hand, she guided him into an adjoining room which was lined with glass shelves displaying what must have been the world's largest collection of miniature hands in all shapes and materials.

"I read in some column that you collected these little hands, and I wanted to add my paws to your other ones," he said.

"I will value your hands more than all the others," she said.

She was so convincing that for one brief moment he actually believed her.

As she directed him back into her sumptuous living room, he took in her figure from the rear, finding it slender and slinky. Her throaty voice evoked Garbo with a touch of Dietrich. He'd read that Eddie Cantor had called her face "fox-like."

As Tashman kept the talk bubbly, Lowe became cruder as he drank. As if jealous of his wife, his tone grew bitchy. "I've never known Lil to pay so much attention to a man. Usually it's the women at any party who have to watch out for her. No beautiful gal is safe going to the powder room with Lil at the party."

She patted Bogie's hand. "Eddie does exaggerate so."

"Whether it's a grand dame of the theater or a newly arrived teenage chorus gal from Broadway, Lil chases after them right into the powder room," Lowe said. "Often she seduces them in a private toilet stall. Her technique is amazing, I hear, and it's the talk of Hollywood."

As Bogie looked at her, he found this slander hard to believe. To him, she was the epitome of elegance and taste.

"They don't call her Latrine Lil for nothing," Lowe said.

No longer able to control herself, Lilyan glared at him. "And they don't call you a cocksucking son-of-a-bitch for nothing," she said. Still, to Bogie's surprise, she didn't deny her husband's assertions. When he became too graphic describing her seduction of Louise Brooks, she said, "forgive Eddie. When he's not sucking a big dick—he's a size queen, incidentally—the true feline that lurks in his heart comes out of her cage." To change the subject, she said, "Tallulah's in town looking for movie work and fucking that divine Gary Cooper. But that Montana cowboy has given her gonorrhea, so darling Tallu is temporarily out of commission."

“She told us about your marriage to Helen,” Lowe said.

“I’d rather not talk about it,” Bogie said, barely concealing his simmering anger.

“It’s all right with us,” she said. “With Eddie and me, you can let your hair down. After all, you and I have a lot in common. You’ve both known darling Tallu. I’ve also enjoyed Miss Helen Menken herself.”

At that point Bogie was ready to bolt from the room. What kept him glued to his seat was his utter fascination with Lilyan in spite of her vile talk. She could speak freely of her seduction of women, yet he felt that she also wanted to go to bed with him. All evening, to emphasize a point, she would reach out and touch him. He found her fingers on him thrilling and wanted her to feel more of him. He regretted that Lowe had arranged the surprise date, even though he kept assuring Bogie that an enchantress was on her way.

Even as she continued to touch and feel Bogie, Lilyan still spoke of women. “I’ve had nearly every major female star in Hollywood, but I struck out with Gloria Swanson, Norma Talmadge, and Billie Dove.”

“Better luck next time,” Bogie said.

“So, now that you’ve seen a slice of our domestic life, what do you think of our ‘ideal marriage?’” Lowe asked. “That’s how all the fan magazines refer to our wedded bliss.”

Fortunately for Bogie, he didn’t have to answer that direct question. “Only last week I granted Photoplay an interview,” she said. “About how a woman can hold onto her man.” She flashed a look of contempt at her drunken husband.” I told the magazine that no man will tolerate a lazy woman for very long. I also told them that a woman has to look good for her man at all times. To quote moi, ‘I never appear before Eddie looking seedy or badly groomed.’”

“That’s a damnable lie,” Lowe said. “I’ve seen my bitch here looking very disheveled after she’s worked over some hot pussy and raises herself up with vagina juice dripping down her chin.”

“Whenever Eddie drinks, he becomes really vulgar,” she said. “You’ll find out more about that later.” Ideal marriage or not, she looked at him with total disdain. “I call him& sewer mouth. But, as I said, you’ll see what I mean as the night progresses.”

Lilyan Tashman

That evening did move on. It was nearly ten o’clock, and Bogie’s mystery date still hadn’t shown up. He suspected that there was no fourth guest, and that he was here for a three-way.

Enthralled by Lilyan, he wanted her alone, miles removed from her homosexual husband. He couldn’t even call up his friend, Tracy, to take Lowe off his hands for the night. Lowe wasn’t Tracy’s type.

The maid came in and announced that Lilyan was wanted on the phone. She rose gracefully, patted Bogie on the knee, and turned to her husband. “Can I trust you alone with this darling man?”

“I’ve already seen him jaybird naked in my dressing room,” Lowe said. “I restrained myself then, but just barely. I’ll be a good boy, although I can’t promise that I won’t salivate a bit.” When& she’d gone, Lowe took Lilyan’s place on the sofa beside Bogie.

Uncomfortable seated there, Bogie rose quickly to refill his own drink. Fortunately, Lilyan came back into the room in only a minute or so.

She looked jubilant. “Your surprise date is also doing the cooking tonight. We are so lucky. She makes the best goulash in Hollywood. Instead of cooking in my kitchen, she preferred to cook the goulash in her own home and is bringing it over.”

“Prepare yourself for a delightful evening,” Lowe predicted to Bogie. “And I don’t mean just the goulash.”

Growing a little bored with Lowe’s fabulous build-up, Bogie said, “Yeah, promises, promises.”

In fifteen minutes, the doorbell rang, and the maid went to answer it.

Not knowing what to expect, Bogie was startled when his surprise date came into the living room, after handing a pot of goulash to the maid.

After kissing both Lowe and Lilyan rather passionately on the mouth, she turned to him. He’d met her before, and, as before, he was overcome by her exotic allure and her beauty.

“Mr. Bogie man,” she said in her seductively accented voice. “We meet again.”

Not wanting to sound like some awed schoolboy, he said, “Did anyone ever tell you you’re one hell of a broad?”

“So many, many times,” she said, smiling at him before looking around the living room, finally focusing on Lilyan. A slight smirk came onto her face. “Someone in this room is going to get lucky tonight. I don’t know….” She paused as if confused about what to say. “What is the damn correct English? On whom I will bestow my charms?”

“If there is a God in heaven,” Bogie said, “and at times I seriously doubt it, I am hoping that he is looking with favor on me tonight, Miss Dietrich.”

CHAPTER FOUR

Bogie woke up the next morning fully convinced that he was a sexual degenerate. After he'd invited Kenneth over for coffee and conversation, he felt better. Drawing on his experience as a former member of the New York Pussy Posse, Kenneth convinced him that what Bogie was doing in Hollywood—no different from some scenes in which he'd participated in New York—was "just the norm out here."

Long after the world's greatest tasting goulash—"that Kraut sure knows how to cook"—was served, Dietrich and Lilyan had disappeared into her bedroom upstairs.

"My God, the evening turned into a scene out of Arabian Nights," he confided to Kenneth. "I don't remember it, just blurred scenes."

Kenneth was convinced the Bogie remembered everything, but didn't want to supply all the details.

"Before I left that house around four o'clock, I did a trick or two that even I hadn't thought about before," Bogie said.

"Like what?" Kenneth asked. "Tell me. I might be missing out on something."

"When you marry Kay Francis, I'm sure she'll teach you on your honeymoon. I'm saying no more."

"I'm still going to pursue women on all fronts, but I'm going to taper off when Helen comes to town," Bogie said.

"You mean Miss Menken?" Kenneth asked in surprise.

"One and the same," Bogie said. "She'll be staying at the Garden of Allah. I'm sure I'll be spending my nights there."

"Have you all but forgotten Mary back in New York?" Kenneth asked. "I'm still carrying a torch for her."

"Yeah," Bogie said. "Would you have stayed in New York if Mary had married you instead of me?"

"No way," Kenneth said. "I think my future is in Hollywood. But I think I could have convinced Mary to come with me."

"In a way I'm glad she's back in New York, because I'll be returning there soon," he said. "I still want to stay married to her. We'll wipe our slates clean and start all over again."

"Does she have a clue about what you're up to out here?" Kenneth asked.

"Not unless you've written her."

"My lips are sealed," Kenneth said, "I think at this point in our lives, we shouldn't stop to analyze what's happening. Let's just let the good times roll."

Suddenly, a messenger arrived from Fox Studios. Opening the package, Bogie learned that he'd been assigned fourth billing in his final film at Fox. Entitled A Holy Terror, it would be directed by Irving Cummings, who had previously guided him through A Devil with Women. He'd be appearing with the star of the picture, George O'Brien.

As he read the script, he was even more startled to learn that it was a western based on Max Brand's novel, Trailin'. In the film, Bogie was slated to play Steve Nash, foreman of the Drew ranch, who's in love with a character played by Sally Eilers.

The city boy from New York was about to play his first cowboy role.

He'd had a lovely evening with Joan Blondell, during which she'd served what she described as one of her favorite dishes—mashed rutabagas mixed with mashed potatoes. Fortunately, she'd also baked a ham as well. That was his favorite. As he related to Kenneth the following morning, "Sex with Joan has become what I imagine it's like between a married couple who's been together for many many years. It's comfortable and safe, but completely without fireworks."

Kenneth seemed relatively unconcerned about Bogie's sex life that morning. He was distracted by plans for his upcoming wedding to Kay Francis. Once again, he secured a promise that Bogie would be there as his best man.

Bogie agreed for a final time, then reminded him that Helen Menken would be arriving in Hollywood soon and checking into the Garden of Allah.

"I adore Helen," Kenneth said. "Bring her to the wedding."

Some of Kay's friends are throwing some parties for us this week. We'd love it if you and Helen could come to any or all of them. I'll slip the invitations under your door."

"That sounds great," Bogie said, "Helen would meet some film people. She already knows everybody on Broadway."

"Wouldn't it be ironic if Helen became a bigger film star than either of us?"

"Things like that happen," Bogie said, lighting up his seventh cigarette of the morning. "But if I make all these appearances at all these parties, people will think I'm back with Helen. Hollywood is a small town. Word will get back to Mary."

"So what?" Kenneth asked. "Mary knows you're sleeping with other gals. And don't kid yourself. Mary hasn't exactly been behaving like a nun recently. I'm sure she has a steady stream of beaux."

"That's our marriage agreement," Bogie said. "It's OK for me to fool around with other women, unless that other woman happens to be Helen.& Mary won't exactly be thrilled by any of this."

"Maybe Mary will divorce you after all," Kenneth said with a wink.

Bogie clinched his fist and pretended to give Kenneth a sock in the jaw. "Still pining for Mary, huh? Here you are about to marry Kay, and you're still trying to steal my wife."

"Hey," Kenneth said, "I've got a sharp eye for a movie plot. How about writing a screenplay together about this romantic entanglement? I bet we could sell it."

"And maybe we couldn't," Bogie said. "About this wedding. Is it going to be a big affair?"

"No. The wedding itself will be very small. The guests include you, Helen, and one or two of Kay's friends. That's why Kay is seeing all of her friends and getting congratulations and, we hope, lots of presents before the actual marriage ceremony."

"Smart thinking," Bogie said, glancing at the clock. "I've got to go to work. Sounds like we'll have a gay old time this week with all the parties and everything."

"It's your chance to score this week," Kenneth said. "You'll be meeting some of the top broads in Hollywood. Too bad you'll be with your wife."

"My former wife," Bogie corrected him. "We're divorced, remember? And besides, even when we were married, Helen and I had an open marriage. And she's likely to be heavily booked during her time out here, spending time with some of her former girl friends, including Tallulah, who's also at the Garden of Allah."

“It’s going to be interesting,” Kenneth said. “I wish I could follow you around with a camera this week.”

“After the marriage, are you still going to be fooling around?”

“Sure. Kay and I both understand that our marriage will be mainly for show. I’m doing it to boost my career in Hollywood. Being married to a major movie star might help. That’s why you married Helen—to advance your career on Broadway.”

“Something like that,” he said. Kenneth’s words evoked a sour memory.

“Kay’s becoming big out here, really big. She’s defined as one of the top five actresses in Hollywood, with lots of attention from the press. Her fans want to see her with a handsome and adoring husband.”

“Good luck,” Bogie said. “Yours will be just one of many lavender marriages out here.”

“No, it’ll be a real marriage,” Kenneth said. “A complicated Hollywood marriage with lovers of all persuasions coming and going. I like women more than I like men. Just ask your wife. On the other hand, Kay likes women more than she likes men. But she’s very attracted to men. The first time I took Kay out, she said, ‘I’m not a star. I’m a woman. And I want to get fucked.’ We’ll just have to work out our sleeping arrangements.”

It was a different Helen Menken he met at the train depot. Her immaculate clothes, even her hat, looked more Fifth Avenue than Hollywood and Vine. She had New York written all over her. He could not imagine a woman who looked less Californian.

As he rushed toward her to take her in his arms and kiss her, he encountered a woman no longer in the spring of her life. Her face was still young but it was more mature, a bit harsher, and a bit less forgiving.

She made no effort to probe into his personal life, other than to say, “A handsome devil like you must be the sensation of half the Hollywood cuties out here—that is, the few that George Raft hasn’t already subdued.”

“Something like that,” he said as nonchalantly as possible.

By the time they’d reached the parking lot of the Garden of Allah, Helen had brought him up to date on all the news of Broadway and several mutual acquaintances. No mention was made of his present wife, except one. “I saw Mary the other day,” she said. “She’s put on a few pounds, but the extra weight is agreeable to her figure. She’s getting work, but neither of us is the sensation of Broadway these days, the way we imagined it would be when we were younger. In fact, with so few shows because of the Depression, Broadway is a pretty dismal place.”

He wanted to ask Helen if she knew who Mary was dating or perhaps even shacked up with, but he restrained himself. “Sorry to hear about the depressed state of affairs. That’s real bad news for me. I’m planning to go back to New York and try for a job on Broadway. Fox isn’t going to renew me. They don’t know what to do with me. In a few weeks I’m leaving Hollywood for good.”

“It’s a ghastly place out here,” she said. “You and I are New Yorkers. We don’t belong outside the civilized world.”

“C’mon, let me show you to your new home.” He went around to the trunk to get her luggage.

She stood looking at the façade of the Garden of Allah, now functioning as a somewhat rundown colony of rentable cottages.

“I can’t believe that this was once Nazimova’s private home. I still see her on and off. It’s hard to imagine that she was once queen of MGM.”

“Garbo seems to have filled her shoes.”

“I suppose you’re right,” she said. “I didn’t think Garbo would survive the advent of talking pictures. I guess her audience wants whiskey pronounced viskey."

"You talk real pretty," he said, "and look great. I hope to take you around to a lot of parties. Maybe some director will discover you out here and make you a big star like Garbo."

"Oh, Hump," she said, heading for the reception desk as if she already knew where to go. "The Twenties are dead and gone. That was a time for daydreaming. It's the grim Thirties now."

In the privacy of her bungalow, she told him that it was almost certain that a production of her lesbian play, The Captive, would be mounted on the stages of Los Angeles. "I'm out here negotiating the deal now." She paused. "That and other things."

For whatever reason, she chose not to tell him what she meant by "other things," which was a signal to him that he would be with her only on certain days, leaving the rest of her Hollywood sojourn a private affair.

"I don't get it," he said. "In New York, that play got you thrown into jail. What makes you think the Los Angeles police won't do the same thing? If anything, they're a lot more liberal in New York than out here. If what they define as perversion is depicted on the screen today, it's got to be hidden. No more Erich von Stroheim. He was the last of that era of decadence, I'm sorry to say."

"We'll see," she said enigmatically. "I have my assurances we're going forward with the project. I can't give you any details until I know more." She waved her arms theatrically. "Here I am installed in my new home in California but with yesterday's husband."

As she twirled around the room, that old sexual stirring came back to him. He still desired this woman.

"I know you just got into town," he said, "and haven't even unpacked. But I've got to know something."

"Whatever do you want to know," she said, coming up to him and kissing him on both cheeks. "You divine, handsome thing you. If anything, in maturity you've grown more beautiful."

"C'mon, Helen," he said. "Even on my finest day no one ever calls me beautiful."

"Handsome then." She kissed him on the lips. "Still keeping those lips moist for me, are you?"

"Yeah," he said. "I've got to know something. When a woman divorces her husband, does said husband have to surrender his conjugal rights, or can he reclaim them at any time?"

"It doesn't matter what the legal restrictions are with me," she said. "If you're talking about that marriage contract between Helen Menken and one Humphrey Bogart, I view the bond as unbroken. Said husband can reclaim those rights whenever he wants to."

"Glad to hear that," he said, taking off his jacket and beginning a striptease in front of her.

"If you're taking off your clothes, I guess you're glad to see me."

En route to the bedroom, she promised him lots of loving before her eight o'clock engagement. "When she heard I was coming to California, Lilyan Tashman wrote me. She wants me to come over for dinner tomorrow night as a means of celebrating my arrival in Los Angeles. As part of your Hollywood rounds, have you met up with the Miss Tashman yet?"

She did not wait for his response, but continued, "Both Katharine Cornell and Nazimova told me Tashman is absolutely divine. Even though married, I hear she has a thing for the ladies. I'll have to be careful that she doesn't seduce me, too."

That did it for him. As he mounted Helen and plowed her good, he was more zealous in his efforts because his brain was flashing images of Lilyan Tashman and not the picture of the woman beneath him. From the ecstatic look on her face, Helen was none the wiser.

Later, when he was spent and she too was exhausted, she whispered in his ear. “I don’t know who’s been letting you fuck them in Hollywood, but your technique has improved.”

Bogie didn’t reach the set of A Holy Terror until eleven o’clock that morning. Sucked into the tangled affairs of his roller-coaster private life, he had paid little attention to the script. But when called for a wardrobe fitting, he began to take his role of Steve Nash more seriously. In full cowboy garb, he was to play the foreman of a ranch opposite that handsome, body beautiful stud, George O’Brien.

Greg Brooks had fitted Bogie with a beige-colored Stetson, a six-shooter, a gigantic red handkerchief, which he was to wear around his neck like a tie, a pair of black-and-white striped pants (for some reason), a black shirt, and a battered old leather jacket.

Even Bogie laughed at himself when he saw his image in a full- length mirror. He could never make a convincing cowboy on screen.

After carefully studying his figure, Brooks said, “something’s not right. You’re just too short to be a cowboy.”

“What do you suggest?” Bogie asked. “You got something to make me grow taller?”

Brooks thought for a minute before sending his wardrobe assistant to fetch a pair of shoes for Bogie. When he returned, Brooks insisted that Bogie put on a pair of elevator boots. “That way you can stand up with O’Brien eyeball to eyeball in your scenes together.”

Horrified, Bogie put on the elevator shoes and walked around the dressing room. “I’m walking on God damn stilts. I feel like a fucking dummy.”

George O'Brien

“You’re getting paid $750 a week, aren’t you?” Brooks asked. “That’s a lot more than a lot of actors at Fox are taking home. Why don’t you just wear the shoes and quit griping?”

“Griping is what I do,” Bogie said. “It’s my specialty.”

“Take off your shirt,” Brooks demanded.

“What?” Bogie asked, astonished. “Am I supposed to strip down for you? I’ve dealt with you little fairy boys from wardrobe before. With me, sweet cakes,& you can dream but not touch.”

“Don’t flatter yourself, Bogart,” Brooks snapped. “You’re not my type at all. I go for he-men. Now take off your shirt. We’ve got a real problem here.”

Although infuriated, Bogie still wanted to earn that paycheck. He pulled off his shirt. Brooks went over to a drawer and pulled out two strips of white padding. “For some of our insufficiently endowed actors, we fake it. Since you don’t have shoulders, I’ll create some for you.”

As reluctant as he was to do it, Bogie allowed Brooks to apply tape and padding to his shoulders. When Bogie put his shirt back on and stared at his image in the mirror, he was impressed. Unlike the elevator shoes, which he detested, the padding did make him look more like a fully developed man who could be the tough foreman of a ranch.

The person Bogie encountered on the set was Sally Eilers. “I’m sure he’s already told you,” she said in a low voice. “But when I’m not hooting with Hoot Gibson, I’m seeing your friend, Mr. Spencer Tracy. He’s a wild one.”

The existence of that liaison had escaped Bogie. When Tracy was with him, he spent more time talking about the men he was seeing instead of the women he was seducing. “He failed to fill me in on that one.”

“In the case of Spence, he’s got so many women he probably loses track,” Eilers said.

“That’s our boy Spence,” he said

On the set George O’Brien came up to Bogie and invited him for a drink in his dressing room. Minutes later, O’Brien poured him a whiskey before filling a glass most generously for himself. “Love your shoes,” he said.

“The less said about them the better. Couldn’t they photograph me standing on a rock or on a staircase looking down at you?”

O’Brien pulled off his shirt. As Bogie was to learn during the shoot of A Holy Terror, O’Brien took every opportunity to pull off his shirt. Bogie could-n’t help but admire his muscles, which reminded him of his own padded shoulders. Brooks was right. O’Brien didn’t need any padding.

O’Brien was quick to detect Bogie’s interest in his physique. Very bluntly he asked, “Are you a homosexual, like my best buddy, Spence?”

“Like hell!” Bogie said defensively. “I’ve got a lot of credentials to prove otherwise. I can summon witnesses if& necessary.”

George O'Brien, Spencer Tracy

“Don’t get so rattled,” O’Brien cautioned him. “I wanted to know who I have to fuck on this picture. I know that Eilers is after me. I’ve already done Brooks in wardrobe. The director’s not a fairy, or at least I don’t think so. Who knows? The picture’s not over yet.”

“Rest assured you can keep your pants on around me.”

“It’s good to clear the air in the very& beginning,” O’Brien said. “When it comes to sex I don’t like to beat around the bush. I come right out with it.” He laughed at his own remark. That sounds sexually suggestive, doesn’t it?”

“I’m beginning to think everything in Hollywood sounds sexually suggestive,” Bogie said.

He remained long enough to finish his whiskey, but his presence in O’Brien’s dressing room seemed so completely unnecessary that he quickly excused himself and left.

“Mama didn’t raise no cowboy,” he said to himself as he headed to his dressing room to change out of his uncomfortable Western gear.

After leaving the studio, he drove to the Garden of Allah to take Helen for dinner. He found her still dressing when he came into the room. He took her in his arms and kissed her with more than the usual passion. “I made a big mistake,” he whispered in her ear. “We should have stayed together. I should never have married Mary.”

“It was my fault,” she said. “All my fault that we broke up.”

His need for her—his need for any woman, but especially for her—was greater than it had been even when they’d had their reunion in Los Angeles.

Sensing that need, she said in a soft voice, “Dinner will have to wait.” She led him to her bed.

The next morning on the set of A Holy Terror, Bogie, dressed in cowboy drag, had only one scene, after which he was finished for the day.

When O’Brien invited him for lunch, Bogie accepted. Although he wanted to order his typical ham and eggs, O’Brien had insisted that he ask for huevos rancheros instead. “The cook in the commissary is Mexican, and they’re really good.”

For himself, O’Brien asked for four raw avocados. “It’s my favorite food. For breakfast, I eat an avocado sandwich on white toast. For lunch I eat them raw with just a little bit of lemon juice. At night I always make guacamole, which I eat as an appetizer before I order a very lean and very rare steak. It keeps my skin young and beautiful.” He leaned over to Bogie. “Go on. Feel the skin of my face. Tell me skin like that can only be compared to a baby’s ass.”

“Hell, man,” Bogie said, “I don’t want to be seen sitting here in the commissary running my fingers across your cheek. People will think we’re a couple of fags.”

“Don’t be such a sissy,” O’Brien urged. “Go on. Rub my skin.”

When he sensed that no one was watching them, Bogie ran his fingers across O’Brien’s cheek. “That’s smooth skin all right, a hell of a lot smoother than mine. I’m not aging well. Starting tomorrow, I’m gonna go on the avocado diet like you.” He reached for a cigarette. “Smooth as your skin is, I’d rather be running my hands over the breasts of—say, Jean Harlow.”

“Relax, relax,” O’Brien told him. “You don’t have to assert your heterosexual credentials around me. I’m not going to put the make on you. You’re not my type. Either man or woman, I insist they have great bodies. You don’t look like you have any physical fitness regime at all. Wardrobe told me they had to pad your shoulders. And those fucking high-heeled boots you wear— that’s not my idea of a man who’s tall in the saddle like I like ‘em.”

Blowing smoke toward him, Bogie said, “I guess that means you’re not going to ask me out.”

Since neither man was needed on the set for the rest of the day, O’Brien invited him to go swimming at Santa Monica. Bogie said that he didn’t have any trunks. O’Brien told him that his house was on the way to the ocean, and they could drop off there and change.

An hour later, Bogie found himself in O’Brien’s home. Although the actor kept himself incredibly well groomed, he obviously didn’t have a maid come in too often to clean his house. It was a pigsty. Dirty dishes piled high in the sink were growing mold, and newspapers and magazines littered the floor. Cups of coffee and platters of half-eaten, long-rotted food were seen about the living room, and the dark wood furnishings looked as if they’d barely survived the Dust Bowl.

When O’Brien emerged from his bedroom, he was stark naked, a most impressive sight. Bogie could only dream of having a physique like the star. “You’re not my size,” O’Brien said to him. “A buddy left these trunks here. I think you can fit into them.”

“I’ll let you in on another one of my beauty secrets,” O’Brien said, as Bogie stripped down to get into his swim suit.

Observing Bogie’s less than perfect figure, O’Brien said, “We’ve got to get you on a new regime of a sensible diet and vigorous physical exercise to build up your body. You probably drink too much. I take it easy with the booze. I notice you lighting up a cigarette every minute. I confine myself to one after-dinner cigar, and I don’t inhale. Your hair too is a problem. You look like a man who is going to loose his hair before he’s forty. The trick is you’ve got to dry your hair thoroughly when you shower or go into the water. Water rots hair. If you keep your hair wet, it’ll start to fall out.”

At the beach O’Brien the athlete attracted a lot of attention. Several of his female fans approached him asking for autographs. The actor seemed in his element, and it was obvious that he adored showing off his body. After all, he was called “The Chest.”

Bogart as a cowboy in A Holy Terror

The beach didn’t bring any cheer to Bogie, as he sat watching the adoration heaped on O’Brien by half the women on the beach. The star had made him feel inadequate, and he’d never been proud of his body. “How,” he asked himself,& “was he ever going to become a leading man in films without a great body?” As each day went by, he thought more and more about heading back to New York. Of course, that too could be a problem. Helen had told him that there were longer lines at the soup kitchen than at the Broadway theaters.

One night at a party honoring Kay Francis and Kenneth, they had arranged for him to meet gossip maven Louella Parsons, claiming she might jump-start his film career and he could remain on the West Coast.

Bogie was ushered into a library. Seated in a large love seat beside the fireplace, Parsons was busy emptying her latest glass.

With his own drink in hand—he’d lost count of how many he’d had—he introduced himself to Parsons. She said nothing but motioned for him to sit down.

As unbelievable as it seemed at the time, Parsons still considered herself one of Hollywood’s “glamour gals,” although even then she was well on her way toward becoming the hag of Tinseltown.

She had removed a notebook from her purse into which she scribbled some information—probably misinformation—that had gotten trapped in her soggy brain. After that, she reached for her compact and smeared on an extra heavy application of blood-red lipstick, even more of a five-alarm fire tube than Clara Bow wore.

“Bogart,” she said, finally staring at him with those steely eyes that had seen too much. “I’ve been meaning to interview you but have been too busy. With every guy on Broadway getting off the train daily, how can I possibly interview every out-of-work actor who hits town trying to make a buck in Hollywood?”

“You’ve got a point there, pal,” he said, reaching for his drink which he’d placed on a coffee table.

Gossip maven Louella Parsons

“Even when I interview somebody, all I hear is their lies,” she said.

“Maybe that’s because the real and the illusional in Hollywood are inextricable,” he said.

“God damn,” she said harshly. “An intellectual. If there’s one kind of actor I positively hate, it’s an intellectual.”

“That I’m not,” he said. “You can print in your column that I was kicked out of Andover. Not only for poor grades, but for being a bad boy.”

“That’s it!” she said. She motioned to a whiskey bottle left on a table beside the French doors. “Pour me some of that and don’t be& stingy, baby. I’m misquoting a line from that Garbo flick, Anna Christie.”

“Yeah, I got that.” He also got up to get her that whiskey and to replenish his own supply. When he gave her the drink, he asked, “What did you mean by, ‘That’s it!’”

“I need a peg to hang a label onto you,” she said. “A college dropout. I bet that as the bad boy of Andover, you got into a lot of trouble with girls. Yeah, that’s it. I’m gonna call you the bad boy of Hollywood.”

“Seems like I have a lot of competition for that title,” he said. “George Raft, for instance.”

“Hell with him,” she said. “He’s nothing but a New York gangster. If he gets to play gangsters in movies, it’ll be type-casting.” Slugging down a hefty swig of that bootleg whiskey, she aimed her eagle eye at him once again. “I’ve got to ask you something right off the bat. That lisp of yours. It bothers me. I know you’re married, but are you a fairy like William Haines? Forgive me, but I have to ask. All the butterflies from Broadway are descending on us out here. It’s very hard to make fairies sound manly in my column. Just how many more times do I have to write that Ramon Novarro is still waiting for the right gal?”

They both chuckled at that, and he felt that he’d broken through to her. “I’m strictly a man for the ladies. I find myself having to keep repeating that. But I don’t expect you to take my word for that. I’m here with Helen Menken tonight. Otherwise, I’d show you what a man I am.”

“Yes, I’ve met your wife. Charming.”

He meant to correct her and say “ex-wife,” but he just assumed that the custodian of all gossip in Hollywood was well aware that he’d married Mary Philips. Considering the shaky status of his marriage to Mary, he didn’t plan to mention her in the interview.

“What were you saying?” she asked. “About my not taking your word for it. If I can’t take your word for it, exactly how do you plan to prove it?”

“I didn’t think we’d progress this far so soon into the interview, but I do find you very attractive,” he said. “If you have any doubts about my manhood, I’d like to demonstrate otherwise. What I’m saying is you can put me to the test anytime.”

She smiled. “You find me attractive, do you? My God, I’m just a working newspaperwoman trying to make a living in journalism. Hearst doesn’t pay me enough. I find myself having to fight off half the wolves in Hollywood.”

“I didn’t mean to insult you,” he said. “But you are one good-looking woman. What can I say? In spite of my lisp, I like glamorous women.”

“We’ll see about that,” she said, studying him carefully with a greatly renewed interest. “I’ve heard a lot of stories about you since you hit town.”

“I bet at least one of them is true,” he said smiling.

Her face looked puzzled. It was as if she weren’t communicating on the same level with him. “I seek the truth but I’m surrounded by lies. People talk lies. They live lies, and with good reason. If the real truth were known about half the stars in Hollywood, the American public would stay away from their movies in droves.”

“When we have our interview, I’m going to give it to you straight,” he said.

She reached for her notepad again. “Give me your private phone number in case I want to get in touch with you.” As he told her the number, she wrote it down in her drunken scrawl.

He felt that he’d carried his flirtatious joking with her far enough and was eager to drop the subject. He was certain that she wouldn’t remember his offer the next morning as she nursed her hangover. Even if she did, he knew that she’d never take him up on it.

“I meant to write you a note and thank you for that good review you gave Spence and me in Up The River. Mainly Spence, of course. I even carry it around in my wallet along with a review that Alexander Woollcott wrote of my Broadway appearance in Swifty. He wrote, ‘The young man who embodies the aforesaid sprig is what is usually and mercifully described as inadequate.’”

“Hell with that drunken Woollcott,” she said. “What did I write?”

He found her review tucked between some ten-dollar bills in his wallet. He read her own words to her. “Humphrey Bogart, talented New York juvenile, plays the part of Steve straight and does it very well.”

“That was very nice of me,” she said. “Actually I was very kind to you and Tracy. Frankly, I can skip prison dramas. They’re too grim for my taste. America is in the middle of a Depression. We need movies with glamorous women in glamorous settings doing rich, glamorous things. Americans should be treated to a fantasy when they go to the movies. It’ll take their minds off their troubles, their empty refrigerators, and all those mortgage foreclosures.”

He carefully put the clipping away. “About that juvenile remark.”

“What about it?” she asked imperiously, almost defying him to challenge her copy.

“It’s the juvenile thing,” he said. “I’m trying to get away from that. On Christmas Day, I’m gonna be thirty-one years old. I’ve played all those ‘Tennis, anyone?’ roles on Broadway. Out here I’m trying for more adult parts.”

“I didn’t know you were thirty-one,” she said. “You don’t look it on the screen. I thought you were much younger. That Helen Menken has literally robbed the cradle. She must be in her late forties or early fifties if she’s a day. Women can’t lie to me about their age. I can just look at a woman, no matter how much makeup she has on, and tell her exact age.”

“And as for men?” he asked.

“They can fool me,” she said. She gave him the look of a boa constrictor about to devour a young chicken for its supper. “Now that I know your exact age, I must say I’ll have to reconsider that very romantic offer you made me. I have an absolute rule. I never go to bed with a man in his twenties. A lot of young actors proposition me because they think they’ll advance their careers by sleeping with me. I’ve already slept with Clark Gable. With the pick of all the beauties in Hollywood, he went to bed with me. He also went to bed with that bitch, Adela Rogers St. Johns. She’s my rival, you know. She thinks she knows so much about Hollywood. I’ve forgotten more than she’ll ever know.”

“I heard that Gable was born in 1901,” he said. “Did he turn thirty before you guys bedded down?”

“I know I said a man has to be thirty. In Clark’s case, I made an exception. In many ways, I wish I hadn’t slept with Clark. Now my illusion about him is spoiled.”

“I hope I don’t disappoint,” he said, teasing her.

“I have a feeling you can deliver,” she said. “Sometimes one of us glamour gals can only laugh when these He-men take off their trousers. But I’ve discovered that some of you guys who look like a runt are surprisingly pleasing when you let it all hang out.”

She downed the rest of her whiskey and motioned to him that she wanted another refill. “Now let’s get down to this God damn interview. I know you’re physically attracted to me, but that doesn’t mean that I’m going to let you off easy. I don’t feel like a candy-ass tonight, believe you me.”

After her interview, she reached for his arm. “Escort me back into the party. Before leaving the library, she kissed him on the mouth. Her brewery breath was foul. “I’m flattered by your offer.”

He had hoped that she’d forgotten it.

“I’ll call you next week.” She looked up lovingly into his eyes. “I’m sure we’ll have a fine old time when we get together again."

With Parsons on his arm, he came back into the main living room and shuddered at the prospect of facing her again, especially if they were alone.

Back on the set of A Holy Terror, a message was left for him. "It's important that we get together—and soon!" It was signed "Miss D." He guessed that Miss D was actually Bette Davis.

Since her Hollywood star didn't seem to be shining any brighter than his, he wondered what she wanted with him. He suspected that she didn't really like him, so he doubted if romance were on her mind. Maybe she'd stumbled onto a hot script that would make both of them overnight sensations.

He needed something to happen and fast.

Hung over, disheveled, and burnt out, he headed for wardrobe.

Tapping his foot impatiently, Greg Brooks, known around the Fox lot as "the wardrobe mistress," said, "My, oh my, aren't we looking déshabillée today."

"Listen, you little faggot," Bogie said, "get out your fucking padding and your high heels and get it over with before I bash your skull in."

"Aren't we the ferocious tigre ?" Brooks said. "Didn't get any last night? Thank God you didn't call me." He licked his lips. "I was too preoccupied."

At that moment the director, Irving Cummings, came into the department.& Anger flashed across his face as he turned to confront Bogie. "Listen, asshole, and listen good. I can replace you tomorrow with any of about a thousand better actors. You're totally wrong for the part, and Fox is only using you because some idiot signed a contract giving you $750 a week. Actors like you I can get for $25 a week." He backed away from him. "You're hung over and you smell like a brewery. I'm reporting all of this to Carl Laemmle."

"Junior or senior?" Bogie asked provocatively.

The director glared at him and seemed out of control. "After we wrap this picture, you'll never get another job in this town. I'll see to that." Cummings stormed out of the wardrobe department.

Bogie tried to get a grip on himself. He'd wanted to punch Cummings in the mouth.

Later that day, and to punish him, Cummings made him shoot a simple scene forty-five times. The director seemed to be sadistically torturing Bogie and humiliating him in front of cast members.

Fortunately, he'd brought a flask with him. "Instead of becoming the greatest actor in motion pictures, I'm going to become the biggest star on Broadway?"

He stood at a safe distance from the dressing room of Sally Eilers. It was obvious that Tracy had been carrying on with Hoot Gibson's wife since they made Quick Millions together. Eilers was the first to leave, since she was due on the set.

After she'd disappeared, Bogie walked up to her dressing room door and knocked on it. In his underwear, with drink in hand, Tracy opened the door. Seeing who it was, he embraced Bogie warmly. "We're supposed to be best friends, and I never get to see you any more. Come on in."

"Aren't you afraid Hoot Gibson will show up with a six-gun?" Bogie asked.

"Not at all," Tracy said. "Sally has told me about the kind of marriage they have. Actually I learned today she plans to divorce him."

“It’s probably a smart career move for her,” Bogie said, accepting a drink. “Her star is rising. There’s talk she’s going to become big. Her sagebrush cowboy is riding off into the sunset.”

“Don’t knock sagebrush flickers,” Tracy kidded him. “You seem to be making an oater yourself.”

Sally Eilers

“After I get dressed and have a drink or two with you,” Tracy said, “I’m going to head over to George’s dressing room. I like George a lot. He’s a real loving he-man, unlike that girl, Lew Ayres.”

“George and Sally on the same afternoon?” Bogie chided him. “You’re more of a man than I am.”

“We both know that,” Tracy said, smiling to erase the sting from his remark. “George and Sally are both on my plate for the afternoon. Tonight I’ve got a date with Jean Harlow.” When Bogie didn’t say anything, Tracy asked him, “Did you hear that?”

“Yeah, I heard it,” he said. “You and Harlow must have had one gay old time on the set of Goldie, a picture I think should be called Blondie.”

“Harlow’s an okay kid,” he said. “Mixed up in the head. A sick family life with her stepfather lusting after her, a mother who’s nuts, and an even worse situation emerging with this Paul Bern creature from the dark lagoon.”

“Spence, old pal,” Bogie said, pouring another drink. “I like you a lot. More than I like Kenneth MacKenna. He’s my pal, and I tell him everything that’s going on in my life, but I have a special feeling for you.”

“Are you coming on to me?” Tracy asked with just a slight touch of mockery in his voice, as if to leave open the possibility he might be joking.

“Cut the crap!” Bogie said. “I have a hard time accepting that part of your life. I mean, I can see you banging Eilers while the grips outside are dreaming of being locked between your spurs. I can see you dating your co-star tonight. Let’s face it: Harlow is the sex symbol of Hollywood. All the men want her. What I can’t even picture—don’t dare picture—is you and guys. George O’Brien, for God’s sake. Mr. Avocado Sandwich.

“I love you, Bogie, but I feel you’re very limited somehow. Many of the pleasures that God put on this earth for us to partake of, especially forbidden fruit, are not to be enjoyed by you. Your mind’s closed off.”

“My loss, pal,” Bogie said, “and that’s how I’m gonna keep it. But if you think for one minute I’m gonna picture you as a pansy like Ramon Novarro and Billy Haines, you’re wrong.”

“You said it all. I’m a man’s man in more ways than one.”

“But I hear from people who work with you that you fuck every pretty gal on the set of one of your pictures,” Bogie said. “Not just your female leads, but the secretaries, the script gal, the waitress who serves you a BLT in the commissary.”

“It’s true, I do,” Tracy said. “I also fuck beautiful guys. By the way, I’m a top. Screwing a man in the ass is different from fucking a woman. Another kind of satisfaction.”

“I know what you’re saying,” Bogie said “but I’ll never understand it. To me, you’re the least homosexual male in Hollywood.”

“You’ll learn as you go through life that we come in the most unlikely packages. The captains of football teams. The heads of industry. Boxers. Weightlifters. Generals. Even one of the presidents of the United States.”

“What president was a fag?”

“Abraham Lincoln.”

“I don’t believe that,” Bogie said. “You’re putting me on.”

“Read your history books,” Tracy said. “His lover was Joshua Fry Speed. You fuck too many women at night. You should take a night off and read a history book once in a while.”

“You’re one to talk.”

“I’m serious,” Tracy said. “Read about Lincoln and Speed, a handsome young man from Kentucky who slept with Lincoln for three years in a very narrow bed. Speed later wrote that no two men were more intimate than Lincoln and him.”

“Why should I doubt your word?” Bogie asked. “After these months logged in Hollywood, I’ve seen it all.”

“If I may correct you, you’ve seen a bit,” Tracy said. “But you haven’t seen it all. After another thirty years, you’ll have seen it all.”

Back at his bleak apartment, a sole letter had arrived. It was postmarked from New York, and he tore it open at once, knowing it was from his wife.

Dear Hump,
